This identification of the third item as the Homilies is in part based upon accepting the correction of "500 pages" to read "50." A page of handwritten notes on which the formal typed report is apparently based does in fact use the figure 50. This figure and the reference to travels are clearly used in the later quotations to refer to Codex D, the Homilies, Polotsky's first publication. This would mean that the first item listed in the Notes of May 5 1932 as belonging to Beatty, though described as "in the form of homilies," is not Codex D, the Homilies. It and the second item ("an epistle") would have to be, one, Codex B, the Synaxeis; and the other, Codex C, volume two of the Kephalaia. For the fourth item "in two parts" would be, as the handwritten note ("? in the form of hymns") would indicate, Codex A, the Psalms. Thus, between March 23, 1930 (when one part of Codex A, the Psalms, was acquired), and February 19, 1932 (the date of Ibscher's report mailed from Berlin), Beatty must have acquired four additional items: a second part of Codex A and Codices B–D. If the second part of Codex A and Codex D were acquired in April 1931, the details of the acquisition of Codices B and C remain unknown.

Rolf Ibscher has indicated that the nomenclature of Beatty's codices as A, B, and C was used by Hugo Ibscher, but that the designation of the Homilies with a letter D was first introduced by himself.

> Hence, up until 1938, of Sir Chester Beatty's part of the discovery, fully conserved were only the pack of the Psalms and the incomplete Homilies that lay beside it at the acquisition of the discovery, which also as the first publication could be presented by Polotsky to an expectant public.
>
> Of the three codices, which my father had designated A, B, C as working titles (whereby the independent Homilies should actually have been designated D), A, B, and C were only partially restored.[5]

This is a further reflection of the sense in which the minor part of the Homilies codex that Beatty actually purchased, though it was the first thing that Hugo Ibscher completely conserved and that Polotsky published, was not fully recognized as an entity in its own right but was associated with the Psalms, in light of the fact that the Psalms and the Homilies had been acquired together.

5. Ibscher, "Mani und kein Ende," 220.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 3 —

The Conservation by Hugo Ibscher

The original essay of Schmidt and Polotsky had been accompanied by a report from Hugo Ibscher, who had been entrusted with the conservation of the codices. Here he described their physical condition as follows:[1]

When the Mani manuscripts reached the Berlin Museum through the good offices of Prof. Schmidt, they were described by a few gentlemen as much-used foot mats, and by others as balls of peat. This is the best way to describe the state of preservation of these precious treasures. Surely every observer stood before these so-called books in doubt as to whether anything could ever be gotten out of them . . .

The bad state of preservation does not come from the age of the manuscripts, but must be attributed to the place of discovery, which, according to the information of Prof. Schmidt given above, is to be sought in a Coptic settlement not far from the south end of the Moris sea. Much older papyrus

Als die Mani-Handschriften durch Hrn. Prof. Schmidt in das Berliner Museum gelangten, wurden sie von einigen Herrn als vielbenutzte Fussmatten und von andern als Ballen Torf angesprochen. Hiermit ist die Erhaltung dieser kostbaren Schätze am besten gekennzeichnet. Zweifelnd stand wohl ein jeder Beschauer vor diesen sogenannten Büchern, ob sich jemals daraus etwas würde gewinnen lassen . . .

Der schlechte Erhaltungszustand liegt nicht am Alter der Handschriften, sondern muss auf den Fundort zurückzuführen sein, der nach den obigen Mitteilungen von Prof. Schmidt in einer koptischen Niederlassung unweit des Südendes des Mörissees zu suchen ist. Weit ältere Papyrusfunde, wie

1. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschriften," 81–82.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

finds, such as, e.g., the large Bible discovery that I have worked on in the most recent past, and many others, even if they have fallen into numberless fragments, are much firmer in their structure and can readily be handled with a little caution. In the case of the Mani manuscripts, water must have exerted its destructive effect, for all the volumes have after all been brought rather near to disintegration by the effect of the dampness. Only a few decades would have sufficed to make of the extant treasures a pile of humus, if the fortunate though unknown finder had not preserved them from that fate. The greatest danger for the manuscripts lies in this, that they are shot through and through with salt crystals, which penetrated through the effect of the water. Unfortunately the disintegration has advanced so far, however, that one may not apply any kind of dampness, through which the salt could have been removed, if one does not wish to endanger the manuscripts. Yet with the prerequisite knowledge, patience and skill one will succeed in saving even this treasure for science, as the successes attained thus far show quite adequately.

z.B. der von mir in letzter Zeit bearbeitete grosse Bibelfund und viele andere, sind, wenn auch in unzählige Fragmente zerfallen, in der Struktur viel fester und lassen sich bei einiger Vorsicht leicht hantieren. Bei den Mani-Handschriften muss das Wasser seine zerstörende Wirkung ausgeübt haben, sind doch alle Bände durch die Einwirkung der Feuchtigkeit dem Zerfall recht nahe gebracht. Nur wenige Jahrzehnte hätten genügt, um aus den vorhandenen Schätzen einen Haufen Humuserde zu machen, wenn nicht der glückliche, unbekannte Finder sie davor bewahrt hätte. Die grösste Gefahr für die Handschriften liegt darin, dass dieselben vollständig von Salzkristallen, die durch die Einwirkung des Wassers hineingedrungen sind, durchsetzt sind. Leider ist der Zerfall aber schon so weit vorgeschritten, dass man keinerlei Feuchtigkeit anwenden darf, wodurch das Salz entzogen werden könnte, will man nicht die Handschriften gefährden. Mit der nötigen Sachkenntnis, Geduld und Geschicklichkeit wird es aber gelingen, auch diesen Schatz für die Wissenschaft zu retten, wie die bisher erzielten Erfolge zur Genüge beweisen.

In 1964–1965 Rolf Ibscher summarized in retrospect the conservation activity of his father, Hugo Ibscher, as follows:[2]

2. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 50–51.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 51] [The Dublin] Homilies and Psalmbook and the Berlin Kephalaia—that was the sequence to which he [Hugo Ibscher] adhered. The other codices were worked on from time to time, to make it possible for Carl Schmidt to dip into them and thus to provide an overview for him and for himself . . .

[p. 50] Actually already in 1937 my father had . . . stopped exerting his over-taxed strength regularly on them.

[p. 51] [The Dublin] Homilien, Psalmbuch und Berliner Kephalaia—das war die Reihenfolge, bei der er [Hugo Ibscher] blieb. Die anderen Codices wurden zwischendurch ankonserviert, um Carl Schmidt ein Anlesen zu ermöglichen und damit einen Überblick ihm und sich zu verschaffen . . .

[p. 50] Mein Vater hatte eigentlich . . . schon 1937 aufgehört, regelmässig seine überforderte Kraft daran zu setzen . . .

In 1965 Rolf Ibscher reported on his father's conservation as follows:[3]

The making accessible of the papyrus material that at first was put in motion with so much effort, since it was rotted, made into peat, with the leaves completely bonded together because of salt crystals that had soaked in, of which Hans Heinrich Schaeder wrote: "Ibscher is performing true miracles of meditation and concentration when confronted with the material," came after about seven years in 1938 [the year Schmidt died] to what amounted to a standstill, since this work overexerted excessively the eyes and the nerves.

A letter of my father to Sir Chester Beatty of 1938 expressed that clearly: "The tension is too great. I must for a while interpose smaller tasks in between that provide a great deal of variety. One cannot make marathon runs constantly without paying the price."

Die anfänglich mühsam in Gang kommende Aufschliessung des verrotteten, vertorften, durch eingeschwemmte Salzkristalle die Blätter miteinander vollig verfilzenden Papyrusmaterials, von der Hans Heinrich Schaeder schrieb: "Ibscher vollbringt wahre Wunder der Andacht und Konzentration vor dem Material," kam nach rund sieben Jahren 1938 [the year Schmidt died] so gut wie zum Stillstand, da diese Arbeit masslos die Augen und die Nerven überbeansprucht.

Ein Brief meines Vaters an Sir Chester Beatty 1938 drückt das klar aus: "Die Anspannung ist zu gross. Ich muss einmal eine Zeitlang [p. 220] abwechslungsreiche kleinere Arbeiten da zwischen schieben. Man kann nicht ungestraft dauernd Marathonläufe machen."

3. Rolf Ibscher, "Mani und kein Ende," 219–20.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Hence, up until 1938, of Sir Chester Beatty's part of the discovery, fully conserved were only the ball of the Psalms and the incomplete Homilies that lay beside it at the acquisition of the discovery, which also as the first publication could be presented by Polotsky to an expectant public.

Of the three codices, which my father had designated A, B, C as working titles (whereby the independent Homilies should actually have been designated D), A, B, and C were only partially restored.

Of the four Berlin codices, only the codex of the Kephalaia was being worked on, and was edited by Polotsky and from 1934 on by Böhlig.

So war bis 1938 denn restlos vom Fundanteil Sir Chester Beattys nur das Konvolut des Psalmenbuchs und das diesem beim Erwerben des Fundes beiliegende unvollständige Homilienbuch, das auch als erste Edition durch Polotsky einer erwartungsvollen Mitwelt präsentiert werden konnte, restauriert worden.

Von den drei Codices, die mein Vater mit A, B, C als Arbeitstitel signierte, wobei die selbstständigen Homilien eigentlich mit D hätten bezeichnet werden müssen, waren A, B, C nur partienhaft restauriert worden.

Von den vier Berliner Codices war nur der Codex der Kephalaia in Arbeit und wurde von Polotsky und ab 1934 von Böhlig ediert.

In 1954 Rolf Ibscher had described the teamwork as follows:[4]

Dr. Polotsky functioned as coworker and the actual first editor both for parts of the London as well as for the Berlin manuscripts and, following him from 1934 on, when the awful political conditions in Germany forced a change, the young Charles Allberry for London and Dr. Böhlig for Berlin. From 1939 on, the continuation of the work for London stood still, and for Berlin too both the conservation [p. 3] and the editorial work came to a standstill in the

Als Mitarbeiter und eigentlicher Erstherausgeber sowohl für Teile der Londoner als auch Berliner Handschriften fungierte Dr. Polotsky und in seiner Nachfolge ab 1934, als die unseligen politischen Verhältnisse in Deutschland zu einer Änderung zwangen, für London der junge Charles Allberry und für Berlin Dr. Böhlig. Ab 1939 ruhte die Weiterarbeit für London, und auch für Berlin kam im Laufe des Jahres 1940 sowohl die konserva-

4. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 2–3. This unpublished lecture was presented at the twenty-third International Congress of Orientalists on August 23, 1954. The Chester Beatty Library supplied a typescript of this lecture to the Manichaean archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity. The work is cited according to the typescript except where otherwise indicated. See also Proceedings of the Twenty-Third, 359–60.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

course of the year 1940. My father no longer found inner repose for the minute detailed work on the Mani manuscripts.

torische [p. 3] als auch die editorische Arbeit zum Erliegen. Mein Vater fand keine innere Ruhe mehr für die minutiöse Feinarbeit an den Mani-Handschriften.

In 1955 Rolf Ibscher described as follows the way the project had finally ground to a halt:[5]

During the war this minutely detailed work, which could only be carried out in an atmosphere of the greatest repose, under secure conditions and with an absolute freedom from nervous strain, by the very nature of the case ultimately came to a complete halt. Also the scholarly work, handled at the end by Böhlig alone after the death of Schmidt in 1938, came to a standstill. The death of my father on May 26, 1943, marked a temporary end to all further conservation of the material.

Im Kriege kam diese minutiöse Feinstarbeit, die nur in einer Atmosphäre grösster Ruhe, gesicherter Verhältnisse und bei absoluter nervlicher Nichtbelastung geleistet werden kann, naturgemäss schliesslich zum völligen Erliegen. Auch die wissenschaftliche Erschliessung, zuletzt nach dem Tode von Schmidt 1938 von Böhlig allein bewältigt, kam zum Stilistand. Der Tod meines Vaters am 26. Mai 1943 setzte einen vorläufigen Schlussstrich unter jegliche weitere konservatorische Aufbereitung des Materials.

Rolf Ibscher itemized in 1954 what his father had conserved:[6]

For about 9 years my father had occupied himself almost without interruption with separating the leaves from the book blocks and impregnating and glassing the rescued material. His annual trips out of the country had become his recreation from this work that exhausted eyes and nerves.

Rund 9 Jahre hatte mein Vater fast ununterbrochen sich mit der Ablösung der Blätter von den Buchblöcken und der Imprägnierung des geretteten Materials und mit seiner Verglasung beschäftigt. Erholung von dieser die Augen und Nerven strapazierenden Arbeit

5. Rolf Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 2. This is an unpublished lecture presented at the Eighth International Papyrologists Congress in Vienna in 1955; Carsten Colpe supplied a typescript of this lecture to the Manichaean archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity.

6. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 5–6.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

According to his last estimation my father hoped at the beginning of the war to be able to end the work in nine more years. But it was to come otherwise. Then what was the status of the whole undertaking when the fateful year 1945 created also for this discovery a completely new kind of situation. What was extant conserved, how much was edited, and what ended up behind a thick question mark?

I begin with the Berlin part of the discovery:

Since 1941 10 fascicles of the important Kephalaia manuscript were in print, i.e., 125 leaves or 250 pages of text. In addition 25 leaves or 50 pages were in manuscript form with Kohlhammer in Stuttgart.

There may have been 100 more leaves or 200 pages of text already glassed, but not yet read.

Except for a remainder of some 20 leaves, this manuscript in the original has not, or not yet, returned to German possession. Neither I nor anyone else can say more about it.

The remainder of the manuscript, designated by my father as no longer conservable, was conserved in 1951 in connection with my first stay in London.

The second important Berlin manuscript is the collection of Mani's Letters. It was taken by me in 1944 to Bavaria together with the British manuscripts, where it still is, and in the meantime is being worked on there.

waren ihm dabei seine jährlichen Auslandsreisen geworden. Nach seiner letzten Schätzung hoffte mein Vater zu Beginn des Krieges, das Werk in weiteren 9 Jahren beenden zu können. Aber es sollte anders kommen. Wie war nun der Stand des ganzen Unternehmens, als das schicksalsschwere Jahr 1945 auch für diesen Fund eine völlig neuartige Lage schuf. Was lag konserviert vor, wieviel war ediert und was endete hinter einem dicken Fragezeichen? —

Ich beginne mit dem Berliner Fundanteil:

Seit 1941 lagen 10 Lieferungen der wichtigen Kephalaia-Handschrift gedruckt vor, d.h. 125 Blatt oder 250 Seiten Text. Dazu kamen 25 Blatt oder 50 Seiten im Manuskript bei Kohlhammer in Stuttgart liegend.

Verglast schon, aber noch ungelesen mögen weitere 100 Blatt oder 200 Seiten Text vorgelegen haben.

Bis auf einen Rest von einigen 20 Blatt ist diese Handschrift im Original jetzt nicht mehr oder noch nicht wieder in deutschen Besitz zurückgekehrt. Mehr kann weder ich noch irgend jemand anderes darüber aussagen.

Der Rest der Handschrift, von meinem Vater als nicht weiter konservierbar bezeichnet, wurde 1951 im Anschluss an meinen ersten Londonaufenthalt konserviert.

Die zweite wichtige Berliner Handschrift ist die Briefsammlung Manis. Sie wurde zusammen mit den Britischen Handschriften von mir 1944 nach Bayern gebracht, wo sie noch liegt und inzwischen dort bearbeitet wird.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[Six] leaves of this collection of Letters separated by my father as well as 41 [31] leaves of another manuscript [P15995] still conserved by my father and two complete book units thus far unconserved [P15997 and P15998] have also not yet returned into German possession. That means ca. 500 leaves yet to be conserved or about 1,000 pages of text . . .

[p. 6] The Chester Beatty part of the discovery was in the fortunate situation of having survived the war and its consequences complete and intact.

The book of Homilies is edited and conserved. It appeared in 1934 after four years of work, as the first publication of the discovery. It was followed in the autumn by the first fascicle of the Berlin Kephalaia manuscript. Hence 20 years have passed since it began to appear. The text of the Homilies embraces 48 leaves or 96 pages of text. Further, the second part of the Psalms was edited by Charles Allberry. In 1938 it appeared with 117 leaves or 234 pages of text. The first part is on hand with 53 leaves conserved, i.e., 106 pages of text. It too was edited by Allberry, but up to the present the manuscript has not yet been printed. To this one must add 47 leaves or 94 pages of text of Codex C of the Chester Beatty manuscripts, which alongside of another text is a continuation of the Berlin Kephalaia.

[Sechs] von meinem Vater abgelöste Blätter dieser Briefkollektion sowie 41 [31] Blätter einer anderen Handschrift [P15995], von meinem Vater noch konserviert und zwei vollständige bisher unkonservierte Bucheinheiten [P15997 and P15998] sind ebenfalls noch nicht in deutschen Besitz zurückgekehrt. Das bedeutet ca. 500 noch zu konservierende Blätter oder rund 1000 Seiten Text . . .

[p. 6] Der Chester Beatty-Fundanteil ist in der glücklichen Lage gewesen, den Krieg und seine Folgeerscheinungen komplett und heil überstanden zu haben.

Konserviert und ediert ist das Homilienbuch. Es erschien im Jahre 1934 nach vierjähriger Arbeit als erste Veröffentlichung des Fundes. Ihm folgte im Herbst die erste Lieferung der Berliner Kephalaiahandschrift. [Zwanzig] Jahre sind also mithin seit diesem Ersterscheinen vergangen. Der Homilientext umfasst 48 Blatt oder 96 Seiten Text. Ferner wurde der zweite Teil des Psalmenbuches ediert durch Charles Allberry, im Jahre 1938 erscheinend mit 117 Blatt oder 234 Seiten Text. Der erste Teil liegt mit 53 Blatt konserviert vor, d.h. also 106 Seiten Text. Er wurde ebenfalls von Allberry ediert, aber bisher wurde das Manuskript noch nicht gedruckt. Dazu kommen 47 Blatt oder 94 Seiten Text des Codex C der Chester Beatty Handschriften, der neben einem anderen Text eine Fortsetzung der Berliner Kephalaia ist.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

A typescript containing a summary of this speech presents somewhat different figures:

The discovery as conserved and edited up until 1951:

A) Sir Chester Beatty

1. Homilies, 48 leaves or 96 pages of text
2. Psalms, Part 2, 117 leaves or 234 pages of text
3. Psalms, Part 1, 53 leaves or 106 pages of text by Charles Allberry, extant only as a manuscript
4. Codex C, 47 leaves or 94 pages of text, thus far unpublished.

B) Berlin part of the discovery

1. Kephalaia, 10 fascicles published

Ca. 100 further leaves were conserved, of which only 25 leaves have been read by Böhlig, extant as a manuscript with Kohlhammer. The remainder has not been read . . .

Not yet returned, up to the present, are two unconserved manuscripts. According to the Berlin catalogue of accessions of what was then the Papyrus Collection, it is a matter of the numbers: 15995 and 15999 [read: P^{15997} and P^{15998}]. Both books may produce ca. 500 leaves or 1,000 pages of text. Furthermore not yet returned are Codex No. 15996 Kephalaia as well as 31 leaves of Codex No. 15997 [read: P^{15995}] and 6 leaves of Codex 15998, which is identical with the codex that is in Bavaria.

Bis 1951 konservierter und edierter Fund:

A) Sir Chester Beatty

1. Homilien 48 Blätter oder 96 Seiten Text
2. Psalmbook Part II 117 Blätter oder 234 Seiten Text
3. Psalmbook Part I 53 Blätter oder 106 Seiten Text durch Charles Allberry nur als Manuskript vorliegend
4. Codex C 47 Blätter oder 94 Seiten Text unpubliziert bisher

B) Berliner Fundanteil

1. Kephalaia 10 Lieferungen publiziert

Konserviert wurden ca. 100 Blätter mehr, davon nur 25 Blätter durch Böhlig gelesen, als Manuskript bei Kohlhammer liegend. Der Rest ungelesen . . .

Bisher noch nicht zurückgekehrt sind zwei unkonservierte Handschriften, nach dem Berliner Standkatalog der früheren Papyrussammlung handelt es sich um die Nummern: 15995 und 15999 [read: P^{15997} and P^{15998}]. Beide Bücher dürften ca. 500 Blätter oder 1,000 Seiten Text ergeben. Ferner sind noch nicht zurückgekehrt Codex Nr. 15996 Kephalaia sowie 31 Blätter von Codex Nr. 15997 [read: P^{15995}] und 6 Blätter des Codex 15998 der identisch ist mit dem in Bayern befindlichen Codex.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The full text and the summary present both garbled and conflicting information about the conservation carried out by Hugo Ibscher:

P15995: THE SYNAXEIS

The full text lists 41 leaves from an unidentified codex, which is presumably an inaccurate reference to the thirty-one leaves of this codex Hugo Ibscher conserved. The summary lists the figure correctly as 31, but identifies these leaves inaccurately as belonging to P15997, the Acts. The rest of the Synaxeis codex was in Schondorf being conserved by Rolf Ibscher. However, he did not seem to know this but maintained inaccurately he was conserving P. 15998, the Letters.

P15996: THE KEPHALAIA

The full text lists 125 leaves published, twenty-five edited for publication, and a hundred conserved but not edited, for a total of 250 leaves or 500 pages The summary includes the 25 edited for publication within the 100, thus making a total of 225 leaves or 450 pages. A statistical table appended to the summary lists for the Berlin part "ca. 230 Blätter oder 460 Seiten," ["ca. 230 leaves or 460 pages"]. The following line reads, "Kephalaia," which may mean that these figures refer only to that codex. Perhaps only Kephalaia leaves are listed because the summary was designated "conserved and edited" material. For even though the statistical table lists its contents as what was "conserved," it probably is intended to be limited to what is conserved and edited. But even if the figure is intended to refer only to the Kephalaia, there is still a discrepancy between the three statements: 250, 225, or ca. 230 leaves. In addition, the full text listed "some 20 leaves" as still accessible in Berlin, and the summary listed as conserved by Rolf Ibscher: "Rest der Kephalaia ca. 25 Blätter oder ca. 50 Seiten Text" ["remainder of the Kephalaia ca. 25 leaves or ca. 50 pages of text"]. Both references, in spite of the discrepancy, are presumably to the same material (see below). Thus, the total number of the leaves of the Kephalaia that had been conserved could be variously calculated as 270, 275, 245, 250, or 255. In this data no distinction is made between the number of leaves originally in the codex, the number conserved, and the number extant.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

P^{15997}: THE ACTS

The full text refers to "two complete, thus far unconserved, book units" as not yet returned, one of which must, by a process of elimination, have been this codex. In the summary it is inaccurately ascribed the number P^{15995} (just as, conversely, the 31 leaves of P^{15995} are inaccurately given the number P. 15997). Since Hugo Ibscher had conserved at least eight leaves not mentioned by Rolf Ibscher, it was inaccurate to refer to this text simply as "thus far unconserved."

P^{15998}: THE LETTERS

The full text and the summary list six leaves conserved by Hugo Ibscher. Both inaccurately identify the codex in Schondorf as the rest of P^{15998}, since in reality it was the rest of the Synaxeis codex. Some 22 leaves of P^{15998}, reported subsequently to have been in the Ibscher home throughout the war and immediate postwar period, are not mentioned (see below).

P^{15999}: THE HOMILIES (BERLIN PART)

The full text apparently includes this codex among the "two complete books thus far unconserved," "ca. 500 leaves or 1,000 pages of text" that have not yet been returned. The summary stated that the two complete codices that had not yet been returned contained a total of "ca. 500 leaves or 1,000 pages of text." This reflects the standard estimate (based on the Kephalaia) of codices of about 250 leaves each. But the Berlin part of this codex was not a complete codex, but was part of the same codex as the Homilies text of Sir Chester Beatty, which consisted of forty-eight leaves. Hence, the Berlin part should have involved about 200 leaves.

It is clear that this list of what Hugo Ibscher had conserved is seriously imprecise and self-contradictory. It is obviously not based on well-organized records prepared during the conservation procedure. Nor is it based on a new inventory of the conserved leaves themselves, which had been taken to Leningrad after the war and had not yet been returned (see below). The list could have been based on published information and the Inventarbuch (inventory book) of the papyrus collection, to which it actually refers. But so many of its errors would have been corrected by a careful study of such materials that one must assume that the list was based on such records only in a superficial way or on memory or on word of mouth. The list reads more as if it were heavily based on memory or oral tradition, whatever Rolf Ibscher could hurriedly put together, given the death or departure of the principals in the story. Alexander Böhlig, the only scholar still connecting the prewar and postwar periods, apparently did not have much clearer information than Rolf Ibscher. Thus, the postwar academic community began with fragmentary, very inexact, and often quite misleading information about each codex in the Berlin collection. It may be just as well that Rolf Ibscher's first public report was not published.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The amount of material that Hugo Ibscher conserved in the Berlin holdings cannot as a consequence be stated with precision, but can only be estimated as around 300 leaves, if one includes half-conserved material.

With regard to the London material, the situation may be less confused. For Rolf Ibscher's report is based on his having actually seen the material in London, none of which was lost. Thus the listed total of 265 leaves conserved by Hugo Ibscher may be accurate.

Such numbers would suggest that Hugo Ibscher succeeded in separating a total of about 565 leaves. This was no doubt a remarkable achievement, given the condition of the codices when entrusted to him, the degree of legibility of much of what he separated, and the fragile nature of his health at the time. His lifetime of conservation work meant that he represented the state of the art in the 1930s, which is one of the few fortunate dimensions of an otherwise misfortune-ridden story.

Alexander Böhlig has reported on the administrative dimensions of the original project:[7]

In Germany the Berlin Academy of Sciences took over the task. As long as Carl Schmidt was an	In Deutschland nahm sich die Berliner Akademie der Wissenschaften der Aufgabe an.

7. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 180ff. See also WZUH 10 (1961) 157–61; and Actes du XXVe Congrés International des Orientalistes, Moscou 9–16 août 1960, 1 (1962) 535–41. A typescript of the address of 1960 is in the Chester Beatty archives. The form published in Mysterion und Wahrheit has been copyedited but not substantively altered. Quotations are from Mysterion und Wahrheit.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

official of the Kommission für spätantike Religionsgeschichte, the enterprise belonged to that area. After his departure, it was transferred to an enterprise under his leadership in the Orientalische Kommission. Meanwhile Hugo Ibscher had separated and put under glass rather large numbers of leaves, so that it was quite appropriate, after Polotsky had been called as full professor to Jerusalem, for each of the owners to engage one's own worker. For the Chester Beatty manuscripts C. R. C. Allberry was engaged, whose death in the war I would like also here bitterly to lament. The Berlin Academy commissioned me, and I am very happy that I had been introduced into this work and its problems back then by Polotsky himself. After Carl Schmidt's death in 1938 I took over the work on my own responsibility. Up to the war there were a total of 574 pages that were presented in print. W. Kohlhammer of Stuttgart, who had new Coptic letters cut just for this purpose based upon the hand of the Kephalaia, took over the printing and publishing.

Solange Carl Schmidt Beamter der Kommission für spätantike Religionsgeschichte war, gehörte das Unternehmen zu deren Bereich, um nach seinem Ausscheiden als ein unter seiner Leitung stehendes Unternehmen in die Orientalische Kommission überführt zu werden. Inzwischen hatte Hugo Ibscher grössere Mengen von Blättern abgelöst und unter Glas gebracht, so dass es durchaus angemessen war, nach der Berufung von Polotsky als Ordinarius nach Jerusalem für jeden der Besitzteile einen eigenen Bearbeiter zu bestellen. Für die Chester-Beatty-Handschriften wurde C. R. C. Allberry bestellt, dessen Tod im Kriege ich auch an dieser Stelle aufs tiefste beklagen möchte. Die Akademie Berlin beauftragte mich, und ich bin sehr froh, damals von Polotsky selbst in diese Arbeit und ihre Probleme eingeführt worden zu sein. Nach Carl Schmidts Tode im Jahre 1938 übernahm ich die Arbeit in eigener Verantwortung. Bis zum Kriege wurden von allen Beteiligten insgesamt 574 Seiten im Druck vorgelegt. Den Druck und Verlag hatte W. Kohlhammer, Stuttgart, übernommen, der eigens nach dem Schrifttyp der Kephalaia neue koptische Lettern schneiden liess.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 4 —

Beatty, Ibscher, and Polotsky

On May 7, 1931, Sir Alan H. Gardiner wrote to Paul Schubart:

> As you know, Coptic is not my immediate branch of study, but it appears that both Mr. Chester Beatty and Dr. [Hugo] Ibscher wish me to take a hand in negotiating the arrangements for the publication of the Manichaean books belonging to the former. Both Dr. [W. E.] Crum and Sir Herbert Thompson have been here and have discussed the matter fully with Ibscher and myself and this letter is intended to set forth Mr. Chester Beatty's wishes after hearing the results of our consultations. Crum's interest is confined to the lexicographic aspects of the books, which he wishes to utilize for his dictionary. Sir Herbert Thompson is too busy to devote any large part of his time to this work, but since Mr. Chester Beatty naturally desires an English editor for his publication, Thompson has declared himself ready to accept such an editorship, provided that the preliminary copying and translation are performed by someone else.
>
> Everything points to the employment of Herr [H. J.] Polotsky for the purpose as an almost ideal solution, the more so if he is engaged, under Professor [Carl] Schmidt's direction, to copy the corresponding Berlin books. Mr. Chester Beatty would be ready to remunerate Herr Polotsky at the same rate of payment as is arranged for Polotsky in connection with the Berlin books, and would be most grateful if you would administer the requisite sum of money for the purpose. He would send you through me a preliminary sum of £50 for the beginning of the payments, but asks that when this sum is approaching its end he should receive (through me) an exact account of the work done and the payments made.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> Mr. Chester Beatty will be most glad to grant Professor Schmidt the right to study and utilize in a general way the books belonging to him, if Professor Schmidt is prepared to give to his English colleagues the same rights with regard to the Berlin books. As I have already said, Crum wishes merely to use the texts for his Dictionary, but it would be useful for Thompson to have copies of the Berlin books to utilize alongside the Chester Beatty books. If I might make a suggestion of my own, would it not be well for Polotsky to make these copies in copying ink, so that separate copies could be kept by Schmidt, Polotsky, Crum and Thompson? The existence of separate copies in the hands of each of the scholars interested would, I think, be of great value. A point on which Mr. Chester Beatty lays great stress is that he would like his books, after they have been unrolled by Ibscher, to be kept in the Papyrusabteilung of the Neues Museum and to be accessible for study by Professor Schmidt and Herr Polotsky only there. Mr. Chester Beatty would be most grateful if you would consent to take this matter up with the Director of the Museum and to obtain the latter's consent and authorization.
>
> I think that the most practical procedure would be if the copies for Crum and Thompson, as well as the accounts for Mr. Chester Beatty, could be sent to me from time to time. I would act as a sort of London agent, and distribute what is sent to the persons concerned.
>
> It is a wonderful discovery and also a wonderful opportunity for friendly and sensible international co-operation. That is one of the reasons, as you can imagine, why I personally am so much interested in it.

On June 6, 1931, Sir Herbert Thompson wrote to Miss Kingsford of Beatty's staff:

> I venture to trouble you with a question or two, as I know Mr. Beatty is an extremely busy man, and you can probably judge best when and how he can be approached on the side of his MSS. I dare say you have heard from Dr. A. H. Gardiner, that, owing to the impossibility of my friend, W. E. Crum, undertaking the supervision of the treatment of Mr. Beatty's new Coptic papyri, it has fallen to me—subject to Mr. Beatty's approval —to consider the questions of his relation to Berlin. Of course you know that these papyri relate to the Manichaean religion, and that part of the same find has gone to Berlin. Prof. Carl Schmidt (of Berlin University) is coming over here "early in June" to consider questions of joint dealing with this material.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

My proposed attitude is somewhat as follows:—

1. Mutual communication of the material on both sides.

2. Working out of the material by a single editor, if possible—Polotsky being proposed—under supervision of C. Schmidt and myself.

   These two conditions are almost essential. It may be found that parts of the same MS are divided between the two collections. This cannot be settled till the whole mass has been taken to pieces and mounted under glass.

3. The question of publication. I feel that this is a subject which in the present state of affairs may, and should be, postponed. There is no hurry about it and I think it very desirable that Mr. Beatty should not be committed hastily to any scheme. I should not (nor, I fancy, would he) wish to see his MS appear as an appendix to a German publication. Such a publication would have to be a Government publication, and would almost necessarily be a slow—(also, entre nous, Prof. C. Schmidt has the reputation of being a very slow hand at producing things). At present, judging from the photographs I have seen of both Mr. Beatty's papyri and the German ones, they are distinct volumes, and there is no reason why the former should not be issued in a separate form. Of course if Polotsky is the sole editor of the texts, he would have to be allowed to take his own course in running the two sets of papyri side by side. But that is no reason why they should be one publication and I suggest that in any case, in the present state of affairs, no definite arrangement as to publication should be entered into.

I shall be very glad to hear how far these views have Mr. Beatty's approvation—and what he may have further to suggest. I may add that a joint publication would give rise to rather difficult questions on the financial side—besides details of printing, illustrations, etc.

On June 15, 1931, Thompson wrote Beatty following the meeting with Schmidt on June 11, 1931:

I met Dr. Carl Schmidt last Thursday, and had satisfactory discussions of the Mani-papyri question. I found him quite ready to take up a reasonable attitude. He quite agreed there is no need to consider any question of publication at present; and that, except as to any MS. that may be found to be divided > between your collection and Berlin, you would of course be free to publish in England and in any form you wished, and he did not press for any form of joint publication. As to any joint MS, that can be dealt with when the time arrives.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> As far as possible, he agrees to Dr. Polotsky working alternate weeks for Berlin and yourself respectively—in detail, it would have to depend somewhat on the material supplied by Ibscher. He does not foresee any difficulty except as to the latter being able to keep his part of the work going at a sufficient rate, as it is difficult work and trying to his eyes—and also he can only work on your papyri out of his official hours. But the initial work on each papyrus is the most difficulty, and once the outer or more fragmentary portion is removed, the faster it proceeds . . .
>
> He quite agreed about mutual interchange of material and nothing to be published on either side without consent, and I pressed him to keep the whole matter as quiet as possible. He told me he was being urged already to make a brief communication to the Berlin Academy, but I told him he must postpone it for the present till the material is separated and sifted. He has been recently in Egypt, making inquiries about the find, and he is satisfied that the whole find was divided into 8 parts, between 3 dealers, of which I understand 5 are coming to Berlin, and he declared you had two MSS. and one on approval, viz. your Hymn book, now in Ibscher's hands and another (?). Is this so? and if so, would you let me see it—and also the papyrus on approval? I should very much like to get some idea of its (their?) size and contents, if possible.

Thompson's English translation of a letter from Schubart to Thompson of July 19, 1931, reports:

> Our common friend Gardiner wrote to me asking me to address myself directly to you in all that concerns the Manipapyri . . . Dr. H. J. Polotsky, Berlin-Charlottenburg 4, Waitzstr. 20, has already worked on the Chester Beatty papyri during May and June so far that it is justifiable to pay him on June 30 the first of the monthly instalments [sic] of 150 Rm. How the payment shall be made is of course entirely a question for Mr. Chester Beatty; perhaps you would kindly speak to him about it. In future then Dr. Polotsky might expect the payment to be made always on the last day of the month. He binds himself to divide his work conscientiously between the Berlin and the Chester Beatty papyri, but it goes without saying that this can> not be done mechanically and exactly according to the number of pages. I will see to it that both parts are carried forward evenly. Each month Dr. Polotsky shall send you copies of the Chester Beatty and Berlin pieces as far as possible with translation. It is understood that these copies are only provisional and that Dr. Polotksy will have to work on them further to improve them. I would ask you to write to Dr. Polotsky your idea as to the working out of the Chester Beatty papyri so that he may know how far he is also to occupy himself with the contents of the New Texts. Dr. Polotsky must also write to you thereon on his part.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> I shall be very grateful to you if you will communicate to me any questions or doubts that may arise, and I am convinced that we shall be able to settle everything in an amicable manner. In any case it will be a pleasure to me to do anything I can to forward the great work without delay.

On June 23, 1931, Thompson wrote Miss Kingford inquiring if Beatty had received his unanswered letter of June 15, 1931, and forwarding his translation of Schubart's letter with the request that she ask Beatty "to act upon it:"

> I am very glad to find that Prof. Schubart will keep the supervision in his own hands rather than leave it all to Dr. C. S.— Entre nous, I trust Schubart entirely—Dr. C. S. is apt to be dilatory and not to be depended on to the same extent.

Thereupon on June 26, 1931, Beatty sent Schubart's letter to Gardiner "and also the answer I propose to send," apparently proposing Ibscher as the intermediary in Berlin, with this request:

> I shall be very glad if you will kindly look through this and let me know if you have any suggestion to make before I send the letter to Sir Herbert Thompson.

On June 27, 1931, Gardiner replied to Beatty as follows:

> When I met Sir Herbert Thompson, Crum, and C. Schmidt about a fortnight ago, it was agreed between us that I had better retire from any concern with the Manichaean texts, because they belong to a province which is rather remote from my own. But since you are kind enough to ask me to comment upon your letter to Thompson here returned, I hope you will allow me to do so quite frankly. In my opinion, knowing as I do all the people concerned except Polotsky, I think it would > be the greatest possible mistake to entrust the controlling of Polotsky's work to Ibscher instead of to Schubart. Schubart is the head of the Papyrus Department, a distinguished man and Ibscher's chief. Ibscher, though a great friend of mine and a most splendid and trustworthy fellow, is an underling in the department and would not be regarded as able to exercise any authority over Polotsky except through Schubart, with whom he is on the best of terms.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> I see through Schubart's letter to Thompson that he personally undertakes to see that both parts of the work are carried on evenly. If he says that, then in my opinion there is not the least doubt in the world that it would be done. If, after a month or two had passed, Thompson, who will be controlling the work, considered that your portion was being neglected in favor of C. Schmidt's the arrangement could at once be terminated. In a word, if the books were mine and I had to negotiate the matter on my own behalf, I should not hesitate to accept Schubart's offer without any reservation whatever.
>
> I have written very frankly, because I think it is by so doing that I shall be of most help both to you and to this most important scientific undertaking . . .
>
> P.S. I notice from your letter that you say you would rather prefer to deal with this business through Ibscher and not through Schmidt. I don't think that the latter course is proposed at all. Indeed, in taking charge of the matter himself doubtless Schubart's idea, like Ibscher's, is to keep the control out of Schmidt's hands.

On June 28, 1931, Thompson wrote Miss Kingsford inquiring whether the mail was functioning since he had still no reply from Beatty to his letters. On July 2, 1931, Beatty wrote Gardiner to the effect he was writing Thompson to work through Schubart rather than Schmidt or Ibscher. On July 7, 1931, Beatty wrote Thompson to arrange for Polotsky to be paid by Schubart not by the month but by the actual amount of work done, since he might work more for Berlin and Ibscher's work may move slowly.

On July 11, 1931, Thompson wrote Beatty, reporting on his implementation of the new arrangements Beatty proposed:

> However I have this morning received from Schubart the results viz. transcription (Coptic), translation and (occasionally) notes of 5 more leaves, of which 4 are from your papyri and 1 from the Berlin papyri.—He sent me 4 copies (mechanical) of > each and I enclose one copy of each of your 4 new pages. One copy will go to Crum for his Dictionary and the other two will remain with me for the present.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> Schubart remarks in his letter: "This time the C.B. pages are the more numerous; another time it may be so with the Berlin pages. That naturally depends on the quality of the leaves [he means that as Ibscher divides his time equally on the two jobs, the number of each that he gets off depends on the condition of the papyrus]. But both parts, C.B. and Berlin, will be as far as possible carried forward equally." I feel sure that Schubart may be trusted to do his best to see this carried out. But we must await further results in due course . . .
>
> I have not been able to go through these pages of Polotsky at present; but I see that he has got out the whole text and it looks very satisfactory as far as I can judge from a cursory glance.

On September 24, 1931, Thompson again wrote Beatty:

> I sent you on July 11th last the first results of Dr. Polotsky's work; but as I received no acknowledgement, I presumed, you were too busy to find time for giving attention to them. So I ceased troubling you with any more. They have been coming in regularly each month. Shall I send them all on to you now? He is doing most excellent, indeed remarkable work on them, and the results are of the highest interest—both in the contents—and philologically for the Coptic language in which they are written, and seems to have sprung up specially equipped for this particular job.

On October 12, 1931, Beatty wrote that he had been very busy, was leaving for New York, and would be glad to receive Polotsky's reports on his return in five or six weeks. On January 4, 1932, Thompson wrote him:

> I have a rather urgent letter from Dr. Carl Schmidt in Berlin, asking me to send him some news as to the Mani papyrus, which you had, I believe, on approval, as scholars are very anxious—and not in Germany only—to have some public statement as to these "mysterious" Manichaean manuscripts. But Dr. Schmidt, rightly I think, wishes to defer any such statement till the fate of this outstanding papyrus of the Mani find is settled—either by its passing into your collection—or finding an assured home, perhaps at Copenhagen, or else in Berlin. The important point is that it should be in hands where > it would be accessible for study in association with those in your hands and those in the Berlin Museum.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> So I venture again to trouble you with a question as to whether it is still in your custody — and if so, may I be allowed to see it? and also whether you still have any thought of acquiring it, or not? If you do not, Dr. Schmidt tells me that Nahman has given him the first option of purchase; but he fears that if the matter is delayed much longer, Nahman may change his mind, and the opportunity of fixing it in safe hands may be lost.

On January 5, 1932, Beatty left for Egypt, but the letter was forwarded to him. On January 26, 1932, J. W. Corble, of Beatty's staff, replied to Thompson on Beatty's behalf that the papyrus was still the property of Nahman and Beatty had it in safekeeping.

Schmidt wrote Thompson on February 6, 1932, in a disturbing way, which Thompson reported to Beatty in a letter of February 14, 1932:

> I am sorry to have to trouble you with Mani matters again so soon, as I fear they are not very welcome. However, it is necessary that you should know that Prof. Carl Schmidt of Berlin, who is controlling Dr. Polotsky's work over there on behalf of the Berlin papyri, will very shortly be in Egypt, and purposes to call on you.
>
> He has prepared a Report which he purposes to lay before the Berlin Academy, relating to the find of Mani papyri. He first referred to it as a "Provisional report";—I assumed that he would give an account of the find—of the number of the papyri, their dates, their language and its dialect and some details of the nature of the contents. But about 10 days ago he wrote and informed me that he proposed to use 10 pages of your papyrus, i.e., publish in his report the Coptic texts and translations—and moreover 4 of those 10 pages have never been forwarded to me nor any account even of their contents. I at once protested, both to Prof. Schubart and to Dr. Schmidt. Schubart (head of the papyrus department of the Berlin Museum) mildly interposed and thought my point of view had not been considered sufficiently. But Schmidt is offended and wrote me an immensely long letter to show that—well, I was spoiling his game, but he was off to Egypt in a few days and would see you and hopes to get your permission for what he wants. He is one of those people to whom if you give him an inch, he will take an ell—and I have been warned of this by people who know > him much better than I do. He wants to publish your papyrus by driblets in successive reports to the Berlin Academy.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> So I have written him today—it will catch him before he leaves—a very straight letter of which I enclose you a copy—so that you may know exactly what is the position I have taken up, and which I consider necessary, if you intend to keep any control over your exceedingly valuable papyrus.
>
> I hope it will meet with your approval.

Thompson's blunt letter to Schmidt of February 14, 1932, is as follows:

> . . . But with regard to the Beatty papyrus, you remark "es wäre mir sehr angenehm einmal Ihre Meinung angesichts der von mir geschilderten Lage zu hören" [it would be very agreeable to me to hear once your view regarding the situation portrayed by me"].
>
> I am the more willing to do as you ask, because I fear that, in your anxiety to inform the Academy, you have overlooked certain fundamental conditions, which are these:—
>
> 1. The Ch. B. papyrus belongs to Mr. Chester Beatty.
> 2. The right of publication is vested in him solely.
> 3. He will decide when and how it is to be published.
> 4. His present intention is to publish it completely as soon as possible.
> 5. His publication will not form part of that of the Berlin papyri but will no doubt be made in England, as soon as Dr. Polotsky—on one-half of whose working time he has an exclusive claim—shall produce it in a condition fit for publication.
> 6. He objects to any piece-meal form of publication.
> 7. Your knowledge of the contents of the papyrus is confidential, and you have no right to the use of it, except by asking for, and receiving permission.
> 8. I have, as at present instructed, no authority to give you that permission.
>
> I informed you, that you might "state in general terms["] the "contents of the Ch. B. papyrus." You answer, "Was will der Gelehrte mit allgemeinen Bemerkungen anfangen?" [What > does the scholar make of general comments?] But the "contents" include a great deal more than that and cover details: but not quotations.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> I am very sorry to have to write to you in such unqualified terms. But you compel me to it. There is nothing in the above 8 points, which was not either common ground between us, or was stipulated for (especially—"no partial publication without common agreement") at our meeting in London.
>
> I am fully aware of the immense difficulty of the work of decipherment on which you and Dr. Polotsky are engaged. I have a number of photographs of the Ch. B. papyrus by me, and can form a good judgment of it; and how necessarily slow it is.
>
> But your calculations as to the length of time likely to be required for the Berlin papyri, do not apply to the Ch. B. papyrus, which I hope will be ready for publication much earlier.
>
> Last autumn I wrote to Dr. Polotsky that my object was to have the text, with English translation, and such notes, philological and historical, as may be found necessary, printed, but it is not to include any elaborate commentary, as that cannot be adequately undertaken until the whole of the papyri have seen the light.

On February 22, 1932, Thompson wrote Miss Kingsford:

> Shortly before Mr. Chester Beatty left for America, he asked me to hold back the results of Dr. Polotsky's work on the Mani papyrus till his expected return some weeks later from the U.S.A.
>
> I fear I forgot that he had ever asked for them; but I have now been through the papers, and added a considerable number of translations, as I told Dr. Polotsky to cease making [English?] translations of the Beatty papyrus, so that he may have more time for deciphering. I send you the results up to the present date and will ask you kindly to keep them till Mr. Beatty's return from Egypt.

On March 19, 1932, Schmidt wrote on his calling card in Cairo a cryptic note to Beatty, also in Cairo, since he had failed to meet him there and was leaving the next day for Luxor. Later Thompson was to provide Beatty with an accurate translation of the relevant part of Schmidt's note:

> I should like to discuss with you a report on the Mani find, which I wish to place before the Academy in Berlin. I have > already corresponded with Sir Herbert Thompson about it. The important point is as to your permission how far I may in my Report also make use of (the material in) your possession. I had proposed to give some examples in illustration from your most valuable Hymn-book so that scholars might be able to judge of the Hymn to Christ and to Mani. Perhaps you will be good enough to talk this over with Sir (H.) Thompson.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On March 21, 1932, Beatty wrote Schmidt already from Cairo, without awaiting an accurate translation, but responding in terms of what Thompson had already written him about Schmidt's proposals:

> I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your note but unfortunately as I do not read German I have only been able to get a rough translation of it. I wish however to have it definitely understood that you are not to use in any way, shape or manner any of the material owned by me, in any article, lecture or quotation. Upon my return to London I will have a careful translation made of your note and will write you further, but in the meantime let there be no misunderstanding. You were allowed to see certain papyri as a matter of courtesy but any thing you have seen is strictly confidential and you are not permitted to make any mention of it or make any use whatever of it, without either my consent or Sir Herbert Thompson's consent in writing.

On March 29, 1932, Beatty sent a copy of his sharp reply to Thompson, with the further comment:

> I think the best solution is that I arrange with Ibscher for him to stop work on the thing, so that we will not have any further complications with Schmidt.

The same day Beatty wrote Nahman, agreeing to return the manuscript on which he had an option via Ibscher, knowing that this meant that Schmidt would acquire it. Apparently, Beatty had soured on the whole Mani enterprise. On April 3, 1932, Thompson wrote Beatty, quite annoyed that Beatty had gone too far:

> Thank you for your letter of Mar. 29th, acknowledging mine of Feb. 10th. I could wish you had done so sooner, as you left me during my controversy with Prof. Schmidt in some doubt as to how far I was justified in maintaining so strict an attitude toward him as I did. But your letter to him of March 31 [21?] is so stiff that it rather puts me into fresh difficulty.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

When Prof. Schmidt came over here in June of last year, I made certain arrangements with him as regards the common working out of the Berlin and your Mani papyri. The main points were:—

1. They were to be worked out by Dr. Polotsky under the supervision of Prof. Schmidt and myself, so far as I could control his work by photographs, or the originals when returned.

2. All the material, as worked out in Berlin, was to be sent to me.

3. Publication was reserved, to be dealt with by each party as they thought best; but no publication of any kind was to be permitted meanwhile without the consent of the other party.

4. I told Schmidt distinctly that Dr. Polotsky was to edit your papyrus for you, and that it would be published over here and not in Germany.

5. Dr. Polotsky was to divide his working time equally between the two parties and each party was to pay him 150 Rm. monthly. (This was before the gold standard was abandoned in England. Therefore, whereas 150 Rm. = £7.10.0 at par originally, it now, at 14 Rm. to the £ = £10.15.0. But, on the other hand, by German Govt. decree all salaries have been reduced by 10% since Jan. 1, so Dr. P.'s salary stands now at 135 Rm. per month).

6. It was agreed that some communication of the contents of these papyri should be made to the public as soon as it could reasonably be done; and that this should take the form of a Report by Prof. Schmidt to the Berlin Academy as to their nature and contents.

Accordingly, when Prof. Schmidt on Feb. 2 announced to me that he was preparing a Report to the Academy and that he intended to make large extracts from your papyrus, I protested at once that he was not entitled to do so, as this amounted to a part-publication. After many letters on both sides, Prof. Schmidt yielded on my writing to him the formal letter, of which I sent you a copy.

But I have given him permission to state the nature and contents of your papyrus with details as to names of persons

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

mentioned and places, and chronological references, provided he makes no quotation whatever; and so much I consider to be desirable in the public interest. This you have now withdrawn by the terms of your letter to him.

After our controversy, which I conducted, I hope, with due politeness, Prof. Schmidt, having conceded my points, gave in with a good grace, and we are again on excellent terms. As Prof. Schubart of the Berlin Museums, who has the custody and control of all the Mani-papyri, supported me throughout, I think it would be deplorable if you refused to sanction the further use of your papyrus, and withdrew from the agreed common work.

Further, with regard to your papyrus, I obtained from Dr. Ibscher on Feb. 22 a report as to his work on it, of which I enclose a translation. He will also make an appendix to Schmidt's Report, on the technical condition and treatment of the papyri. He has sent me a copy of his paper, and I see nothing whatever to object to in it.

In consequence of Ibscher's statement, (from which I learned for the first time that you own, not one papyrus only, but 3 or 4), I wrote to Dr. Polotsky that I advised him to concentrate on finishing up the shortest one of 37 leaves; and, as, if he were to wait till the whole 460–600 leaves were worked out, it would probably be some years before anything appeared, he should finish this short one up and you would arrange for a publication of it separately—which would bring him into prominence. He is an extremely learned and able young man; but he is not a naturalised German (being a Russian) and hence has no prospect of an official or University post; and has to make a living. I believe he has nothing but these 270 Rm. (orig. 300 Rm.) per month, i.e. at par £180 p. ann.

I hope very earnestly that you will not withdraw from the scheme as originally laid down. It cannot be carried out without the collaboration of Prof. Schmidt; and I have put matters on such a footing that I feel sure he will now act reasonably; as he has discovered that he has not a "man of straw" to deal with on this side. But if this is to be effected, I must ask you to back me up also in the concessions I have made both as regards Prof. Schmidt and Dr. Polotsky. They are no more than was allowed in the original agreement.

On April 16, 1932, Beatty wrote Ibscher:

We have had a good deal of trouble and dispute with Professor Schmidt with reference to the Mani papyrus, and I understand

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> from Dr. Gardiner that you are coming to London, so I wish you would stop all expenditure and work on the Mani papyrus and just leave the matter as it is until I can see you in London. We can then discuss the best policy to pursue, but at present I do not like Professor Schmidt's attitude; I feel the most satisfactory way is to stop all work in order not to have any complications.

Thompson wrote Beatty on April 22, 1932, on hearing from Berlin of Beatty's letter to Ibscher:

> I have this morning received a letter from Prof. Schubart telling me that you [have] written to Dr. Ibscher that he is to stop work on your Mani papyri in Berlin "on account of disagreement with Prof. Schmidt." As the latter is still in Egypt, Schubart naturally wishes to know what it means and applies to me for information.
>
> As you put the relations between you and Berlin into my hands, and as I had reminded Prof. Schmidt of his duty to you in respect of his use of your papyri, and replaced everything again on an amicable basis, after establishing a proper control over the use to be made of your property, I think it would have been better, had you continued to leave the matter to be conducted through me. Instead of which you have written letters of a very decisive import both to Prof. Schmidt and now to Dr. Ibscher without any reference to me whatever.
>
> Frankly, I cannot work for you on this double basis. Either you must leave the conduct of the business to me, or you take it all into your own hands. It is for you to choose.
>
> But I must remind you that you are under definite obligations to Dr. Polotsky, which cannot be suddenly cut short without notice.
>
> Will you kindly let me know what your intentions are as soon as possible, so that I may know where I stand in relation to the Berlin Museum authorities . . . I understand that Ibscher will be in London some time next week; and I shall be meeting him of course.

On May 1, 1932, Thompson again wrote Beatty:

> On April 22 I wrote you a letter in which I described the position in which you had placed me, and to which I asked for a speedy answer, but I have heard nothing from you.
>
> From the neglect with which you treat all my letters I can only conclude that you do not want me or my services any > more. And so, much to my regret, I have to inform you that you must now find some one else to do the work, which, under more favourable circumstances I was so anxious to do in the interests of science.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> After three days, if I do not hear any further from you, I shall inform Prof. Schubart that, as far as I am concerned, I can take no further part in the working out of the Mani papyri.
>
> With regard to Dr. Polotsky, I have made certain engagements with him in your name, which I must see carried out, and if you repudiate them, then it will be a matter of honour to me to see that a proper compensation is made to him.

This bitter letter crossed in the mail with a more conciliatory letter from Beatty to Thompson of April 30, 1932:

> I am so sorry that there has been such a mix-up in the matter of the Schmidt business. I got your letter in Egypt, from which I gathered that Schmidt was not acting very well, and I got his letter and also a reprint in German apparently of a Biblical papyrus which he had been interfering with, and then I wrote to him. I thought in view of the dispute that the best way to bring him to terms was to stop the work absolutely. I quite understand that with reference to Dr. Polotsky we may have some work still to settle with him.
>
> I met Dr. Alan Gardiner the other day and understand that Dr. Ibscher is here, so that I will be seeing him within the next few days, and if you will let me know what days you expect to be in London I will try to call on you so that we can have a talk and straighten the matter out.
>
> I am sorry for any upset I have caused in your plans, but it was done with the best intentions.

On May 2, 1932, Thompson replied to Beatty:

> I have just received your letter of Apr. 30th and it has crossed mine, which was written to you yesterday. Your letter still gives me no answer as to your intentions in relation to the arrangements made through me with the authorities in Berlin. You speak of "stopping the work absolutely." If you have done so, or are doing so, you might have told me of it, before leaving me in the lurch. I have nothing to alter in my letter written to you yesterday; but if you think it worth while, I will come up to town and see you any day this week between 10:30 and 3 pm, that you like to name.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On the same day Beatty wrote a further conciliatory letter to Thompson, in which he nonetheless announced a formal closing down of the arrangements:

> I feel I owe you many apologies for my seeming discourtesy in not replying to your letters, but the fact is that since my return from Egypt I have been so engrossed with business matters that everything else had had to take a secondary place, and I have put off from day to day attending to my personal correspondence with the usual result that it has been entirely neglected. As a matter of fact, I did dictate a letter to you on Friday evening which was sent to my house for signature, but I had to go unexpectedly to the country and so unfortunately it was not dispatched at once.
>
> I quite understand that with regard to Dr. Polotsky and Professor Schubart there will be some settlement needed, and I am of course ready and willing to accept responsibility for this. I met Dr. Alan Gardiner the other day and understand that Dr. Ibscher is here, so I will be seeing him within the next few days.
>
> I regret very much any upset I may have caused in your arrangements, but it was done with the best intentions.
>
> In view of the very difficult business conditions which demand the whole of my time, I have decided to discontinue all work in regard to manuscripts at present. I do not want to offend my friends who have assisted me so much in the work on the library, and I feel I may inadvertently offend them if I try to continue the library work and at the same time have to look after business. I am Chairman of a number of Companies, and I feel that during these difficult times I must devote all my time to them; I am glad to say they are doing all right, but until we get through this world crisis I feel my first duty is to them, and so I cannot devote the time to manuscripts which I would like and would be able to in normal conditions.

A memorandum of a conference between Beatty and Gardiner on May 8, 1932, reported the following policy:

> Under the arrangement with Dr. Polotsky, he was to be paid 150 Rm. by each party monthly, and was to divide his working time equally between the two parties (Mr. A.C.B. and Berlin). Half of this is for Mr. A.C.B.'s account. Polotsky has now almost finished his work and has been working specially on the books of travels [Homilies] of which there are about ten pages

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms > left; the idea is to dispense with Polotsky's time after he has finished these ten pages and to arrange through Dr. Schubart that he will finish the work by a certain time.

>
> Then, if Sir Herbert Thompson approves, the idea would be to give Polotsky the right to publish it within a year at his own expense through some scientific paper.
>
> Then in regard to the arrangement with Dr. Ibscher, who was to receive 50 marks (about £3) per page, he charges by the page and his work comes to about £200 a year. He has separated or has in process of separation about 100 leaves of which about 30 are under glass. The idea is that he will not separate any more leaves of the manuscript but gradually put the present leaves which he has separated under glass within the next year or so. He is not to undertake any new work on the remaining part of the manuscript without my approval.

On May 10, 1932, Thompson wrote Beatty:

> The enclosed pages (7 of your MS. and 3 of the Berlin papyrus) reached me yesterday from Berlin, representing last month's contribution by Dr. Polotsky.
>
> I have written to him to stop working on your papyri, since you wrote to me on the 2nd inst. that you decided to discontinue all work in regard to manuscripts at present. So this will be the last that he will send. I have not troubled (as with former sendings) to make a translation of them, as I do not suppose you will have time to read them, and it naturally takes a good deal of my time to do it.

On the same day Beatty wrote Thompson that he had "had a long talk with Dr. Alan Gardiner and Dr. Ibscher in reference to the Manichaean manuscripts and have taken some notes with regard to the matter," no doubt the memorandum of the meeting May 8, 1932, and inquiring if he could see Thompson in London. On May 11, 1932, Thompson responded, commenting "I wish you could have seen me when I offered it last week," and pointing out that the times Beatty now proposed were inconvenient. On May 12, 1932, Gardiner wrote Beatty:

> I have had some further talks with Dr. Ibscher and Sir Herbert Thompson with regard to the best way of bringing the arrangement with Sir Herbert and Dr. Polotsky to a satisfactory conclusion. If I understand rightly, you are ready to cede to Dr. Polotsky publication rights in the 50 leaves relating to > the journeyings of Mani [Homilies] provided he produces his work within a reasonable time. I would suggest that, to treat Polotsky very liberally, you would allow him to retain those rights until this time next year, say the last day of June 1933. The publication would appear in Germany and no cost in connection with it would be incurred by you. Furthermore, after the end of this month, no further obligation for payments to Dr. Polotsky for his studies would rest upon you.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> If this arrangement seems satisfactory, I should be grateful for a line at your earliest convenience. Ibscher is leaving for Germany on Saturday, and would like to go back bearing your consent with him.

On May 13, 1932, Beatty responded to Gardiner accepting his proposals.

On May 14, 1932, Ibscher wrote Beatty from London:

Before I return again to Germany, I would not want to neglect to confirm that I have correctly received for Prof. Schmidt the Mani manuscript . . .	Bevor ich wieder nach Deutschland zurückfahre, möchte ich nicht versäumen zu bestätigen, dass ich das Mani-Manuskript für Herrn Prof. Schmidt richtig erhalten habe . . .
As agreed, I will continue treating the Mani text until the already unstuck 100 leaves are assured. I hope I can soon provide you more precise communications about this.	Die Manitexte werde ich wie verabredet weiter behandeln, bis die bereits losgelösten 100 Blätter gesichert sind. Ich hoffe Ihnen hierüber bald nähere Mitteilungen machen zu können.

On May 20, 1932, Beatty wrote Thompson a summary of the situation, including a statement concerning Ibscher:

> Dr. Ibscher is just completing the work on the present pages he is doing which will probably take another six or nine months, and when he has finished this work I have promised to let him know whether I wish him to continue separating any more of the leaves.

On May 24, 1932, Thompson replied to Beatty:

> Thank you for your letter, which was forwarded to me here where I shall be nearly to the middle of next month. I have also heard from Dr. Gardiner with regard to the result of your conferences with him. It is quite satisfactory to me, but I note > that you write to me: "that he (Dr. Polotsky) would have the right for a certain period to publish an article on the pages (i.e. of the work he was lately doing) in a German publication." In your letter to Dr. Gardiner you said: "I am to cede to Dr. Pol. publication rights in the 50 leaves relating to the journeyings of Mani [Homilies], provided he produces his work within a reasonable time," defined as the end of June 1933. The difference is material and I have taken the latter as the more authoritative, and I have written to Dr. Polotsky that he has the right to publish the text of the short papyrus in question, with introduction, translation and notes, as an independent volume in Germany. That is what he was engaged to do in relation to your papyri before the matter came into my hands, with the difference that hitherto the stipulation was that the publication was to be in England. The difference now is that he is restricted to this short papyrus and the publication is to be in Germany. I hope this is quite clear; as also that he has no claim on you for future expenses either as to his work or the publication.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On May 30, 1932, Beatty acknowledged the correctness of Thompson's interpretation, which Thompson acknowledged on June 2, 1932. This seems to be the conclusion of this correspondence.

It would seem that Beatty's initial proposal of working through those with whom he already had good working relationships, Gardiner and Ibscher, was the procedure to which he had returned, after the relationship with Thompson repeatedly failed to become close, and Schmidt had come to be seen as a problem.

The conserved material has been partially published: Sir Chester Beatty's part of the Homilies by H. J. Polotsky in 1934; part two of Sir Chester Beatty's Psalms by C. R. C. Allberry in 1938; and the first part of the Berlin Kephalaia by H. J. Polotsky and Alexander Böhlig in double fascicles from 1935–1940, with fascicles 11–12 published by Böhlig in 1966, and the next page, 292, by Böhlig in 1985.[1]

1. Polotsky, Manichäische Homilien; Allberry, Manichaean Psalm-Book, Part 2 (the preface reported that fascicles 1–8 had appeared in 1935–1937); Polotsky and Böhlig, Kephalaia. Manichäische Handschriften der staatlichen Museen Berlin, Band 1, herausgegeben im Auftrage der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften unter Leitung von Prof. Carl Schmidt, 1. Hälfte (Lieferungen 1–10), pages 1–102 by Polotsky, pages 103–244 by Böhlig; Kephalaia. Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin, Band 1, herausgegeben im Auftrag der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin; zweite Hälfte (only Lieferungen 11/12 = pages 244–92), by Böhlig; Böhlig, "Ja und Amen," 59–70.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The unconserved book blocks belonging to Berlin are no longer extant, whereas three belonging to Sir Chester Beatty were saved and conserved after the war. The conserved leaves belonging to Berlin are largely extant (though the exact dividing line between what was ever conserved and what was still unconserved when the book blocks disappeared is not clear), and those belonging to Sir Chester Beatty are extant.

Some of the material transcribed by Polotsky but not published has been preserved, in the archives of the Chester Beatty Library, in the Crum Archives of the Griffith Institute at the Ashmolean Museum in Oxford, and at the Academy of Sciences in Berlin. None has survived at the Egyptian Museum in East Berlin or in the possession of H. J. Polotsky.

A ring binder at the Chester Beatty Library has two leaves that have the appearance of title pages, one reading: "A. CHESTER BEATTY. MANICHAEAN PAPYRUS. CODEX A. Psalms (Hymnbook). CODEX B. Homilies (Discourses). Transcriptions and Translations. From Sir H. Thompson. July, 1931—May 18, 1932." The other reads similarly: "BERLIN MANICHAEAN PAPYRUS. Transcriptions and Translations. From Sir H. Thompson. July, 1931—May 18, 1932."

In the Chester Beatty Library are to be found transcriptions of the published pages 25, 26, 30, 34–40, 51, and 54 of the Kephalaia and of pages 8, 11, 12, 27–30, 44, 60, 69, 76, 78, 79, 82–84, 91, and 93 of the Homilies, as well as two pages of the Kephalaia published only in the initial essay by Schmidt and Polotsky, pages 375–76.[2] Also to be found are five still unpublished pages of the Kephalaia: pages 343, 344, 353, 354, and 366.

In the preface to A Coptic Dictionary (1939), W. E. Crum referred to "copies of the unpublished portions [of the Manichaica] kindly sent by Dr. Polotsky and Mr. Allberry" that he was able to include "only since reaching the letter P." Among the "Abbreviations" are hence "Mani 1 = copies of Chester Beatty's unpublished Manichaean papyri by H. J. Polotsky and H. Thompson" and "Mani 2 = copies of similar papyri at Berlin by Polotsky." This reference to unpublished material would not include, at first glance, what had been published by 1939, which consisted (according to the "Abbreviations," of the Dublin Homilies) of Part 2 of the Dublin Psalms, and the Berlin Kephalaia, presumably only fascicles 1–8, since they were published in 1935–1937; the first volume was published in 1940 with the appearance of fascicles 9–10. Thus, it is conceivable that some Berlin materials that Crum cites as unpublished are among those that have been subsequently published, whereas Dublin material cited as unpublished would still be unpublished, unless it was so listed in fascicles of Crum's Dictionary that appeared before Allberry published in 1938. Though the materials identified in the Dublin Archives include no unpublished Dublin material, there are in the Oxford Archives unidentified Dublin transcripts, though one (II, 30, 1) has the note "precedes Allberry p. 1," which must mean it comes from the unpublished first part of the Psalms codex. Two psalms published in English translation by Søren Giversen as derived from the unpublished first part of the Psalms are also present in the Crum Archives (see below).

2. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten," 45, for the German translation and page 87 for the Coptic text from codex page 375; page 42 for the German translation and page 82 for the Coptic text of codex page 376. Schmidt and Polotsky did not give the page numeration in the codex.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 5 —

The Effects of World War II

This remarkable story of the discovery, acquisition, and initial conservation and publication of the Manichaica of Medinet Madi has as its sequel an equally remarkable story of the Manichaean codices in the aftermath of World War II.

In a guidebook, Joachim Selim Karig, acting director of the Ägyptisches Museum in Charlottenburg, West Berlin, until 1989, described precautions taken in wartime as follows:[1]

Rudolf Anthes, the successor in office to Heinrich Schäfter from 1935 on, suffered a similar fate as well. [Similar to that of his predecessor's pupils: "Both were obliged, since they were not pleasing to the ruling powers, to give up their careers and later even their homeland."] Recognition was denied to him, for he had never hidden the fact when his personal political opinion stood in opposition to his superiors. He was not named director, though he had to bear the work and responsibility of the leader of the collection. Also the sad task rested on him of protecting the valuable objects of the collection from destruction by

Auch Rudolf Anthes, der Amtsnachfolger von Heinrich Schäfer seit 1935, erlitt ein ähnliches Schicksal. [Similar to that of his predecessor's pupils: "Beide mussten, da sie den herrschenden Machthabern nicht genehm waren, ihre Laufbahn, später sogar ihre Heimat verlassen."] Ihm, der nie ein Hehl daraus machte, wenn seine persönliche politische Meinung im Gegensatz zu seiner Obrigkeit stand, wurde die Anerkennung versagt. Er wurde nicht zum Direktor ernannt, obwohl er die Arbeit und Verantwortung des Sammlungsleiters zu tragen hatte. Ihm oblag auch die

1. Karig, Ägyptisches Museum Berlin, 73–74.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

war and bombing raids, of packing them up and carrying them to various places—an activity that he executed with the greatest conscientiousness in spite of all the impediments of the time.

traurige Aufgabe, die wertvollen Sammlungsgüter vor der Vernichtung durch Krieg und Bombenangriffe zu schützen, sie zu verpacken und an verschiedene Stellen abzutransportieren—eine Tätigkeit, die er mit der grössten Gewissenhaftigkeit, allen Behinderungen der Zeit zum Trotz, ausführte.

Jürgen Settgast, director of the Ägyptisches Museum in West Berlin, described the wartime and postwar period as follows:[2]

Catastrophe

Already soon after the Second World War broke out, steps began to be taken also in the Egyptian Museum to put in safekeeping the objects of the collection. Storage places which one thought could offer them better protection than the museum in the center of Berlin had to be located and made ready to receive them. But statues and pieces of architecture that weighed tons remained at their place in the museum and were covered with protective walls.

The most valuable works of art were brought to the concrete bunker [removed after the war] in the Zoo. Many outstanding exhibition pieces wandered into the deep cellar of the Neue Münze; others remained on the Museum Island where they could find protection in the basements of the museums.

Katastrophe

Schon bald nach Ausbruch des Zweiten Weltkrieges begannen auch im Ägyptischen Museum Massnahmen zur Sicherung des Sammlungsbestandes. Auslagerungsplätze, von denen man glaubte, dass sie besseren Schutz als das Museum im Berliner Zentrum bieten könnten, mussten gefunden und aufnahmebereit hergerichtet werden. Tonnenschwere Statuen und Architekturteile aber verblieben im Museum an Ort und Stelle und wurden mit Schutzmauern verkleidet.

Die wertvollsten Kunstwerke wurden in den Betonbunker [removed after the war] am Zoo gebracht. Viele hervorragende Ausstellungsstücke wanderten in den Tiefkeller der Neuen Münze, andere verblieben auf der Museumsinsel, konnten Schutz in den Kellern der Museen finden. Nahezu alle Objekte

2. Settgast, Ägyptisches Museum Berlin, 76. The hardback booklet published by the Ägyptisches Museum der Staatlichen Museen Preussicher Kulturbesitz, West Berlin, summarizes this report with more or less detail in three languages: Kniese and Robbel, Ägyptisches Museum Berlin, 8 (German); Fay, Egyptian Museum Berlin, 7–8 (English); and Alte, Musée Égyptien Berlin, 8 (French).

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Almost all the objects of these three storage places survived the war intact, were transported into the Soviet Union in 1945–1946, and then returned to Berlin in 1958. These objects comprise today the core of the Egyptian Museum in the eastern part of Berlin.

Immediately after the end of the war the objects stored in the bunker of Friedrichshain became the victims of a large fire. However, the Egyptian Museum suffered its most serious losses in the total destruction of the depots of art objects in the castle Sophienhof in the region of Mecklenburg, which was heavily fought over in April 1945. Here almost 100 crates of small works of art, well over 500 stone objects, and the bulk of the collection of wooden coffins and mummy coverings were destroyed. The Berlin Egyptian Museum is still today marked by this catastrophe. What was stored in a mine near Grabsleben west of the Elbe fell into the hands of British troops in April 1945. They gave the 34 crates with objects from the reserves emergency asylum in Celle. Incomparably more important was what was given over to the American troops that pushed forward into Thüringen: ninety-seven crates, among them the one with the green head and another with the bust of Nofretete. That the best of the Berlin collections was rescued for us is also thanks to unknown railroad workers, who simply ignored Goebbel's dieser drei Auslagerungsstätten haben den Krieg heil überdauert, sind 1945/46 in die Sowjetunion transportiert worden und kehrten 1958 nach Berlin zurück. Diese Stücke sind heute Kern des Ägyptischen Museums im Ostteil Berlins.

Die im Bunker Friedrichshain ausgelagerten Objekte wurden unmittelbar nach Kriegsende Opfer eines Grossfeuers. Die schwersten Verluste aber erlitt das Ägyptische Museum durch die totale Vernichtung des Kunstgutlagers in Schloss Sophienhof im Mecklenburgischen, das im April 1945 heftig umkämpft war. Hier wurden fast 100 Kisten mit Kleinkunst, weit über 500 Steinwerke und der grösste Teil der Sammlung von Holzsärgen und Mumienhüllen vernichtet. Von dieser Katastrophe ist das Berliner Ägyptische Museum noch heute gezeichnet. Was in einem Bergwerk bei Grabsleben westlich der Elbe ausgelagert war, fiel britischen Truppen im April 1945 in die Hände. Diese liessen die 34 Kisten mit Magazinbeständen in Celle Notasyl finden. Ungleich wichtiger war, was den bis nach Thüringen hinein vorgestossenen amerikanischen Truppen übergeben wurde: 97 Kisten, darunter die mit dem Grünen Kopf und eine andere mit der Büste der Nofretete. Dass das Spitzenstück der Berliner Sammlungen uns erhalten blieb, verdanken wir auch unbekannten Eisenbahnern, die den Goebbels Befehl, die Nofretete aber Ostern 1945 wieder nach

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms order to take Nofretete back to Berlin at Easter 1945. Instead, the Americans transferred the queen to Wiesbaden, where she resided for ten years before returning home to Berlin on June 23, 1956.

Berlin zu schaffen, einfach ignorierten. Statt dessen überführten die Amerikaner die Königin nach Wiesbaden, wo sie zehn Jahre residierte, bevor sie am 23. Juni 1956 nach Berlin heimkehrte.

Karig described the beginnings of the new Egyptian Museum just across the street from the castle in Charlottenburg:[3]

New Beginning

One hundred and thirty-one wooden crates in the ballroom of the former troop casino, which with its emergency roof above the burnt-out and naked walls did not look at all festive any longer—that was the heritage that one had to use. A director, a secretary, and a conservator was the staff that from February 1, 1962, on, was supposed to produce from this an Egyptian Museum. Just the sifting and identifying of the objects of the collection already produced great difficulties. All the files about them, the Inventory Books and other records were in East Berlin, unavailable for our use, whereas the inventory numbers on the pieces themselves were often illegibly rubbed off, destroyed. Much was not published, but even if it was—also a specialized library had first to be built up out of nothing.

Nonetheless, a suitable house had already been found, which seemed to be remarkably suited to house in its relatively small rooms a collection containing many pieces of small format as a result of

Neubegin

Einhundertundeinunddreissig Holzkisten im Festsaal des ehemaligen Landwehrkasinos, der mit seinem Notdach über den ausgebrannten and nackten Wänden keineswegs mehr festlich wirkte—das war das Erbe, das es zu nutzen galt; ein Direktor, eine Sekretärin und ein Restaurator die Mannschaft, die vom 1. Februar 1962 an hieraus ein Ägyptisches Museum schaffen sollte. Allein schon die Sichtung und Identifizierung der Sammlungsbestände brachte grosse Schwierigkeiten. Alle Akten hierüber, Inventarbücher und sonstigen Unterlagen waren in Ost-Berlin für uns nicht erreichbar, die Inventar-Nummern auf den Stücken selbst aber oftmals unleserlich abgerieben, zerstört. Vieles ist nicht publiziert worden, aber selbst wenn—auch eine Fachbibliothek musste erst aus dem Nichts aufgebaut werden.

Immerhin, ein passendes Haus war schon gefunden, das vorzüglich geeignet zu sein schien, in seinen relativ kleinen Räumen

3. Karig, Ägpytisches Museum Beriln, 78.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the storage situation. The fact that the departure of the police from the eastern building constructed by Stüber was delayed by a further number of years was more nearly useful for the cause, since one could devote one's attention after all to the objects (now with the larger staff of colleagues), could restore them, and could also go at making the completely unstudied Papyrus Collection accessible.

eine Sammlung aufzunehmen, die, bedingt durch die Auslagerung, viele kleinformatige Stücke besitzt. Dass sich der Auszug der Polizei aus dem östlichen Stüberbau noch um Jahre verzögerte, war eher der Sache nach dienlich, konnte man sich doch, jetzt mit vergrössertem Mitarbeiterstab, den Denkmälern widmen und sie restaurieren und auch schon an die Erschliessung der noch gänzlich unbearbeiteten Papyrussammlung gehen.

In an earlier guidebook, Karl-Theodor Zauzich had described the situation of the papyrus collection as follows:[4]

In the Second World War the contents of the Papyrus Collection as well as of the Egyptian Museum had been stored in different parts of Germany to protect them from air raids. After the end of the war they remained in the relevant occupation zones, and, after some detours, were turned over to the papyrus collection of the Staatliche Museen in Berlin ([the former] DDR) and to the Ägyptisches Museum Preussischer Kulturbesitz. By the accident of the earlier storage, the papyri that reached West Berlin were almost exclusively those that had been worked on neither in terms of restoration nor in terms of scholarship, and still had no inventory numbers. By the very nature of the case, it was a matter of the papyrus leaves that were outwardly less appealing and especially of the

Im 2. Weltkrieg hat man die Bestände der Papyrussammlung sowie die des Ägyptischen Museums zu ihrem Schutz vor Bombenangriffen in verschiedene Teile Deutschlands ausgelagert. Nach Kriegsende verblieben sie in den jeweiligen Besatzungszonen und wurden nach einigen Umwegen der Papyrussammlung der Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin (DDR) und dem Ägyptischen Museum Preussischer Kulturbesitz übergeben. Durch die Zufälligkeit der seinerzeitigen Auslagerung sind nach West-Berlin fast ausschliesslich jene Papyri gelangt, die weder restauratorisch noch wissenschaftlich bearbeitet waren und auch noch keine Inventarnummern hatten. Das waren naturgemäss die äusserlich weniger ansprechenden und vor allem die stärker fragmentierten

4. Zauzich, Kunst der Welt in den Berliner Museen, 11:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

more fragmentary leaves, which, however, precisely because of their long neglect, are especially interesting from a scholarly point of view.

Papyrusblätter, die allerdings gerade wegen ihrer langen Vernachlässigung wissenschaftlich besonders interessant sind.

The guidebook of the Museum Island museums in Berlin portrays as follows the situation during and after the war:[5]

[p. 7] Fascism and war had also brought the State Museums to the edge of complete destruction. The first and most important task in 1945 was hence to save from the ruins what had survived Fascistic barbarism and war. Here began the inestimable help of the Soviet Union, which carried the works of art to the museums of Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, and other cities, cared for them there, and gave them over to our people, when suitable prerequisites for caring for them had been created.

[p. 22] Then at the beginning of the Fascistic predatory war in 1939, all museums were closed. It lasted 10 years until an exhibit could again take place on the Berlin Museum Island.

A large part of the holdings were packed and put in storage outside [the museums], in basements, in crypts of banks, in the large bunkers at the Zoo and in Friedrichshain, in warehouses and mines. Numerous works of art and valuable books were ruined in these storage places during the war.

[p. 7] Faschismus und Krieg hatten auch die Staatlichen Museen an den Rand der völligen Vernichtung gebracht. Die erste und wichtigste Aufgabe war deshalb 1945, das aus den Trümmern zu bergen, was faschistische Barbarei und Krieg überstanden hatte. Hier setzte die unschätzbare Hilfe der Sowjetunion ein, die die Kunstwerke in die Museen Moskaus, Leningrads, Kiews und anderer Städte überführte, sie dort pflegte und unserem Volk übergab, als entsprechende Voraussetzungen für ihre Unterbringung geschaffen waren.

[p. 22] Bei Beginn des faschistischen Raubkrieges 1939 wurden dann alle Museen geschlossen, es dauerte 10 Jahre, ehe wieder eine Ausstellung auf der Berliner Museumsinsel stattfinden konnte.

Ein grosser Teil der Bestände wurde verpackt und ausgelagert, in Keller, Tresore von Banken, in die grossen Bunker am Zoo und im Friedrichshain, in Gutshäuser und Bergwerke. Zahlreiches Kunstgut und wertvolle Bücher gingen in diesen Auslagerungsorten während des Krieges zugrunde.

5. Schätze der Weltkultur (Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR: Staatliche Museen zu Beriln, and Berlin-Information, 2. überarbeitete Auflage, 1981), "Vorwort," 7; and Hühns, "Zur Geschichte," 22, 23, 25.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The Museum Island was destroyed on February 3, 1945, by a massive attack. This barbaric air attack lies on the same level as the destroying of Dresden ten days later.

Fascism and war had destroyed a locale of world culture

To the Soviet troops that in May 1945 freed Berlin, a terrifying picture presented itself. All the buildings of the Museum Island were destroyed, only a few rooms in the basement floors were usable, but they too were without windows and [p. 23] endangered by water and cold, since all the houses' roofs were missing. Given the high degree of destruction in Berlin, it was not possible to find room for the rescued works of art, especially those from the places of storage outside, where they could be protected from further disintegration and theft. For the fact that we today can again admire these unique treasures of culture we are indebted to the Soviet soldiers, scholars, and restorers. They took to heart, as in the case of the Dresden paintings, also the Berlin art treasures. They were put in safekeeping and brought into the Soviet Union, where they were cared for and conserved in the museums in Leningrad, Moscow, and Kiev, until the possibility existed again in Berlin to receive the collections and care for and exhibit them in a professional way.

The holdings of the State Museums that were stored in the occupation zones of the Western allies were brought together by

Die Museumsinsel wurde am 3. Februar 1945 durch einen Grossangriff zerstört. Dieser barbarische Luftangriff liegt mit der Zerstörung Dresdens, 10 Tage später, auf einer Linie.

Faschismus und Krieg hatten eine Stätte der Weltkultur vernichtet.

Den sowjetischen Truppen, die im Mai 1945 Berlin befreiten, bot sich ein erschreckendes Bild. Alle Gebäude der Museumsinsel waren zerstört, nur in den Sockelgeschossen waren einige Räume brauchbar, aber auch sie ohne Fenster und [p. 23] von Wasser und Kälte gefährdet, da allen Häusern die Dächer fehlten. Bei dem hohen Grad von Zerstörung in Berlin gab es keine Möglichkeit, für die geretteten Kunstwerke, vor allem aus den Auslagerungstätten, Raum zu finden, in denen sie vor weiterem Verfall und vor Diebstahl geschützt werden konnten. Dass wir heute diese einzigartigen Schätze der Kultur wieder bewundern können, verdanken wir den sowjetischen Soldaten, Wissenschaftlern und Restauratoren. Sie nahmen sich, wie der Dresdner Gemälde, auch der Berliner Kunstschätze an. Sie wurden sichergestellt und in die Sowjetunion gebracht, wo sie in den Museen in Leningrad, Moskau und Kiew gepflegt und konserviert wurden, bis in Berlin wieder die Möglichkeit bestand, die Sammlungen aufzunehmen, sachkundig zu betreuen und auszustellen.

Die in den Besatzungszonen der westlichen Alliierten untergebrachten Bestände der Staatlichen Museen wurden von den Besatzungstruppen zunächst in Wiesbaden und Celle

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the occupation troops at first in Wiesbaden and Celle, and later taken to West Berlin, where they until today are denied to the State Museums as their owner . . .

[p. 25] In 1958 the Soviet Union gave over to the [former] DDR the rest of the pieces from the collections of the museums that had been put in safe keeping in 1945. In several hundred railroad cars over a million museum objects arrived in Berlin, carefully folded in silk paper, wrapped in waxed paper and in upholstered boxes, along with the documentation that belonged with them. In the State Museums these treasures were then given back to the owners. Among them, holdings of the gallery of paintings and of the collection of sculptures, of the cabinet of etchings, the Pergamon frieze and many unique works, which since then are deposited and exhibited on the Museum Island. Tens of thousands of visitors saw at that time the exhibition "Treasures of World Culture Saved by the Soviet Union." A friendly, decades-long collaboration with the museums in Moscow and Leningrad dates from this time, to which we are indebted for many interesting exhibits and many a stimulus for our work.

zusammengeführt und später nach Westberlin gebracht, wo sie bis heute den Staatlichen Museen als ihrem Eigentümer vorenthalten werden . . .

[p. 25] 1958 übergab die Sowjetunion die übrigen 1945 sichergestellten Stücke aus den Sammlungen der Museen an die DDR. In mehreren hundert Eisenbahnwagen trafen über eine Million Museumsexponate in Berlin ein; sorgsam in Seidenpapier gehüllt, in Wachstuch eingeschlagen und in gepolsterten Kisten, zusammen mit der dazugehörigen Dokumentation. In den Staatlichen Museen wurden diese Schätze dann den Eigentümern zurückgegeben. Unter ihnen Bestände der Gemäldegalerie und der Skulpturensammlung, des Kupferstichkabinetts, der Fries von Pergamon und viele einmalige Werke, die seitdem auf der Museumsinsel deponiert und ausgestellt werden. Zehntausende von Besuchern haben damals die Ausstellung "Schätze der Weltkultur von der Sowjetunion gerettet" gesehen. Von dieser Zeit an datiert nun eine schon Jahrzehnte währende freundschaftliche Zusammenarbeit mit den Museen in Moskau und Leningrad, denen wir viele interessante Ausstellungen und manche Anregungen für unsere Arbeit verdanken.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

In a small guidebook of the Ägyptisches Museum of Berlin, Wolfgang Müller has provided, as follows, more specific information about the papyrus collection:[6]

At the end of the war in 1945, the New Museum was a ruin. Parts of the collection stored outside and taken over by the West's occupation troops are today unlawfully in (West) Berlin and have not yet been given back to their original place of storage on the Museum Island. Many works of art saved in destroyed Berlin were taken for safekeeping to the Soviet Union. Already in 1953, after years of rebuilding, the first Egyptian exhibit could be opened on the Museum Island. After the return of the art holdings preserved in the Soviet Union, the Egyptian Museum had been showing since 1959 in the Bode Museum a large number of works of art of the highest quality, from the early period down to the Hellenistic age, papyrus manuscripts, selected finds from daily life, and mummies. This chronologically arranged exhibit was enlarged in 1964 with new rooms, and since 1973 has been basically rearranged.

Bei Kriegsende 1945 war das Neue Museum eine Ruine. Ausgelagerte and von den westlichen Besatzungstruppen übernommene Sammlungsteile befinden sich heute widerrechtlich in Berlin [West] und sind noch nicht an ihren ursprünglichen Aufbewahrungsort auf der Museumsinsel zurückgegeben worden. Viele im zerstörten Berlin gerettete Kunstwerke wurden zur Sicherung in die Sowjetunion überführt. Nach Jahren des Aufbaus konnte bereits 1953 auf der Museumsinsel die erste ägyptische Ausstellung eröffnet werden. Nach Übergabe des in der Sowjetunion bewahrten Kunstbesitzes zeigt das Ägyptische Museum seit 1959 im Bode-Museum eine grosse Zahl von Kunstwerken ersten Ranges von der Frühzeit bis zum Hellenismus, Papyrushandschriften, ausgewählte Funde aus dem täglichen Leben und Mumien. Diese chronologisch aufgebaute Ausstellung wurde 1964 durch neue Räume erweitert und seit 1973 grundlegend umgestaltet.

In 1954 Rolf Ibscher narrated, as follows, the course of events during the war, relative to the Manichaean codices:[7]

6. Müller, "Einleitung," 6.
7. Ibscher, Rolf. "Wiederaufnahme," 3.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

After the passing of my father on May 26, 1943, I took the Manichaean papyrus books for reasons of security into the repository, safe from bombs, that had received the papyri of the Berlin Museums. But after July 20, 1944, this place too did not seem to me safe enough, especially since the remainder of the not yet conserved Mani books of Sir Chester Beatty was in Berlin, and I removed them, together with a Berlin manuscript, to Bavaria, into the house of my father-in-law in the country. Thence, after the war, the parts belonging to Chester Beatty returned to London.

The Berlin manuscript remained in Bavaria.

Nach dem am 26. Mai 1943 erfolgten Ableben meines Vaters brachte ich die Mani-chäischen Papyrusbücher aus Sicherheitsgründen in das bombensichere Verliess, das die Papyri der Berliner Museen aufgenommen hatte. Aber nach dem 20. Juli 1944 erschien mir auch dieser Platz nicht mehr sicker genug, besonders, da ja der Rest der noch nicht aufgearbeiteten Manibücher von Sir Chester Beatty in Berlin war, und ich entführte diese zusammen mit einer Berliner Handschrift nach Bayern in das Haus meines Schwiegervaters auf dem Lande. Dort kehrten nach Kriegsende die Teile des Chester Beatty-Besitzes nach London zurück.

Die Berliner Handschrift blieb in Bayern.

Alexander Böhlig has summarized what happened to the Manichaean codices as follows:[8]

The war brought the thriving editorial activity to an abrupt end. Besides, the air attacks brought with them an unusual endangering of the manuscript material. As a result, one went at moving them outside. The glassed pieces of the Chester Beatty collection were already by and large in London. The Berlin collection was, to the extent it was glassed, brought into one of the anti-aircraft towers at the Zoo train station, together with the not-yet-restored Mani manuscripts. In fact, at that time there were in the Berlin Papyrus Collection the not yet restored pieces from both the English and

Der Krieg machte der regen Editionstätigkeit ein jähes Ende. Die Luftangriffe brachten ausserdem eine ausserordentliche Gefährdung für das Handschriftenmaterial mit sich. Infolgedessen machte man sich an die Auslagerung. Die verglasten Stücke der Chester-Beatty-Sammlung waren bereits im wesentlichen in London. Die Berliner Sammlung wurde, soweit sie verglast war, in einen der Flaktürme am Bahnhof Zoo gebracht, zusammen mit den noch nicht restaurierten Mani-Handschriften; es befanden sich damals nämlich die noch nicht restaurierten Stücke

8. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 180–81.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the German holdings. Rolf Ibscher had already in 1940 taken the place of his father, who then died in 1943. Concern for the safekeeping of the manuscripts moved him, with the approval of General Director Kümmel, in November 1944 to bring the remainder of Sir Chester Beatty's Codices A and C (the Psalms and the Kephalaia), as well as a further manuscript, to Schondorf on the Ammers Lake in Upper Bavaria, into the house of his father-in-law. There Sir Chester Beatty had the parts of the Codices A and C picked up in the year 1946. The Manichaean texts that had been brought into the USSR, in connection with the action of the Soviet armed forces to make things secure, were given back to Berlin in the year 1958.

sowohl aus englischem wie aus deutschem Besitz in der Berliner Papyrussammlung. Die Sorge um die Sicherung der Handschriften bewog Dr. Rolf Ibscher, der schon 1940 an die Stelle seines dann 1943 verstorbenen Vaters getreten war, mit Genehmigung von Generaldirektor Kümmel im November 1944 die Sir Chester Beatty gehörigen Reste der Codices A und C (Psalmbuch und Kephalaia) sowie eine weitere Handschrift nach Schondorf am Ammersee in Oberbayern in das Haus seines Schwiegervaters zu bringen. Dort liess Sir Chester Beatty die Teile der Codices A und C im Jahre 1946 abholen. Die bei der Sicherstellungsaktion der sowjetischen Streitkräfte in die UdSSR geschafften manichäischen Texte wurden im Jahre 1958 nach Berlin zurückgegeben.

Rolf Ibscher had reported in 1955 about the fate of Sir Chester Beatty's codices:[9]

which on my own responsibility I had brought out of the danger zone of Berlin at the end of 1944 for the final phase of the war together with a Berlin manuscript (Codex No. 15998 [actually Sir Chester Beatty's Synaxeis Codex B] on the shrewd advise of my father-in-law, the publisher Wolf Henry Doering, into his secure house on the quiet Ammer Lake in Schondorf, a good hour from Munich.

die ich Ende 1944 auf den klugen Rat meines Schwiegervaters, des Verlegers Wolf Henry Doering, zusammen mit einer Berliner Handschrift (Codex Nr. 15998 [actually Sir Chester Beatty's Synaxeis Codex B]) auf eigene Verantwortung aus der Gefahrenzone Berlins für die Endphase des Krieges in sein sicheres Haus am stillen Ammersee in Schondorf, eine gute Stunde von München entfernt, gebracht hatte.

9. Ibscher, Rolf, "Das Konservierungswerk," 3.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Ibscher's phrase, "on my own responsibility," presents a different emphasis from Böhlig's phrase, "with the approval of General Director Kümmel." In any case, Kümmel would have difficulty retaining responsibility for a codex of the Berlin Papyrus Collection that was far away in Bavaria. If Kümmel had been informed of the plan to remove the codices of Sir Chester Beatty, he could well have taken the position that these materials were not formally under his control, hence he would not like to bear the responsibility for them, either in war-torn Berlin or elsewhere, and Ibscher could assume that responsibility and could act according to his own discretion. But it is hard to see how Kümmel could have formally approved of hiding Berlin Museum and Papyrus Collection holdings quite unofficially in Schondorf and at the invitation of a person neither on the museum staff nor otherwise officially involved in the safekeeping of the Museum's holdings.

Böhlig has similarly interpreted this rescue operation:[10]

Rolf Ibscher had the authorization from General Director Kümmel to get the Dublin material from the anti-aircraft tower and take it to Bavaria. He did this in the company of the Museum worker P. Seidel, who has since died. In the process the idea came to him that it would perhaps be useful, in case worst came to worst, also to take along one of the Berlin codices. This decision was, as far as I know, spontaneous. That it was worth it, is shown by the success. These things remained completely preserved, in contrast to what	Rolf Ibscher hatte von Generaldirektor Kümmel die Genehmigung, die Dubliner Materialien aus dem Flakturm zu holen und nach Bayern zu bringen. Er tat das in Begleitung des inzwischen verstorbenen Museumsarbeiters P. Seidel. Dabei kam ihm der Gedanke, es wäre vielleicht nützlich für den Notfall, auch einen der Berliner Codices mitzunehmen. Dieser Entschluss war meines Wissens spontan. Dass es sich gelohnt hat, zeigt der Erfolg. Diese Dinge blieben vollständig erhalten im

10. Böhlig, in a letter of February 10, 1986. For his concluding comment he refers to Søren Giversen's paper, "The Unedited Chester Beatty Mani Texts," 371, where Giversen listed the following extant material as belonging to the Chester Beatty Library: "The whole CB collection consists of somewhat 1040 pages of which only 334 have been published so far. I said somewhat 1040 pages—the exact number depends on how some very fragmented pages or remnants of pages are counted. These 1040 pages are: A) Psalmbook 546 pages, B) Unidentified codex 20 pages, C) 'Kephalaia' 358 pages, D) Homilies 98 pages, E) Addenda et Varia 20 pages." This makes a total of 1048 pages, of which he lists 334 as published, leaving 714 yet to be published.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the Soviets had "saved." Whether something was then confused when turned over to the emissaries of Chester Beatty, so that in the end result a Berlin part came to

Gegensatz zu dem, was die Sowjets "gerettet" haben. Ob dann bei der übergabe an die Abgesandten von Chester Beatty etwas verwechselt worden ist, so dass im Endeffekt

Rolf Ibscher described to Sir Chester Beatty the rescue operation in his broken English as follows:[11]

> The papyri were removed according to my arrangement from the bomb proof shelter (Zoo Bunker) in 1944 by my assistant at the Museum, Mr. Seidel, but Codex B [Synaxeis], sorry to say, seems to have been left behind. The reason being that the papyri had to be removed secretly in a frantic hurry, thus you can imagine how glad I was, when Mr. Seidel got past the SS-Guards with the invaluable little wooden box.
>
> This wooden box contained one Berlin manuscript [actually Sir Chester Beatty's Codex B, the Synaxeis] (for which I had specially asked Mr. Seidel) to make certain, that at l[e]ast part of the Berlin collection also was saved, in addition those papyri which reached you in London in 1947 after Dr. Böhlig had separated them at Schondorf.
>
> Thus Codex B [actually the Berlin Codex P^{15998}, the Letters], together with 3 Berlin manuscripts [P^{15996}, P^{15997}, P^{15999}] and all other glazed Berlin Manichaean Papyri of the Museum [P^{15995} and leaves of P^{15996}, P^{15997}, P^{15998}] were taken to Russia.

On November 1, 1960, I. E. S. Edwards of the British Museum's Department of Egyptian Antiquities wrote to Rudolf Anthes, then in Philadelphia, who had been assistant keeper of the Egyptian Department of the Berlin Museums in 1939, inquiring about the whereabouts of Beatty's papyri:

> I should like to know in particular whether there were many pages or few, and also whether Hugo Ibscher would have worked on them in the Museum or at home.

On November 9, 1960, Edwards wrote to R. J. Hayes, then head of the Chester Beatty Library:

> I have had a reply from Anthes who confirms what Böhlig says about Rolf Ibscher taking the Chester Beatty material to

11. Rolf Ibscher in a letter of October 6, 1955, to Sir Chester Beatty.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> Schondorf when the Flakturm was bombed (p. 5 [of the transcript of Böhlig's paper]).

In the archives of the Chester Beatty Library there is a black loose-leaf folder titled "Papyrus. Biblical Manichaean Hieratic. Greek etc. General Catalogue." In the section entitled "Manichaean Pap." there is a note dated May 1940:

> Mr. Allberry said that Dr. Ibscher had the remainder of Mr. Beatty's papyrus at his house in the country, at Klein Machnow (see letter from Allberry).

Böhlig has subsequently reported similarly concerning half-conserved Kephalaia material belonging to Berlin:[12]

Of the material in Berlin only a very small part has always remained in Berlin. It was the last 20 leaves of the Berlin Kephalaia book. They were conserved by Rolf Ibscher in the years 1952 and 1953.	Von dem in Berlin befindlichen Material war nur der kleinste Teil immer in Berlin geblieben; es waren die letzten 20 Blätter des Berliner Kephalaiabuches; sie wurden von Rolf Ibscher in den Jahren 1952 and 1953 konserviert.

Rolf Ibscher then reported similarly about the half-conserved remainder of the Berlin Kephalaia:[13]

The remains of the Berlin Kephalaia had escaped destruction by being stored in my house after 1945. The degree of difficulty in conserving them, which I overcame between 1951 and 1955, was worse than that which the Chester Beatty papyri displayed.	Der Schwierigkeitsgrad der Konservierung für die Reste der Berliner Kephalaia, die der Vernichtung durch die Aufbewahrung in meinem Haus nach 1945 entgangen waren und die ich zwischen 1951 und 1955 bewältigte, war schlimmer als ihn die Chester Beatty Papyri aufwiesen.

It would seem probable that what was stored in his house after 1945 had already been stored in his house during the war, a conjecture confirmed by Böhlig:[14]

12. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 182.
13. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 52.
14. Böhlig, in a letter of February 10, 1986, to the author.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

If half-conserved leaves of the Berlin Kephalaia, the material belonging to Sir Chester Beatty, and perhaps other book blocks or half-conserved leaves had been taken to the Ibscher home to be worked on there, it is unclear what of this material Rolf Ibscher took to the Zoo Bunker after his father's death of on May 26, 1943. At least some material remained in the Ibscher home throughout the war (cf. Böhlig's comment, "only a very small part," "the last 20 leaves of the Berlin Kephalaia book"). P[15999], referred to pejoratively as the wig, was apparently classified by itself, in that it was put on display as hopeless rather than as classified with the other Manichaean codices to be conserved. Thus it may well not have been in the Ibscher home for conservation. If Hugo Ibscher still worked some days in the museum, some unconserved or half-conserved material may have been still there for him to work on. Thus, it is indeterminate just what material stayed in Berlin throughout the war and postwar periods (or what was taken from the

Why did Rolf Ibscher also have material at home? He, like his father, always had material at home, since his father at his sixtieth birthday had received the right to work at home three days a week. When the papyri came into the Zoo bunker, the material on which he was working naturally remained in Ibscher's residence. That bombs would fall in the region of his residence—Kleinmachnow is incidentally not part of Berlin, but rather belongs to the district of Potsdam—was not exactly probable and in fact did not happen.

Warum Rolf Ibscher auch zuhause Material hatte? Er hatte wie sein Vater immer Material zuhause, weil sein Vater bei seinem 60. Geburtstag das Recht erhalten hatte, 3 Tage der Woche zuhause zu arbeiten. Als die Papyri in den Zoobunker kamen, blieb natürlich das Material in Ibschers Wohnung, an dem er arbeitete. Dass in die Gegend seiner Wohnung (Kleinmachnow ist übrigens kein Teil von Berlin, sondern gehört zum Bezirk Potsdam) Bomben fallen würden, war nicht gerade wahrscheinlich und ist ja auch nicht geschehen.

Ibscher home in Kleinmachnow to Schondorf on the Ammer Lake), what material went to the Zoo bunker and from there to Schondorf (no doubt via the Ibscher home in Kleinmachnow), and what material went to the Zoo bunker and from there to Leningrad (or at least in the direction of Leningrad) but did not return to Berlin in 1958. The major losses were the unconserved book blocks of P[15997], P[15998], and P[15999].

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

One can only postulate that all the conserved leaves of P15997 and P15998 and all the half-conserved leaves of P15996 and P15998 are all accounted for; four conserved leaves of P15996 do seem to be missing (see below).

Michel Tardieu describes the loss of the bulk of P15997 and P15998 as "detruit ou perdu durant la seconde guerre mondiale" ["destroyed or lost during the second world war."][15] Apparently, there was no loss during the war but only after the war.

Rolf Ibscher described what happened to the material taken to Leningrad:[16]

On August 29, 1960, Otto Firchow, director of the Egyptian Museum and Papyrus Collection in East Berlin, responded as follows to an inquiry about Beatty's codices from I. E. S. Edwards of the British Museum's Department of Egyptian Antiquities (according to the English translation preserved in the Chester Beatty Library archives):

> The papyri which Sir Chester Beatty sent to Dr. Ibscher shortly before the war were taken by the Russians to Leningrad together with the Berlin collection of papyri. I am however glad to be able to tell you that they were among those which came back safely. Only I and my wife, who has hitherto been Conservator of Papyri in the Museum, knew about their existence. To return them at the present moment would probably require considerable diplomatic intervention on the part of the British Foreign Office with the East German Government.
>
> I myself have been compelled to surrender during the past few days under political and personal pressure the Direction of the Berlin Musuem, Egyptian Department, and to flee to West Berlin. I have used this opportunity to take the Mani Papyri with me. In the next few days I will hand them over to the British Military Authorities. I consider that in this way this valuable material will eventually reach your hands.

Three Berlin codices [the unconserved book blocks of P15997, P15998, and P15999] and Codex B of Sir Chester Beatty [which in fact did not go into "exile"] have not reemerged thus far after the return of the Berlin papyrus col-	Drei Berliner Codices [the unconserved book blocks of P15997, P15998, and P15999] und Codex B von Sir Chester Beatty [which in fact did not go into "exile"] tauchten bisher nach Rückführung der Berliner Papyrussammlung aus dem Exil

15. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6.
16. Rolf Ibscher, "Mani und kein Ende," 220.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

lection from exile. In the case of such extensive objects something can always be overlooked and still be peacefully slumbering somewhere, or these very brittle codices crumbled into dust when transported, before they could be registered into the very conscientious protection with the very exactly executed salvage lists. Hence there are certainly hopes, and miracles are always taking place at all times, if one believes in them. I spoke about this with Professors Guber and Diakonov in 1954 in Cambridge and later also with Prof. Struve in Moscow in 1960.

noch nicht wieder auf. Bei so umfänglichen Objekten kann immer etwas übersehen werden und noch friedlich irgendwo schlummern, oder diese sehr mürben Codices sind beim Abtransport zerstäubt, bevor sie noch in die sehr gewissenhafte Obhut mit den sehr genau geführten Bergungslisten eingetragen werden konnten. Es bestehen also noch durchaus Hoffnungen, und Wunder geschehen immer zu allen Zeiten, wenn man an sie glaubt. Ich sprach darüber mit den Professoren Guber und Diakonov 1954 in Cambridge und später auch mit Prof. Struve in Moskau, 1960.

In September 1960 Edwards reported this to Beatty:

> Clearly Dr. Firchow found himself in an awkward position. I am sure that he will not part with the papyri unless he is satisfied that the military authorities will convey them safely, but there is always the risk that they will not agree to help. On the whole I should feel happier if he had left them in the Museum and I could have started negotiations with the Foreign Office. I am writing to him to ask him to let me know how matters stand at present and I shall also ask him to hold his hand unless he is absolutely sure that the military authorities can be trusted to deliver them safely. If he runs into difficulties I shall suggest that he takes them to Professor Grapow an old friend of mine in the Berlin Acadamy. We can then review the courses open to us.

The same day Edwards also wrote to R. J. Hayes, honorary director of the Chester Beatty Library:

> I have written to Sir Chester to let him know that the missing portion of his Mani codex has been traced in the Berlin Museum . . .
>
> As you will see events have taken a rather disconcerting turn and I shall write immediately to Firchow and urge him

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> to exercise the greatest care. Personally, I mistrust military authorities. However, it is quite clear that he cannot now return the papyri to the Museum and, if he runs into difficulties, I think his best course will be to deposit them with Grapow in the Berlin Academy. If there were any alternative I should not have chosen him, although I have known him for twenty-five years and I saw him last month in Moscow, but it is rather a case of faute de mieux [lack of better].

The Berlin Academy was in the Soviet sector, where Firchow probably would not have wanted to return to visit Grapow. Nor would Grapow have felt comfortable going to West Berlin to bring back to the Academy or to the Museum (also in East Berlin) what Firchow had secretly carried to West Berlin. There was a customs check between sectors, even if the wall became official only on August 13, 1961.

On September 15, 1960, Hayes replied to Edwards:

> It is great news about the Mani Papyri. I hope they will come through safely, but I would feel they were safer in British than in any German hands. Do you think I should ask a man I know in M. I. 5 to hold a watching brief? . . .
>
> Is the Russian returned material between glass or an unopened roll?

On September 20, 1960, Edwards replied to Hayes:

> I do not know whether the Russian returned material is between glass or if it is still in a pack. I saw Ibscher senior working on one pack when I was in Berlin in 1934, but I think that one belonged to the Berlin Museum. It was a large pack and must have contained at least 100 sheets. I cannot imagine that Firchow has removed as much glass as that from the Museum. My guess is therefore that it is still unglazed, but I may be wrong . . .
>
> The part remaining in Berlin is an unknown quantity, except to Firchow.
>
> Perhaps it would be better to leave an approach to your friend in M. I. 5 until we know exactly what we can ask him to do.

On September 26, 1960, Edwards wrote again to Hayes:

> I am delighted to be able to tell you that I have heard from Firchow that he has handed what he describes as "das Paket mit den Mani-Papyri" ["the packet with the Mani papyri"] to the British consul in Berlin.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> I am getting in touch with him and I hope we shall have the papyri safely here very soon. [An appended hand-written note: "The Bag Room at the F{oreign}.O{ffice}. reports that nothing has yet arrived."] Since he refers to a packet it seems to me unlikely that the papyri are already between glass.

On October 21, 1960, Edwards wrote again to Hayes:

> I heard yesterday that the Berlin Mani package will be arriving at London Airport next Sunday. I shall go and meet the bearer myself and I hope to be able to write on Monday saying that it has arrived safely.

On October 26, 1960, Edwards wrote to Beatty with a copy to Hayes:

> I am writing to let you know the result of our quest for the Mani papyri in Berlin.
>
> The operation, which I now realise is only the first round, did not turn out to be much of a success, I am sorry to say. Our Consul-General in Berlin and the Foreign Office were most helpful. The package was brought by a member of the diplomatic staff and I took delivery at London Airport last Sunday. By previous arrangement with the Customs it was opened at the Museum on Monday.
>
> Up to that point everything seemed to be running our way, but alas, on opening the package we found it contained only blank leaves of papyrus and a few inscribed fragments. It was most disappointing. [Papyrus Conservator Stanley] Baker will deal with the pages, but they will not yield very much, I fear.
>
> My guess is that we have received no more than the outermost leaves which Dr. Ibscher probably abstracted from the main body of the codex. The latter is, I suspect, still in Berlin and was overlooked by our friend, Dr. Firchow. I have written to him at the refugee camp in Hamburg, where he is now domiciled, and have told him my suspicions. Perhaps he will be able to suggest an explanation.
>
> For the present I feel the only course is to lie low and see who is appointed to the Berlin Museum as Dr. Firchow's successor. Obviously we do not want to do anything to embarrass either Dr. Firchow or the Consul-General. If the new Keeper of the Berlin Museum is someone whom I know and feel I can trust I can take up the problem anew without reference to the first attempt. I shall, however, have a better idea of what can be done when I have heard from Dr. Firchow whether he has left my letters in the files of the Museum.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> It is very sad that a quest which looked so promising should have suffered such an anticlimax, but I have not lost hope that we shall succeed in the end. However, I wish I could report that we had done so already.

On October 28, 1960, Firchow wrote Edwards; a translation of this letter is in the archives of the Chester Beatty Library:

> I received your letter with real dismay. I am so sorry that the important papyri have not reached you, but only material of relatively little value. Unfortunately, I did not know anything about the circumstances in which Sir Chester Beatty handed over the papyri to Dr. Hugo Ibscher, and in consequence, I supposed that they consisted only of those which my wife and I found in the packet. We alone have examined the packet—very hastily—since it was packed by Dr. Ibscher. Under the prevailing conditions we were unable to make a thorough examination of such fragmentary material; I did however recognize that it consisted of Mani fragments and I believed that I had found confirmation of this identification in your letter. We last saw the papyri in the office of the British Council General, Mr. Weymes. I can only remember one hieratic fragment.
>
> I agree that the material was not substantial and I hoped that the most important part had already been mounted by Ibscher before the war and had been sent back to Sir Chester Beatty. You are certainly right in supposing that the packet contained only odds and ends. But I am certain that the main body (of the papyri) is not in Berlin.
>
> In my opinion the papyri ought to be found with Dr. Rolf Ibscher probably already mounted and glazed. Dr. Hugo Ibscher used to carry out this kind of work in his own home. If I were still in Berlin, or if I had known about the matter a few months ago, I could have offered you my help. I should suggest that you get in touch with Rolf Ibscher, who has no connection with the Berlin Museum. Let me say again that the papyri cannot be in the Berlin Museum but must have been in Hugo Ibscher's private possession.
>
> While writing this letter my wife has told me that she actually remembered Dr. Ibscher speaking to her once about material belonging to Sir Chester Beatty which he had in his possession.
>
> It would certainly be better not to mention your personal correspondence with me. I have kept your letter among my personal papers. I sincerely hope that the affair will soon be satisfactorily settled. Please keep me in touch with developments.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Edwards wrote on November 1, 1960, to Hayes and Beatty in support of Rolf Ibscher's ignorance in the matter. To Hayes he wrote:

> I cannot myself think that Rolf Ibscher could have known anything about these papyri. He was working for Sir Chester Beatty for about four years and he would surely have told one of us if he had known of their existence. I feel we should regard him as a last resource.

To Beatty he wrote:

> Personally I do not think Rolf Ibscher would have kept quiet about these papyri if they had been in his possession when he was working for you. So, for the present anyhow, I do not intend to follow Firchow's advice to write to Rolf Ibscher. Instead I am writing to-day to Dr. Rudolf Anthes in Philadelphia and to Dr. [Günther] Roeder in Hildesheim to ask them if they can tell me anything helpful. Dr. Roeder was the Keeper of the Egyptian Department in the Berlin Museum when the war broke out and Dr. Anthes was Assistant Keeper. They are both good friends of mine and I am sure they will tell me all they know. I shall write again when I have heard from them.
>
> What I find so perplexing at present is to understand why Hugo Ibscher should have put the odds and ends in a packet in the Berlin Museum and have kept the main body of the papyri in his home. I should have thought that he would have taken all of them to the Museum when the war broke out.
>
> One difficulty, of course, is that we do not know exactly what we are looking for. Until the pages had been mounted no one could know anything about the contents. Another problem is the bulk of the missing material; was it large or small?

In the letter to Roeder the same day he explained:

> Some weeks ago Sir Chester Beatty happened to tell me that he had sent some of his Mani codex before the war to Dr. Hugo Ibscher in Berlin for mounting between glass. I told him that I knew that the Berlin papyri were back in the Museum and I promised to write to Dr. Firchow and ask whether the portions of Mani in question had come to light. The result of the inquiry was not satisfactory and Dr. Firchow has, he tells me, now left the Museum and Berlin.
>
> I wonder whether you have any recollection of having seen these papyri at any stage either in Dr. Ibscher's possession or in the Museum. It is possible that Dr. Ibscher had them in his home and if so the only one who could help would be Rolf

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> Ibscher. If possible, however, I do not want Rolf Ibscher to be involved in this matter because he and Sir Chester Beatty have had some differences over the mounting of the Mani papyri which were not sent to Dr. Hugo Ibscher.
>
> I realize that Dr. Ibscher probably received these papyri in the days when you were still at Hildesheim, but perhaps he told you something about them at the beginning of the war which would help now in recovering them.

In the letter to Anthes the same day he explained:

> Some time before the war Sir Chester Beatty sent to the Berlin Museum some of his Mani papyri for Dr. Hugo Ibscher to disentangle and to mount. In an attempt to trace these papyri I wrote to Firchow who was most helpful and sent me what he could find in Berlin, but it amounted to no more than a few blank pages and some fragments.
>
> As you know, Firchow has left the Museum and gone to Western Germany so he can do no more. However he says that he is certain that there are no more of Sir Chester's Mani papyri in the Museum.
>
> This is my question. Do you remember anything about these papyri? I should like to know in particular whether there were many pages or a few, and also whether Hugo Ibscher would have worked on them in the Museum or at home.
>
> I must mention that I think it would perhaps be a disservice to Firchow to let his part in this matter be known; I am sure you will regard it as confidential. I must also add that—at least at present—I do not want Rolf Ibscher to know that I am trying to trace these documents. He has been rather troublesome to Sir Chester Beatty and I am not very sure that I can count on his good will.

On November 9, 1960, Edwards again wrote Hayes his confidence in Rolf Ibscher:

> However, it does not seem likely that Rolf Ibscher would be working consciously on Chester Beatty material, even in Berlin, without obtaining Sir Chester's consent.
>
> I have a reply from Anthes who confirms what Böhlig says about Rolf Ibscher taking the Chester Beatty material to Schondorf when the Flakturm was bombed (p. 5 [of the typescript of Böhlig's Moscow speech]).

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On November 14, 1960, Hayes wrote Edwards:

> I also enclose another page of typescript (keep it also) that seems to me to be of great significance. There are so many mistakes in spelling in the German that I think it must be something Miss McGilligan typed from a manuscript note by Ibscher. I found it with the 13 leaves of Codex B [Synaxeis]. The words "Hauptmasse mit ca. 200 Blättern in Russland" ["the main mass with about 200 leaves in Russia"] seem to be just what we are seeking.

In 1957 and again in 1960, in the paper circulating among the English, Böhlig had identified the book block in Schondorf as the Synaxeis belonging to Beatty, but the English did not locate this identification. Thus, the search for the missing codex was gradually given up. I drew the attention of the staff of the Chester Beatty Library to this situation in 1985 and again in 1988.

Böhlig has provided further details about the material during and after the war:[17]

They were stored splendidly and securely in the anti-aircraft tower at the Zoo train station and, just before the division of Berlin went into effect, were taken by the Soviets quickly from the Zoo (English Sector!) to Friedrichsfelde Castle in the Russian part and were then put in storage in the USSR. And in this process not only papyri, but also other things got lost. Hence Warsaw too has its Mani leaves—someone found along the railroad tracks glassed papyrus leaves that had fallen out from the transport into the USSR.	Sie waren im Flakturm am Bahnhof Zoo glänzend und sicher aufbewahrt und wurden ganz kurz vor Inkrafttreten der Teilung Berlins von den Sowjets schnell vom Zoo (englischer Sektor!) ins Schloss Friedrichsfelde im russischen Teil gebracht und dann in die UdSSR ausgelagert. Und dabei sind nicht nur Papyri, sondern auch andere Dinge verlorengegangen. Daher hat auch Warschau seine Mani-Blätter (man hat an der Bahnstrecke verglaste Papyrusblätter gefunden, die aus dem Transport in die UdSSR herausgefallen waren).

Friedrichsfelde Schloss is a small castle, privately owned until 1945. Dr. sc. Wolfgang Müller, director emeritus of the Egyptian Museum and of the Papyrus Collection in East Berlin, has reported

17. Böhlig in a letter of February 5, 1986.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms that Rolf Ibscher told him that a few papyri were found near the castle and returned to the Papyrus Collection. Ibscher's report to Müller is the basis for the assumption that the crates were temporarily housed there.

The castle has subsequently been heavily restored, with a new roof and new inner construction throughout. But what necessitated the rebuilding seems not to have been war damage, but rather a general process of deterioration and in 1948–1949 reuse of the building as an adult education center for Berlin city government functionaries (according to Lothar Berfelde, see below). The castle's current guidebooklet reports on the restoration in the preface but without making clear the castle's condition in 1945:[18]

Immeasurable are the losses in monuments of history and culture in our city that were caused by the Second World War launched by German Fascism. Many valuable historical buildings were lost beyond recovery or were severely damaged. Other witnesses to our cultural heritage among buildings that were not directly affected by the war showed clear signs of deterioration due to long neglect under the domination of capitalism. From the very beginning it required the greatest exertions of our workers-and-peasant power to restore the substance of monuments thus destroyed. In spite of magnificent achievements of restoration and reconstruction in the center of our capital city, maintenance and restoration projects in the care of monuments must also be effectively carried out, in connection with the augmentation of measures for the reconstruction and modernization of the

Unermesslich sind die Verluste an Denkmalen der Geschichte und Kultur in unserer Stadt, die durch den vom deutschen Faschismus ausgelösten zweiten Weltkrieg verursacht wurden. Viele wertvolle historische Bauten gingen unwiederbringlich verloren oder wurden stark beschädigt. Andere nicht unmittelbar vom Krieg betroffene Zeugnisse unseres baulichen Kulturerbes zeigten durch lange Vernachlässigung unter der Herrschaft des Kapitalismus deutliche Spuren des Verfalls. Es bedurfte von Beginn an grosser Anstrengungen unserer Arbeiter- und Bauern-Macht zur Wiederherstellung der auf diese Weise zerstörten Denkmalsubstanz. Trotz grossartiger Restaurierungs- und Rekonstrucktionsleistungen im Zentrum unserer Hauptstadt müssen im Zusammenhang mit der Erhöhung der Baumassnahmen für die Rekonstruktion und die

18. Dathe, Schunchardt et al., "Vorwort."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

substance of old buildings, as was called for by the Tenth Party Congress of the Socialistic Union Party of Germany.

The completion of the Berlin Friedrichsfelde Castle is a worthy contribution to this, in demonstrating the continuous culture politics of our socialist state, directed toward the care of the cultural heritage and toward actively rendering it accessible. Thanks to the magnanimous support of the party of the working class and of the government of the German Democratic Republic, with its politics directed toward the well-being of the people, our capital city has become richer by an appealing tourist attraction, on the eve of the elections to the Volkskammer of the German Democratic Republic and of the Assembly of the city government of Berlin.

The extent of the restoration activities, as well as of measures to refinish and refurbish the interiors, was considerable. The difficult tasks in the care of monuments could only be undertaken in stages. The results attained, however, justify this special course, and will certainly instigate further initiatives for the maintenance of monuments and for making them accessible to society.

Modernisierung der Altbausubstanz, die der X. Parteitag der SED fordert, auch die denkmalpflegerischen Erhaltungs- und Wiederherstellungsarbeiten wirksam fortgesetzt werden.

Die Fertigstellung des Schlosses Berlin-Friedrichsfelde ist dazu ein würdiger Beitrag, der die kontinuierliche, auf die Pflege und lebendige Erschliessung des kulturellen Erbes gerichtete Kulturpolitik unseres sozialistischen Staates beweist. Dank der grosszügigen Unterstützung der Partei der Arbeiterklasse und der Regierung der Deutschen Demokratischen Republik mit ihrer auf das Wohl des Volkes gerichteten Politik ist unsere Hauptstadt am Vorabend der Wahlen zur Volkskammer der DDR und der Stadtverordnetenversammlung von Berlin um eine attraktive Sehenswürdigkeit reicher geworden.

Der Umfang der Wiederherstellungsarbeiten sowie der Ausgestaltungs- und Ausstattungsaufgaben für die Innenräume war beträchtlich. Nur schrittweise konnten die schwierigen denkmalpflegerischen Aufgaben in Angriff genommen werden. Die erreichten Ergebnisse jedoch rechtfertigen diesen besonderen Weg und werden sicher weitere Initiativen zur Erhaltung und gesellschaftlichen Erschliessung von Denkmalen auslösen.

In the introduction of the guide, the details of the cause of the damage to the building become more specific:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Meanwhile it was possible to restore the castle as an important part of this significant ensemble of monuments of building and gardening art. Due to the deficient care of buildings before and during the Second World War, the Friedrichsfelde Castle had suffered severe damages. Nonetheless, ever-increasing deteriorations, whose cause was not known back then, were even more grave. Whereas the original five-part building had only field stone foundations, the side parts added in 1719 were in addition erected on wooden piles. As a result of the lowering of the water table after the construction of a waterworks directly in the neighborhood of the park at the beginning of our century, the wooden parts, no longer resting in the area of the ground water, gradually rotted and increasingly led to considerable settlings of the building and severe cracking.

The restoration, as part of the maintenance of monuments, began with comprehensive measures to eliminate the dangers and secure the building, and thus began the new history of the Castle. The main interest was at first directed to the retaining or restoring of the exterior.

Als wichtiger Bestandteil dieses bedeutenden Denkmalensembles der Bau- und Gartenkunst konnte das Schloss inzwischen wiederhergestellt werden. Durch mangelnde Baupflege vor und während des zweiten Weltkrieges hatte das Friedrichsfelder Schloss beträchtliche Schäden erlitten. Schwerwiegender waren jedoch fortschreitende Zerstörungen, deren Ursache damals noch nicht bekannt war. Während der fünfachsige Ursprungsbau lediglich Feldsteinfundamente besass, waren die 1719 angefügten Seitenteile ausserdem noch auf Holzpfählen errichtet. Infolge der Grundwasserabsenkung nach dem Bau eines Wasserwerkes in unmittelbarer Nähe des Parkes zu Beginn unseres Jahrhunderts verrotteten die nicht mehr im Grundwasserbereich liegenden Holzteile allmählich und führten zunehmend zu erheblichen Bausetzungen und starker Rissbildung.

Mit umfassenden Massnahmen zur Gefahrenbeseitigung und Sicherung des Gebäudes begann die denkmalpflegerische Wiederherstellung und damit die neuere Geschichte des Schlosses. Das Hauptinteresse galt zunächst der Erhaltung bzw. Wiederherstellung des Aussenbaus.

In the description of the Historical Staircase:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The main staircase was restored in its early classicistic room arrangement. Whereas the reconstruction of the ceiling paintings had to be executed largely on the basis of fotos, there stood at our disposal in addition to the illusionistic wall paintings, in varying degrees of conservation, a part of the original wallpaper removed in 1947, as well as segments of wall paintings that had remained partially intact on the ground floor.

Das Haupttreppenhaus wurde in seiner frühklassizistischen Raumgestaltung wiederhergestellt. Während die Rekonstruktion der Deckenmalereien im wesentlichen nach Fotos ausgeführt werden musste, standen für die illusionistischen Wandmalereien zusätzlich ein Teil der 1947 entfernten originalen Leinwandbespannungen in unterschiedlicher Erhaltungsqualität sowie Befunde von partiell erhalten gebliebenen Wandmalereien im Erdgeschoss zur Verfügung.

Regarding the Garden Room:

In 1947 there were pieces of the interior decoration dating back to the Biedermeier period still intact. However, at the commencement of the comprehensive restoration of the castle there were no longer any historical decorative elements or objects of interior decorating.

1947 waren noch Ausstattungsstücke der Biedermeierzeit vorhanden. Zu Beginn der umfassenden Wiederherstellung des Schlosses gab es jedoch keine historischen Dekorationselemente oder Ausstattungsgegenstände mehr.

In the section titled "Dates on the History of the Castle" one reads:

1945 [actually 1948, according to Lothar Berfelde (see below)]: The Castle and park were taken over by the city government of Berlin.

1948–49: The castle was renovated into a home for school purposes.

August 27, 1954: The city government decided to develop a Zoo in Friedrichsfelde.

July 2, 1955: The opening of the Berlin Zoo.

1945 [actually 1948, according to Lothar Berfelde (see below)]: Übernahme vom Schloss and Park durch den Magistrat von Berlin.

1948–49: Ausbau des Schlosses zu einem Schulungsheim.

27.8.1954: Magistratsbeschluss zum Ausbau eines Tierparkes in Friedrichsfelde.

2.7.1955: Eröffnung des Tierparks Berlin.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

1966: The commencement of the first work to secure and restore the heavily destroyed castle.	1966: Beginn von ersten Sicherungs-arbeiten zur Wiederherstellung des stark zerstörten Schlosses.
Until 1971: The securing of the foundations.	bis 1971: Unterfangung der Fundamente.
1973: The erection of a new roof of steel construction with large triangular gables.	1973: Aufbringen eines neuen Mansardendaches (Stahlkon-struktion) mit grossen Dreieckgiebeln.

The guide of the conducted tour on March 9, 1986, explained that a Soviet command post ("Kommandantur") was housed in the castle in 1945, and that a distant relative of the former owner of the castle was afterwards permitted to use three rooms for a private museum for a few years.

Lothar Berfelde has moved his Gründerzeit-Museum to Mahlsdorf near Berlin in another building he restored. It has been put under governmental protection as a "collection," since private "museums" are not legal. He reported on April 18, 1986, that a Soviet command post occupied the castle from the spring of 1945 to the spring of 1946. Then when the castle was vacated, he was able to block a proposal to raze it, and was permitted to occupy part of it with the beginnings of his Museum for a couple of years. During the year that it was used as a command post he was aware of libraries being stored there until they could be transported to the Soviet Union, but he had no specific information about holdings of the state museums being stored there.

Thus, one may suppose that the museum objects were brought to the Friedrichsfelde Castle when it was a Soviet command post. At that time the building was apparently run down, but the dismantling of the interior would seem to have taken place beginning 1947, no doubt especially in 1948–1949 when the building was adapted into a school for city employees; the roof was first removed when the restoration was undertaken and a new roof installed in 1973. Thus, the building was sufficiently intact in 1945–1946 to have served as a temporary repository for crates moved from the Zoo bunker to await shipment to Leningrad, before the education center was installed. For 1947 seems to mark the date of the dismantling of interior architecture and the removal of antique furniture for this new purpose, and 1966 the beginning of the restoration that involved strengthening the foundations, replacing the roof, and completely redoing and refurbishing the interior. The building could presumably have housed the museum objects in 1945 without undue risk.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Joachim Karig has reported that the retreating German army had removed all railroad tracks east of Berlin and had cut all the ties in 1944–1945. During 1945 and 1946, this action no doubt made rail transportation of museum objects from Berlin to Leningrad bumpy, congested, and insecure. When whole factories and other movable objects moved east, works of art (which required several hundred railroad cars for the return to Berlin in 1958) might have had a lower priority. Karig recalled, e.g., a report that a quantity of grand pianos were seen beside the railroad tracks, exposed to the elements, apparently having been temporarily unloaded to provide boxcars for higher-priority transports to the east, or awaiting their turn for shipment east.

Berfelde reported further, from a childhood friend who worked for the German railroads, that the German railroad crews continued to operate the trains even after the end of the war. These crews were aboard German trains as far as the eastern border of Poland, where the Soviet railroads, with different gauges, began. Crossing Poland, trains laden with German items were at times stopped by train robbers. In a robbery, freight cars would be separated from the engine, in which the German crew was told to proceed down the tracks, leaving the freight cars unguarded in the countryside. There the freight cars would be looted before the authorities could be notified and police or soldiers sent to stop the looting. The one reporting this story attributed the practice of robbery to Poles resentful of the Soviet Union for not returning, at the end of the war, land the Soviets had occupied since 1939, when the Germans had invaded Poland. No doubt avarice also accounted for a Polish desire to share in the war booty.

Alexander Böhlig has reported:[19]

As a result of a rumor that papyri had been found on the rail line, the rail line was combed with success at the instigation of Prof. von Manteuffel.	Auf ein Gerücht hin, dass an der Bahnlinie Papyri gefunden worden seien, wurde auf Veranlassung von Professor von Manteuffel die Bahnlinie mit Erfolg abgesucht.

19. Böhlig, in a letter of February 10, 1986.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Böhlig has further clarified his initial comment:[20]

Professor von Manteuffel, responsible for papyrology before and after the war, was known to me personally. I went on a walk with him in London after the International Papyrologists' Congress in Oxford in 1937. I do not know whether he had a chair for ancient history or for classical philology in Warsaw; for papyrology alone there are hardly professorships. He was always a Pole with a well-formed national consciousness.

Der vor und nach dem Krieg für Papyrologie zuständige Professor von Manteuffel ist mir persönlich bekannt gewesen. Ich bin mit ihm im Anschluss an den internationalen Papyrologenkongress in Oxford 1937 in London spazierengegangen. Ob er etwa einen Lehrstuhl für Alte Geschichte oder Klassische Philologie in Warschau innehatte, weiss ich nicht; für Papyrologie allein gibt es ja kaum Professuren. Er ist immer ein ausgesprochen nationalbewusster Pole gewesen.

On July 12, 1986, Wincenty Myszor sent a report of his inquiries into what took place as follows:

The Manichaean manuscripts that are now in Warsaw cropped up shortly after the last war under circumstances that have not been fully clarified. There is always talk of a place Brodnica, near Torun [Thorn]. I have thus far received no answer to my letter of April 21, 1986, to the regional museum in Brodnica. There are also no documents in the archive of the Warsaw University and in the National Museum. The plates are thought to have been first in a private collection, then in some way [sold? acquired?] to have reached Prof. J. Manteuffel, the leader of the Institute for Papyrology of Warsaw University, and a part of the manuscripts turned over to Die manichäischen Handschriften, die sich jetzt in Warschau befinden, sind kurz nach dem letzten Krieg unter nicht ganz aufgeklärten Umständen aufgetaucht. Es wird immer über einen Ort Brodnica, bei Torun [Thorn], gesprochen. Auf meinen Brief an das Regional-Museum in Brodnica von 21. April 1986 habe ich bis heute keine Antwort bekommen. Es gibt auch keine Dokumente im Archiv der Warschauer Universität und im National-Museum. Die Platten sollen sich zuerst in einer Privatsammlung befunden haben, dann in irgendeiner Weise [gekauft? bekommen?] zu Prof. J. Manteuffel, dem Leiter des Instituts für Papyrologie der

20. Böhlig, in a letter of March 7, 1986.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the National Museum on deposit. There are also rumors according to which the plates in the National Museum came directly from Brodnica to Warsaw, to Prof. Michalowski. Prof. J. Manteuffel and Prof. K. Michalowski wanted to give the leaves back to Berlin. But they did not succeed in that. In the sixties the issue almost reached the Ministry. In any case there are still many questions that probably can no longer be answered. Thus one cannot say why the manuscripts are today preserved at two places. There is the view that this has to do with an exhibition in the National Museum. But there are in the National Museum also other manuscripts from the Berlin collection that Dr. Poethke from Berlin has once already seen. These manuscripts could have come to the Museum from a private collection.

Warschauer Universität gelangt und ein Teil der Handschriften dem National-Museum als Depot übergeben worden sein. Es gibt auch Gerüchte, nach denen die Platten im National-Museum direkt aus Brodnica nach Warschau, zu Prof. Michalowski gekommen seien. Prof. J. Manteuffel und Prof. K. Michalowski wollten die Blätter nach Berlin zurückgeben. Das ist ihnen nicht gelungen. In den 60er Jahren wäre diese Sache fast im Ministerium gelandet. Jedenfalls gibt es noch viele Fragen, die wahrscheinlich schon nicht mehr beantwortet werden können. So kann man nicht beantworten, warum die Handschriften heute an zwei Stellen aufbewahrt sind. Es gibt die Ansicht, dass dieses mit einer Ausstellung im National-Museum zusammenhinge. Es gibt aber im National-Museum auch andere Handschriften aus der Berliner Sammlung, die Dr. Poethke aus Berlin schon einmal gesehen hat. Diese Handschriften könnten direkt von einem Privatbesitz zum Museum gekommen sein.

Since there is no list of how many leaves Hugo Ibscher had actually conserved from Berlin's part of the Manichaean codices of Medinet Madi, it is unclear whether those in Warsaw are actually the only leaves not included in the return with other German museum holdings to East Berlin in 1958. No book blocks were returned, and hence, if in fact they had been included in those left in the zoo concrete bunker and taken to the Friedrichsfelde Castle and from there to Leningrad, they would be the only clear instance of material still completely missing.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Once the material was back in East Berlin, plans were initiated to resume its publication. Böhlig has reported on the steps leading to his being reassigned after the war to publish the Manichaean material, while he was still in East Germany.[21] He moved in 1963 to Munich and then to Tübingen, where he lived until his death in 1996:

In the year 1959 I then submitted to the German Academy of Sciences in Berlin a memorandum in which I pointed out how urgently the resumption of the editing of the Manichaean texts is. The Academy responded positively to this initiative and entrusted the undertaking to the Institut für griechisch-römische Altertumskunde, in order that its working group "Kommission für spätantike Religionsgeschichte" could assume responsibility for the continuation of the edition. At the session of the commission on May 13, 1960, this task was entrusted to me.

Im Jahre 1959 reichte ich daraufhin der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin eine Denkschrift ein, in der ich darauf hinwies, wie dringlich die Wiederaufnahme der Editionsarbeit an den manichäischen Texten sei. Die Akademie nahm zu dieser Anregung positiv Stellung and übergab das Unternehmen an das Institut für griechisch-römische Altertumskunde, damit dessen Arbeitsgruppe Kommission für spätantike Religionsgeschichte die Weiterführung der Edition in ihren Aufgabenbereich aufnehmen sollte. In der Kommissionssitzung vom 13. Mai 1960 wurde diese Aufgabe mir übertragen.

21. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 181.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Part Two

The Conservation by Rolf Ibscher

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 6 —

The Conservation of the Material in the State Museums of the Former East Berlin

The post-war activity has until recently consisted almost exclusively of Rolf Ibscher's conservation work. Ibscher made every effort to present himself in unbroken continuity with his father, and thus to build a career on his father's reputation. As he phrased it typically, "die Kunde von der Wunderleistung der konservatorischen Rettung durch meinen Vater" ["the report of the miraculous performance of the conservation rescue by my father"].[1] But it is rather clear that Rolf Ibscher began with fuzzy information and lack of experience. The former is indicated by his summary of the material cited above from 1954 and his revised summary in 1955:[2]

At the beginning of the 1930s the codices were purchased: three bundles and a vestige came to London into the possession of Sir Chester Beatty (Psalms, Codex B, Codex C, and the Homilies), and four bundles and a vestige to Berlin into the possession of the state museums (Kephalaia, Codex 15995, Codex 15998, Codex 15999, and 31 leaves of Codex Anfang der dreissiger Jahre kamen durch Ankauf die Codices mit drei Konvoluten und einem Rest nach London in den Besitz von Sir Chester Beatty (Psalmbuch, Codex B, Codex C und die Homilien) und mit vier Konvoluten und einem Rest nach Berlin in den Besitz der Staatlichen Museen (Kephalaia, Codex Nr. 15995, Codex Nr. 15998, Codex Nr. 15999 und 31

1. Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 1.
2. Ibid.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

15997). The remainder of a quire acquired for Vienna by Grohmann could be added to the Kephalaia, Berlin's main text alongside of Codex 15998, containing the corpus of Letters and now in Schondorf in Upper Bavaria on Ammer Lake. It [the remainder in Vienna] comprises pp. 311–30.

Blätter des Codex Nr. 15997). Der durch Grohmann für Wien erworbene Lagenrest konnte der Kephalaia, Berlins Hauptschrift neben Codex Nr. 15998, das Briefcorpus enthaltend und jetzt in Schondorf/Obb in Oberbayern am Ammersee liegend, zugeführt werden. Er umfasst die Seiten 311–30.

Here the information available in Schmidt and Polotsky's published report is identified confusedly with the information in the Inventarbuch of the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR. The Berlin holdings themselves, except for some partially conserved leaves of P^{15996} and P^{15998} in the Ibscher home, were in Leningrad, inaccessible to Ibscher. One need merely enumerate the needed corrections of this summary, along with those itemized in the preceding chapter, to assess the fuzziness of the information with which Rolf Ibscher began: P^{15995} consists only of 31 leaves (which are not P^{15997}) and hence are not a bundle but only a vestige; P^{15996} should be listed as the inventory number of the Kephalaia; P^{15997} consists not merely of 31 leaves, hence it was not acquired as a vestige but was a complete codex, from which only some eight or nine leaves seem to have been removed by Hugo Ibscher before the war; Codex 15998 was among the material taken east rather than to Schondorf; P^{15999}, the other half of the London Homilies and hence to be designated a vestige, also went east. What was in Schondorf was actually Sir Chester Beatty's Codex B, the Synaxeis.

Hence, it is not surprising that material left half conserved and hence inadequately labeled by Hugo Ibscher in his home, should have been variously and unreliably identified by Rolf Ibscher.

Rolf Ibscher's inexperience becomes clear from a passing remark of 1954: "here in London I began with this work that my father had designated as the most difficult task of his life as a conservator, a life rich in difficult tasks. It was a task that I could entrust to myself since one expected it of me, although never before had I separated a leaf as a test under the supervision of my father. It was a risk, but a successful one."[3]

3. Ibscher, Rolf, "Wiederaufnahme," 11: ". . . hier in London begann ich mit dieser

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

That is to say, Sir Chester Beatty, no doubt grateful to Rolf Ibscher for having rescued his codices from the ruin of the war, quite unaware that Ibscher was still withholding one in Schondorf, and in response to Rolf Ibscher's appeals, engaged the son on the assumption he was, in the craft tradition of Europe, the father's only understudy and hence his qualified successor, whereas the son had in fact had no experience in the conservation of the Manichaean codices. Under permissive supervision at the British Museum, he inductively learned his trade. Rather jeopardize the codices than his own future!

On his return trip from London, Rolf Ibscher began conservation on the Synaxeis codex in Schondorf (see below), and in Berlin began to work at completing the conservation work of his father, on what had been in his home throughout the war.

In 1954 Rolf Ibscher himself had referred as follows to the beginnings of his conservation work on this material:[4]

Between my first [Oct–Dec 1951] and second [June–Oct 1952] London trips I succeeded in saving in Berlin the remainder of the Berlin Kephalaia manuscript. So some 20 leaves and leaf fragments came from it. The state of preservation of this outside pad of the codex was even more desolate than that of the remaining pads of the Psalms book I had worked on previously in London. I can understand that my father deferred again and again the separating off of these leaves and considered the possibility of giving up this part of the manuscript as unconservable. The leaves and fragments of leaves have meanwhile been impregnated and are awaiting the collaboration of the scholarly colleague,

Zwischen meiner ersten x–xii 51 [Oct–Dec 1951] und zweiten vi–x 52 [June–Oct 1952] Londoner Reise gelang es mir in Berlin den Rest der Berliner Kephalaiahandschrift zu retten. Es kamen dabei einige 20 Blätter und Blattfragmente heraus. Der Erhaltungszustand dieser Aussenlage des Codex war noch desolater als derjenige der Restlagen des zuvor von mir in London bearbeiteten Psalmenbuchs und ich kann verstehen, dass mein Vater immer wieder die Ablösung dieser Blätter hinausgeschoben und die Möglichkeit in Aussicht gestellt hatte, diesen Teil der Handschrift als unkonservierbar aufzugeben. Die Blätter und Blattfragmente

Arbeit, die mein Vater als die schwierigste Aufgabe seines an schweren Aufgaben reichen Konservatorenlebens bezeichnet hatte. Es war eine Aufgabe, die ich mir zutraute, weil man sie von mir erwartete, obgleich ich niemals je zuvor ein Blatt als Probe unter der Leitung meines Vaters abgelöst hatte. Es war ein Risiko, aber es gelang."

4. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 10–11.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

since from the material alone the arrangement and sequence of the leaves and fragments cannot [p. 11] be guaranteed with certainty.

sind inzwischen imprägniert und harren der Mithilfe des wissenschaftlichen Bearbeiters, da vom Material allein aus mit Sicherheit die Einordnung und Anordnung der Blätter und Fragmente nicht garan- [p. 11] tiert werden kann.

In his report in 1955, Rolf Ibscher summarized his work as follows: "Following the experimental separation of a few leaves of the Schondorf manuscript from Berlin, I attempted on my return home to Berlin in the winter months [of 1952] to separate and impregnate a residue of very fragmented leaves of the Kephalaia, which my father had also designated as 'inoperable.' These leaves should be definitively glassed this winter, at the beginning of 1956."[5]

Rolf Ibscher did in fact develop his own conservation techniques, which he considered vastly superior to those of his father.[6]

In September I could . . . see in the beautiful library of Sir Chester Beatty in Dublin the leaves of the Homilies and of the Psalms conserved by my father and reassure myself as to whether his method of impregnating them had proven itself over a period of 15 or 20 years. Nevertheless I have now decided to follow a proposal of Dr. Plenderleith of the laboratory of the British Museum and use a fixative recommended by him to strengthen the brittle papyrus weave.

Im September konnte ich . . . in der schönen Bibliothek Sir Chester Beatty's in Dublin die von meinem Vater konservierten Blätter der Homilien und des Psalmenbuches sehen und mich vergewissern, ob seine Imprägnierungsmethode über fast 15 bis 20 Jahre hin sich bewährt hatte. Dennoch habe ich mich jetzt entschlossen, dabei einem Vorschlag von Dr. Plenderleith vom Laboratorium des Britischen Museums zu folgen und ein von ihm empfohlenes Fixativ zur Festigung der mürben Papyrusgewebe zu benutzen.

5. Rolf Ibscher, "Das Konservierugswerk," 5: "Der probeweisen Ablösung von einigen Blättern der Schondorfer Handschrift aus Berlin folgte dann bei meiner Heimkehr nach Berlin in den Wintermonaten [of 1952] der Versuch, einen Restbestand sehr fragmentarisierter Blätter der Kephalaia abzulösen und zu imprägnieren, den mein Vater auch als "unauflösbar" bezeichnet hatte. Diese Blätter sollen im Winter Anfang 1956 definitiv verglast werden."

6. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 7–10.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The conservation thus moves in completely new paths. I have been able to develop a new procedure for separating the leaves, which permits one to separate intact also such leaves as dissolved into their component parts according to the method used by my father. On August 22, 1936, he suspended work on Codex C after he had been able to separate 47 leaves, and wrote in this regard: "The papyrus dissolves completely into its component parts in separating the individual leaves, and was held together only in the whole mass. Further investigation of the book block showed that already in antiquity the book had been very damaged. After one place that readily separated there followed at first 2 blank leaves and then very faded text of another hand, so that it appeared as if here another work began. Of course I think I have seen at one place a chapter title. In any case it was hardly worth working on the block after the empty leaves, since the writing will be able to be figured out only in a few places."—This turned out in the course of the work in 1952 and in this summer to be an error. I obtained 136 usable and in part very beautiful leaves. The few leaves with very faded handwriting can no doubt be made visible given the state of our modern photography. The Berlin manuscript in Schondorf displays the same deficiencies. But I hope that Pater Dolt of the Palimpsest Institute in the Cloister Beuron will help me to develop a

Die Konservierung geht damit völlig neue Wege. Ich habe ein neues Verfahren zur Ablösung der Blätter entwickeln können, das auch solche Blätter im Zusammenhang ablösen lässt, die nach der von meinem Vater geübten Methode sich in ihre Bestandteile auflösten. Am 22. August 1936 stellte er die Arbeit am Codex C ein, nachdem er 47 Blätter abheben konnte, und schreibt dazu: "Der Papyrus löste sich beim Abheben der einzelnen Blätter vollständig in seine Bestandteile auf und wurde nur in der ganzen Masse zusammengehalten. Bei weiterer Untersuchung des Buchblockes ergab sich, dass das Buch bereits im Altertum sehr zerstört war. An einer Stelle, die sich leicht löste, folgten zunächst 2 leere Blätter und dann sehr verblasster Text von anderer Hand, sodass es den Anschein hat, als wenn hier ein andres Werk begann. Allerdings glaube ich an einer Stelle eine Kapitelüberschrift gesehen zu haben. Jedenfalls lohnt es sich kaum, den Block von den leeren Blättern an zu bearbeiten, da die Schrift nur an wenigen Stellen zu entziffern sein wird."—Das stellte sich im Verlauf der Arbeit 1952 und in diesem Sommer als ein Irrtum heraus. Ich gewann 136 brauchbare und zum Teil sehr schöne Blätter. Die wenigen Blätter mit sehr verblasster Handschrift dürften beim Stande unserer modernen Photographie sichtbar gemacht werden können. Gleiche Mängel weist die Berliner Handschrift in Schondorf auf. Ich hoffe aber, dass Pater Dolt vom Palimpzest-Institut an Kloster Beuron mir helfen wird, ein brauchbares fotographisches usable photographical procedure to balance out this deficiency.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

My procedure for separating the individual leaves from the book blocks is characterized as the adjustable sloping plane. The leaf is compelled to draw itself off as it were by its own weight, over a very smooth parchment paper, that presents no resistance to the papyrus fiber, laid above on the book block. With tweezers and a thin scalpel only a bit of supplemental help is provided in pushing the leaf in front of them over the slanting plane and carefully separating the fibers ruined by pressure and salt crystals. I would like to name this procedure "the extremely freewheeling method."

My father, on the other hand, lifted off the individual leaf without such a slanted support. He lifted the individual fragments separated from each other onto a paper support lying next to the book block and attempted to advance the leaf with extreme carefulness in its entirety from the book block off onto this support. This procedure presupposed an incredibly sure hand and an equally unimaginable gift of recollection, to transfer the fragmentary splinters with absolute certainty into the right arrangement. The individual fragment would have to come immediately with certainty into its right place, since every grasping with the tweezers in the case of especially rotted leaves immediately led such small fragments to break down into dust. I would like to name this procedure

Verfahren zu entwickeln, um diesen Nachteil auszugleichen.

Mein Verfahren, die einzelnen Blätter von den Buchblöcken abzuheben, wird durch die verstellbare schiefe Ebene gekenn-zeichnet. Das Blatt wird genötigt, sich gleichsam durch sein eigenes Gewicht über ein sehr glattes, der Papyrusfaser gar keinen Widerstand entgegensetzendes Pergaminpapier, das auf den Buchblock oben aufgelegt wird, abzuziehen. Mit Pinzette und dünnen Skalpells wird lediglich nachgeholfen, das Blatt vor ihnen her über die schiefe Ebene zu schieben und die durch Pressung und Salzkristalle verbackenen Fasern vorsichtig zu trennen. Ich möchte dieses Verfahren "the extremely freewheeling method" bezeichnen.

Mein Vater hob dagegen das einzelne Blatt ohne solche schräge Unterlage ab. Er hob die einzelnen Fragmente getrennt auf eine neben dem Buchblock liegende Papierunterlage und versuchte, mit äusserster Behutsamkeit das Blatt in seiner Gesamtheit vom Buchblock weg auf diese Unterlage zu befördern. Dieses Verfahren setzte eine unvorstellbar ruhige Hand voraus und eine ebenso unvorstellbare Gabe des Erinnerungsvermögens, die Fragmentsplitter mit absoluter Sicherheit in der richtigen Anordnung zu übertragen. Das einzelne Fragment musste sofort sicher an seinen richtigen Platz kommen, da jedes Anpacken mit den Pinzetten bei besonders vermorschten Blättern sofort dazu führte solche kleinen Fragmente zu Staub zerbröckeln zu lassen. Ich möchte dieses Verfahren "the very delicately compelling method" nennen.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

"the very delicately compelling method."

To the new method of separating leaves and the handling of the separated leaves with a new fixative, in order to impede or eliminate the inner decomposition of the very degenerated material, will be associated the new glassing of the impregnated leaves, in that, instead of simple glass, now plexiglass will be used. To be sure it is very expensive, but it does not break and is very light and permits one to photograph the individual leaf even through the glass with infrared or ultraviolet light in order to entice out the faded writing. The electric effect can unfortunately thus far be eliminated only for a brief time by means of a special substance, so that laying the leaf between the glass panes is not difficult. The magnetic effect proves to be very unpleasant and dangerous when one is compelled to take the leaf out of the glasses again. Equally disagreeable is the fact that plexiglass, in distinction from simple glass, is very sensitive and gets abrasions or scratches immediately with careless handling. And it is a risk, how plexiglass in the course of decades reacts to climatic conditions and whether it darkens or not.

Whether the disadvantages or advantages in using plexiglass over conserving the leaves between simple glass panes will dominate will become clear after a few years, when it becomes necessary to reconserve the leaves again. And this necessity will emerge, even if the

Der neuen Ablösungsmethode und Behandlung der abgelösten Blätter mit einem neuen Fixativ, um den inneren Zerfall des sehr angegriffenen Materials aufzuhalten bzw. zu beseitigen, wird sich die neuartige Unterbringung der imprägnierten Blätter gesellen, indem anstelle des einfachen Glases jetzt das Perspexglas treten wird, das zwar sehr teuer, aber unzerbrechlich und sehr leicht ist und gestattet, das einzelne Blatt auch durch das Glas hindurch mit infrarotem oder ultraviolettem Licht zwecks Hervorzauberung der verblassten Schrift zu fotografieren. Der elektrische Effekt geht leider bisher nur für kurze Zeit durch ein Spezialmittel zu entfernen, sodass das Zwischenlegen zwischen die Glasscheiben keine Mühe verursacht. Sehr unangenehm und gefährlich erweist sich die magnetische Wirkung, wenn man genötigt ist, das Blatt noch einmal aus den Gläsern herauszunehmen. Ebenfalls unangenehm ist es, dass Perspexglas im Gegensatz zu einfachem Glas sehr empfindlich ist und Schrammen oder Kratzer sofort bei unpfleglicher Behandlung erhält. Und ein Risiko ist es, wie sich Perspexglas im Laufe von Jahrzehnten verhält gegen Witterungseinflüsse und ob es blind wird oder nicht.

Ob die Nachteile oder Vorteile bei der Benutzung von Perspexglas gegenüber der Unterbringung der Blätter zwischen einfachem Glas dominieren werden, wird sich nach einigen Jahren herausstellen, wenn die Notwendigkeit sich ergibt, die Blätter aufs neue umzuglasen. Und rescued leaves are stored carefully and with constant temperature and protected from climatic influences, since the papyrus material between the glasses begins to work in the course of time, in spite of the impregnation, which only serves to strengthen the rotted papyrus substance and slow down further decomposition, just as did the earlier treatment of the leaves, the dusting with zapon lacquer applied by my father.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Subterranean water and inundation water has in the course of the centuries soaked through the book block. The salt residue cannot be soaked out in conservation by means of baths. Every additional dampness would inescapably dissolve the papyrus substance between the papyrus fibers into a sticky soupy mess. But the infiltration with salty elements, this enrichment of the papyrus substance with ingredients containing salt, produces in the course of time, and especially with changes of temperature, a blue-like film on the glass panes, because of which seeing through the glass is disturbed and the traces of writing, often only weakly distinguishable from the very darkened papyrus material, is hardly still perceptible. In such a case the only thing that helps is to take the leaves out of the glasses and, after cleaning the glasses of this blue-like film to reglass them.

For this reason too there emerges for photography here a special task, not only for reasons of security, as the most recent sad

diese Notwendigkeit wird sich ergeben, auch wenn die geretteten Blätter sorgsam und bei gleichmässiger Temperatur und geschützt vor Witterungseinflüssen aufbewahrt werden, weil trotz der Imprägnierung, die ja nur der Festigung der morschen Papyrussubstanz dient und den weiteren Zerfallsprozess aufhalten soll, ebenso wie die frühere Behandlung der Blätter durch die von meinem Vater angewandte Bestäubung mit Zaponlack, das Papyrusmaterial zwischen den Gläsern im Laufe der Zeit zu arbeiten beginnt.

Grund- und Überschwemmungswasser hat im Laufe der Jahrhunderte die Buchblöcke durchtränkt. Die salzigen Rückstände können bei der Konservierung nicht durch Bäder ausgelaugt werden. Jede zusätzliche Feuchtigkeit würde die Papyrussubstanz zwischen den Papyrusfasern unweigerlich sofort in eine schmierige breiige Masse auflösen. Aber das Infiltrat von salzhaltigen Elementen, diese Anreicherung der Papyrussubstanz mit salzhaltigen Ingredienzien bewirkt im Laufe der Zeit und ganz besonders bei Temperaturschwankungen einen bläulichen Niederschlag auf den Glasscheiben, wodurch die Sicht durch das Glas getrübt wird und die oft sich nur schwach vom stark gebräunten Papyrusmaterial abhebenden Schriftspuren kaum noch wahrnehmbar werden. In solchem Fall hilft da das Eine, die Blätter aus den Gläsern herauszunehmen und sie nach Reinigung der Gläser von diesem bläulichen Scheibenbelag von neuem zu verglasen.

Aus diesem Grunde erwächst auch der Fotographie hier eine besondere Aufgabe, nicht nur aus Sicherheitsgründen, wie die jüngste traurige Vergangenheit es gelehrt hat,

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

past has taught us, and as an indispensable supplement and help for the reader. One should, preferably immediately after conservation, or, if that is not possible, very soon after the definitive glassing, photograph each individual leaf without imperfection before any impediment to legibility can emerge. I concede that no photography, no matter how perfect it may be technically, even if it exceeds the most demanding requirements, can replace the unimpeded work on the direct original, but at some time the time will arrive that in future times, even if we leave catastrophes completely out of view, a repeated reglassing of the Manichaean papyri will simply no longer be possible, since this most sensitive of all papyrus materials that have emerged will no longer permit such a procedure of reglassing even with the most careful handling.

Hence the problem of the best possible photographic recording of each of these precious leaves must be solved now, as an aid for the reader, the interpreter, and precisely as a prophylactic means that can endure over the centuries.

und als unentbehrliches Ergänzungs- und Hilfsmittel für den Leser, dass es hier gelingt, sofort nach der Konservierung am besten oder wenn das noch nicht möglich werden sollte, sehr bald nach der definitiven Verglasung, jedes einzelne Blatt einwandfrei im Bild aufzunehmen, bevor irgendwelche Sichtbehinderungen auftreten. Ich gebe zu, dass keine Fotographie, und mag sie technisch noch so einwandfrei sein, mag sie anspruchsvollste Forderungen überbieten, die einwandfreie Arbeit am direkten Original ersetzen kann, aber einmal wird der Zeitpunkt eintreten, dass in künftigen Zeiten, wenn wir Katastrophen dabei völlig ausser Acht lassen, eine mehrmalige Umglasung der Manichäischen Papyri einfach nicht mehr möglich sein wird, da dieses empfindlichste aller bisher aufgetretenen Papyrusmaterial die Prozedur des Umglasens bei sorgsamster Handhabung nicht mehr zulassen wird.

Daher muss das Problem der bestmöglichen fotographischen Bestandaufnahme jedes einzelnen dieser kostbaren Blätter jetzt gelöst werden als Hilfsmittel für den Leser, den Interpreten und eben als prophylaktisches Mittel, das die Jahrhunderte überdauern kann.

In 1960 Böhlig then reported as follows on Rolf Ibscher's work on this material:[7]

7. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 182.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

. . . the last 20 leaves of the Berlin Kephalaia book . . . were conserved by Rolf Ibscher in the years 1952 and 1953. The urgently needed reglassing of all the pieces that had been glassed by Hugo Ibscher and returned to Berlin in 1958 was undertaken by Rolf Ibscher beginning in June of this year (1960), along with the conservation of a few half-conserved leaves that Ibscher Sr. had at first put to one side as too difficult, doubtlessly correctly, for it has to do usually with double or triple leaves.

. . . die letzten 20 Blätter des Berliner Kephalaiabuches . . . wurden von Rolf Ibscher in den Jahren 1952 und 1953 konserviert. Die dringend notwendige Umglasung aller von Hugo Ibscher verglasten und 1958 nach Berlin zurückgekehrten Stücke hat Rolf Ibscher seit Juni dieses Jahres (1960) in Angriff genommen, ebenso die Konservierung einiger halbkonservierter Blätter, die Ibscher sen. zunächst—sicher mit Recht, handelt es sich doch dabei meist um Zwillings- oder Drillingsblätter—als zu schwierig beiseite gelegt hatte.

Rolf Ibscher reported as follows in 1964–1965 on the final conservation of this material and on the reglassing of the material returned from Leningrad:[8]

[p. 52] The remains of the Berlin Kephalaia had escaped destruction by being stored in my house after 1945. The degree of difficulty in conserving them, which I overcame between 1951 and 1955, was worse than that which the Chester Beatty papyri displayed. Unfortunately a marvellous leaf, after being separated [from the book block], was lost, completely atomized. I had to sneeze, but could not turn away with lightening speed—and all had disappeared without a trace.

[p. 62] One has to do here with the reglassing of the Kephalaia. More than half has been accomplished . . . [p. 63] After the

[p. 52] Der Schwierigkeitsgrad der Konservierung für die Reste der Berliner Kephalaia, die der Vernichtung durch die Aufbewahrung in meinem Hause nach 1945 entgangen waren und die ich zwischen 1951 und 1955 bewaltigte, war schlimmer als ihn die Chester Beatty-Papyri aufwiesen. Leider ging mir ein wundervolles Blatt nach seiner Ablösung restlos atomisiert verloren. Ich musste niesen, konnte mich nicht blitzschnell abwenden—und alles war spurlos verschwunden.—

[p. 62] Es geht da um die Umglasung der Kephalaia. Sie ist über die Hälfte gediehen . . . [p. 63] Nach den Kephalaia

8. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 52, 62, 63.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Kephalaia, groups of the codices Nr. 15[9]95, 15[9]97 and 15[9]98 still must be reglassed, along with a sizable number of leaves separated last, quite provisionally, by my father, with an entry on the paper cover that protected them which really creates puzzles: "from the codex B," i.e. then Chester Beatty [Synaxeis] or ?—and with the addition put in parentheses "Letters," i.e. then again Codex Nr. 15[9]98. What is one to make of that? But there is also among these leaves one with the number 361. To what does this belong?

müssen noch Gruppen der Codices Nr. 15[9]95, 15[9]97 und 15[9]98 umgeglast werden, sowie eine stattliche Anzahl zuletzt ganz provisorisch von meinem Vater abgelöster Blätter mit einer wahrlich Rätsel schaffenden Eintragung auf der sie bergenden Papierhülle: "aus dem Codex B", d.h. also Chester Beatty oder ? und mit dem in Klammern gesetzten Zusatz "Briefe", d.h. dann wieder Codex Nr. 15[9]98. Was soll das? Aber auch unter diesen Blättern ist eines mit der Nummer 361. Wozu gehört dieses?

Ibscher's situation with regard to the material in East Berlin was rendered all the more serious by the departure for Tübingen in 1963 of Alexander Böhlig, the scholar commissioned to edit the material; Böhlig hence terminated his involvement:[9]

[p. 54] And even Alexander Böhlig suddenly bailed out, when the resolution [of the twenty-fifth International Congress of Orientalists in Moscow in August 1960 favoring the publication of the Manichaica], with its confidently sounding tone, remained unnoted on all sides, and turned to a new illustrious task, possibly more suited to him.

Und gar Alexander Böhlig sprang plötzlich ab, als die Resolution [of the twenty-fifth International Congress of Orientalists in Moscow in August 1960 favoring the publication of the Manichaica] mit ihrem zuversichtlich stimmenden Klange allenthalben unbeachtet blieb und wandte sich einer neuen möglicherweise ihm mehr gemässen illustren Aufgabe zu.

In Rolf Ibscher's last article of 1965 he described his reconservation experience:[10]

10. Ibscher, "Mani und kein Ende," 221–22.

9. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 54.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The difficulties that emerge in reglassing vary, just as in separating off individual leaves from the book blocks. But here no "inclined plane" helps, my method for simplifying the separating of leaves, over against the procedure used by my father, this discovery of mine in the last moment before failure, thanks to desperation and the grace of the moment, or of luck. What would a restorer be when confronted with the unusual, the unique object, in the right moment, en kairo, without the igniting spark of genius! To sense this magical impulse in all creative realms and vocations would be worth a carefully interpretive investigation!

But the inflexible glass required extreme care in disengaging the leaves from the panes, which split the papyrus layers that lie at right angles to each other. The fixing down of the fragment parts also naturally called for great effort after reglassing. The slightest unevenness in the glass causes bad slippage when taping the edges, and often the glass plates must be reopened two or three times, even in the case of the old smooth glasses that my father had tested. Even in my father's time that happened often enough. Then if the material lies for a while, it settles down on its own.

Probably, after this first basic total reglassing, one has the assurance that now, with correct, consistently climatized storing of the restored discovery, no new

Die Schwierigkeiten, die sich bei einer Umglasung ergeben, variieren, genau wie beim Ablösen der einzelnen Blätter von den Buchblöcken. Hier hilft aber keine "Schiefe Ebene," meine Erleichterungsmethode des Ablösens, gegenüber dem von meinem Vater geübten Verfahren, diese meine Erfindung in letzter Minute vor dem Scheitern aus Verzweiflung und Gnade des Augenblicks oder Glücks. Was wäre ein Restaurator vor dem seltenen einmaligen Objekt im rechten Augenblick en kairo ohne den zündenden Funken des Genius. Diesem magischen Impuls in allen schöpferischen Bereichen und Berufen nachzuspüren wäre schon wert einer vorsichtig deutenden Untersuchung!

Das unflexible Glas aber verlangt äusserste Vorsicht beim Ablösen der Blätter von den mitunter die kreuzweisen Papyruslagen spaltenden Scheiben. Grosse Mühe bereitet natürlich auch nach dem Umglasen das Festigen von Fragmentteilen. Die geringste Unebenheit im Glas verursacht böses Verrutschen beim Rändeln, und oft müssen selbst bei den alten planen Gläsern, die mein Vater erprobt hatte, die Glasplatten zwei- und dreimal nochmals geöffnet werden. Auch zu meines Vaters Zeit kam das oft genug vor. Liegt das Material dann erst eine Weile, so beruhigt es sich ganz von selbst.

Wahrscheinlich wird nach dieser ersten grundlegenden totalen Umglasung die Gewähr bestehen, dass nun bei richtiger, konsequent wohltemperierter Lagerung des restaurierten Fundes keine neuen

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

condensations will occur between the glass panes.

[p. 222] The Berlin part of the discovery, with the exception of the codex that is in West Berlin, has been for some time undergoing reglassing, and, if no new illness puts me out of action, should be completed by the fall of 1966. A remainder of provisionally rescued material that my father had separated off last and that is still in the first stage of conservation should then follow. Dr. Dr. Nagel of the Institut für Byzantinistik in Halle, successor to Böhlig, has taken over the still unread leaves energetically and with devoted care and love. Also this deserves to be mentioned, that the important problem of the photographability is in the process of being well solved thanks to his tireless activity.

Kondensationen zwischen den Gläsern auftreten werden.

[p. 222] Der Berliner Fundanteil, mit Ausnahme des in Westdeutschland befindlichen Codex, wird seit geraumer Zeit umgeglast und dürfte, wenn keine neue Erkrankung mich ausser Gefecht setzt, bis Herbst 1966 abgeschlossen sein. Ein Rest provisorisch gesicherten Materials, das mein Vater zuletzt ablöste und das sich noch im ersten Stadium der Konservierung befindet, soll dann folgen. Der noch ungelesenen Blätter nimmt sich Dr. D. Nagel vom Institut für Byzantinistik in Halle in Nachfolge von Böhlig tatkräftig, mit hingebender Umsicht und Liebe an. Auch das verdient genannt zu werden, dass das wichtige Problem der Fotografierbarkeit dank seiner unermüdlichen Tatkraft auf dem besten Wege ist gelöst zu werden.

Wolfgang Müller's obituary for Rolf Ibscher reported his death on February 5, 1967, with the following relevant information:[11]

Chosen by the world-renowned "papyrus doctor," Hugo Ibscher, to be his successor, the graduate of the humanistic gymnasium in Berlin-Charlottenburg in 1928 began the study of classical philology at the University of Berlin, which he completed in 1938, after an interruption and temporary activity as assistant restorer in the Papyrus Collection, with graduation in Munich. Again apprentice years followed, in which Rolf

Vom weltbekannten "Papyrusdoktor" Hugo Ibscher zu seinem Nachfolger bestimmt, begann der Abiturient des humanistischen Gymnasiums in Berlin-Charlottenburg 1928 das Studium der klassischen Philologie an der Universität zu Berlin, das er nach Unterbrechung und zeitweiliger Tätigkeit als Hilfsrestaurator in der Papyrus-Sammlung 1938 in München mit der Promotion abschloss. Wieder folgten

11. Müller, "In memoriam Rolf Ibsicher," 207.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Ibscher, under the critical eyes of his father, gained the technical assurance of all stages of the work, until he accredited himself more and more after the Second World War with significant achievements of his own, as a conservator of international stature in his own right. Thus he succeeded largely in completing the conservation of the famous Coptic papyrus codices with Manichaean texts in Berlin and Dublin, whose restoration had been interrupted by the death of his father in 1943 . . .

Lehrjahre, in denen Rolf Ibscher unter den kritischen Augen des Vaters die technische Sicherheit aller Arbeitsgänge erwarb, bis er sich in zunehmendem Masse nach dem zweiten Weltkriege mit bedeutenden eigenen Leistungen als selbständiger Konservator von internationalem Rang erwies. So gelang es ihm, die Konservierung der berühmten koptischen Papyruscodices mit manichäischen Texten in Berlin und Dublin, deren Wiederherstellung durch den Tod des Vaters 1943 unterbrochen war, weitgehend zu vollenden . . .

Otto Werner Luke, Rolf Ibscher's assistant, completed the reconservation of the Kephalaia after Ibscher's death:[12]

He could not complete the work by the time of his death, so that the continuation was entrusted to me. [p. 152] Ca. 70 leaves still had to be freed of the milky film and reconserved.

The difficult technical procedure should be briefly described. The individual papyrus leaves lie, as has been already mentioned, between glass panes that a strip on the edges holds together. This has first to be cut open on three sides, in order to lift up one of the glass panes. Here it became clear that the fine papyrus material in many cases, as a result of the early handling with laquer, was so firmly stuck to the glass panes that it could be separated off only with the greatest care with a spatula.

Er konnte die Arbeit bis zu seinem Tode nicht vollenden, so dass mir die Weiterführung anvertraut wurde. Es mussten [p. 152] noch ca. 70 Blätter von der milchigen Eintrübung befreit und umgebettet werden.

Der schwierige technische Vorgang soll in Kürze dargestellt werden. Die einzelnen Papyrusblätter liegen, wie erwähnt, zwischen Glasplatten, die ein Randstreifen zusammenhält. Dieser muss zunächst an drei Seiten aufgeschnitten werden, um eine der Glasplatten anheben zu können. Dabei stellte es sich heraus, dass das feine Papyrusmaterial in vielen Fällen infolge der früheren Behandlung mit Lack an den Gläsern so fest haftete, dass es nur

12. Luke, "Die Umkonservierung," 151–52.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

This had to be done with full concentration, since the papyrus came loose only centimeter by centimeter and the work on one side often called for hours of work. Any careless movement of the hand endangered the object, since the papyrus fiber is so fine that it can be rubbed into powder without difficulty.

The papyrus loosened from a glass plate was, in order to prevent new sticking, covered with parchment paper and a pane of glass. In this way it was possible to turn the leaf on this firm foundation and to work on the second side in the same way. Finally the papyrus, now lying between parchment paper, was taken from the glass plates, which were to undergo a basic cleansing. The papyrus preserved between the parchment paper, by reversing the work procedure, again comes between the glass plates, that then were attached anew. The strips used here then received, to make them hold better, a stroke of color and lacquer.

The papyrus itself is held only by means of the pressure of the glass panes. No adhesive may come into contact with the fine papyrus material. Whereas an individual complete papyrus leaf is held in its position well by the pressure, the holding in place of fragments is especially difficult, since with the slightest unevenness in the glass and any shaking, it can slide and be destroyed. For this reason, the completed plates unter grösster Vorsicht mit einem Spachtel abzuheben war. Dies musste mit aller Konzentration geschehen, da der Papyrus nur zentimeterweise sich löste und die Arbeit an einer Seite oft Stunden in Anspruch nahm. Jede unvorsichtige Handbewegung gefährdete das Objekt, da die Papyrusfaser so fein ist, dass sie sich ohne Schwierigkeit zu Pulver verreiben lässt.

Der von einer Glasplatte gelöste Papyrus wurde, um erneutes Ankleben zu verhüten, mit Pergaminpapier und einer Glasscheibe bedeckt. Damit war es möglich, das Blatt auf dieser festen Unterlage zu wenden und die zweite Seite auf gleiche Weise zu bearbeiten. Schliesslich wurde der Papyrus, jetzt zwischen Pergaminpapier liegend, von den Glasplatten genommen, die einer gründlichen Reinigung zu unterziehen waren. Der zwischen dem Pergaminpapier aufbewahrte Papyrus gelangte durch Umkehrung des Arbeitsvorganges wieder zwischen die Glasplatten, die dann neu verklebt wurden. Die hierbei verwendeten Streifen erhielten anschliessend zur besseren Haltbarkeit einen Farb- und Lackanstrich.

Der Papyrus selbst wird nur durch den Druck der Glasplatten gehalten, irgendwelche Klebstoffe dürfen mit dem feinen Papyrusmaterial nicht in Berührung kommen. Während ein einzelnes vollständiges Papyrusblatt durch den Druck gut in seiner Lage gehalten wird, gestaltet sich die Festlegung von Fragmenten besonders schwierig, da sie durch die geringsten Unebenheiten im Glas are stored in boxes horizontally. Thus the reconservation of the Kephalaia codex is completed, which is to be hoped will prevent a new cloudiness on the papyrus material.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

und durch Erschütterungen verrutschen und zerstört werden können. Aus diesem Grunde werden die fertigen Platten horizontal in Kästen aufbewahrt. Damit ist die Umkonservierung des Kephalaia-Kodex abgeschlossen, die hoffentlich eine Neueintrübung des Papyrusmaterials verhindern wird.

Plans for Peter Nagel to complete the editing of the Kephalaia were not realized, and Rolf Ibscher died without a scholar as colleague to guide him.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 7 —

The Conservation of the Material in Schondorf/Göttingen/West Berlin

In 1954 Rolf Ibscher described as follows his work on the codex then in Schondorf:[1]

[p. 6] On the trip home [from London in December 1951], prevented by fog from continuing the flight, I began in Schondorf on Ammer Lake with the work of separating the leaves of the Berlin manuscript that contains the letters of Mani. This work I continued in May 1952 before flying on to Berlin, and did about 20 leaves . . .

[p. 10] In October and November 1952, on the trip home from London, I continued my work on the Berlin manuscript in Bavaria, and could remove 20 more leaves. Hence, together with the leaves separated there in the spring, there are now in all 40 legible leaves, which I impregnated in the fall of 1953.

[p. 6] Auf der Heimreise [from London in December 1951], durch Nebel am Weiterflug behindert begann ich in Schondorf am Ammersee mit der Blätterablösungsarbeit der Berliner Handschrift, die die Briefe Manis enthält. Diese Arbeit setzte ich im Mai 1952 vor dem Weiterflug nach London fort und schaffte rund 20 Blatt . . .

[p. 10] Im Oktober und November 1952 setzte ich auf der Rückreise von London meine Arbeit an der Berliner Handschrift in Bayern fort und konnte weitere 20 Blätter abheben. Zusammen mit den im Frühjahr dort abgelösten Blättern liegen jetzt also insgesamt dort 40 lesbare Blätter vor, die ich im Herbst 1953 imprägnierte.

1. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 6, 10.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

In 1955 Rolf Ibscher gave a much fuller report on his work up to that time:[2]

[p.3] At Christmastime 1951, returning from London and delayed at the airport by fog that lasted for days, I could inform myself there right away thoroughly about the condition of the Berlin manuscript, which I had not seen since 1944. I used the time to separate a few leaves by way of experiment, after my hands had become unusually sensitive in their touch for beginning a new manuscript through the work in London that had gone on for weeks . . .

[p. 5] Since the Schondorf manuscript certainly must be photographed, in hopes that the faded traces of writing may possibly stand out better from the dark papyrus background, one must either use plexiglass also in Germany for our Mani leaves, or distance oneself from definitive glassing until the photography problem that has been initiated has been solved. But I must here too insist that finally this intermediate task reach a conclusion, since it is now time, in the case of the leaves that I separated in 1952 and 1953 and in part already impregnated, that they [p. 6] can be sealed off hermetically from atmospheric influences. The problem could have been solved if the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft, which took over the financial supervision of the Schondorf manuscript, had followed my recommendations . . .

[p. 3] In den Weihnachtstagen 1951, von London kommend und durch tagelang anhaltenden Nebel am Heimflug verhindert, konnte ich mich dort gleich über den Erhaltungszustand der Berliner Handschrift eingehend informieren, die ich seit 1944 nicht mehr gesehen hatte, und nutzte die Zeit, einige Blätter probeweise abzulösen, nachdem die Hände durch die wochenlange Arbeit in London für den Beginn an einer neuen Handschrift ausserordentlich fühlfähig geworden waren . . .

[p. 5] Da die Schondorfer Handschrift unbedingt fotografiert werden muss, in der Hoffnung, dass die verblassten Schriftzüge eventuell besser aus dem dunklen Papyrushintergrund hervortreten, so müsste man entweder auch Plexiglas in Deutschland für unsere Maniblätter verwenden oder solange vom definitiven Verglasen Abstand nehmen, bis das in Angriff genommene fotografische Problem gelöst worden ist. Aber ich muss auch hier darauf dringen, dass endlich diese Zwischenaufgabe zum Abschluss gelangt, da es nun für die Blätter, die ich 1952 und 1953 ablöste und zum Teil schon imprägnierte, Zeit wird, dass sie hermetisch gegen atmosphärische Einflüsse abgeschlossen werden [p. 6] können. Das Problem hätte gelöst sein können, wenn man seitens der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft, die finanzielle Betreuung der Schondorfer Handschrift übernahm, meine Ratschläge befolgt hätte . . .

2. Rolf Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 3, 5, 7–11.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Since in those days, after the currency reform and the establishing of two governmental systems in Germany, the financing of such a massive work, extending over years across zone frontiers, would have to strike upon insurpassable difficulties from Berlin, especially since in Berlin one had serious reservations about the task of the Manichaean conservation, I was most deeply grateful that a personal acquaintance with a person of broad connections, whom I had often seen in Berlin in the house of his son-in-law, Prof. Schellenberg, and who would have been glad to transplant me to West Germany, brought to the Mani undertaking insightful aid. It was Professor Geiler, formerly the minister president of Hesse after the collapse, and rector of Heidelberg University and temporary president of the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft. His point of departure was the correct insight that this work should not be in arrears behind the work called to life by Sir Chester Beatty in London. When I came from London shortly before Christmas in 1951, he invited me to him in Heidelberg and promised me to mediate the help of the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft. A clear-headed spirit seemed to radiate over the Mani enterprise that was getting moving also on German soil. Overjoyed, I travelled to Berlin. Since the president of the German Academy of Sciences in Berlin, Professor Stroux, recognized the same necessity not to

Da in jenen Tagen nach der Währungsreform und der Etablierung zweier Regierungssysteme in Deutschland die Finanzierung einer solchen umfangreichen über Jahre sich erstreckenden Arbeit über Zonengrenzen hinweg von Berlin aus auf unüberbrückbare Schwierigkeiten stossen musste, zumal man in Berlin der Manichäischen Konservierungsaufgabe noch reichlich fremd gegenüberstand, war ich zutiefst dankbar, dass eine persönliche Bekanntschaft mit einem Manne von weitreichenden Beziehungen, den ich im Hause seines Schwiegersohnes, Prof. Schellenberg, in Berlin des öfteren gesehen hatte und der mich gern nach Westdeutschland verpflanzt hätte, dem Maniunternehmen eine [ein]sichtige Hilfe zuführte. Es war Professor Geiler, der frühere Ministerpräsident von Hessen nach dem Zusammenbruch und Rektor der Heidelberger Universität und zeitweilige Präsident der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft. Er ging von der richtigen Erkenntnis aus, dass diese Arbeit nicht im Rückstand hinter der von Sir Chester Beatty ins Leben gerufenen Arbeit in London bleiben dürfte. Als ich von London kurz vor Weihnachten 1951 kam, lud er mich zu sich nach Heidelberg und versprach mir, die Hilfe der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft zu vermitteln. Ein lichter Geist schien über dem nun auch auf deutschem Boden in Gang kommenden Maniunternehmen zu erstrahlen. Beglückt fuhr ich nach Berlin. Da der Präsident der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, Herr Professor Stroux, die gleiche Notwendigkeit erkannte, die leave to its own fate the Berlin manuscript and, in view of the creeping inner disintegration, not to let the rescue become illusory, I laid hold thankfully of the help that was actually coming forward, but which could become effective first in the fall of 1953, just at the moment when special difficulties blocked for me the way from Schondorf to London.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 7] But for the work in Bavaria a temporary contract was created, as it had been arranged for my stays in England on the part of Sir Chester Beatty. But it must be decidedly brought to expression that the material reimbursement of this exceptional work by Sir Chester Beatty shows that he had a much greater esteem for the performance of the conservator.

In order not to let the time until this help came into force go by unused, I had to finance the work in Schondorf on the Berlin Mani manuscript in 1952 by my own means. In union with the generous help by my nearest relatives, the publisher Wolf H. Döring and my brother-in-law, the co-publisher Ernst Günther Vockrodt, who immediately introduced first steps for solving the photographical problem by means of Perutz and later Agfa-Leverkusen and Prof. Hellwich of Darmstadt, and himself undertook experiments, it succeeded that prior to my second trip to London and immediately thereafter for weeks on end I found free asylum in Schondorf and could work undisturbed.

Berliner Handschrift nicht sich selbst zu überlassen und bei dem inneren schleichenden Verfall die Rettung nicht illusorisch werden zu lassen, griff ich die tatsächlich erfolgende Hilfe, die aber erst im Herbst 1953 wirksam werden konnte, dankbar auf, just in dem Moment, als besondere Schwierigkeiten mir den Weg von Schondorf aus nach London blockierten.

[p. 7] Für die Arbeit in Bayern aber wurde ein temporäres Vertragsverhältnis geschaffen, wie es für meine Aufenthalte in England seitens Sir Chester Beatty eingerichtet wurde. Es muss aber entschieden zum Ausdruck gebracht werden, dass die materielle Vergütung dieser aussergewöhnlichen Arbeit durch Sir Chester Beatty zeigt, dass er eine weitaus grössere Hochachtung vor der Leistung des Konservators hat.

Um die Zeit aber bis zum Inkrafttreten dieser Hilfe nicht ungenutzt verstreichen zu lassen, musste ich die Arbeit in Schondorf an der Berliner Manihandschrift 1952 noch aus eigenen Mitteln finanzieren. Im Verein mit der grosszügigen Hilfe durch meine nächsten Verwandten, den Verleger Wolf H. Döring und meinen Schwager, den Mitverleger Ernst Günther Vockrodt, der sofort erste Schritte für die Lösung des fotografischen Problems über Perutz und später über Agfa-Leverkusen und Prof. Hellwich-Darmstadt einleitete und selbst Versuche anstellte, gelang es, dass ich vor meiner zweiten Reise nach London und unmittelbar danach wochenlang ein gastfreies Asyl in Schondorf fand und ungestört arbeiten konnte.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

By this time 84 leaves of the Schondorf Mani manuscript, which contain, at least in large parts of the outer strata, the corpus of letters of Mani to his heads of congregations, have now been detached and provisionally laid between protective paper and glass. The first 6 leaves, which my father before the war had loosened as an experiment, were identified by C. Schmidt as letters of Mani. An examination of the leaves that I disengaged in 1952 was carried out by Böhlig, who came to the same result. The kernel or inner strata of the manuscript seem however parts of a still unknown manuscript. And it will have to do here with the same case as with the Chester Beatty manuscript, Codex C.

In this manuscript too I will proceed according to the proven London method of working: It has in view that all leaves are loosened with one effort, but that, in between, the work on the individual leaves takes place. That means that for each individual leaf there must repeatedly be undertaken a sort of reading to correct the fibers. Especially [p.8] the texts must be searched again and again for remaining splinters of fibers and small chips of papyrus, and entangled fibers straightened out.

After these proceedures, the impregnating of the leaves can then be begun. It will be, and remain, the same proven procedure of my father, as I applied already in Berlin and on a series of Schondorf leaves. It has to do with Bisher liegen nunmehr 84 Blätter der Schondorfer Manihandschrift, die zumindest in weiten Partien der Aussenlagen das Briefcorpus Manis an seine Gemeindeoberhäupter enthält, abgelöst und provisorisch zwischen Schutzpapier und Glas gelegt, vor. Die ersten 6 Blätter, die mein Vater vor dem Kriege probeweise abgelöst hatte, waren von C. Schmidt als Briefe Manis identifiziert worden. Eine Überprüfung der Blätter, die ich 1952 ablöste, erfolgte durch Böhlig, der zu gleichem Resultat kam. Der Kern oder Innenlagen der Handschrift scheinen aber Teile einer noch unbekannten Handschrift zu sein. Und es wird hier ein gleicher Fall vorliegen wie bei der Chester Beatty Handschrift, Codex C.

Auch bei dieser Handschrift werde ich nach dem bewährten Londoner Arbeitsprinzip vorgehen: Es sieht vor, dass alle Blätter in einem Zuge abgelöst werden; dass zwischendurch aber die Arbeit an den einzelnen Blättern erfolgt. Das heisst, wiederholt muss bei jedem einzelnen Blatt eine Art Faserkorrekturlesung vorgenommen werden. Speziell [p. 8] die Texte müssen immer erneut nach restlichen Fasersplittern und kleinen Papyrusabsprengseln abgesucht und verworrene Fasern gestreckt werden.

Nach diesen Arbeitsvorgängen kann dann mit dem Imprägnieren der Blätter begonnen werden. Es wird das gleiche bewährte Verfahren meines Vaters sein und bleiben, wie ich es schon in Berlin und an einer Reihe Schondorfer Blätter anwandte. Es handelt sich um das Besprühen

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

spraying the leaves with a weak solution of zapon lacquer.

The London fixative, recommended by Dr. Plenderleith, did not pan out, since it made the papyrus too dark. It effected exactly what in London was said of the use of zapon lacquer, but does not correspond to the facts. For all the leaves handled in this way by my father more than 20 years ago show no darkening, whereas the new fixative indeed consolidates excellently, but develops traits of tanning and darkening the papyrus.

Furthermore it is my wish and will that the photographic problem be solved before the definitive glassing, since photographing through glass, except for plexiglas, is a dubious thing.

Now if all attempts fail, then I hope that the Beuron Palimpsest Institute knows a solution. Since my brother-in-law as a specialist in photography is very interested in this problem, and knows all previous results of the attempts at Perutz and Agfa-Leverkusen, it will be necessary that as soon as possible he goes with me to Beuron, so that, through his professional information, unnecessary attempts are avoided.

Also, in the section of work before the definitive glassing, there belongs the exact determination of the individual quires in the manuscripts. It reassures me to read in the introductions to the [p. 9] individual editions, especially to the "Manichaean Homilies," what efforts and how much time this der Blätter mit einer schwachen Lösung von Zaponlack.

Das Londoner Fixativ, von Dr. Plenderleith empfohlen, hat sich nicht bewährt, indem es den Papyrus zu sehr dunkel machte. Es hat genau das bewirkt, was in London der Verwendung von Zaponlack nachgesagt wurde, aber nicht den Tatsachen entspricht; denn alle vor über 20 Jahren in dieser Weise von meinem Vater behandelten Blätter zeigen keine Nachdunklung, indessen das neue Fixativ zwar ausgezeichnet festigende, aber zu stark gerbende und den Papyrus dunkel färbende Eigenschaften entwickelt.

Ferner ist es mein Wunsch und Wille, dass das fotografische Problem vor dem definitiven Verglasen gelöst wird, da das Fotografieren durch Glas, ausgenommen bei Plexiglas oder Perspexglas, ein missliches Ding ist.

Sollten alle Versuche jetzt scheitern, so hoffe ich, dass das Beuroner Palimpzest-Institut vielleicht eine Hilfe kennt. Da mein Schwager als Fotofachmann an der Lösung dieses Problems sehr interessiert ist und alle bisherigen Resultate der Versuche bei Perutz und Agfa-Leverkusen kennt, wird es nötig sein, dass er mit mir, sobald als möglich, nach Beuron geht, um dort durch seine fachmännischen Informationen zu verhindern, dass unnötige Versuchsreihen angestellt werden.

Ebenfalls in den Arbeitsabschnitt vor dem definitiven Verglasen gehört die exakte Feststellung der einzelnen Buchlagen in den Handschriften. Es beruhigt mich, in den Einleitungen zu den [p. 9] einzelnen Editionen, speziell den "Manichäischen Homilien," zu lesen, welche Mühen und welche Zeit meinem Vater diese Ordnung der Blätter arranging of the leaves has cost my father. For it becomes apparent that, as a result of the mixing up by the dealers, and especially also by the owners of this small Manichaean library, losses within the seequence of leaves have taken place. But since the fibers, often due to the high degree of loss and decay of key fibers decisive for determining by the eye, often do not provide an irreproachable guide, the identification of double leaves that belong together, out of which the quires consis, is made very difficult and often is put in question.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

All such newly emerging problems, within a work procedure that is new for me, must hold me up and bring delays in estimates of time unexpectedly and unavoidably. One must accept them, and only be glad that my new technique for separating leaves . . . shortens amazingly this difficult and very awkward procedure, while at the same time providing a more certain guarantee of being able to lift off leaves in a whole piece that previously could not be removed at all, or survived this new birth only in fragments. All other techniques cannot be speeded up on tempo. They need their time.

It would be a further important help if also, before the final putting under glass, the person working on the text stood by my side, in the same way that this immeasurable help stood by my father already at the beginning of the conservation task by gekostet hat. Denn es zeigt sich, dass infolge der Vertauschungen durch die Händler und besonders auch durch den Eigentümer dieser manichäischen Handbibliothek innerhalb der Blätterfolge Verluste eingetreten sind. Dadurch aber, dass die Fasern oft bei dem hochgradigen Ausfall und Verfall entscheidender Leitfasern für die Bestimmung durch das Auge oft keine einwandfreie Handhabe bieten, wird die Identifizierung zusammengehöriger Doppelblätter, aus denen die Buchlagen bestehen, sehr erschwert und oft in Frage gestellt.

Alle solche innerhalb eines für mich neuartigen Arbeitsprozesses neu auftretenden Probleme halten auf und bringen Zeittermine für veranschlagte Teilabschnitte unvermutet und unvermeidbar ins Gleiten. Man muss sie hinnehmen, und kann nur froh sein, dass meine neuartige Ablösetechnik . . . gerade diesen schwierigen und sehr heiklen Vorgang erstaunlich verkürzt und zugleich relativ doch eine sicherere Gewähr bietet, auch Blätter in einem Stück abzuheben, die früher garnicht ablösbar waren oder nur fragmentarisiert diese Neugeburt überstanden. Alle anderen Vorgänge können nicht im Tempo beschleunigt werden. Sie brauchen ihre Zeit.

Eine weitere wichtige Hilfe wäre es, wenn gleichfalls vor dem definitiven Verglasen mir in gleicher Weise der Textbearbeiter zur Seite stande, wie diese unschätzbare Hilfe meinem Vater schon zu Beginn der Konservierungsaufgabe durch

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Schmidt and Polotsky, and later by Schmidt, Allberry and Böhlig.

This collaboration achieved, that really every fragment is proven by the text as to its correct placement and that overlooked fiber inexactitudes, which could seriously distort the text, are eliminated with the highest possible probability.

Unfortuanteley these legitimate wishes, which after all had as their goal the reestablishment of the really proven method of teamwork during the lifetime [p. 10] of my Father, led to incomprehensible tensions with the Deutsche Forshungsgemeinschaft.

The hope that with the departure of the curator of the Mani undertaking, Prof. Scheel, and under the new Curator, Prof. Hengstenberg, who is an expert aware of the goal, is not yet really fulfilled, since also over against this area of research he stands too unfamiliar and new.

After a fully absurd and unnecessary time-consuming episode which finally, in addition, ended quite unpleasantly, since, on bad advice, instead of Prof. Böhlig, as proven editor for 9 years from 1934 to 1943, one entrusted an absolute beginner [Rudnitzki] with the deciphering and reading of these difficult texts, who, in a grotesque way, also still had to give an evaluation, upon which the further financing of the work was to be made dependent, where of course nothing came of it other than an invalid false judgment, since he thus far had no experi-

Schmidt-Polotsky und später durch Schmidt, Allberry und Böhlig dauernd zur Verfügung gestanden hat.

Diese Zusammenarbeit gewährleistet, dass wirklich ein jedes Fragment auch vom Text überprüft auf seine richtige Anordnung am richtigen Platz untergebracht werden kann und dass übersehene Faserungenauigkeiten, die das Textbild empfindlich entstellen können, mit grösstmöglicher Wahr-scheinlichkeit ausgeschaltet werden.

Leider führten diese berechtigten Wünsche, die doch nur die Neuetablierung der wirklich bewährten Arbeitsteammethode zu Lebzeiten [p. 10] meines Vaters zum Ziel hatten, zu unbegreiflichen Spannungen mit der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft.

Die Hoffnung, dass mit dem Ausscheiden des Kurators des Maniunternehmens, Professor Scheel, unter dem neuen Kurator, Professor Hengstenberg, ein zielbewusster Fachmann mir zur Seite träte, will sich bisher nicht recht erfüllen, da auch er diesem Arbeitsbereich zu fremd und neu gegenübersteht.

Nach einer völlig absurden und unnötigen, Zeit vergeudenden und schliesslich obendrein noch unerquicklich verlaufenden Episode, weil man schlecht beraten anstelle von Professor Böhlig, als bewährtem Editor über 9 Jahre von 1934 bis 1943, einen absoluten Anfänger [Rudnitzki] mit dem Entziffern und Lesen dieser schwierigen Texte betraute, der grotesker Weise auch noch ein Werturteil zu fällen hatte, wovon die weitere Arbeitsfinanzierung abhängig gemacht werden sollte, wobei natürlich nichts dabei herauskam als ein unmassgebliches Fehlurteil, da er noch keine Erfahrung mit Papyrusoriginalen hatte

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

ence with papyrus originals and stood there completely helpless and unprepared. After checking with Böhlig and the Vice-President of the German Academy of Sciences in Berlin, Prof. Steinitz, I now received the agreement that Böhlig could be put immediately at my side at Berlin's expense. I made this information known without delay to the German Forschungsgemeinschaft, so that it can hence make contact with the German Academy of Sciences in Berlin to the extent it was really serious with the view that this undertaking advance "promptly and continually," which last year it had called for precisely regarding my period of work in Bavaria.

The German Academy of Sciences has taken this desire into account in that they arranged my employment so that I was to devote myself completely to working up this scattered discovery.

The German Academy of Sciences, the work on the text, at first deferred for lack of funds [p. 11] could now, as is desirable, take place at the same time, which provided a firm assurance that the work of conservation could, not only one-sidedly on the more technical side, reach completion in the foreseeable future.

Now it will become clear whether the bright spirit of Prof. Geiler, under whom the great work was initiated, will hopefully give its renewed blessing to the task.

A rejection would be incomprehensible; it would find the und gänzlich hilflos und unvorbereitet dastand, habe ich nach Rücksprache mit Böhlig und dem Vizepräsidenten der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, Professor Steinitz, nun die Zusage erhalten, dass Böhlig sofort mir auf Kosten Berlins zur Seite gestellt werden kann; ich gab diese Mitteilung unverzüglich der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft bekannt, damit sie deswegen mit der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin Fühlung nehmen kann, sofern es ihr wirklich ernst damit ist, dass dies Unternehmen "zügig und kontinuierlich" vorankommt, was sie im vorigen Jahr gerade hinsichtlich meiner Arbeitsaufenthalte in Bayern gefordert hatte.

Die Deutsche Akademie der Wissenschaften hat diesem Wunsch Rechnung getragen, indem sie mein Arbeitsverhältnis so regelte, dass ich weitgehend mich der Aufarbeitung dieses verstreut liegenden Fundes ausschliesslich widmen sollte.

Durch das Angebot der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften würde die von der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft aus Geldmangel vorerst [p. 11] zurückgestellte Textbearbeitung, nunmehr, wie es wünschenswert ist, gleichzeitig erfolgen können, was eine sichere Gewähr gäbe, das das Konservierungswerk nicht nur einseitig nach der mehr technischen Seite hin zur Vollendung in absehbarer Zeit gelangen könnte.

Es wird sich jetzt zeigen, ob der lichte Geist Prof. Geilers, unter dem das grosse Werk eingeleitet wurde,

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms disapproval of all scholars who again take inner satisfaction at the progress and success, and would bring a storm of resentment.

But the work in Schondorf had develooped well in terms of work, especially since it is possible from this year on, thanks to the agreement of the German Academy of Sciences of Berlin, for me to work in Schondorf for longer periods of time. Such work on material this obstinate requires very extended work periods, especially what the eye has to perform, is dependent very much also on good weather, since artificial light overworks the eyes too much, and not least of all from the absolute reliability and relaxation of the hands.

But after the conclusion of the conservation of Sir Chester Beatty's Manichaica, the main effort will automatically go to the Schondorf manuscript, to the extent that a surprising return to London or Dublin of the three Berlin codices that wandered to Russia and of Codex B from the possession of Sir Chester Beatty not create a new turning point.

hoffnungsvoll erneut der Aufgabe seinen Segen spenden wird.

Eine Zurückweisung wäre unverständlich und würde die Missbilligung aller Wissenschaftler finden, die an dem Fortgang und Gelingen nun wieder innigen Anteil nehmen, und müsste einen Sturm der Entrüstung heraufbeschwören.

Die Arbeit in Schondorf aber hat sich arbeitsmässig gut eingespielt, besonders, nachdem es mir nun seit diesem Jahr auch möglich ist, dank dem Entgegenkommen der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin in längeren Zeitabschnitten in Schondorf zu arbeiten. Eine solche Arbeit an derartig aufsässigem Material bedarf durchaus ausgedehnterer Arbeitsfolgen, zumal sie auch, besonders was das Auge dabei zu leisten hat, sehr von der Gunst des Wetters abhängig ist, da künstliches Licht zu sehr die Augen überanstrengt, und nicht zuletzt von der absoluten Sicherheit und Ruhe der Hände.

Nach dem Abschluss der Konservierung der Sir Chester Beatty Manichaika aber wird automatisch der Hauptakzent auf die Schondorfer Handschrift übergehen, sofern nicht eine überraschende Rückkehr der drei nach Russland gewanderten Berliner Codices und von Codex B aus dem Besitze von Sir Chester Beatty nach London oder Dublin eine neue Wende schafft.

The current status of papyrus conservation theory indicates a reversal of Rolf Ibscher's conservation theory:[3] [4]

3. Fackelmann, Resaurierung, 60–61.
4. Ibid., 21, 60–61.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 21] Zapon lacquer polishing:
Zapon is a self-polishing protection for the surface. Originally used for the protection of the top surface of metals, it was used in modified form for the conservation of library material—with the use of saltpeter acid, nitrated cellulose was dissolved in amyl acetate and carbonated hydrogen and mixed with a softening mixture of oil and camphor. coatings on paper as well as papyrus showed devastating results: Yellowing, splits, brittleness of the material, along side of the danger of fire that existed for objects treated in such a way, were the negative effects . . .
Glassing:
All too eager glassing and supplemental closing off from air of the glass plates with sealing lacquer led to the emergence of a small climate inside the plates that favors the microscopic organisms.

Result: Strong decomposition of the cellulose in the papyrus—rapid degeneration—film on the glass plates.

[p. 60] 2. Glassing with the Elimination of Air:
Hundreds of papyri were mounted without padding, presumbably for their better [p. 61] protection, between two glass panes, which were pasted with strips of paper and finally sealed with zapon lacquer. Yet this intentional protection from the outside world had terrible consequences: Because of the lack of the interchange of air there emerged within the glass plates a miniature climate, which was ad-

[p. 21] Zaponlackuberzuge:
Zapon ist ein selbstglättender Oberflächenschutz. Ursprünglich für den Oberflächenschutz von Metallen verwendet, wurde er in abgewandelter Form zur Konservierung von Bibliotheksgut benützt—mit Salpetersäure nitrerte Cellulose wurde in Amylacetat und Kohlenwasserstoff gelöst und mit einem Weichmachergemisch von Öl und Kampfer versetzt. Uberzüge auf Papier sowie Papyrus zeigten niederschmetternde Ergebnisse: Vergilben, Risse, Verspröden des Materials waren neben der Feuergefahr, die für solchermassen behandelte Objekte bestand, die negativen Auswirkungen . . .
Verglasen:
Allzu bereitwilliges Verglasen und zusätzliches luftdichtes Verschliessen der Glasplatten mit Siegellack führte zum Entstehen eines die Mikroorganismen begüstigenden Kleinklimas innerhalb der Platten.

Folge: starker Abbau der Cellulose im Papyrus—rascher Verfalls Beschlag auf der Glasplatte.

[p. 60] 2. Verglasung unter Luftabschluss:
Hunderte Papyri wurden zum vermeintlich bes- [p. 61] seren Schutz ohne Einlage zwischen zwei Glasplatten montiert, welche mit Papierstreifen umklebt und letztlich mit Zaponlack versiegelt wurden. Dieser beabsichtigte Schutz vor der Aussenwelt hatte jedoch erschreckende Folgen: durch den fehlenden Luftaustausch entstand innerhalb der Glasplatten ein Kleinklima, das dem Wachstum von Pilzen förderlich war.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

vantageous to the growth of fungus. The cellulose molecules gave up their necessary water constitution onto the glass plates pressed on it (according to the principle of osmotic pressure), as a result of which the degeneration of the cellulose proceeded more rapidly. Access to air and the circulation of air are a necessity for the existence of organic materials.

Die Cellulosemoleküle gaben ihr notwendiges Konstitutionswasser an die angepressten Glasplatten (nach dem Prinzip des osmotischen Druckes) ab, wodurch der Abbau der Cellulose rascher vor sich ging. Luftzufuhr und Luftzirkulation sind eine Notwendigkeit für den Bestand organischer Materialien.

In 1960/68, Böhlig summarized efforts to conserve and copy the codex after it had been moved from Schondorf to Göttingen:[5]

The manuscript that had come to West Germany and remained there after the war is at present in Göttingen and is cared for by the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft . . . I was able to see the manuscript in Göttingen through the cooperation of the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft in the year 1957.

Rolf Ibscher repeatedly undertook conservation work on the codex in Göttingen, funded by the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft; C. Colpe prepared the transcriptions. But at present the work has come to a halt and urgently needs to be carried forward.

Die nach Westdeutschland gekommene und nach dem Kriege dort verbliebene Handschrift befindet sich gegenwärtig in Göttingen und wird von der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft betreut . . . Die Handschrift in Göttingen konnte ich durch Entgegenkommen der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft im Jahre 1957 besichtigen.

An dem in Göttingen befindlichen Codex wurden auf Kosten der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft mehrfach von Rolf Ibscher Konservierungsarbeiten vorgenommen und von C. Colpe Abschriften angefertigt; die Arbeit ist aber gegenwärtig ins Stocken gekommen und bedarf dringend der Weiterführung.

In 1965 Rolf Ibscher described as follows the work on this codex:[6]

5. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 181–82.
6. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 54, 58–61.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 54] Charles Allberry, the great hope in the younger generation, fell as a victim of the anti-aircraft defense over Berlin. Rudnitzki quickly turned out to be not up to the job on the Berlin manuscript in Schondorf, and endangered the help that had been attained, precisely thanks to Prof. Geiler, from the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft in Bad Godesberg. In his place entered Carsten Colpe in Göttingen. Colpe's joy to collaborate, at first unbounded, burned out in a rapid straw fire. From him too there resulted an endangering that still continues to persist.

[p. 58] The situation is no different [than the discouraging report about the Dublin Manichaica] with the codex in Göttingen. Carsten Colpe, who worked for a time on the leaves that had been won up until then, brought into play in Munich at the International Orientalists' Congress [1957] the thesis that the manuscript does not belong to Berlin at all but is identical with the 13 leaves of Codex B in Dublin (or again now in London, since all the Mani material was shipped back to the British Museum by Sir Chester Beatty, without the Museum's being able to administer it). Böhlig, on the other hand, maintained that, in view of the shared titles on the pages (Synaxis), the 31 leaves of the Berlin codex Nr. 15[9]95 belong together with [p. 59] the Göttingen codex, whereas he had earlier held it to be codex Nr. 15[9]98 (collection of Letters). Böhlig's cautious, but nonetheless quite fixed thesis

[p. 54] Charles Allberry, die grosse Nachwuchshoffnung, fiel der Flugabwehr über Berlin zum Opfer. Rudnitzki erwies sich sehr schnell nicht gewachsen der Aufgabe an der Berliner Handschrift in Schondorf und gefährdete die gerade dank Professor Geiler gewonnene Hilfe seitens der DFG Godesberg. An seine Stelle trat Carsten Colpe in Göttingen. Seine zuerst unbändige Freude am Mitwirken verflog in schnellem Strohfeuer. Auch von ihm ging Gefährdung aus und wirkt noch nachhaltend an . . .

[p. 58] Nicht anders [than the discouraging report about the Dublin Manichaica] steht es mit dem Codex in Göttingen. Carsten Colpe, der eine Zeitlang an den bisher gewonnenen Blättern arbeitete, warf in München auf dem Internationalen Orientalistenkongress [1957] die These ins Spiel, die Handschrift gehöre gar nicht Berlin, sondern sei identisch mit den 13 Blättern des Codex B in Dublin oder jetzt London wieder, da alles Manimaterial an das Britische Museum von Sir Chester Beatty zurückverlagert wurde, ohne dass das Museum darüber verfügen kann. Böhlig hingegen erklärt, die 31 Blätter des Berliner Codex Nr. 15[9]95 gehören wegen der gemeinsamen Uberschriften auf den Seiten (SYNAXIS) zusammen mit [p. 59] dem Göttinger Codex, währehd er ihn früher für Codex Nr. 15[9]98 (Briefkollektion) gehalten hatte. Böhligs vorsichtige, was that, possibly by error, my father had brought to London the 13 leaves of the Codex B of Sir Chester Beatty, once they were glassed, as the result of which a dilemma again emerges. What is then the situation with the 31 leaves in Berlin, that, after all, are identical with those of the codex in Göttingen? When these leaves of Codex B came back to London, Carl Schmidt was still alive. At that time, in all probability, Charles Allberry was very clearly informed about the shares in the find. I.e., probably three minds and six eyes were at work as a control. But anyone who knew my father knows that he was inerrant, unconfusable, infallible, yes, that he possessed a phenomenal ability of memory.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Again and again I must come back to my conclusions, which came to me simply from the familiarity with, the eyewitnessing of, the glassed Mani papyri that are in Dublin. At the time, I inferred therefrom that Sir Chester Beatty's Codex B had remained in Berlin (that is to say, before the termination of the war's activities) and had shared the fate, then still uncertain, of all the rest of the papyri in the Zoo bunker. The format of these leaves of Codex B was very different for me from that of the manuscript that at the time was still in Schondorf on the Ammer Lake. The first embraced 7 leaves, the second 6 leaves [per quire?].

Accordingly, in view of my calculations, three Berlin codi-

aber doch eben fixierte These war, mein Vater hätte möglicherweise die 13 Blätter des Codex B von Sir Chester Beatty irrtümlich einst verglast nach London gebracht, wodurch wieder ein Dilemma entsteht. Was ist dann mit den 31 Blättern in Berlin, die doch identisch sind mit denen des Codex in Göttingen? Als diese Blätter des Codex B nach London zurückkamen, lebte Carl Schmidt noch. Dann war aller Wahrscheinlichkeit nach Charles Allberry sehr klar informiert über die Fundanteile. D.h. wahrscheinlich waren drei Hirne und sechs Augen als Kontrolle am Werk. Aber wer meinen Vater kannte, weiss, dass er unbeirrbar war, unverwirrbar und unfehlbar, ja, dass er ein phänomenales Erinnerungsvermögen besass.

Immer wieder muss ich auf meine Ergebnisse zurückkommen, die sich mir einfach aus der Kenntnis, aus der Autopsie der in Dublin befindlichen verglasten Manipapyri ergaben. Ich folgerte daraus damals, dass Sir Chester Beattys Codex B in Berlin verblieben war (also vor Einstellung der Kriegshandlungen) und das damals noch ungewisse Schicksal aller übrigen im Zoobunker verbliebenen Papyri geteilt hatte. Das Format dieser Codex-B-Blätter unterschied sich mir sehr von dem der damals noch in Schondorf am Ammersee befindlichen Handschrift. Die erste umfasste 7, die zweite 6 Blätter [per quire?].

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

ces [Acts, P[15997]; Letters, P[15998]; Homilies, P[15999]]—and one codex from the possession of Sir Chester Beatty [Synaxeis, Codex B] must not have returned from their odyssey. Likewise six leaves of the Kephalaia are missing, as has now become apparent from the reglassing. I do not believe in carelessness and destruction resulting from it, since the return lists show damages correctly noted in each case. In the case of a few papyri whose glasses were cracked, someone even carried out primitive first-aid conservations. So one was very concerned not to let anything fall victim to destruction, as well as it could be achieved. I explain the six missed Kephalaia leaves as still slumbering somewhere in a drawer, [p. 60] having missing the return trip. Forgetfulness is after all something very human. One will hence still have to request an inquiry. Sir Chester Beatty said to me in the summer of 1956, when we were talking about my discovering the absence of Codex B, that after all it would be a while before all Berlin papyri had returned to Berlin. It would be easier for him then to occupy himself in Berlin with a return.

The Berlin Codex Nr. 15[9]95 that is now in Göttingen still has about 100 to 120 unseparated leaves, which become more and more brittle under the climate's influence, in spite of good storage thus far. It already gave me very great difficulties at the time of my work between Christmas 1951 until 1958 in Göttingen. This work

Nach meinen Berechnungen müssen demnach drei Berliner Codices [Acts, P15997; Letters, P15998; Homilies, P15999] und ein Codex aus dem Besitz von Sir Chester Beatty [Synaxeis, Codex B] von ihrer Odyssee nicht zurückgekehrt sein. Ebenfalls fehlen sechs Blätter der Kephalaia, wie sich jetzt bei der Umglasung ergibt. Ich glaube nicht an Fahrlässigkeit und damit verbundene Vernichtung, weil die Rückkehrlisten Beschädigungen jeweils korrekt vermerkt anzeigen. Man hat ja auch bei einigen Papyri, deren Gläser zersprungen waren, sogar primitive Notkonservierungen gemacht, war also sehr bedacht, alles so gut es eben gehen wollte, nicht der Vernichtung anheim fallen zu lassen. Die sechs fehlenden Kephalaia-Blätter erkläre ich mir damit, dass sie irgendwo noch in einem Fache schlummern [p. 60] und die Rückreise verpasst haben. Vergesslichkeit ist schliesslich etwas sehr Menschliches. Man wird also noch einmal um eine Ermittlung ersuchen müssen. Sir Chester Beatty sagte mir im Sommer 1956, als wir über meine Entdeckung des Fehlens von Codex B sprachen, dass das ja Zeit hätte, bis alle Berliner Papyri wieder nach Berlin zurückgekehrt seien. Es würde für ihn einfacher sein, dann um eine Rückgabe in Berlin sich zu bemühen.

Da der Berliner, jetzt in Göttingen befindliche Codex Nr. 15[9]95 noch ca. 100 bis 120 nicht abgelöste Blätter hat, die unter der klimatischen Einwirkung, trotz guter Lagerung bisher, immer mürber werden und schon zur Zeit meiner of a provisional safeguarding, undoubtedly most important, must be carried forward, after having been interrupted for six years. For otherwise the same thing can happen that happened to my father with Codex C [Chester Beatty's Kephalaia], that it was no longer possible to save it, not even with the tricky method of the Inclined Plane . . . My desire was that one should also see to it that photography must go hand in hand with the conservation and editing. But this has ballooned into such a mania that precious time is wasted in search of some open-sesame formula for photography, to the detriment of the codex. This is something Mr. Colpe may perhaps secretly already regret, but this will not remove the original evil from the world.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The writing is often very rubbed off, since here we again have to do precisely with soot ink, with the exception of the writing in the parts of the codex "stored" inside, as in the case of Codex C. Here ultraviolet rays can hardly conjure up anything. Since there are large lacunae in the text in many of the ca. 145 leaves, [p. 61] photography can perhaps perform a certain supplemental help in the case of individual leaves, more in the sense of an "aid in collation" for the editor after a first transcription, in case he, as in the case of Charles Allberry, must carry on his work on the text in a different location, where he cannot have the original papyrus before him. Without "strong eyes,"

Bearbeitung zwischen Weihnachten 1951 bis 1958 in Göttingen sehr grosse Schwierigkeiten mir bereiteten, muss jetzt unbedingt diese vorerst wichtigste Arbeit der provisorischen Sicherung nach sechs Jahren ihrer Unterbrechung vorangebracht werden, weil sonst das eintreten kann, was meinem Vater mit Codex C [Chester Beatty's Kephalaia] passierte, dass eine Rettung nicht mehr möglich ist, auch nicht mit der überlistungsmethode der Schiefen Ebene . . . Dass mein Wunsch, man sollte auch dafür sorgen, dass Hand in Hand mit dem Konservieren und dem Edieren das Fotografieren gehen möge, sich zu einer solchen Manie jetzt ausgewachsen hat, indem kostbare Zeit mit der Suche nach einer "Sesam-öffne-dich-Fotografierformel" zu Ungunsten des Codex vergeudet wird, mag Herrn Colpe vielleicht insgeheim schon reuen, aber damit wird das Urübel nicht aus der Welt geschafft.

Da die Schrift oft sehr abgerieben ist, weil wir es hier wieder gerade mit Ausnahme der bei den Partien des ebenso wie in Codex C "eingelagerten Codex" mit Russtinte zu tun haben, wo ultraviolette Strahlen kaum etwas hervorzaubern können, und da grosse Lücken im Text bei vielen der ca. 145 Blätter bestehen, kann [p. 61] die Fotografie bei einzelnen Blättern vielleicht eine gewisse zusätzliche Hilfe leisten, mehr im Sinne einer "Repetierhilfe" nach erster Lesung für den Editor, falls er, wie im Falle von Charles Allberry, an einem anderen Ort, wo er eben den Papyrus nicht als Original vor sich sehen kann, am Text weiterarbeiten muss. Ohne die "starken Augen," wie es Carl Schmidt im ersten Akademiebericht nennt, as Carl Schmidt puts it in the first Academy report, it will not work. Also not without a tremendous ability to make combinations, and not without the often quite odd positionings of the correct angle for the light to fall, by each individual editor, and the often amazing necessity to decipher each individual leaf—for each one it is different, according to the degree of rotting—with quite specific lighting, but never by making use of artificial light, since the papyrus, as a result of very great darkening, almost already lets one perceive hardly any more writing.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

It should not lead to the situation that photography is elevated to a rigid doctrine for something, where nothing lies behind it except an excuse. With or without photography, Mr. Colpe can hardly find a stronger interest again in this quite difficult codex, after he has once learned to recognize very quickly that editorial work on such a Mani manuscript, in the area of editing, is among the most demanding.

geht es nicht; ohne ein immenses Kombinierungsvermögen auch nicht und ohne die von jedem einzelnen Editor vorzunehmenden, oft wunderlichen, Einstellungen des rechten Lichteinfallwinkels und der oft frappierenden Nötigung, das jeweilige Blatt—bei jedem ist es anders, je nach dem Grade der Verrottung unter ganz bestimmter Beleuchtung, aber niemals unter Zuhilfenahme künstlichen Lichtes, zu entziffern, da der Papyrus, infolge sehr starker Nachdunklung, fast schon nicht mehr Schrift wahrnehmen lässt.

Es darf jetzt nicht dazu führen, dass die Fotografie als eine starre Doktrin für etwas erhoben wird, wo nichts anderes dahinter steht als eine Ausflucht. Mit oder ohne Fotografie dürfte Herr Colpe kaum ein stärkeres Interesse wieder an diesem recht schwierigen Codex finden, nachdem er einst sehr schnell erkennen lernte, dass editorische Arbeit an einer solchen Manihandschrift zum Schwersten auf editorischem Gebiet gehört.

Böhlig has explained, as follows, the possibility that thirteen leaves could have been taken by mistake to London: "Various individual leaves . . . were at various times also transported by both Ibschers between England and Berlin back and forth."[7]

Böhlig also has clarified Rolf Ibscher's statement that Böhlig "had earlier held it to be codex Nr. 15[9]98 (collection of Letters)":[8]

7. Böhlig, in a letter of February 5, 1986: "Verschiedene einzelne Blätter . . . sind zu verschiedenen Zeiten von beiden Ibschers auch zwischen England und Berlin hin und her transportiert worden."

8. Böhlig, in a letter of June 1, 1986.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

When Ibscher claimed that it has to do with a German manuscript, then it of course first of all only about the historical book or the letters of Mani, since the third German manuscirpt, the so-called "wig," would have exerted no motivation for speical security . . . Since apparently statements in the first and second person occur, it could less likely be the historical book, so only the letters remained. Yet what today is completely incomprehensibile . . . is that the codices after all were apparently so inadequately characterized that even a doubt could ever arise as to their identity.

Wenn Ibscher behauptete, es handel sich um eine deutsche Handschrift, dann konnte es sich ja zunächst einmal nur um das historische Buch oder die Briefe Manis handeln, weil die 3. deutsche Handschrift, die sog. "Perücke," keinen Reiz für eine besondere Sicherstellung ausgeübt hätte . . . Da anscheinend Aussagen in der 1. und 2. Person vorkammen, konnte es weniger gut das histor-ische Buch sein; also blieben, konnte es weniger gut das historische Buch sein; also blieben nur die Briefe übrig. Was nur heute völlig unbegreiflich ist . . . , ist, dass die Codices doch offenkundig so mangelhaft gekennzeichnet waren, dass überhaupt ein Zweifel über ihre Identität entstehen konnte.

Presumably, when Böhlig went to Schondorf to sort out the book blocks to be turned over to the Allied authorities, he was simply following Ibscher's instructions to keep one in Schondorf on the assumption it was one of the Berlin codices.

In the first version of his essay on the Synaxeis in 1957 Böhlig wrote: "In the war one of the codices belonging to the Berlin holdings was stored outside, in the region of what is now the Federal Republic."[9] In the second edition of that essay in 1968, the formulation was left open, in that the codex is no longer said to belong to Berlin and yet is said to be stored along with those of Sir Chester Beatty, as if it were not itself one of them: "In the war a manuscript was stored outside in the region of what is now the Federal Republic, along with the codices belonging to Sir Chester Beatty; this text is at present in Göttingen

9. Böhlig, "Synaxis = Homilia?" 485–86, especially 485: "Im Kriege wurde einer der zum Berliner Bestand gehörigen Codices ins Gebiet der jetzigen Bundesrepublik ausgelagert." Böhlig published a revised and expanded version as "Zu den Synaxeis," 222–27, especially 222–23.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

to be conserved."[10] But a further insertion into the second edition of the essay makes it clear that Böhlig no longer assumed the codex belonged to Germany, in that he clearly identified it as the bulk of the codex of which Berlin owned only a vestige: "Thus one can assume, as C. Colpe also thinks, that the remainder of a Berlin codex discussed by C. Schmidt [P^{15995}] forms with this codex a unity of contents, but not of ownership."[11]

Here it is clear, even if cautiously and then only obliquely expressed, that Böhlig with Colpe had reached the conclusion that the codex then in Göttingen is not a codex belonging to Berlin but rather a codex belonging to Sir Chester Beatty, since from the very beginning all agreed that the Synaxeis belonged to Sir Chester Beatty (except for the 31 leaves of this codex that Carl Schmidt had purchased in Egypt for Berlin). Although the Göttingen codex had already been identified as the Synaxeis codex at the time the first edition of this essay was published, Böhlig did not in the first edition state the inescapable inference that it was hence not a codex belonging to Berlin.

10. "Im Kriege wurde zusammen mit den Sir Chester Beatty gehörigen Codices eine Handschrift in das jetzige Gebiet der Bundesrepublik ausgelagert; dieser Text befindet sich gegenwärtig in Göttingen zur Konservierung."

11. "Damit kann man annehmen, wie auch C. Colpe meint, dass der von C. Schmidt besprochene Berliner Restcodex [P^{15995}] mit diesem Codex eine inhaltliche, aber keine besitzmässige Einheit bildet."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 8 —

The Conservation of the Material in London/Dublin

Regarding the London/Dublin material, Ibscher wrote in 1955:[1]

[p. 2] Thanks to the initiative of Sir Chester Beatty, events took a turn after the war . . .

[p. 3] At the suggestion of Sir Alan H. Gardiner, Sir Harold I. Bell, and Professor Glanville, Sir Chester Beatty engaged me in 1948 to carry forward the conservation work that had been orphaned. Difficult circumstances of the time put me at a disadvantage, so that it was only in x 51 that I could reach London and begin with the conservation of the Chester Beatty papyri, which at the end of 1944, on the smart advice of my father-in-law, the publisher Wolf Henry Doering, together with a Berlin manuscript (Codex No. 15998), I on my own responsibility had brought from the danger zone of Berlin for the final phase of the war into his safe

[p. 2] Dank der Initiative von Sir Chester Beatty trat nach dem Kriege eine Wende ein . . .

[p. 3] Auf Vorschlag von Sir Alan H. Gardiner, Sir Harold I. Bell und Professor Glanville engagierte mich Sir Chester Beatty 1948 zur Fortführung der verwaisten Konservierungsarbeit. Widrige Zeitverhältnisse benachteiligten mich, sodass ich erst Oktober 1951 nach London gelangen und mit dem Konservieren der Chester Beatty Papyri beginnen konnte, die ich Ende 1944 auf den klugen Rat meines Schwiegervaters hin, des Verlegers Wolf Henry Doering, zusammen mit einer Berliner Handschrift (Codex Nr. 15998) auf eigene Verantwortung aus der Gefahrenzone Berlins für die Endphase des Krieges in sein

1. Rolf Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 2–3.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

house on the quiet Ammer Lake in Schondorf, a good hour away from Munich . . .

In London I had begun with three residual pads (not identical with quires in the sense of codicology) of the Psalms book, which my father some time before the war had put to one side, for, as he had written to Sir Chester Beatty, "the unremitting difficult work of separating the leaves was too exhausting over a period of time," and separated 49 well-preserved leaves and a few very fragmentary remains of leaves.

sicheres Haus am stillen Ammersee in Schondorf, eine gute Stunde von München entfernt, gebracht hatte . . .

In London hatte ich mit drei Restlagen (sie Sind nicht identisch mit den buchtechnischen Buchlageneinheiten) des Psalmenbuches begonnen, die mein Vater einige Zeit vor dem Kriege zurückgestellt hatte, da ihn, wie er an Sir Chester Beatty geschrieben hatte, "die unentwegte schwere Ablösearbeit zu sehr auf die Dauer anstrengte," und 49 gut erhaltene Blätter und einige sehr fragmentarische Blätterreste abgehoben.

Already in 1954 Rolf Ibscher had described the beginning of his work in London in somewhat more detail:[2]

In 1951, after three years of persistent waiting, I obtained the exit permit from East Germany and began on October 5, not without a pounding heart, the difficult work of separating the leaves from the remains of the Psalms book. It was three quires that I, shortly before Christmas, was able to bring provisionally under glass. It became 49 leaves or 98 pages of text, and, in addition to that, fragmentary leaves of probably 12 leaves.

1951, nach dreijährigem beharrlichem Warten, erlangte ich die Ausreisegenehmigung aus Ostdeutschland und begann am 5. Oktober nicht ohne einiges Herzklopfen mit der schwierigen Arbeit des Ablösens der Blätter von Resten des Psalmenbuches. Es waren drei Lagen, die ich bis kurz vor Weihnachten provisorisch zwischen Glas bringen konnte. Es sind 49 Blatt oder 98 Seiten Text geworden, dazu noch Fragmentblätter von wahrscheinlich 12 Blättern.

In 1955 Ibscher also reported on his continuing work up to 1955:[3]

2. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 6.
3. Rolf Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 4–5.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 4] In 1952 I began with Codex C, which, as my father too had already ascertained by separating 34 leaves, contains in large parts valuable Kephalaia text.

It was good luck that I did not let myself be led astray by a report of my father about the condition of the codex preservation. He had given up the work after a certain number of leaves by pointing out that each further leaf, peeled from the block of the manuscript, dissolved completely, and it seemed that one could hardly expect still useful and legible text, since practically no writing would be still recognizable.

But my new outsmarting technique, which had proven so successful on the seemingly hopelessly brittle leaves of the Psalms book, made it in fact possible for me to clear this hurdle.

It soon became clear that, after a series of leaves with very faded writing, suddenly quite visible Kephalaia text with ca. 75 leaves came to light.

It was part of the discordant accompanying music of this truly ideal task, and the false decisions that one would hope by now would belong forever to a legendary past, that in 1953 I could not continue my London work in spite of daring efforts.

But in 1954, thanks to the intervention of many good forces on the part of the German Academy of Sciences in Berlin and especially of Sir Chester Beatty, all impediments were overcome, so

[p. 4] 1952 begann ich mit Codex C, der in weiten Partien, wie auch mein Vater schon durch Abheben von 34 Blättern ermittelt hatte, wertvollen Kephalaia-Text enthält.

Es war ein dass ich mich nicht durch einen Bericht meines Vaters über den Erhaltungszustand des Codex hatte beirren lassen. Er hatte nach einer gewissen Anzahl von Blättern die Arbeit unter dem Hinweis aufgegeben, dass jedes weitere Blatt, aus dem Verbande der Handschrift geschält, sich völlig auflöste und es den Anschein hätte, kaum noch brauchbaren und lesbaren Text erwarten zu können, da so gut wie keine Schrift mehr erkennbar wäre.

Aber meine neue überlistungstechnik, die sich so gut an den hoffnungslos scheinenden mürben Psalmenbuchblättern bewahrt hatte, liess mich tatsächlich diese Hürde nehmen.

Es zeigte sich bald, dass nach einer Serie von Blättern mit Behr verblasster Schrift plötzlich guttsichtbarer Kephalaia-Text mit ca. 75 Blättern zutage kam.

Es gehörte zu der misstönenden Begleitmusik dieser wahrhaft idealen Aufgabe und den hoffentlich nunmehr für immer einer legendarischen Vergangenheit angehörenden Fehlentscheidungen, dass ich 1953 meine Londoner Arbeit trotz waghalsiger Bemühungen nicht fortsetzen konnte.

Aber 1954 waren dank dem Eingreifen vieler guter Kräfte seitens der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin und vornehmlich Sir Chester Beatty's alle

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms that I could now impregnate the Psalms codex and in July separate the last leaf of Codex C, with a deep breath and yet with some melancholy. The most beautiful work on the Mani discovery is the separating of a leaf.

Thus, however, the most difficult partial task had been completed for the papyri belonging to Sir Chester Beatty. Codex C had produced in all about 140 partially quite good leaves. They also were all impregnated in 1954.

[p.5] The definitive glassing should have taken place in this year [1955], but since thus far the special glass perspex, or, as it is called in Germany, plexiglass, had not yet arrived, one can hardly any longer hope that more than a fourth of this also ticklish work can be performed . . .

Since the writing [of the "Schondorf" codex] is relatively clear, the glassing can be justified. For this reason Sir Chester Beatty also decided for the use of plexiglass, since one can also photograph through this with infrared, if it should prove to be necessary.

Hemmnisse beseitigt, sodass ich jetzt das Psalmenbuch imprägnieren und im Judi das letzte Blatt des Codex C aufatmend und doch ein wenig melancholisch abheben konnte. Die schönste Arbeit am Manifund ist das Abheben eines Blattes.

Damit aber war die schwierigste Teilaufgabe an den Sir Chester Beatty Papyri abgeschlossen worden. Codex C hatte insgesamt rund 140 zum Teil recht gute Blätter hergegeben. Sie wurden ebenfalls 1954 imprägniert.

[p. 5] Die definitive Verglasung sollte in diesem Jahre [1955] erfolgen, da aber bisher noch nicht das Spezialglas Perspex oder, wie es in Deutschland heisst: Plexiglas eingetroffen ist, bleibt kaum zu erwarten, dass mehr als ein Viert el dieser ebenfalls heiklen Arbeit geleistet werden kann . . .

Da die Schrift [of the "Schondorf" codex] relativ deutlich ist, lässt sich das Verglasen rechtfertigen. Aus diesem Grunde entschied sich Sir Chester Beatty auch für die Verwendung von Perspexglas, da durch dieses auch mit Infrarot, wenn es sich als nötig erweisen sollte, hindurchfotografiert werden kann.

In 1954 Ibscher had given a slightly different figure for the number of leaves he had conserved from Codex C, the Kephalaia:[4] "136 leaves or 272 pages of text of partially very good condition are separated and thus available."

In 1964/65 Rolf Ibscher also presented a much more disillusioned report:[5]

4. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 11: "136 Blätter oder 272 Seiten Text von zum Teil sehr guter Verfassung liegen abgelöst damit vor."

5. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 55–57.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 55] The annoyance is and remains that the work that had advanced so energetically on the Chester Beatty part of the find has come to a complete standstill since 1956, when I was for the last time in Dublin. This is due to the death of the librarian Mr. Wilkinson and that of Mr. Merton, both of whom alone knew what still needed to be mastered. Until 1962 I had hoped [p. 56] to be able to complete the work in Dublin . . . [p. 57] The death of Mr. Wilkinson, the librarian of the Chester Beatty Library in Dublin, and just so that of Mr. Merton, led to the situation that Sir Chester Beatty, now standing under the influence of other advisors, stopped the undertaking, with the explanation that the most important part—nota bene the most important for him—the separating of the remaining leaves of the codex, had been completed,—whereby he was not stingy with praise—, but he said he had many other important projects in view and he was no longer the youngest.

[p. 55] Das Ärgernis ist und bleibt, dass die so stürmisch vorangekommene Arbeit am Chester Beatty-Fundanteil in völliges Stocken seit 1956 geraten ist, als ich das letzte Mal in Dublin gewesen war, durch den Tod des Bibliothekars Mr. Wilkinson und Mr. Merton's, die beide allein um das noch zu Bewältigende wussten. Bis 1962 hatte ich gehofft, in Dublin vollenden zu [p. 56] können . . . [p. 57] Der Tod Mr. Wllkinson's, des Bibliothekars der Chester-Beatty-Library in Dublin und ebenso der von Mr. Merton führte dazu, dass Sir Chester Beatty nun unter dem Einfluss anderer Berater stehend, das Unternehmen mit der Begründung abstoppte, der wichtigste—wohlgemerkt für ihn wichtigste—Teil, die Ablösung der restlichen Codicesblätter sei abgeschlossen,—wobei er mit Lob nicht kargte—, aber er habe noch viele andere wichtige Projekte vor und er sei nicht mehr der Jüngste.

One may recall (see above) the comment that I. E. S. Edwards made in a letter to R. J. Hayes on November 1, 1960: "I cannot myself think that Rolf Ibscher could have known anything about these papyri. He was working for Sir Chester Beatty for about four years and he would surely have told one of us if he had known of their existence. I feel we should regard him as a last resource." Edwards wrote to Günther Roeder on the same day:

> I wonder whether you have any recollection of having seen these papyri at any stage either in Dr. Ibscher's possession or in the Museum. It is possible that Dr. Ibscher had them in his home and if so the only one who could help would be Rolf

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> Ibscher. If possible, however, I do not want Rolf Ibscher to be involved in this matter because he and Sir Chester Beatty have had some differences over the mounting of the Mani papyri which were not sent to Dr. Hugo Ibscher.

On the same day Edwards wrote to Rudolf Anthes: "I must also add that—at least at present—I do not want Rolf Ibscher to know that I am trying to trace these documents. He has been rather troublesome to Sir Chester Beatty and I am not very sure that I can count on his good will."

Thus, Ibscher stood alone, a technician dependent for employment on nonexistent scholars and patrons. He had sought in vain to persuade Polotsky to resume the collaboration that had been so effective with his father, but by 1964–1965 no scholar was available:[6]

[p. 61] Walter Till wrote me on June 6, 1957: "Of course I was in the Chester Beatty collection. But there was no talk of a continuation of the publication. That is indeed a difficult chapter. When you say that one should draw on no young forces, I must agree with you, if you mean by that beginners. This is of course not for beginners. But it is also not for old people; for one must have for it good young eyes. Young forces would be quite acceptable, but not mere beginners. People with some experience, who have worked on other things. After all, one must reflect that Polotsky, Böhlig and Allberry were also young when they tried their hands at the Manichaica. If now a young person goes at it, he would have the great advantage over the three I have named that indeed three volumes lie before us published, on which he [p. 62] can train himself. This possibility is some-

[p. 61] Walter Till schrieb mir am 6. Juni 1957: "Natürlich war ich in der Chester-Beatty-Sammlung. Aber über eine Weiterführung der Publikation wurde nicht gesprochen. Das ist ja ein schwieriges Kapitel. Wenn Sie sagen, man sollte keine jungen Kräfte heranziehen, so muss ich Ihnen dann recht geben, wenn Sie darunter Anfänger verstehen. Das ist natürlich nichts für Anfänger. Es ist aber auch nichts für Alte; denn man muss gute junge Augen dazu haben. Junge Kräfte wären schon recht, aber nicht gerade Anfänger. Leute mit etwas Erfahrung, die schon andere Dinge bearbeitet haben. Schliesslich muss man bedenken, dass auch Polotsky, Böhlig and Allberry jung waren, als sie sich an den Manichaika versuchten. Wenn jetzt ein Junger Baran herangeht, hat er vor den drei genannten den grossen Vorteil, dass eben schon drei

6. Ibid., 61.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

thing the three I have named did not have. Of course there stood perhaps Carl Schmidt by their side with his great experience."

Bände publiziert vorliegen, an denen er [p. 62] sich schulen kann. Diese Möglichkeit hatten die drei Genannten nicht. Allerdings stand ihnen vielleicht Carl Schmidt mit seiner grossen Erfahrung zur Seite."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Inventories of Individual Codices

This series of misadventures of the Manichaean codices as a result of the war and the postwar period means that to a certain extent, the material must be, as it were, rediscovered. For the information Schmidt and Polotsky provided more than a half a century ago, incomplete though it was, provided a picture of what there was, where it was, and what was being done with it at the time, which stands in sharp contrast to the absence of any comparable published information today. The present study hence seeks to clarify such questions as of today, so that the current generation of scholars can know what can be ascertained about the present status of this important manuscript discovery.

Schmidt and Polotsky's article proceeded to discuss in a preliminary way the Manichaean codices one by one. That initial information is cited here as a point of departure. It is then supplemented first by the official entry made in the Inventarbuch by Wilhelm Schubart, director of the Ägyptisches Museum and of the Papyrussammlung, together with whatever subsequent unofficial notes were added to the entries. (The Inventarbuch is now kept in the administration offices beneath the Pergamonmuseum on the Museumsinsel of Berlin.) This is then updated from the editiones principes, to the extent the codices have been published. For each codex there is added the information that Rolf Ibscher and Alexander Böhlig provided in various articles and lectures presented over the subsequent years. Then recorded for each codex is the information found in a preliminary catalog of Coptic manuscripts in the Berlin papyrus collection, a catalog presented by Wolfgang Müller to a workshop held at the Institut für Byzantinistik of

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:04 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg on December 14 and 15, 1964.[1] Then the entry is excerpted from a more detailed catalog published by Walter Beltz in 1978.[2] Finally, this secondary literature is updated with an inventory of the actual papyri themselves.

1. Müller, "Die koptischen Handschriften der Berliner Papyrussammlung," 67–68.

2. Beltz, "Katalog der koptischen Handschriften," APF (1978) 57–119; (1980) 121–222. The Manichaean codices are catalogued on pp. 97–98.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:04 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Part Three

The Berlin Holdings

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:07 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 9 —

P15995 Synaxeis (Berlin Part)

Schmidt and Polotsky reported as follows:[1]

And with equal brevity we must report on a collection of 31 leaves brought under glass, which were acquired in the Fayyum and without doubt belong to the London Mani pieces. It also has to do with individual treatises, as the remains of titles show. We read there: ⲧⲙⲁ2ⲥ̅ⲛ̅ⲧⲉ ⲛ̅ⲥⲩⲛⲁⲍⲓⲥ, "the second σύναξις [a chapter superscription on lines 14–15 of the side with vertical fibers of the leaf labeled 18, and a running head at the top of the side with vertical fibers of the leaf labeled 17], and beside this the number ⲛⲋ̅, which indicates the 33rd treatise, or ⲧⲙⲁ2ⲱⲙⲧⲉ ⲛ̅ⲥⲩⲛⲁ2ⲓⲥ ⲙ̅ⲡⲁ2ⲱⲙ̅ⲧ̅ ⲛⲁⲟⲅⲟⲥ ⲙ̅ⲡⲉⲩⲁⲅⲅⲉⲗⲓⲟⲛ ⲉⲧⲁⲛ̅ⲥ = "The Third σύναξις of the Third λόγος of the Living Gospel" [a chapter superscription on lines 10-11 of the side with the horizontal fibers of the leaf labeled 16]. What is meant by σύναξις, "assembly,"

Und ebenso kurz müssen wir referieren über eine Sammlung von 31 unter Glas gebrachten Blättern, die im Fajum erworben sind and unbedingt zu den Londoner Manistücken gehören. Es sind ebenfalls einzelne Abhandlungen, wie die Reste der Uberschriften zeigen. Wir lesen dort: ⲧⲙⲁ2ⲥ̅ⲛ̅ⲧⲉ ⲛ̅ⲥⲩⲛⲁⲍⲓⲥ "die zweite σύναξις" [a chapter superscription on lines 14–15 of the side with vertical fibers of the leaf labeled 18, and a running head at the top of the side with vertical fibers of the leaf labeled 17], daneben die Zahl ⲛⲋ̅, die die 33. Abhandlung anzeigt, oder ⲧⲙⲁ2ⲱⲙⲧⲉ ⲛ̅ⲥⲩⲁⲛ2ⲓⲥ ⲙ̅ⲡⲁ2ⲱⲙ̅ⲧ̅ ⲛⲁⲟⲅⲟⲥ ⲙ̅ⲡⲉⲩⲁⲅⲅⲉⲗⲓⲟⲛ ⲉⲧⲁⲛ̅ⲥ = "die dritte σύναξις des dritten λόγος des lebendigen Evangeliums" [a chapter superscription on lines 10–11 of the side with the horizontal fibers of the leaf

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:07 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

still remains unclear. A hint is provided by the mention of the "Living Gospel," the well-known original work of Mani. It seems to have to do with some kind of commentary to this text, from the pen of a later Manichaean.

labeled 16]. Was unter σύναξις "Versammlung" zu verstehen ist, bleibt noch unklar. Ein Fingerzeig gibt die Erwähnung des "lebendigen Evangeliums," des bekannten Originalwerkes des Mani. Es scheint sich um eine Art von Kommentar zu diesem aus der Feder eines späteren Manichäers zu handeln.

Schmidt and Polotsky's report about the rest of the Synaxeis codex is included in their report among the codices belonging to Sir Chester Beatty (see Codex B Synaxeis below).

In their original report (see above), Schmidt and Polotsky had stated: "The antiquities dealer in the Fayyum had sold his manuscripts exclusively to Mr. Chester Beatty." The 31 leaves are an exception, for "one had removed the top and bottom layers of papyrus, which had suffered to an especial extent against the covers of the binding . . . , to give the whole a better appearance." In the spring of 1931, after Sir Chester Beatty had acquired the three codices of the Fayyum dealer, Schmidt "found such outwardly unimpressive remains, which doubtlessly belong to the papyrus books acquired by Mr. Chester Beatty in the Fayyum, and . . . acquired them for a cheap price, since the dealer already had his great reward in his pocket. I do not regret my decision, for in the conservation 31 leaves could be brought under glass in more or less fragmentary preservation." Thus, only 31 leaves of this codex belong to the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptische Abteilung of the Staatliche Museen of Berlin.

Volume 15 of the Inventarbuch of the Papyrus-Sammlung, titled on the spine "Staatl. Museen Ägyptische Abteilung P15001–16000" ("State Museums, Egyptian Section, P15001–16000"), records on facing pages both numbered 2294, each of the Manichaean manuscripts, under the numbers P15995–15999. The hand of the initial entry in black ink Wolfgang Müller has identified as that of Wilhelm Schubart, under whom he had studied, and who was his predecessor (several times removed) as director of the Papyrus-Sammlung and the Ägyptische Abteilung.[2]

2. In letters of May 7, 1957, and May 14 and 15, 1957, from Rolf Ibscher to Carsten Colpe, these entries are ascribed, apparently erroneously, to Hugo Ibscher.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:07 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

At P[15995] there is the following entry, apparently made before the identification of the leaves as deriving from the Synaxeis codex:

Coptic Papyrus Codex, 31 leaves, partially damaged. Manuscript of about the fifth century A.D. Content: Manichaean writing about theogony. Acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt, in Cairo, 1931. Gift of Mr. August Pfeffer 1933. The leaves are on the average 22 cm high, 15 cm wide.	Koptischer Papyruskodex, 31 Blätter, z. T. beschädigt. Handschrift etwa des 5. Jh. n. Chr. Inhalt: Manichäische Schrift über Theogonie. Erworben durch Herrn Prof. Carl Schmidt, in Cairo, 1931. Geschenk des Herrn August Pfeffer 1933. Die Blätter sind im Durchschnitt 22 cm hoch 15 cm breit.

To this basic entry have been added in pencil: "Schrank 5" ["cupboard 5"] and "z. Zt. Papyrus-Sammlung Regal" ["at present Papyrus Collection shelves."] A rubber stamp reading "1958 vorhanden" ["1958 present"] records the return of the material from Leningrad, after which 31 counting marks record the presence of all 31 leaves, which is also stated explicitly: "31 Blätter zurück" ["31 leaves back"]. A second line in the same hand records: "Codex in Göttingen! [Rolf] Ib[scher]." A stamp reading "1972 vorhanden" ["1972 present"] confirms that the material was present at the time of the inventory of holdings made that year by Ulrich Luft, then of the Museum staff.

The Vorwort of 1940 to the Kephalaia provides more information, though still cryptic, about the patron who made possible the Museum's acquisition of the Manichaica:

Professor Schmidt sought to gain the rest of the papyri for Germany. That was possible for him only thanks to the financial support of Director August Pfeffer, who acquired the texts and in a very generous way gave them to the State Museums in Berlin.	Den Rest der Papyri suchte Professor Schmidt für Deutschland zu gewinnen. Das wurde ihm nur möglich durch die finanzielle Unterstützung des Herrn Direktor August Pfeffer, der die Texte erwarb and in hochherziger Weise den Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin schenkte.

Alexander Böhlig has explained (during a visit to his Tübingen home on May 8, 1986) that Schmidt cultivated a circle of well-to-do patrons, to which Pfeffer must have belonged. The title director does not refer to a position with, e.g., the museum or the publishing house, but the title apparently reflects a business relationship.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:07 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The possibility that there are in Berlin more leaves of the Synaxeis than the 31 Schmidt acquired was raised by Rolf Ibscher[3] with regard to > a sizable number of leaves separated last, quite provisionally, by my father, with an entry on the paper cover that protected them which really creates puzzles: "from Codex B," i.e., then Chester Beatty [Synaxeis] or ?—and with the addition put in parentheses "Letters," i.e., then again Codex Nr. 15[9]98. What is one to make of that?

These additional leaves that puzzled Rolf Ibscher are currently in the Papyrus-Abteilung of Berlin, now classified unambiguously as belonging to P^{15998}.

Wolfgang Müller's preliminary inventory of 1964–1965 reported: "Synaxeis = sermons, 31 leaves in Berlin, the rest in Göttingen, here 145 leaf units separated, about 100–120 leaves still on the book block."[4]

Beltz catalogued the 31 leaves as follows:

I 603 P^{15995}. 31 leaves of a codex, P^{15995}, averaging 18–20 cm in height and 11–16 cm in width. There are about 26–28 lines per page. It is very poorly preserved. It is hardly legible. The codex belongs to the discoveries of Medinet Madi and was acquired by Schmidt for Berlin in 1928 [read: 1931]. The remainder of the codex is to be found for the time being in West Berlin. Since 1945, 145 new leaf units have been separated and conserved there. The remainder of the book block is not yet conserved. A. Böhlig and C. Colpe have defined the codex as "Synaxeis to the Living Gospel of Mani." On the text see Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten," Berlin 1933, and W.

I 603 P^{15995}; 31 Blätter eines Codex, P^{15995}, durchschnittliche H. 18–20 und durchschnittliche B. 11–16. Pro S. etwa 26–28 Z. Sehr schlecht erhalten. Kaum lesbar. Codex gehört zu den Funden von Medinet Mandi und wurde von Schmidt für Berlin 1928 [read: 1931] erworben. Der Rest des Codex befindet sich z. Z. in Berlin-West. Seit 1945 sind dort 145 neue Blatteinheiten abgelöst und konserviert. Der Rest des Buchblockes noch nicht konserviert. A. Böhlig und C. Colpe haben den Codex bestimmt als "Synaxeis zu dem Lebendigen Evangelium des Mani." Zum Text siehe Schmidt-Polotsky, Ein Manifund in

3. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 62.

4. Synaxeis = Predigten, 31 Bl. in Berlin, Rest in Göttingen, hier 145 Blatteinheiten abgelöst, etwa 100–120 Bl. noch auf dem Buchblock.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:07 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Müller, "Koptologische Studien in der DDR," Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Universität Halle-Wittenberg 1965, Sonderheft, pp. 67–68.

Ägypten, Berlin 1933, und W. Müller, Kopt. Studien in der DDR, WZU Halle-Wittenberg 1965, Sonderheft, S. 67–68.

Photographs of both sides of leaf 20 are on file at the Papyrus-Sammlung in Berlin. One copy of each side was donated to the Manichaean archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, which were turned over to Wolf-Peter Funk.

Gesine Schenke Robinson transcribed the thirty-one leaves in 1985–1986. Wolf-Peter Funk provided a partial draft translation in April 1988.

This codex has not been published.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:07 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 10 —

P 15996 Kephalaia, Volume One

Schmidt and Polotsky's basic report cited above noted that it was part of the Kephalaia that was first shown to Schmidt in 1930 and acquired on his return trip from Jerusalem, and that it was this codex that was then supplemented by two further piles of papyrus acquired from the same dealer in the spring of 1931. Schmidt and Polotsky added specific information about this codex as follows:[1]

[p. 18] In first place among the present papyrus books stands a work whose parts came to Berlin in individual stages and whose conservation was begun immediately by Ibscher, so that already rather large connected portions have been brought under glass. It has to do here with a work that was counted among the original writings of Mani and once bore the name Κεφάλαια in the Greek tradition.

[p. 19]. . . With regard to externals, the work must have embraced an unusually large size, in that Ibscher has already been able to identify the number ϕΙΔ = 514 on one of the leaves. For a fortunate circumstance comes to

[p. 18] Unter den vorliegenden Papyrusbüchern tritt an erste Stelle ein Werk, dessen Teile in einzelnen Etappen nach Berlin gekommen sind und dessen Konservierung sofort von Ibscher in Angriff genommen ist, so dass bereits grössere zusammenhängende Stücke unter Glas gebracht worden sind. Es handelt sich hier um ein Werk, das zu den Originalschriften des Mani gerechnet wurde und einst den Namen Κεφάλαια in der griechischen überlieferung trug.

[p. 19]. . . Was das Äussere anbetrifft, so muss das Werk einen ungemein grossen Umfang gehabt haben, wenn Ibscher bereits die Ziffer ϕΙΔ = 514 auf einem der Blätter feststellen konnte. Denn als günstiger Umstand kommt uns zur Hilfe, dass die einzel-

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 18–24. The quotations are from 18–19.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

our help, in that the individual pages were numbered and thus an arrangement of the separated parts becomes possible. In any case the work must have included in the papyrus codex more than 520 pages = 260 leaves.

nen Seiten numeriert waren und dadurch eine Anordnung der auseinandergefallenen Teile ermöglicht wird. Jedenfalls muss das Werk in dem Papyruscodex mehr als 520 Seiten = 260 Blätter umfasst haben.

Quire 21 would have consisted of pages 481–504, quire 22 of pages 505–28.

Wilhelm Schubart recorded in the Inventarbuch of the Papyrussammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum of Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR in black ink for P[15996] the following entry: "Koptischer Papyruskodex." ["Coptic Papyrus Codex."] The column regarding "Art der Erwerblung" ["Nature of the Acquisition"] reports "dsgl." ["the same"] as P[15995], i.e.: "Acquired through Prof Carl Schmidt, in Cairo, 1931. Gift of Mr. August Pfeffer 1933." An added penciled note reports "NKEFALAION." A rubber stamp "Phot." may mean the material was photographed. The original report contained a photograph of p. 33, and the publication of Volume 1 contained a photograph of p. 31 as the frontispiece. In the Papyrus-Sammlung there are on file glossy prints of p. 295 (with a black background) and of pp. 167–68 (on a white background), presumably resulting from such photography. Glossy prints of pages 259, 261, 262, 265–74, 277, 278, 281–91, 297–99 (on a white background), prepared under the supervision of Peter Nagel for his work on the codex in the 1960s, are also present. Duplicates of pages 167, 168, 282 and 295 were given to the Manichaean Archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, and from there to Wolf-Peter Funk. A purple carbon note reports "ca. 200 Blätter, Rest in Berlin, übr. in Mo[skau]." ["ca. 200 leaves, a remainder in Berlin, the rest in Moskow]." A rubber stamp reading "1958 vorhanden" ["1958 present"] records the return of the material (presumably not from Moscow but) from Leningrad, and a rubber stamp reading "1972 vorhanden" ["1972 present"] records that the material was present at the time of the inventory of holdings made that year by Ulrich Luft, then of the museum staff.

In 1940 Hugo Ibscher reported:[2]

2. Kephalaia (see following note), Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," v–xiv, especially vi–vii.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. vi] Hence the Kephalaia did not come to Berlin in one volume, but in two larger packets and five weaker layers. All of course nicely jumbled! However, after five years of hard work, we have succeeded in saving from the Kephalaia over 400 pages for scientific work and in defining with certainty and almost without a gap the sequence of the leaves.

Purchase Number	Page Range
1	1–18
2	19–310
3	331–56
4	357–76
5	377–94
6	395–414
7	421–end

[p. vii] I could identify the pages that are missing in the list, 311-30, in a quite small find which had come to the Vienna collection along with other papyri. This acquisition was in such a bad condition that the administration of the Vienna collection at first did not even want to send it to me, since the whole appeared to be only a confusion of fibers. I succeeded in gaining from it a few more pages, even though they were quite incomplete, and on one page deciphered the chapter [number] 132, by means of which then it could be established that we had to do here with remains of pp. 311–30. Also at the other places where the leaves had been ripped

[p. vi] Die Kephalaia kamen daher auch nicht in einem Volumen nach Berlin, sondern in zwei stärkeren Packen und fünf schwächeren Lagen. Alles natürlich hübsch durcheinander! Nach fünfjähriger angestrengter Arbeit ist es aber gelungen, allein von den Kephalaia über 400 Seiten für die wissenschaftliche Bearbeitung zu retten und die Reihenfolge der Blätter fast lückenlos sicher zu bestimmen. Die einzelnen Ankäufe ergeben folgende Seiten:

Ankauf	jetzt Seite
I	1–18
II	19–310
III	331–56
IV	357–76
V	377–94
VI	395–414
VII	421–Schluss

[p. vii] Die in der Aufstellung fehlenden Seiten 311-330 konnte ich in einem winzigen Funde feststellen, der mit andern Papyri in die Wiener Sammlung gekommen war. Dieser Ankauf war so schlecht erhalten, dass die Direktion der Wiener Sammlung ihn mir erst gar nicht schicken wollte, weil das Ganze nur ein Gewirr von Fasern zu sein schien. Es gelang mir, daraus noch einige, wenn auch unvollständige Seiten zu gewinnen und auf einer Seite das Kapitel 132 zu entziffern, wodurch dann festgestellt werden konnte, dass es sich hier um Reste der Seiten 311–30 handelt. Auch an den anderen Stellen, wo die Blätter mit Gewalt voneinandergerissen worden sind, sind stets die betref-

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

apart by force, the leaves in question have always been more or less destroyed. Thus between the pp. 414–21 there are only paltry remains of the missing leaves, which can hardly be identified. [Pages 415/16 and 419/20 are missing from the box listing pages 401–20. Only the bottom half of pages 417/18 is extant, and only the top half of pages 413/14 is extant. They complement each other well, and hence could be halves of the same leaf, though vertical fiber continuity is inconclusive.] Also the pages after 421 have suffered very much. By means of the circumstances of the find I was able to identify the last leaf that survives, in spite of the missing pagination, as bearing the page number 501/02. It shows the chapter [number] c = 200.

But whether the Berlin Kephalaia have come down to us complete, or whether at the end further pages will be missing, is difficult to determine. But one may conjecture that a rather large number of leaves is lost. For I was able to identify a further Kephalaia book among the Mani books in the possession of Chester Beatty. Whereas the last discernible chapter number in the Berlin Kephalaia is 200, on a page of the London Kephalaia I could clearly read the chapter [number] 333. Since a number of pages still preceded it, which I have not yet been able to conserve, one can with certainty assume that the London Kephalaia in the present condition began with chapter 300. Thus there are missing between the Berlin and fenden Blätter mehr oder weniger zerstört worden. So befinden sich zwischen den Seiten 414–21 nur noch kümmerliche Reste der fehlenden Blätter, die sich kaum werden bestimmen lassen. [Pages 415/16 and 419/20 are missing from the box listing pages 401–20. Only the bottom half of page 417/18 is extant, and only the top half of page 413/14 is extant. They complement each other well, and hence could be halves of the same leaf, though vertical-fiber continuity is inconclusive.] Auch die auf 421 folgenden Seiten haben noch sehr gelitten. Das letzte erhaltene Blatt liess sich durch die Fundumstände, trotz der fehlenden Paginierung, von mir als Träger der Seitenzahl 501/502 bestimmen. Es zeigt das Kapitel c = 200.

Ob die Berliner Kephalaia aber vollständig auf uns gekommen sind, oder ob am Schluss noch Seiten fehlen werden, wird sich nur schwer feststellen lassen. Zu vermuten ist aber, dass noch eine grössere Anzahl von Blättern verlorengegangen ist, denn ein weiteres Kephalaiabuch konnte ich unter den im Besitz von Chester Beatty befindlichen Manibüchern feststellen. Während nun die letzte, sichtbare Kapitelzahl in den Berliner Kephalaia 200 ist, konnte ich auf einer Seite der Londoner Kephalaia das Kapitel 333 deutlich lesen. Da noch eine Anzahl von Seiten vorausgehen, die ich noch nicht restaurieren konnte, kann man mit Sicherheit annehmen, dass die Londoner Kephalaia im jetzigen Zustand mit Kapitel 300 begonnen haben. Es fehlen also zwischen den Berliner the London Kephalaia roughly 100 chapters, which would call for about 240 pages or 120 leaves. But there is hardly room for a further volume between the two that are in hand, so that we must initially assume that the missing 120 leaves were lost either from the end of the Berlin or rather from the beginning of the London Kephalaia. After all, it is not impossible that each volume of the Kephalaia contained 750 pages. Given the very thin papyrus material, the book block would have measured hardly more than 3–4 cm. A tiny fragment still attached to the upper margin of the last leaf along with other uninscribed fragments, and showing vestiges of the pagination ϕΙΔ = 514, also proves to us that pages were lost in the case of the Berlin Kephalaia at the end of the extant part.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

und den Londoner Kephalaia rund 100 Kapitel, die etwa 240 Seiten oder 120 Blätter ergeben würden. Für einen weiteren Band zwischen den beiden vorhandenen ist aber kaum Platz, so dass wir vorerst annehmen müssen, dass die fehlenden 120 Blätter entweder vom Schluss der Berliner, oder vom Anfang der Londoner Kephalaia verlorengegangen sind. Immerhin ist es nicht unmöglich, dass jeder Band der Kephalaia etwa 750 Seiten umfasst hat; bei dem sehr dünnen Papyrusmaterial würde der Buchblock kaum mehr als 3-4 cm gemessen haben. Dass bei den Berliner Kephalaia am Ende des erhaltenen Teils Seiten verlorengegangen sind, beweist uns auch ein winziges Fragment, das noch auf dem oberen Rand des letzten Blattes mit anderen unbeschriebenen Fragmenten festsass and Reste der Pagina ϕΙΔ = 514 zeigte.

It is difficult to correlate the seven acquisitions Ibscher here reports with Schmidt's report to the effect that he acquired the bulk as his first purchase in 1930 and two smaller parts in the spring of 1931.

The remains of pp. 311–30 belonging to Vienna must have been sent to Berlin, conserved there by Hugo Ibscher, and then returned to Vienna. Schmidt and Polotsky had reported concerning the Vienna material that "Ibscher recently saved fragments of two leaves from this junk heap," which reference corresponds roughly to Ibscher's allusion to "a few more pages." The material currently in the Österrreichische Nationalbibliothek bears the inventory number K 11010. It consists of four glass containers, containing three leaves and a number of fragments. The leaves are identified as pp. 311–16. The leaves 313/314 and 315/316 are most nearly complete, and relate to each other in terms of fiber directions as like (in this case vertical fibers) facing like. The small remnant of a leaf assigned the numeration 311/312 has been rotated 90 degrees rather than having been glassed right side up, to judge by the alignment of its profile. The surface labeled page 312 shares roughly the profile of pp. 313 and 315, suggesting that p. 312 should be given an odd number. But it could not be p. 311, since then (in terms of fiber directions) like would not face like. For p. 313 and the page labeled p. 312, that should be an odd-numbered page, both have horizontal fibers but would not face each other. In fact, the profile of the page labeled 312 is at places closer to that of p. 315 than to that of 313. Hence, one may postulate that what is labeled as page 312, which has horizontal fibers, is actually p. 317, 321, 325, or 329, all of which one would expect to have horizontal fibers. What is labeled p. 311 would then be p. 318, 322, 326, or 330. The chapter number Ibscher detected, 132, would then fall on page 318, 322, 326, or 330. Since chapter 140 begins on p. 343, one may estimate that a chapter averages two-and-a-half pages, in which case chapter 132 would fall at about p. 323, or, among the actual options, at p. 322. Hence one may quite tentatively postulate that the leaf labeled "311/312" is pp. 321–322. One of the five fragments glassed with "311/312" is identified as "oben links v. 312" ["above left from 312,"] and it would indeed increase the similarity of profile with page 315 if so placed on page 321. The other five fragments in this glass and the some eight fragments in a fourth glass are not identified. It is perhaps more probable that the material between pages 311 and 330 that survived belonged closely together, as a single pad, rather than widely scattered through this spectrum of ten leaves. Hence, the unidentified fragments may be largely from pages 317/318 and 319/320, since the extant leaves are pp. 313/314, 315/316 and probably 321/322.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The Kephalaia began to appear in fascicles in 1935; in 1940 the first ten fascicles were published as Volume 1, containing pp. 1–244.[3]

3. Polotsky and Böhlig, Kephalaia. Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin, Band 1, herausgegeben im Auftrage der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften unter Leitung von Prof. Carl Schmidt, 1. Hälfte (Lieferung 1–10); Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 183, n. 1 states: "Die Namen der wirklichen Editoren fehlen auf dem Titelblatt aus folgendem Grund: Der Name von H. J. Polotsky sollte in der NS-Zeit im Anschluss an die Rassengesetzgebung nicht auf dem Titelblatt erscheinen; die Nennung meines Namens allein habe ich aber abgelehnt." ["The names of the real editors are missing from the title page for the following reason: The name of H. J. Polotsky was not supposed to appear on the title page in the Nazi time because of the racial legislation. But I turned down the naming of my name alone."] Böhlig reports,

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Hugo Ibscher had referred to "over 400 pages" having been conserved. It is unlikely that more was conserved during the war. For Rolf Ibscher reported in 1964–1965 that "already in 1937" his father had stopped working "regularly" on the materials,[4] and in 1955 that "during the war this minutely detailed work . . . came to a complete halt."[5] The Inventarbuch was at Rolf Ibscher's disposal while the material itself was in the east following the war.[6] It was during this time that the entry was added, perhaps by him, to the effect that there were "ca. 200 leaves." This hardly reflects a new inventory, since the material was inaccessible, but is no doubt merely an imprecise allusion to the 1940 report of "over 400 pages." Thus the exact number of leaves conserved by Hugo Ibscher is not known.

After the war Rolf Ibscher resumed the conservation work his father had not completed. He spoke in 1955 of "the attempt to separate and impregnate a residue of very fragmented leaves of the Kephalaia, which my father had designated as 'insoluable.' These leaves should be definitively glassed by this winter, at the beginning of 1956."[7] This material had been taken to the Ibscher home before or during the time of the war and thus had not been taken to Leningrad. Its presence in the home is explainable in terms of the fact that from the age of sixty, i.e., from 1934 on, Hugo Ibscher was permitted to work three days a week at home.[8] In the archive of the Chester Beatty Library there is a black loose-leaf folder entitled: "Papyrus. Biblical Manichaean Hieratic Greek etc. General Catalogue." In the section entitled "Manichaean Pap." there is a note dated May 1940 that reads: "Mr. Allberry said that Dr. Ibscher had the remainder of Mr. Beatty's papyrus at his house in the country, at Klein Machnow (see letter from Allberry)." At the death of Hugo Ibscher it was put in the concrete bunker at the Zoo.

183, that Polotsky edited Coptic pages 1–102, and that Böhlig himself edited Coptic pages 103–244. Allberry, Manichaean Psalm-Book, Part 2, "Preface," reported that fascicles 1-8 had appeared in 1935–37.

4. Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 50.

5. Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 2.

6. This is apparent from allusions to it by Rolf Ibscher in letters to Carsten Colpe of August 7, 1957, and August 14–15, 1957, and has been confirmed by Wolfgang Müller.

7. Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 5.

8. Böhlig reports this in a letter of February 10, 1986.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Böhlig's presentation of 1960/68 reported as follows concerning this material left in Berlin:[9]

> Of the material in Berlin only a very small part has always remained in Berlin. It was the last 20 leaves of the Berlin Kephalaia book. They were conserved by Rolf Ibscher in the years 1952 and '53.

Böhlig has explained this ambiguous formulation as follows:[10]

It [Böhlig's statement "last 20 leaves"] merely means that Rolf Ibscher in these years conserved the last = the only leaves that were still in Berlin, which belonged to the Kephalaia and were still there, i.e., had not been put in security (they survived the war in the Ibscher house). It was indeed 20 pieces. I did not express any opinion as to what page numbers of the book were to be assigned to these leaves, and indeed I could not, since that would have been pure speculation (when the page numbers, as in this case, were no longer preserved on the leaves). For of course I did not know which and how many leaves of the Kephalaia had come to the USSR.

Sie [Böhlig's statement "last 20 leaves"] besagt nämlich einfach, dass Rolf Ibscher in diesen Jahren die letzten = die einzigen noch in Berlin befindlichen Blätter, die zu den Kephalaia gehörten und noch vorhanden, d.h. nicht sichergestellt waren (sie überstanden den Krieg im Hause Ibscher), konserviert hat; das waren eben 20 Stück. Mit welcher Seitenzahl des Buchs diese Blätter zu belegen waren, darüber habe ich mich überhaupt nicht geäussert, konnte es auch gar nicht, da es reine Spekulation gewesen wäre (wenn die Seitenzahl, wie hier, auf den Blättern nicht mehr erhalten war); denn ich wusste ja nicht, welche und wieviele Blätter der Kephalaia in die UdSSR gekommen waren.

The reference to 20 leaves conserved by Rolf Ibscher apparently goes back to his presentation of 1954 (see above), where he referred to conserving a "remainder of some 20 leaves" that had not gone to Leningrad. He there said he conserved them in 1951 after his first trip to London. But his return from London was delayed during the Christmas holidays by a layover at Schondorf on Ammer Lake to visit his wife's family. Hence the actual date of this conservation was no doubt the beginning of 1952, which thus overlaps Böhlig's dating of

9. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 182.

10. Böhlig in a letter of February 5, 1986.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the conservation as 1952–1953. In 1964/1965 Rolf Ibscher dated this conservation "between 1951 and 1955." But in the published summary of his speech, Rolf Ibscher refers to having conserved a "remainder of the Kephalaia, ca. 25 leaves or ca. 50 pages of the text." Thus the exact number seems to have been uncertain, which is of relevance in seeking to interpret the fact that Beltz's catalogue listed the number of plates still in Berlin as 30 (see below). One of these leaves was "atomized" by Rolf Ibscher's sneeze. Since he listed 20 as extant or 25 as conserved by himself, one may assume that this now-missing leaf is not included in his figures.

Böhlig also reported on plans for the continuation of the publication:[11]

The double fascicle of the second volume, prepared by me already during the war and embracing pp. 245–92, has not yet been printed by the publisher Kohlhammer, as a result of the lack of specialized typesetters, and after the war as a result of the unclarity that prevailed as to the continuation of the project. Hence I presented the German translation, for the sake of interested persons, in ["Die Arbeit an den koptischen Manichaica,"] Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg [5 (1956) 1067–84]. This double fascicle should now be printed as the first of the second volume of the Kephalaia, and the following ones will be continually added. [Footnote 3, added when the essay was reprinted in 1968: This double fascicle has been worked over still another time by me and in the meantime has appeared in print (1966). The Institut für Byzantinistik of the University of Halle will care for the further

Die noch im Kriege von mir fertiggestellte, die Seiten 245–92 umfassende erste Doppellieferung des 2. Bandes wurde vom Verlag Kohlhammer infolge des Mangels an Spezialsetzern und nach dem Kriege infolge der Unklarheit, die über die Fortführung des Unternehmens herrschte, noch nicht gedruckt. Die deutsche Übersetzung legte ich deshalb um der Interessenten willen 1956 in der Wissenschaftlichen Zeitschrift der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg vor ["Die Arbeit an den koptischen Manichaica," 5 (1956) 1067–84]. Diese Doppellieferung soll nun als erste des 2. Bandes der Kephalaia gedruckt werden, die weiteren werden sich laufend anschliessen. [Footnote 3, added when the essay was reprinted in 1968: Diese Doppellieferung ist von mir noch einmal überarbeitet worden und inzwischen im Druck erschienen (1966); die weitere Edition wird das Institut für

11. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 182.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

editing through a co-worker [Peter Nagel]. Also an index should be added to the second volume of the Kephalaia. The collections prepared along with the editing were lost in the war and must be prepared anew. [Footnote 4: At my request Dr. Dr. P. Nagel of the Institut für Byzantinistik of the University of Halle has produced anew the index for the first volume. It is not yet clear whether it is to appear separately or only together with the index of the second volume at the conclusion of the total edition.]

Byzantinistik der Universität Halle durch einen Mitarbeiter [Peter Nagel] besorgen lassen.] Dem 2. Bande der Kephalaia sollte auch ein Index angefügt werden. Die mit der Edition angefertigten Sammlungen hierfür sind im Kriege verlorengegangen und müssen neu erstellt werden. [Footnote 4: Auf meine Anregung hin hat Herr Dr. Dr. P. Nagel vom Institut für Byzantinistik der Universität Halle den Index für den 1. Band neu erstellt. Es ist noch nicht geklärt, ob er gesondert oder erst zusammen mit dem des 2. Bandes am Ende der Gesamtausgabe erscheinen soll.]

The first two fascicles of a second volume of the Berlin Kephalaia, fascicles 11–12, were published in German translation only in 1956 (pages 245–92), and then in 1966 with Coptic text and revised German translation, but omitting page 292, which was added in 1985.[12]

The Vorwort to the 1966 edition explains the circumstances of the delay:

After it was possible to complete the first half of the Kephalaia in the year 1940, the second half, including the indices for both halves, was to follow without interruption in further double fascicles. Unfortunately however the editing work had to be interrupted as a consequence of the war and its effects. The double fascicle 11–12 that is here presented was basically

Nachdem die 1. Hälfte der "Kephalaia" im Jahre 1940 abgeschlossen werden konnte, sollte die 2. Hälfte einschliesslich der Indices für beide Teile in weiteren Doppellieferungen laufend folgen. Leider musste die Editionsarbeit aber dann infolge des Krieges und seiner Auswirkungen unterbrochen werden. Die jetzt vorliegende Doppellieferung 11/12 war im

12. Böhlig, "Aus den Manichaischen," 1067–84; Kephalaia, 244–91; Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 183, reported inexactly that the double fascicle contained Coptic pages 245–92. In fact, the last page could not be included for technical reasons within the limits of the double fascicle. Hence Coptic pp. 290, 29–292, and 32 were published with an extensive interpretation by Böhlig, "Ja und Amen," 59–70.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

completed in the year 1943, transcriptions of further pages were complete and the indices were supplemented as we went along. Yet the publisher W. Kohlhammer found himself unable, due to the lack of specialized typesetters, to undertake the printing of the double fascicle still during the war. The transcriptions of further pages and the indices became a victim of the air attacks. Finally it was especially the displacement of the papyri, which returned to Berlin only in 1958 and were accessible again in 1960, that made a continuous publication of the edition impossible . . .

Dr. Nagel will also continue the edition in the future.

wesentlichen im Jahre 1943 fertiggestellt, Abschriften weiterer Seiten waren angefertigt und die Indices laufend ergänzt warden. Doch der Verlag W. Kohlhammer sah sich aus Mangel an Spezialsetzern ausserstande, den Druck der Doppellieferung noch während des Krieges vorzunehmen. Die Abschriften weiterer Seiten und die Indices wurden ein Opfer der Fliegerangriffe. Schliesslich machte vor allem die Verlagerung der Papyri, die erst 1958 nach Berlin zurückkehrten und 1960 wieder zugänglich waren, ein kontinuierliches Weitererscheinen der Edition unmöglich . . .

Herr Dr. Nagel wird auch die Edition in Zukunft fortsetzen.

Wolfgang Müller had already reported in 1964 "dass die Kephalaia P. 15[9]96 vollständig erhalten sind und jetzt nach erfolgter Umkonservierung von P. Nagel/Halle weiter ediert werden" ["that the Kephalaia P. 15[9]96 are completely extant and now, after their successful reconservation, are being further edited by P. Nagel of Halle."] Similarly Rolf Ibscher reported in 1965/66 that the Kephalaia "jetzt erneut nach dem Tode Schmidts und Weggang Böhligs in Halle durch Dr. Dr. Nagel kollationiert und weiter ediert wurden und werden" ["now will be collated and further edited anew after the death of Schmidt and the departure of Böhlig in Halle by Dr. Dr. Nagel."][13]

In August 1985 Nagel confirmed that he had formally submitted his withdrawal, so as not to block the Material from being reassigned. Thus the editing of the material has reverted to the supervision of its repository, the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin, rather than being still under the care of the Institute that Nagel himself has directed.

Beltz's catalogue reported as follows on this codex:

13. Ibscher, "Mani und kein Ende," 219.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

I 605 P15996. Codex from the Mani find, P15996 contains the Manichaean Kephalaia. The whole codex is glassed. In Berlin are pp. 1–446, 455–56. Pp. 447–54 are at present in Warsaw. Furthermore there are 30 more plates with fragments of various sizes of the same codex in Berlin. On the nature of the codex see the introduction to the edition: Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin, Vol. I, Kephalaia. First half prepared by H. J. Polotsky and A. Böhlig (pp. 1–243); second half prepared by A. Böhlig (pp. 244–91). Stuttgart, 1940; 1966.

I 605 P15996; Codex aus dem Manifund, enthält P15996 die manichäischen Kephalaia. Der ganze, Codex ist verglast. In Berlin befinden sich die S. 1–446, 455–56. Die Seiten 447–454 befinden sich z. Z. in Warschau. Ferner sind noch 30 Platten mit Fragmenten unterschiedlicher Grösse vom selben Codex in Berlin. Zur Beschaffenheit des Codex siehe die Einleitung zu der Edition: Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin, Bd. I, Kephalaia. 1. Hälfte bearbeitet von H. J. Polotsky u. A. Böhlig (S. 1–243); 2. Hälfte bearbeitet von A. Böhlig (S. 244–291). Stuttgart 1940; 1966.

Günter Poethke, Custos of the Greek manuscripts in the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum, visited Warsaw in September and October of 1971 and saw there four leaves of the Mani material. On February 23, 1972, he submitted a report preserved in the archives of the Ägyptisches Museum to the effect that in the Kathedra Papirologii of the University of Warsaw four Manichaean leaves were present, for which he listed the numbers 451/2, 453/4, 447/8, 499/500. Beltz saw the leaves on June 2, 1976, and identified them for the first time as belonging to P15996. Subsequently, two additional leaves of the Manichaica have been located at the university.[14]

Wincenty Myszor reported as follows on the materials at the Warsaw University, on July 12, 1986:

There are here 6 glassed leaves. Of these, 5 plates are 36 cm high and 23.5 broad, and 1 plate is 24.5 cm high and 18.5 cm broad. This last plate also has a different glassing. It is smaller and is supplied with dark red adhesive ribbon. The 5 plates have the pp. 447/448;

Hier befinden sich 6 verglaste Blätter. Davon sind 5 Platten 36 cm hoch und 23,5 cm breit und 1 Platte ist 24,5 cm hoch und 18,5 cm breit. Diese letzte Platte hat auch eine andere Verglasung. Sie ist kleiner und mit dunkelrotem Klebeband versehen. Die 5 Platten

14. According to a letter dated December 23, 1985, from Wlodzimierz Godlewski.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

449/450; 451/452; 453/454 and 499/500.The plates 447/448 and 449/450 have P15996; the plate 499/500 has P14997. Also the smaller sixth plate has P15997. The other two plates are without P. On June 2, 1976, W. Beltz opened the glass of the leaf 453/454, as is indicated by a piece of paper pasted at the cracked place (with a signature). The 5 leaves seem to belong to the same codex. The state of preservation of the leaves is very bad. The worst is however the sixth leaf with the other glassing. This leaf with P15997 (the last digit is not quite clear; it can also be 96!) belongs very certainly to different codex from the plate 499/500 with a quite clear P15997, and hence different from the other 5 leaves.

haben die Seiten 447/448; 449/450; 451/452; 453/454 und 499/500. Die Platten 447/448 und 449/450 haben P15996; die Platte 499/500 hat P15997. Auch die kleinere sechste Platte hat P15997. Die anderen beiden Platten sind ohne P. Die Verglasung des Blattes 453/454 hat W. Beltz am 2. Juni 1976 geöffnet, wie ein aufgeklebtes Papier (mit Unterschrift) an der angebrochenen Stelle zeigt. Die 5 Blätter scheinen zu demselben Kodex zu gehören. Der Erhaltungsgrad der Blätter ist sehr schlecht: Am schlechtesten aber ist das sechste Blatt mit der anderen Verglasung. Dieses Blatt mit P15997 (die letzte Ziffer ist nicht ganz deutlich; kann es auch 96 sein!) gehört ganz bestimmt zu einem anderen Kodex als die Platte 499/500 mit ganz deutlichem P15997, also als die anderen 5 Blätter.

This would indicate that Poethke's report of the labeling 499/500 being in Warsaw and Beltz's report of 449/450 being in Berlin are not conflicting reports about the labeling of the same plate, as has been previously assumed, but are both accurate reports about different plates. The fact that the plate labeled 499/500 is listed as P15997 rather than as P15996 must be regarded as an error in labeling. For Myszor's conclusion that it is from the same codex as the 4 leaves with pages 447–54, the identity in the size of the glass frame with that of the 4 leaves, and the pagination reaching such a high figure as 500, all point toward the Kephalaia, and not toward the Acts. For in the case of the Acts, no page numbers have been assigned to its few conserved leaves, and the plates are much smaller.

On September 11, 1986, Wolf-Peter Funk examined the five plates, and on November 15, 1986, he wrote a report that brings further clarity to the situation. "Apart from the mystery of the one glass frame of smaller size, there can be no doubt about the assignment of the leaves to codices: the five glasses clearly belong to P[15996] because they actually contain portions of Kephalaia text." Concerning the individual leaves, he reports:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> 447/448: "Leaf in extremely bad condition, on both sides only small parts of papyrus surface extant . . ." P. 447(with vertical fibres): A label, apparently old, reads 447. Though nothing was transcribed, regular lines, but no chapter heading, could be detected throughout. P. 448, (with horizontal fibres): "'Readability' only slightly better than P. 447." Each of the letters of the pagination of P. 447 is uncertain. Only up to four letters on a line were transcribed from lines 1–4. "No chapter heading visible (but not entirely excluded)."
>
> 449/450: "Leaf in extremely bad condition, on both sides only small parts of papyrus surface extant." P. 449 (with horizontal fibres): Nothing was transcribed. No chapter heading is visible. P. 450 (with vertical fibres): A recent label reads "449/450 P[15996]." In the top left-hand corner of the page is the pagination 450, though the first letter is uncertain. There are 29 or 30 lines, the last seven of which are part of a new chapter, vestiges of whose heading follow upon line 19. The chapter number is legible only as ..5. Only a few letters were transcribed.
>
> 451/452: P. 451 (with vertical fibers): The page number 451 is legible in the upper right-hand corner, as is much of the running title. Twenty-one lines are visible, but no chapter heading. P. 452 (with horizontal fibers): A label reads 451/452. The page number 452 and the complete running title are legible. After line 26 there is the chapter number 1.6; the title follows on the next three lines, followed by the first two lines of the chapter, all only partly legible.
>
> 453/454: There is a label, apparently old, reading "453/454." A "large paper strip across broken glasses on both sides" reads: "Schutzverklebung 2. Juni 1976 / Beltz," ". . . durch WALTER BELTZ Berlin." ["Protective pasting June 2, 1976, Beltz," ". . . by Walter Beltz Berlin."] "Both pages make difficult reading except upper part of recto. Apparently no chapter headings." P. 453 (with horizontal fibers): The running title and the central segment of lines 1–4 were transcribed. P. 454 (with vertical fibers): The uncertain letters of pagination 45. as well as the running title and a couple of words from each of the first two lines were transcribed.
>
> 499/500: The leaf is thus labeled. P. 499 (with vertical fibers): A few words of lines 2–3 were transcribed. Then after line 3 there is what looks like a chapter number reading 2 . . . , where what is taken to be perhaps the second digit looks like a small raised lambda). Two lines

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms > of title follow, of which only a word on each was transcribed. P. 500 (with horizontal fibers): Very occasional letters or words were transcribed. After what may be line 12, 13, or 14, there is a straight clear line drawn horizontally under the line of text, after which there follow lines with only scattered letters legible.

From this wealth of previously unavailable scattered detail there emerges a problem, which Funk analyzes as follows:

> To me, another problem of a different nature arose when I compared what I think I read in Warsaw on the fifth leaf, with Ibscher's statement about the last surviving leaf of Kephalaia (Volume One) containing pp. 501/02 and showing the chapter number c = 200. If I am not mistaken, the leaf identified as pp. 499/500 contains a chapter heading whose top number is extant (but not the right- or left-hand side numbers): the first figure in this number is clearly S, but apparently followed by other figures (illegible to me), which means that the number must be higher than 200. If this is correct, the partly destroyed chapter numbers on pp. 450 and 452 could be restored as [19]5 and 1[9]6, respectively (which would be in accordance with the average length of chapters in the first 12 quires of the codex). Otherwise they would have to be 185 and 186, assuming that the length of chapters considerably increases after p. 292. This latter question can probably be decided after examining the preceding pages at Berlin.
>
> P. 389 bears the chapter number 156, p. 395 the chapter number 158, p. 397 the chapter number 159, and p. 429 the chapter number 172. Hence it would seem more likely that p. 450 would bear the chapter number [18]5 and p. 452 the chapter number 1[8]6.

These considerations have led Funk to put a question mark beside the numeration 499/500, with which the leaf is labeled. For if Ibscher were correct in detecting on the leaf 501/502 the chapter numeration 200, a chapter numeration beyond 200 could not occur on the leaf 499/500 but of necessity would be a leaf paginated in the 500s.

One may also wonder if the discrepancy may not be due to some error in Ibscher's way of ascertaining that the pagination of the last leaf that survives is 501/502. For he concedes that no pagination is extant; his reasoning is based on unspecified "circumstances of the find." It is not clear how such matters would establish the precise pagination. In any case, the leaf to which Ibscher referred, if other than the Warsaw leaf labeled 499/500 with a chapter number 2[00], has not been located.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

An inventory was carried out in 1985–1986 of the Manichaean material stored in the Magazin of the Papyrussammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum in the basement of the Pergamonmuseum on the Museumsinsel. There one finds 21 cardboard boxes, each containing slots for ten glassed leaves, labeled "Kephalaia Seite 1–20" ["Kephalaia page 1–20"], etc., through pp. 421–40, which must represent the last complete set of ten leaves that Hugo Ibscher conserved.

A card in the box labeled "Seite 21–40" ["page 21–40"] reports: "Blatt 35/36 fehlt" ["leaf 35/36 is missing"]. Pages 35–36 are in fact missing, though the leaf was published in Kephalaia, volume one. A card in the box labeled "Seite 61–80" ["page 61–80"] reads: "61/62 fehlt" ["61/62 is missing"]. Pages 61–62 are in fact missing, though the leaf was published in Kephalaia, volume one.

The leaf 217/18 was on display in 1986 in the papyrus gallery of the Egyptian section of the Bode Museum (upstairs, on the left) in Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR. The leaves 291/92, 293/94, 295/96, 297/98, and 299/300 were in 1986 in the Lesesaal of the Egyptian Museum in the basement of the Pergamon Museum, but may well have been returned to the Magazin.

One box is labeled "Seite 301–340," ["page 301–40"] with the comment "311–330 in Wien" ["311–30 in Vienna"]. Pages 311–30 are in fact missing from the box, but one may conclude from the Vienna photographs (see above) that of the twenty pages 311–30 much of 6 pages (pp. 313–16 and perhaps 321–22 plus fragments) survives.

A card in the box labeled "Seite 381–400" ["page 381–400"] reports: "383/84 385/86 fehlen" ["383/84 385/86 are missing."] Pages 383–86 are in fact missing.

A card in the box labeled "Seite 401/420" ["page 401–20"] reads: "415/16 fehlt; 419/20 fehlt" ["415/16 is missing; 419/20 is missing"]. Pages 415/16 and 419/20 are in fact missing. In the list of acquisitions published in 1940 by Hugo Ibscher (see above), the pp. 415–20 are not listed, but he reported: "Thus between the pages 414 and 421 there are only paltry remains of the missing leaves, which can hardly be identified." Thus the only extant leaf (actually only part of the bottom half of a leaf), assigned the numeration 417/18, may in fact be all that is left of pp. 415–20 (if one is not to conjecture that it might be the missing bottom half of pp. 413/14).

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

In his report of 1965, Rolf Ibscher had stated (see above): "Likewise six leaves of the Kephalaia are missing, as has now become apparent from the reglasing . . . I explain the six missing Kephalaia leaves as still slumbering somewhere in a drawer, having missed the return trip."

These 6 missing leaves can no doubt be identified as pp. 35/36, 61/62, 383/84, 385/86, 415/16, and 419/20, since similar cards in the hand of Rolf Ibscher's assistant Otto W. Luke identify precisely these six leaves as missing. But since the 1940 listing of acquisitions omitted pp. 415–20, and since Hugo Ibscher had spoken of only "paltry remains" between p. 414 and p. 421, there is little reason to assume leaves 415/16 and 419/20 ever were conserved. Thus one may infer that only four leaves (two of which were unpublished and hence presumably permanently inaccessible to scholarship) were lost in the process of being taken into safekeeping to Leningrad and returned to Berlin. For it is known that some material was in fact lost in transit: pp. 447–54, 499–500, have subsequently been identified in Warsaw.

Thus the boxes labeled pages 1–440 actually contain (including those leaves present elsewhere at the Museum) only pages 1–34, 37–60, 63–310, 331–82, 387–414, 417–18, and 421–40, a total of 418 pages = 209 leaves. To this may be added six pages = three leaves in Vienna, a total of 414 pages = 207 leaves, and ten pages = five leaves in Warsaw. This fits rather well Hugo Ibscher's 1940 reference to "over 400 pages." (At that time two of the leaves now missing, pp. 35/36 and 61/62, must also have been extant, since they were published.) Beltz's listing of all pp. 1–440, as in Berlin, must hence be taken merely as a global statement, overlooking the various missing materials among these pages.

Some leaves of the Kephalaia are glassed but not in a box. Like the leaves of the other Manichaean codices, which also are not in boxes, they lie on the wooden shelves in the Magazin, on which the boxes also lie. The glasses in the boxes are 23 cm wide by 36 cm high. The glasses not in boxes vary in size, 23 to 25 cm wide by 35 to 35.5 cm high. The tape sealing the glasses of all the Manichaica varies from light to dark brown; brown is the color used to distinguish Coptic papyri from other papyri. In the case of the glasses not in boxes, the tape is so sticky that the glasses adhere to each other. Hence they are to be stacked in a staggered pattern that keeps tape from bonding to tape.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Although there are no leaves labeled as pp. 441–46, which Beltz reported as present, there is extant the last glass he reported, labeled 455/456. Since he did not itemize any material as missing prior to page 440, one may assume he did not itemize any material as missing in pp. 1–456 (except for the leaves he had identified in Warsaw, pp. 447–54). Thus, one need hardly postulate that pp. 441–46 were identified in Berlin at the time of Beltz's inventory and only subsequently became lost. Their presence may simply have been inferred on the basis of the presence of the leaf labeled pp. 455/456.

There are also 30 other glass containers, numbered 1–30, i.e., by leaf or glass container rather than by page, each with a label (on one side only) reading "Kephalaia Nr. 1" ["Kephalaia Number 1,"] etc. These glasses numbered 1–30 are no doubt the same thirty glasses that Beltz characterized as containing "fragments of various sizes," e.g., number 23 is more a scattering of unplaced fragments than a leaf. The lack of labeled pagination may in part be due to their not having been definitively conserved and labeled by Hugo Ibscher, with the result that Rolf Ibscher left them unidentified. The increasingly fragmentary nature of the latter part of the codex may account for the unidentified status of the leaves.

Since there is no reason to assume that material prior to p. 440 would be among these 30 leaves, they would be expected to fall in the area of pp. 441–46 and 457–502 (except for pp. 499–500, if that is in fact its pagination, in Warsaw), a total of 25 leaves. Thus one may suspect that some of the thirty leaves belong after p. 502 or before p. 440, or may not in fact belong to P[15996].

In the case of "Kephalaia P[15996] Nr. 29" ["Kephalaia P[15996] Number 29"], the number is on an unusually large round label, which also bears the marked-out number 361 (and, marked out on the back, 362), and (also marked out) "zu 15998" ["to 15998"], thus identifying the leaf as once having been ascribed to the Letters. Rolf Ibscher had reported (see above) in connection with the leaves provisionally preserved by his father and confusingly labeled, "from Codex B," and "Letters": "But there is also among these leaves one with the number 361. To what does that belong?" Obviously, it has subsequently been reassigned to P[15996], but with what justification remains unclear. Pages 361–62 are extant at their proper place in the box where they belong, so this marked-out numeration can hardly be responsible for ascribing the leaf to P15996. Yet since such high numbers occur only in the case of the Kephalaia, one might have been tempted to assign such a leaf to that codex if one did not look to see if it were absent from the proper box.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The glass container labeled "Kephalaia 15996 Nr. 30" ["Kephalaia 15996, Number 30"] actually contains two leaves that were apparently never separated from each other. The surface of the typed label is scraped off, except for "P.," with "15996" and "Nr. 30" added in ink.

The reidentification of these two containers as belonging to P15996 was apparently carried out by Walter Beltz when he was preparing his inventory, published in 1978, since Günter Poethke has identified the handwriting as that of Beltz. Hence, they may be three of the leaves previously ascribed to P15998 (the Letters) that currently are missing (see below).

Two glasses are labeled "Kephalaia o. Nr." ["Kephalaia without number."] But these were stacked, when the inventory was begun in 1985, along with 13 other leaves that were labeled P15998, in a group accompanied by a piece of paper with a note in Günter Poethke's hand. The note read: "Wahrscheinlich zu P15998 gehörig (s. Vortrag von Böhlig in Moskau: 'Schweren Herzens'). 15 Platten. 26.7.72" ["Apparently belonging to P15998 (see the lecture by Böhlig in Moscow [that begins] 'With heavy heart . . .'). 15 glasses. July 26, 1972."] Since the labels were not changed to fit the note, one may wonder if these two plates were originally counted among the 15. Perhaps the two containers whose labels apparently Walter Beltz changed to read "P15996 29 and 30" were among the fifteen classified in 1972 as belonging to P15998. Since Beltz does not refer to those fifteen plates in his catalogue, he may well not have been aware of their existence. These two plates from among the 15 may have lain apart by themselves at the time, been seen by Beltz, and been included by him in the large stack that was already ascribed to P15996. In that case, when their labels were changed to P15996, the number of plates ascribed to P15998 would have been reduced from 15 to 13, without the note referring to fifteen plates having been corrected. At some juncture the two plates labeled "Kephalaia without number" would have been stacked with the thirteen to produce the total of fifteen, to fit the note stating there were fifteen leaves. It would seem probable that by some such procedure the thirty plates mentioned in Beltz's catalogue as belonging after page 456 have now become thirty-two, bearing the designation Kephalaia, though his catalogue refers only to thirty. The relabeling of two plates and the removal of two others from the stack of thirty (P^{15996}) to the stack of fifteen (P^{15998}) functioned, in effect, as a trade. Yet any such solution of the confusion must remain very speculative.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

One may hence tentatively assume that there are twenty-nine extant leaves of the Kephalaia without assigned pagination (plates 1–22 and 24–28, not counting plate 23 that contains only fragments, plus two leaves "without number"). One may seek to correlate these twenty-nine leaves with the twenty or circa 25 reported to have been conserved by Rolf Ibscher after the war. Since approximately seven or twelve leaves more are extant than his figures would lead one to expect, the question arises whether some of these extra leaves correspond to those that have been identified as missing. They would not be the six leaves Rolf Ibscher mentioned as already missing when he reconserved the codex, and which have been identified from what is currently missing as pp. 35/36, 61/62, 383/84, 385/86, 415/16, 419/20. Nor would they be the missing pp. 311–20, the remains of which are in Vienna. Nor would they be those in Warsaw—pp. 447–54, 499–500. Since the leaf 501/02 was mentioned as the last extant leaf of the codex at an earlier time, the twenty-five leaves composing pp. 441–46, 457–98, 501–2 would be the only leaves unaccounted for. This minimal number should be reduced to twenty-four, to take account of the leaf atomized by a sneeze. This figure is nearer to Rolf Ibscher's figure of c. twenty-five than to his figure twenty. But it tends to suggest that not all the material that Beltz listed as extant in Berlin and not all the material currently labeled as P^{15996} does in fact belong to P^{15996}, unless one is to assume that there were an indeterminate number beyond p. 502.

Ibscher presents the Kephalaia as consisting codicologically of quires of six sheets (twelve leaves, twenty-four pages). The table below lays out the page ranges and center pages of the Kephalaia's various quires; the chart assumes only complete sheets (i.e., no half sheets plus stubs).

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Kephalaia Quires

Quire Number	Page Range	Center Pages
1	1–24	12–13
2	25–48	36–37
3	49–72	60–61
4	73–96	84–85
5	97–120	108–9
6	121–44	132–33
7	145–68	156–57
8	169–92	180–81
9	193–216	204–5
10	217–40	228–29
11	241–64	252–53
12	265–88	276–77
13	289–312	300–301
14	313–36	324–25
15	337–60	348–49
16	361–84	372–73
17	385–408	396–97
18	409–32	420–21
19	433–56	444–45
20	457–80	468–69
21	481–504	492–93
22	505–28	516–17

Since Hugo Ibscher reported a fragment containing the pagination 514 to have been attached to the last extant leaf[15] (pp. 501/02), from which he inferred that "the work must have included in the papyrus codex more than 520 pages = 260 leaves," one may assume that quire 22 concluding with page 528 is the last quire of the codex, at least the last of which there has been any evidence. Thus, pp. 503–28, 26 pages = 13 leaves, were presumably not acquired by Schmidt (except for the fragment with the pagination), and the pp. 441–502, 62 pages = 31 leaves, have not, with the exception of the leaf labeled 455/456, been identified in Berlin in the inventory of 1985–1986.

15. Hugo Ibscher, Kephalaia, vii.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Hugo Ibscher reported as follows regarding the fiber directions of the codices of Medinet Madi, where his information was based primarily on the Berlin Kephalaia and on Sir Chester Beatty's Codex A, the Psalms:[16]

> It is interesting, and corresponds to the distinguished character of our Mani books, that the arrangement of the leaves is such that the horizontal and vertical fibers always came to lie on each other. In this way the opened book attained a much more pleasant appearance, since the surface lying before the beholder was not disturbed by the varying fiber directions. This arrangement is unpleasant only for the person who today must separate the leaves from each other. For the fibers have now become so intertwined with each other through the effect of dampness that the leaves can be separated from each other only with the greatest of care and patience.
>
> Interessant und dem vornehmen Charakter unserer Mani-Bücher entsprechend ist auch die Anordnung der Blätter, die so erfolgte, dass immer die horizontalen und vertikalen Fasern aufeinander zu liegen kamen. Dadurch gewann das aufgeschlagene Buch ein weit gefälligeres Aussehen, weil die vor dem Beschauer liegende Fläche nicht durch die verschiedene Faserun gestört wurde. Unangenehm ist diese Anordnung nur für den, der heute die Blätter auseinanderlösen muss, haben sich doch durch die Einwirkung der Feuchtigkeit die Fasern jetzt derart ineinander verfilzt, dass nur mit der grössten Sorgfalt and Geduld die Blätter voneinander zu bringen sind.

The inventory of the Kephalaia of 1985–1986 has shown that this fiber pattern does characterize the codex. To be sure, this pattern is somewhat obscured by the fact that in the glassing by Hugo Ibscher or in the reglassing by Rolf Ibscher, some labels were incorrectly placed. But in the process of preparing the inventory, such plates have been supplemented with correct labels. This could be determined by the profiles of what is extant, by the postulated fiber patterns, by the running heads in some cases, and perhaps by an occasional pagination. Leaf 431/32 consists of a series of fragments, presumably from this leaf, two of which are conserved with the wrong surface up.

16. Hugo Ibscher, "Ein Mani-Fund," 85.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

One may wonder just what degree of reliability is to be accorded to the pagination ascribed to all the identified leaves, once the minor suggestions here made have been taken into consideration. This is all the more problematic given Hugo Ibscher's view that the sheets were not cut from rolls, which permits the identification of the sequence of sheets. For he argued "that the papyrus material for the present codices was not cut from a roll, but that the leaves were manufactured especially for our Mani books."[17] This phenomenon is otherwise unattested. To make such a claim, he would have had to establish that there are no kolleseis (a point which, to judge by the leaves that have been examined, would indeed seem to be accurate). But since kolleseis could have been trimmed off at the margin by a careful stationer preparing a deluxe codex, Ibscher would have had to verify that there is no continuity of fibers from sheet to sheet. Since he does not refer to this negative criterion, it is unknown whether he examined the codex from this point of view. Hence, this needs to be verified to be certain that this criterion for establishing the sequence of the sheets, and hence of the pages, is not available. If Hugo Ibscher is correct, then missing is the main codicological criterion for establishing the sequence of sheets in a codex lacking much of the Coptic pagination and the continuity of text from leaf to leaf, namely the continuity of horizontal fibers (or, in rare instances such as Nag Hammadi Codex XIII, the vertical fibers) from sheet to sheet in the quire. In the case of the Kephalaia, chapter numbers are sporadically extant in the text itself, so that in general the assigned pagination may indeed be reliable.

The verification of quires in terms of conjugate leaves needs to be carried through systematically to provide a relative confirmation of the page sequence.

Eight smaller plates that seem to involve the remainder of fragments from the conservation of the Kephalaia were located in the Magazin. For a card accompanying the fragments states that they are "bestimmte and unbestimmte Mani-Fragmente (farblos geändert)—8 Platten" ["defined and undefined Mani fragments (colorlessly framed)—8 plates"].

17. Ibid., 84: "dass das Papyrusmaterial für die vorliegenden Kodices nicht aus einer Rolle geschnitten ist, sondern dass die Blätter . . . eigens für unsere Mani-Bücher angefertigt worden sind."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Plate 1: A label reports in pencil "S. 479" ["p. 479"] and in ink "zu Kephalaia" ["to Kephalaia"]. One fragment does have the numeration 479/48[0], another 47[], another 4[ ].

Plate 2: A label reports 459/60. The plate contains about 9 fragments. This pagination was not noted.

Plate 3: A label records Kephalaia and the pagination "503/4??." The plate contains about 18 fragments. This pagination was not noted.

Plate 4: A label reports in Greek ink Kephalaia and the numbers ϟΚΓ/ϟΚΔ i.e., 423/424. This leaf is extant in its proper box, though the pagination was not noted on it. Nor was this pagination noted on the some 12 fragments in plate 4.

Plate 5: It contains about 11 small fragments.

Plate 6: It contains about 6 fragments, two of which seemed to consist of more than one leaf.

Plate 7: It contains uninscribed pads and one small inscribed fragment.

Plate 8: It contains about thirteen fragments, three of which contain waved decorations such as may have been at the end of the codex; the back of these fragments is uninscribed.

These eight plates are to be classified as fragments and hence are not included in the following assessment of the number of extant leaves.

Since the 146 leaves = 292 pages that have been published present pp. 1–292, of which 144 leaves = 288 pages are still extant, there remain in Berlin yet to be published among the extant leaves assigned a pagination: pp. 293–310, 331–82, 387–414, 417–18, 421–40, 455–56, i.e. 61 leaves = 122 pages, plus 29 unboxed but glassed extant leaves without assigned pagination, i.e. 58 pages, a total of 90 leaves = 180 pages; three leaves = six pages plus fragments out of the fragmentary pages 311–30 (K 11010) in Vienna's Österreichische Nationalbibliothek; and pp. 447–54, 499–500, (i.e., five leaves = ten pages), in Warsaw—a total of 98 unpublished leaves = 196 unpublished pages of the Kephalaia

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

that are presumably extant. Thus, there would seem to be a total of 242 extant leaves = 484 pages. (This does not include the second volume of Kephalaia belonging to the Chester Beatty Library, see below.)

Such a listing of unpublished but extant leaves may be somewhat misleading. For although the size of the lacunae is relatively small in many cases, that is to say, although most of the papyrus is usually extant, the amount of extant ink varies considerably, and the resultant legibility of many pages is disappointingly small. Hence, a rough classification of extant ink may give a clearer picture of what one may expect. On a scale of 0 to 5: 0 = no ink is visible; 1 = some ink but probably no letters are visible; 2 = some letters but probably no words are legible; 3 = some words but probably no sentences are legible; 4 = some sentences but probably less than half the page is legible; 5 = probably more than half the page is legible. The 122 unpublished but paginated extant pages in Berlin have been classified in the chart that follows:

Berlin Kephalaia Paginated Leaves

Category	Total pages in category	Individual page numbers
Some ink visible	6	422, 424, 431, 432, 435–36.
Some letters visible	12	309–10, 331–32, 394, 417–18, 421, 423, 427, 433–34.
Some words visible	29	306–8, 333–36, 339, 340, 362, 382, 387, 393, 403–9, 413–14, 425–26, 428–30, 438, 440.
Some sentences visible	42	297, 299, 300, 304–5, 337–38, 341–42, 345–46, 351–52, 355, 357, 359–61, 364, 368–70, 372–74, 377, 378, 380, 381, 388, 390, 392, 398, 399, 401, 410–12, 437, 439, 455–56.
More than half the page visible	33	293–96, 298, 301–3, 343–44, 347–50, 353–54, 356, 358, 363, 365–67, 371, 375–76, 379, 389, 391, 395–97, 400, 402.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The unpaginated extant leaves 1–28 in Berlin can be classified as follows (the labeled side is cited as a, the side without the label as b): In category 1, 21b. In category 2, 18b, 19a, 21a, 22b, 23b, 24ab, 25ab, 26a, 27b. In category 3, 2ab, 3ab, 4ab, 5ab, 6ab, 7b, 8ab, 9ab, 10ab, l2ab, 13ab, 14ab, 15ab, 16ab, 17ab, 18a, 19b, 20ab, 22a, 23a, 26b, 27a, 28ab. In category 4, lab, 11ab.

Some transcriptions by H. J. Polotsky are in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library.[18] They include pp. 25, 26, 30, 34–40, 51, and 54 published in Kephalaia and pages 375–76 published in Schmidt and Polotsky's initial essay,[19] and the unpublished pages 343, 344, 353, 354 and 366, with German translations by Polotsky of pp. 353, 354, and 366, and English translations by Sir H. Thompson of pp. 343 and 344. This work is dated from July 1931 to May 18, 1932. There are also holdings in the Griffith Institute in the Ashmoleon Museum in Oxford and at the Academy of Sciences in Berlin (see above).

Reinhold Merkelbach[20] has remarked that chapter 138, extant in Polotsky's German translation, is lost:[21] "Der koptische Text ist verlorengegangen, es existiert nur noch die deutsche Übersetzung." ["The Coptic text is lost, there still exists only the German translation."] However an examination of the papyri in the Papyrus-Sammlung

18. Crum, A Coptic Dictionary, vi, reports: "As regards the lesser dialects, reference must first be made to the great increase in material resulting from the discovery and gradual publication of the Manichaean papyri, acquired by Mr. Chester Beatty and the Berlin Museum. These we have been able to use, thanks to the permission of their owners and to copies of the unpublished portions kindly sent by Dr. Polotsky and Mr. Allberry. But this advantage has been ours only since reaching the letter P."

Crum, Coptic Dictionary, xii, lists:

Mani I = copies of Chester Beatty's unpublished Manichaean papyri by H. J. Polotsky and H. Thompson.

Mani II = copies of sim. papyri at Berlin by Polotsky.

The Crum Archive of the Ashmolean Museum and the Archive of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin contain material that supplements the incomplete file at the Chester Beatty Library.

19. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 45, for the German translation of p. 375, p. 87, in "Anhang Nr. III," for the Coptic text of p. 375, p. 42 for the German translation of p. 376, and p. 86, in "Anhang Nr. II," for the Coptic text of p. 376.

20. Merkelbach, Mani und sein Religionssystem (Rheinisch-Westfälische Akademie der Wissenschaften, Geisteswissenschaften, Vorträge: G 281; Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag, 1986), 18 n. 9.

21. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 70–71.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms of (East) Berlin on July 13, 1988, tended to indicate that the papyri containing this chapter are in fact not lost. Chapter 136 begins on p. 337, chapter 137 on p. 338, chapter 138 on p. 340, chapters 140 and 141 both on p. 343. The leaf labeled 341/342 is also extant, on which the continuation and conclusion of chapter 138 (and the beginning of chapter 139) presumably take place. Yet the identity of the leaf in question seemed at first unclear, for the labels reading 339/340 and with the chapter numeration 138 were affixed in such a way that when the labels were at the top of the page, the writing was upside down, so that the leaf needed to be returned to its upright position. Nor did the fiber directions conform to the pattern of like fiber directions on facing pages. But if the side labeled 339 is relabeled 340, and that side labeled 340 relabeled 339, then the fiber pattern becomes normal. Furthermore, only on the basis of these corrections do the profiles of this leaf and that of the preceding and following leaves conform to each other. Thus once these corrections were made, the codex seemed at this point to be intact, though the text is less legible than it was half a century ago, to judge by the extant German translation.

In 1986 Wolf-Peter Funk began transcribing the first unpublished leaves, pp. 293–95, 11, here concluding with the numeration and title of chapter 123.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 11 —

$\mathcal{P}^{15997}$: Acts

Schmidt and Polotsky's basic report made it clear that P^{15997} (Acts) was acquired in the spring of 1931. Their report concerning this specific codex is as follows:[1]

[p. 27] I can be very brief in the case of the third papyrus book, which when acquired lay in the original condition between two wooden covers as remains of the binding. It too belongs to the Berlin holdings. An idea of the desolate condition of the preservation may be gotten from the accompanying photograph (see plate 2). Also there are only a few leaves of this pile that have been separated for the sake of determining the character of the work. Thus it has become clear [p. 28] that it is a work of historical content . . . [p. 29] To judge by [p. 30] the external size, it must have been a work of at least 250 leaves.

[p. 27] Ganz kurz kann ich mich fassen bei dem dritten Papyrusbuch, das bei der Erwerbung noch in dem ursprünglichen Zustand zwischen zwei Holzdeckeln als Reste des Einbandes lag and ebenfalls zum Berliner Bestande gehört. Eine Vorstellung von dem desolaten Zustande der Erhaltung wird die beigefügte Photographie (s. Taf. 2) geben. Auch von diesem Haufen sind nur einige Blätter bisher behufs Feststellung des Charakters des Werkes abgehoben worden. Dabei hat es sich als ein Werk historischen Inhalts heraus- [p. 28] gestellt . . . [p. 29] Nach [p. 30] dem äusseren Umfang zu urteilen, muss es ein Werk von mindestens 250 Blättern gewesen sein.

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 27–30.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Wilhelm Schubart recorded in the Inventarbuch of the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum of East Berlin in black ink for P[15997]: "Koptischer Papyruskodex" ["Coptic Papyrus Codex"]. The column regarding "Art der Erwerbung" ["Nature of the Acquisition"] reads "dsgl" ["the same] as P[15995], i.e., "acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt in Cairo, 1931, gift of Mr. August Pfeffer 1933." Further notes added in pencil report: "Historischer Text" ["historical text"], "z. T. verglast" ["partially glassed"], "8 Blätter" ["8 leaves,"] "Schrank 5" ["cupboard 5"], "z. Zt. Papyrussammlung Regal" ["at present Papyrus Collection shelf"]. A purple carbon note reports "nach dem Osten sichergestellt" ["put in safety to the east"], to which is added in black ink "8 Blätter sind zurück. Codex nicht! [Rolf] Ib[scher]." ["8 leaves are back. Codex [is] not! [Rolf] Ib[scher]."] That is to say, all 8 glassed leaves were at the time thought to have been returned, but the book block that had not been separated into leaves and individually glassed was not returned. A rubber stamp reading "1958 vorhanden" ["1958 present"] records the return of the leaves from Leningrad in that year. The stamp is followed by 8 counting marks. Another rubber stamp reading "1972 vorhanden" ["1972 present"] records that the leaves were present at the time of the inventory of holdings made that year by Ulrich Luft, then a member of the Museum staff.

Böhlig reported in 1960/68:[2]

The codex P[15997] is unfortunately lost except for the 8 leaves that were conserved already before the war. It contained historical reports about Mani and the later time of the church. The loss of this text is so regrettable because one could expect from it, as is already visible from the few remains, both materials on the history of Manichaeism and such as had to do with the history of the Sassanid kingdom and its western neighbors. Whether or not the book formed an inner unity is difficult to say. At the top of a few pages, scarcely legible and hardly interpretable superscriptions are

Der Codex P[15997] ist leider bis auf die 8 Blätter, die bereits vor dem Kriege konserviert waren, verlorengegangen. Er enthielt historische Berichte über Mani und die spätere Zeit der Kirche. Der Verlust dieser Schrift ist deshalb so zu beklagen, weil wir in ihr, wie schon aus den geringen Resten ersichtlich ist, zugleich mit Materialien zur Geschichte des Manichäismus auch solche zur Geschichte des Sassanidenreiches und seiner westlichen Anlieger zu erwarten hatten. Ob das Buch eine innere Einheit gebildet hat, ist schwer zu sagen. Über einigen Seiten sind kaum lesbare und

2. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 183–84.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

present. Schmidt's claim that it [p. 184] had to do here with names of Mani's disciples must be based on an oversight. The handwriting does not have the calligraphic beauty of that of the Kephalaia, but rather has angular and awkward-looking forms. Also the inscribed column is not as carefully divided. If at the end of the page there is less room, one made the letters and the space between lines smaller. Of course this does not contribute especially to the text's beauty.

deutbare Überschriften vorhanden. Die Behauptung Schmidts, es [p. 184] handle sich dabei um Namen von Jüngern Manis, dürfte auf einem Versehen beruhen. Die Schrift besitzt nicht die kalligraphische Schönheit wie die der Kephalaia, sondern hat eckigere, ungelenker wirkende Formen. Auch der Schriftspiegel ist nicht so sorgfältig eingeteilt; wenn am Ende der Seite der Raum weniger wird, macht man die Buchstaben und den Zeilenabstand kleiner; das trägt natürlich nicht gerade zur Verschönerung bei.

It is unclear on the basis of what information Böhlig reported that the 8 leaves were conserved before the war. It may be based on no more than the reference in the Inventarbuch to "8 leaves." But the penciled note in the Inventarbuch is not dated and hence could have been entered after the war, as a deduction from 8 leaves having been returned from Leningrad conserved in glass panes all of the same size, the others of which were labeled P[15997]. In that case, the only information one would have as to how many leaves had been conserved would be the vague reference in the basic report to "only a few leaves." And even this reference to only a few leaves may be out of date, since further leaves could have been conserved after that report, as in the case of P[15998], where 4 leaves were reported to have been separated by the time the initial report was published, whereas Hugo Ibscher separated and glassed a total of 6 leaves, and a good number of others were separated but not permanently conserved or glassed (see below). Although the discussion will continue on the assumption that there were only 8 leaves conserved, the possibility that an indeterminate number have been conserved should not be lost from sight.

Wolfgang Müller's preliminary inventory of 1964–1965 reported: "P[15997]: historical content, 8 leaves in Berlin, the rest is lost."[3]

Beltz's catalogue of 1978 reported:

3. P[15997] historischer Inhalt, 8. Bl. in Berlin, Rest verloren.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

I 605 P[15997]. 8 leaves of a codex from the Mani find. The average height of the leaves is 22–25 cm, the average width 8–11 cm. There are about 36–40 lines per page, poorly preserved. The codex is probably a Vita of Mani. On the text, see R. Ibscher, Akten des XXIV. Internationalen Orientalistenkongresses (Munich, 1957), pp. 226–29, and in Koptologische Studien in der DDR, Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Universität Halle-Wittenberg 1965, Sonderheft, pp. 50–64. In Warsaw there is at present a leaf from this codex at the University. The remainder of the codex is lost. R[ecto] line 1: ⲙⲁⲑⲏⲧⲏⲥ; line 11: ⲟⲩⲥ ⲛⲕⲁⲧⲁⲣⲉⲩ ⲉⲇⲛ.

I 605 P[15997]; 8 Blätter eines Codex aus dem Mani-Fund. Die durchschnittliche H. der Blätter 22–25, die durchschnittliche B. 8–11. Pro S. etwa 36–40 Z., schlecht erhalten. Der Codex ist vermutlich eine Vita Manis. Zum Text siehe R. Ibscher, Akten des XXIV. Intern. Orientalistenkongresses, München 1957, S. 226–29, and in Kopt. Studien in der DDR, WZU Halle-Wittenberg 1965, Sonderheft, S. 50–64. In Warschau befindet sich z. Z. ein Blatt aus diesem Codex in der Universität, der Rest des Codex ist verloren, R. Z. 1: ⲙⲁⲑⲏⲧⲏⲥ Z. 11: ⲟⲩⲥ ⲛⲕⲁⲧⲁⲣⲉⲩ ⲉⲇⲛ.

The transcribed words have not been located on the papyri in Berlin themselves.

This report could readily lead to the assumption that a total of nine leaves are extant. Thus Michel Tardieu reported:[4] "P Berol. 15997 (= I 605 Beltz), of which 8 leaves are in East Berlin and 1 in Warsaw. The rest of the codex has been lost or destroyed during the Second World War."

Wincenty Myszor reported on July 12, 1986, that there are at the Institute for Papyrology of Warsaw University 6 glassed plates. One numbered 499/500 is labeled "with a quite clear P[15997]," but seems nonetheless to belong to P[15996] (see above). It is conserved, as are the 4 leaves of P[15996], in glasses 36 by 23.5 cm. Myszor concludes: "These 5 leaves seem to have belonged to the same codex." But the sixth leaf at the University is from another codex. It is conserved in glass panes 24.5 by 18.5 cm, and is sealed with a different, red tape. It is labeled P[15997], though the last digit "is not quite clear—it can also be 96!" Its "degree of preservation" is "the worse" among the 6 leaves at the University. Myszor concludes that it "belongs quite certainly to another codex than . . . the other 5 leaves." The Warsaw leaf that Beltz ascribed to P[15997] may have been the leaf numbered 499–500 and labeled P[15997], though actually belonging to P[15996] (see above), for Beltz did not list this leaf for P[15996]. There would be no reason to ascribe the smaller sixth leaf to P[15997] other than the indistinct label that may read either P[15997] or P[15996], and the apparent need to ascribe this leaf to some other codex than P[15996]. The dimensions of the glass panes (24.5 by 18.5 cm) do not correspond to those of P[15997] in Berlin (32 by 21 cm).

4. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6. "P.Berol. 15997 (= I 605 Beltz), dont subsistent 8 feuillets a Berlin-Est et 1 a Varsovie. Le reste du codex a été perdu ou détruit durant la second guerre mondiale."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On September 11, 1986, Wolf-Peter Funk examined the smaller plate, and on November 15, 1986, wrote a report that brings further clarity to the situation:

> The one glass frame of unusually smaller size (Myszor: 24.5 x 18.5 cm) and unusually coloured tape (red) has—if my records are complete—two labels: one (on recto? [right-hand page]) at the bottom, reading "Dr. Kohlhammer" (ink, old), above which is written in blue pencil "P. 1599[.]" (part of paper broken off); the other on the verso side of the glass [left-hand page], of recent origin (Beltz's hand?) "zu P[15997]" ["to P[15997]"].
>
> The glass contains a narrow strip of papyrus, inscribed on both sides, with an appearance very similar to the other Manichaean leaves. The writing is Coptic at least. But the scribe's hand is clearly different from the Kephalaia codex (and, I think, also different from the Letters and Synaxeis codices), though the general style is similar. (The letters appear to be slightly more heavy, or more uncial, than those of the other hands.) I consider it possible that an extremely patient and imaginative person might be able to identify several Coptic words on the recto (approximately one third of each line preserved, the rest is only fibers/debris), but hardly more than isolated letters on the verso.
>
> I can only speculate about the reasons which prompted my predecessor to attach a label "zu P. 15997" ["to P[15997]"] (similarity of the hand? or the peculiar mode of conservation?), because I have not seen the glasses of P[15997] at the Berlin Museum so far.

The two labels that Funk notes seem to include the indistinct label read variously as P[15997] and P[15996] by Myszor, and as P[1599][.] by Funk, and a clear label reading P[15997], apparently not noted by Myszor. This raises the question as to whether this clear label was added subsequently, conceivably by Myzsor on the basis of a query I posed to him as to whether a leaf of P15997 were in Warsaw; this query could have led him or someone else in Warsaw to make such a conjectural identification. Funk's impression that the hand is not that of P15996, and, less certainly, not that of P15995 or P15998, would, by a process of elimination, tend to identify it as P15997, since a conservation of P15999 seems not to have ever even begun; yet such an identification on the basis of hands (uncertain as this would of necessity have been without leaves of P15995 or P15998 available for comparison) would be far from conclusive. Since Kohlhammer paid for P15999, one may wonder if his name on the plate suggests this was, after all, a sample from that codex.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

An inventory carried out in 1986 of the 8 leaves currently in Berlin that are labeled P15997 has raised the question as to whether one of the Berlin leaves does not belong to another codex. It bears a printed label "P15998," with the 8 marked out and replaced in blue ink by 7. Günter Poethke, Custos of the Greek manuscripts of the Papyrus-Sammlung in East Berlin, reports this to be the work of Rolf Ibscher's assistant, Otto Werner Luke. This would suggest that the leaf was previously attributed to the Letters and only at some later time reassigned to the Acts. It also has a separate label, similar to those numbering the leaves of P15997, reading in ink 36, with the 6 marked out and replaced in pencil by 2. This Arabic leaf numeration diverges from that typical of P15997, since Roman numerals, ranging from I to IX (I–V and IX plus an unlabeled leaf), are all that are employed. But in the case of P15998, the Arabic numeration of leaves not assigned a pagination reaches 25, which included 6 leaves glassed by Hugo Ibscher (including Nr. 25) and about 22 that he left half conserved, a total of about 28 leaves. One may recall the similar numeration by glass container rather than by page for the half-conserved leaves of the Kephalaia, where the Arabic numeration reached 30, with 29 (and perhaps 30) secondarily shifted from P15998 to P15996, just as here a leaf originally assigned to P15998 and numbered 35 was secondarily shifted to P15997 and the number 32.

The reason why this leaf was reassigned to P15997 may have been that it is conserved, as are the 7 leaves originally labeled P15997, in glass frames 32 cm high by 21 cm broad, whereas the 6 leaves of P15998 that Hugo Ibscher glassed measure 35.6 by 23 cm, and those of P15998 that Rolf Ibscher glassed were 35 by 25 cm. The smaller format may have been used for the single leaf under discussion because the leaf itself is smaller than is typical for P[15998]. But this does not mean that the dimensions of the leaf fit those of P[15997]. The profile of the leaf is not like that of the leaves of P[15997]. Indeed the frayed edges of the leaf stand in some contrast to the relatively clean edges of the leaves of P[15997]. Thus, in spite of the comparable size of the glass frame, the leaf itself would not seem to belong to P[15997].

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

This leaf in the smaller glass frame may have been packed with the equally small glasses of P[15997] at the time of the war. When it was returned from Leningrad in 1958, it would presumably have been still packed with the 7 leaves of P[15997] that were returned. Since at the time, it was not known that one leaf (the one in Warsaw) was missing, it could readily have been assumed that the 8 leaves recorded in the Inventarbuch as separated from the book block of P[15997] were the 8 leaves glassed in frames of the same size, and hence stacked together, even though only 7 of these similarly glassed leaves may actually have belonged to P[15997].

In the second volume of the facsimile edition of the Chester Beatty Library Manichaean texts, there has been published "a single sheet with historical information":[5]

> The two pages have a text with some historical information, and this can be identified with similar information reported by C. Schmidt from a leaf in Berlin (C. Schmidt, Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten, 1933, pp. 28–29). Exactly the same persons are mentioned: Thadamor, Amaro, Sapores the hyparch, Narsaph, Hormezd, Innaios, Abiesus and others. This must either be a parallel text to that mentioned by C. Schmidt, or the leaf must physically be the same. Parallel texts are well known from other papyri, e.g., in the Nag Hammadi texts the two very close long versions of the Apocryphon of John, and the two versions of the Gospel of Truth.

Yet there is no indication in any reports concerning the discovery from Medinet Madi of there being a duplicate copy of the Acts. There are two volumes of Kephalaia, a first volume in Berlin and the second in Dublin, a two-volume work rather than a case of duplication. And there were two parts of the Homilies codex, the published part in

5. Giversen, Homilies and Varia: The facsimiles are plates on pp. 99–100, the quotation from p. vii. Subsequent quotations are from pp. viii–ix. Note the Errata on p. x, to the effect that the fiber directions are reversed on pp. 99–100: Plate 99 actually has horizontal fibers, plate 100 vertical fibers.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Dublin and the unpublished part (P^{15999}) of Berlin, now lost. But this had to do with two parts of one codex, not of duplicates. Hence there are no known instances of duplication in the library of Medinet Madi (nor is there duplication of the sublibraries among the Nag Hammadi Codices, for that matter). The overwhelming probability is that "the leaf must physically be the same."

Giversen poses the problem of the reports by Böhlig (1968), Müller (1965), and Beltz (1978) cited above, to the effect that all 8 leaves were in Berlin. For a label on the glass initialed by the librarian of the Chester Beatty Library, J. V. S. Wilkinson, is dated "October 1956," and Giversen can report of the leaf that "in 1977 it could be studied in Dublin." He hence speculates: "It is possible that this leaf was not included in the eight pages but was one of the other leaves mentioned by C. Schmidt, and that later on it was transferred to the Chester Beatty collection. In that case it is hard to explain why it was transferred." But Schmidt did not mention "other" leaves than the 8 mentioned in the Inventarbuch; rather he spoke of "only a few leaves," a comment that provides no reason to assume there were more than 8 leaves. But in view of the recognition (see above) that only 7 of the 8 Berlin leaves actually belong to P^{15997}, it is not necessary to postulate more than 8 leaves.

Wilkinson's label read: "This sheet seems to belong to the Homilies, but is not included in Polotsky's publication." Giversen compares the two, noting similarities and divergences, only to conclude: "But despite the similarities, the general impression is that the writing on pp. 99 and 100 is by another hand." But upon quoting Böhlig's description of the awkward hand, Giversen comments:

> This description [p. ix] does not, however, match with the writing of pp. 99 and 100, and if these pages were once a part of the manuscript mentioned by C. Schmidt, this could be the reason why they were separated. If it is true that their handwriting was closer to that of the Chester Beatty Homilies than to the manuscript mentioned by C. Schmidt, such an alteration would be understandable.

Giversen then reports from the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library that in May 1932 there were references in correspondence between Sir Chester Beatty and Sir Alan Gardiner to the Homilies as consisting of 50 leaves:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> Neither Alan H. Gardiner nor A. Chester Beatty in these two letters use the expression "about 50 leaves", but clearly "the 50 leaves" [emphasis Giversen's].

The 50 leaves could be the 49 leaves (48 sheets plus the glass containing the fragments) plus the leaf on pp. 99 and 100. On 19 May 1931 Hugo Ibscher sent A. Chester Beatty an invoice for the preservation and placing under glass of papyri, among others "10 Blatt Manitexte" ["10 leaves of Mani texts"]—probably the first Mani papyri H. Ibscher restored for A. Chester Beatty. An invoice dated 17 June 1934 charges A. Chester Beatty for several Mani pages, the first of them "Manichäische Homilien: 49 Bältter" ["Manichaean Homilies: 49 leaves"]. Afterwards the three codices, A, B, and C, are mentioned. If the leaf on pp. 99 and 100 is included with these papyri mentioned in the invoices, it could be among the "10 Blatt Manitexte" ["10 leaves of Mani texts"], which are not specified, and if this leaf was among the 50 leaves that Polotsky was permitted to publish, the reason it was not included in the publication was probably that it differed too much in appearance from the pages bearing the Homilies.

Giversen concludes:

> Because of the doubts about its identity, it has been hard to decide whether this leaf should be included in this edition. Since nobody besides myself has raised such questions until now, and it is stated repeatedly in the two catalogues of the German collection that all eight leaves mentioned above are kept in Berlin, it has been agreed to include the leaf here. If however the two catalogues are wrong, it remains possible that the two texts are identical. In any case I shall continue to investigate the history of the leaf.

It seems that the question has in fact already been clarified. Only 7 leaves of P[15997] are in Berlin (see above). A Berlin leaf was by mistake taken to London and Dublin, and its absence, though detected by Böhlig and explained by Rolf Ibscher, was lost sight of due to an eighth leaf being erroneously ascribed to P[15997], until inferred again in Berlin in 1986.

Since this codex was acquired "in the original condition between two wooden covers," one might assume that the "few leaves of this pile that have been separated for the sake of determining the character of the work"[6] are a more ordered sequence than in the case of codices that dealers have already separated into smaller batches. One might thus speculate that the leaves were taken from the front of the book, (since this might be assumed to provide a clearer indication of its character) in an effort to arrive at a preliminary identification of the codex. But one could also speculate that the codex was first opened elsewhere, or that leaves from different parts of the codex were conserved first, in order thus to achieve an overview. In fact nothing is known about the selection of leaves to be conserved as the initial sample.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The 7 leaves in East Berlin not only bear the number P^{15997}. They are also numbered with Roman numerals I–V, with one leaf unnumbered and one numbered IX. Since only 8 leaves are thought to have been separated from the book block, the number IX seems out of place. One may at best wonder if the 8 leaves returned from Leningrad and classified as P^{15997} (and the subsequent report of a leaf in Warsaw) are responsible for the numeration system leading to IX, which would hence be a relatively recent numeration. Such a speculation would not explain why the Berlin leaves were given the specific numeration each has. Indeed one would think that the natural thing to have done would have been to consider the Berlin leaves I–VIII and the Warsaw leaf IX, since there was no possibility to compare them side by side and to establish their relative position in the original codex as a basis for a more useful numeration system.

Schmidt and Polotsky reported, primarily on the basis of the Berlin Kephalaia and the London Psalms, that the fiber directions on facing pages were always the same. This pattern would seem to apply also to P^{15997}, since when leaves are so stacked in the sequence of the Roman numerals, there is continuity of extant profiles. But in order to retain the pattern of the fiber directions being the same on facing pages, the leaf numbered IX could not follow directly upon leaf V. Yet the pattern is retained if the unnumbered leaf is placed between V and IX, a sequence supported by the fact that the profile of IX is nearest to that of the unnumbered leaf. Hence the unnumbered leaf is tentatively assigned the number VIII.

The leaves have labels on one side only, listing the codex number and the Roman numeral; this side of the leaves was apparently intended as the side with horizontal fibers, since only plate I is an exception.

6. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 27.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Small labels with letters "a" and "b" were found in 1976 on 4 of the 7 plates to distinguish a "front" from a "back," however that may have been understood. Only leaf IV has "a" on the side with the main label and "b" on the other side. In the cases of leaves III, V, and IX, the side with the main label is designated as "b," with the other side identified as "a." (Stephen Patterson in 1987 found these small labels extant only on leaves III and IV.) This conscious effort to identify a first and a second side does not conform consistently to horizontal and vertical fiber directions (IV), or to vertical and horizontal fiber directions (III, V, IX). The lettering may have been intended to identify the first (right-hand) and second (left-hand) side of the leaf, since in the present hypothetical reconstruction, it does in all four cases happen to fall into this pattern.

P[15997] has no extant page numbers. Whereas P[15996] had its original pagination, P[15998] seems not to have been paginated, or at least Schmidt and Polotsky found no extant page numbers. They observed of P[15997]:[7] "ob das Ganze paginiert war, wird sich erst bei der weiteren Konservierung erweisen" ["Whether the whole was paginated will become clear only with the further conservation"]. Since such a further conservation never took place, the question remains unresolved.

A sequence of leaves or pages cannot be inferred from the text itself. For not only does the absence of the papyrus or the illegibility of the text at the tops and bottoms of pages render impossible an argument about the continuity of text from one leaf to the next; even a vague sequence of the train of thought seems unattainable today (in contrast to the trains of thought that Schmidt and Polotsky reported), given the largely illegible status of the ink today. Hence the pagination to be assigned to the 7 leaves in Berlin must be based on such circumstantial considerations as those here indicated, and will lack any real assurance of corresponding to the original pagination or even to the right page sequence. It is also not known whether the pages were an unbroken sequence. The four passages that Schmidt and Polotsky summarized do not suggest a continuous sequence but rather widely separated texts. The numeration by leaf rather than by page, and in Roman numerals, may indicate an interest to avoid attempting a pagination. Stephen Patterson has drawn attention to the pieces of twine pressed into the surface of the papyrus on the horizontal sides

7. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

of leaves II and IV, without any impressions of these pieces of twine visible on the facing pages of leaves I and III, which might suggest that these are not in fact the original facing pages. It is not even certain that it has been correctly determined which margins were at the spine and which margins were at the leading edge. The use of square brackets [ ] will indicate that the pagination is not legible on the papyrus, and the use of an asterisk (*) will indicate that the pagination is relatively arbitrarily assigned. The pagination should clearly be considered no more than a convention.

In the case of codices with the same fiber directions on facing pages, it was customary that the first page of each quire would have horizontal fibers, the second page vertical fibers, the third vertical, the fourth horizontal, and so on. However, in the case of the present material, leaf I has vertical fibers on the side with the main label (with no labeling of sides as "a" and "b"). One may conjecture that the lack of such letters means that the main label is on the surface facing the front of the book (rather than considering, e.g., the position of the main label as irrelevant, or that the small labels with the letters have in some cases been rubbed off, either of which alternatives is quite possible). The problem of the first page's not having horizontal fibers could be explained in several ways. The codex could simply be atypical. Or the assumptions as to which page is the right-hand page and which the left-hand page (i.e., the assumption about which margin is at the spine and which is at the leading edge) could be reversed. Or the first leaf may be missing. If one may postulate an uninscribed and hence unconserved front flyleaf, then the fiber directions of leaf I (as the second leaf) are as they should be. These are the assumptions, admittedly far from compelling, that have led to the provisional pagination of the seven leaves. It is to be hoped that more solid criteria may emerge as a result of subsequent study.

The following table is intended to identify the pages thus numbered [1*]–[10*], [11*]–[14*] in terms of the labels they already bore:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Leaf	Side with main label	Label a or b	Conventional numeration	Horizontal or vertical fibers
I	X		[1*]	Vert.
I			[2*]	Hor.
II	X		[3*]	Hor.
II			[4*]	Vert.
III	X	a	[5*]	Vert.
III	X	b	[6*]	Hor.
IV	X	a	[7*]	Hor.
IV		b	[8*]	Vert.
V		a	[9*]	Vert.
V	X	b	[10*]	Hor.
[VIII]	X		[11*]	Hor.
[VIII]			[12*]	Vert.
IX		a	[13*]	Vert.
IX	X	b	[14*]	Hor.

The size of the writing columns and of the leaves is hard to determine. The faded condition of the ink makes measurements of the columns uncertain, in that faint ink traces and darker fibers tend to become indistinguishable, and a completely faded-out area can be mistaken for a margin. The absence of the original edges of the papyrus makes measurements of the original leaf impossible. Even measurements of the extant leaf are imprecise, in that isolated fibers may often extend a measurement by a centimeter or so. In such cases, it may at times be an arbitrary decision how much to include and what to exclude as a stray fiber. The extant writing columns average in height about 20.5 cm.:

> p. [1*] 20.8; p. [2*] 20.6; p. [3*] 20.8; p. [4*] 20.5; p. [5*] 20.7; p. [6*] 20.2; p. [7*] 20.6; p. [8*] 20.3; p. [9*] 20.4?; p. [10*] 20.4?; p. [11*] 20.5; p. [12*] 20.6; p. [13*] 20.5; p. [14*] 20.5?

The top margins have in the cases of pp. [5*], [6*], and [8*] running heads that are up to 1.0 cm high, beginning about .5 cm from the extant top edge of the leaf. These captions are not included in the statistics listed above for the height of the writing columns. The largest measurement of an extant width of a writing column is 11.5 cm for plate 99 in the facsimile edition of Dublin. The extant top margins reach a height of 3.4 cm (p. [7*]) or 3.0 cm (p. [8*]); the extant bottom margins only .8 cm (p. [4*] and p. [6*]), .7 cm (p. [8*] and p. [14*]), or .6 cm (p. [2*] and p. [3*]). The extant dimensions of the leaves reach 24 by 12 cm ([7*]/[8*]), where the width increases by an extension of the top margin on the opposite edge of the leaf from that with some side margin still extant.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Schmidt, Polotsky, and Hugo Ibscher do not give any dimensions for the book block or the wooden covers. That no dimensions are given for the wooden covers is all the more regrettable in that the covers would have provided the only reliable guide to the original dimensions prior to the fraying of the papyrus edges. By comparison, Hugo Ibscher gives the dimensions of P[15996] as 31.5 by 18 cm, with the following breakdown: the writing column is 22 by 13 cm, the top margin 4, and the bottom margin 5.5 cm, the inner margin 2 cm and the outer margin 4 cm (sic!). The corresponding dimensions of the Psalms is a leaf of 27 by 17.5 cm with the following breakdown: the writing column 17.5 by 11 cm, top and bottom margins 3.5 and 5.5 (sic!), the inner and outer margins 2 and 4.5.

The only dimension of P[15997] that seems to be that of the original codex, and relatively certain, is the height of the writing column, some 20.5 cm. This dimension is about midway between that of P[15996] (22 cm) and the Psalms (17.5 cm). This would suggest a basis for conjecturing comparable median dimensions for the width of the writing column and the size of the margins and of the leaves: e.g., a writing-column width of 12 cm, top margins of 3.75 cm, bottom margins of 5.5 cm, inner margins of 2 cm and outer margins of 4.25 cm, producing a leaf dimension of 29.75 by 18.25 cm. When one considers the extant dimensions of the leaves ranging in height from 20.9 ([11*]/[12*]) to 24 ([7*]/[8*]), the estimated loss in height would be 5.75 to 8.85 cm. This would seem to be an excessive estimate of loss, when compared to Plate 2 of the article by Schmidt and Polotsky. For the leaves do not seem quite this much shorter than the covers (if indeed one may assume the photograph displays the height of the codex). Perhaps the conservation process involved loss in the margins.

On October 31, 1986, Günter Poethke confirmed that the two wooden boards of the cover of this codex, mentioned by Schmidt and

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Polotsky but omitted in the Inventarbuch and by Böhlig and Beltz, are not among the three Coptic book bindings listed by Wolfgang Müller as still extant in the museum.[8] Hence the covers must be considered lost.

The information about the contents of this codex must be derived primarily from Schmidt and Polotsky's report. For the seven leaves in Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR have on a first scanning produced no more than isolated letters and words, much less than the continuing phrases or sentences or trains of thought such as Schmidt and Polotsky report. This may be the result of the conservation process itself. For if Polotsky transcribed each successive page on the top of the book block before it was removed, he may well have transcribed much more text from the exposed side that could have been read after the leaf was removed. This would mean, of course, that the back of each leaf would in his (no longer extant) transcription present less text than the front. When in the case of P[15998], one compares the relatively large amount of text legible on the two exposed surfaces of a pair of never-separated leaves with the text legible on individual, separated leaves from the same codex, one can get some impression of the loss involved in rendering the hidden inner surfaces accessible. And the top surface on the lost book block may have been more legible (though the exposed surface on the extant book block of the Synaxeis codex is not markedly more legible that the conserved leaves). Yet Schmidt and Polotsky referred explicitly to what could be read "auf den konservierten Blättern" ["on the conserved leaves"], so that their information is presumably derived from the extant leaves.[9] Of course there may well have been fading over the intervening half century. The amount of flaking that would have been caused not only by the normal handling but especially by the transportation to the Zoo Bunker, by repercussions from exploding bombs and from antiaircraft fire, and by the railroad tracks to and from Leningrad in 1945–1946 and 1958, can be sensed from the quantity of dust and minor fragments littering the inside of the glasses. Yet the published leaves of the Kephalaia do not display such a marked contrast between what was read then and what can be read now.

8. Müller, "Die koptischen Handschriften," 66.
9. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 28.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Böhlig has challenged as an "oversight" the concluding detail of Schmidt and Polotsky's report[10]: "Auf den oberen Rändern standen die Namen der Verfasser." ["In the upper margins stood the names of the authors."] Since one must assume the published summaries from the codex are based on actual readings of the text, one should also assume the superscriptions of pages were more legible then than now. Since Böhlig did not record an alternate reading, it is doubtful he has been able to make them out to read differently, given their present illegibility. Schmidt and Polotsky had just noted[11] that the two disciples whose names they had found in the text of P15997 occurred as authors in the superscriptions of the pages of P15999, so that to make a similar inference concerning perhaps already minimally legible vestiges in the upper margins of P15997 would not be unreasonable, although the degree to which their statement was a conjecture can hardly be determined. The fact that the Cologne Mani Codex documents the names of Salmaios and Kustaios in its headings (see below) would tend to support this interpretation.

Beltz's statement that "the codex is probably a Vita of Mani" seems based not on new information, but simply on his interpretation of Schmidt and Polotsky's report. However, Schmidt and Polotsky did not refer to it as a Vita, but rather as "a work of historical content." The nearest Schmidt and Polotsky came to a discussion of the literary genre of the text is at the conclusion of their summary:

> Since the master put so much weight on the "book," as we will see, an active writing process developed also among the successors. Of course this writing concerned itself vigorously with the life of the religion's founder, especially with his last blows of fate. Early on, the "Martyrdom" was the object of sketches to be read on the day of his death, on the day of the Bema festival, and to serve as source material for cultic actions
>
> [p. 30] Da der Meister so grosses Gewicht auf das "Buch" legt, wie wir noch sehen werden, hat auch unter den Epigonen eine rege Schriftstellerei eingesetzt. Naturgemäss hat sich diese Schriftstellerei mit dem Leben des Religionsstifters lebhaft beschäftigt, besonders mit seinen letzten Schicksalen. Frühzeitig ist das "Martyrium" Gegenstand der Aufzeichnungen gewesen, um am Todestage, am Tage des Bema-Festes, verlesen zu werden und den

10. Ibid., 30.

11. Ibid., 29, where the codex in question is not identified. But from page 30, the identity is clear.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

and hymns. From such a historical work, Arabic historians such as An Nadim have drawn their chronological data. Fragments of narrative content have also been found among the Turfan texts. Hence it need not surprise us if also the Egyptian Manichaean incorporated a historical work about his religion into his library.

Kulthandlungen und den Hymnen zur Unterlage zu dienen. Aus einem derartigen Geschichtswerke haben arabische Historiker wie An Nadim ihre chronologischen Angaben bezogen. Auch unter den Turfantexten sind Fragmente erzählenden Inhalts gefunden worden. Daher darf es uns nicht überraschen, wenn auch der ägyptische Manichäer ein historisches Werk über seine Religion in seine Bibliothek aufgenommen hat.

But Schmidt and Polotsky rejected Alfaric's suggestion that a previously known allusion to a "Book of Apomnemoneumata" should be interpreted as a "Vie du Maître" ("Life of the Master"). For such a reference is very vague and could equally well refer to the Kephalaia. Thus the title Vita is hardly a valid inference from Schmidt's interpretation. Rather the combination of a Martyrdom with subsequent stories about the original disciples after the founder's death would seem to fit better the genre of apocryphal Acts. To be sure, the Martyrdom of the founder is less obviously part of such Acts, perhaps because in early Christianity the genre of Gospel tended to absorb the Martyrdom into it, with of course the Apostle's martyrdom comprising a worthy conclusion (but not beginning) for apocryphal Acts.

If it were correct to assume that the few pages separated from the book block were from the beginning of the codex and composed some 3.2 percent of the codex (8 out of the some 250 leaves that Schmidt and Polotsky estimated), of which only part contained the Martyrdom, then obviously the whole codex should no more be titled after this prelude than should the canonical Acts of the Apostles be named after the ascension with which it begins. But since one does not know whether the conserved leaves were all from the beginning of the codex, or whether they represent a sampling of different parts of the codex, such an argument cannot be pressed.

To be sure, the almost contemporary Life of Pachomius included the administrations of his immediate successors, as abbots of the

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Pachomian order, all of whom had been his disciples. But this is hardly a relevant parallel, since the Life of Pachomius began with his own call and composed primarily his adult life of leadership of the order, with the period of his immediate successors representing more of an appendix, or continuation of his administration.

Ludwig Koenen has suggested[12] that P^{15997} "seemingly showed the same literary structure and probably was part of the same work" as the Cologne Mani Codex. Schmidt and Polotsky had reported:[13] "Our historical work obviously did not flow from the pen of a single author, but rather was a collection made up of different smaller essays and reports that were put together here under the names of the authors in question." To this Koenen remarks:[14] "This description suits the C[ologne]M[ani]C[odex] perfectly. Headings in the Coptic Codex furnish the names of Ammos, Salmaios, and Kustaios as authors of the articles and reports. Having the same function, the names of Salmaios and Kustaios occur in the headings of the CMC." Although Schmidt and Polotsky did not make clear that Kustaios is mentioned in this codex and did not specify just which names appear in superscriptions, mentioning only Ammos as occurring in a subscription, Koenen's observation is nonetheless quite relevant.

Koenen further conjectures that "the whole work was a history of the Manichaean church, and it consisted of several codices."[15] This conjecture is supported by the note: "To judge from the space which the C[ologne] [Mani] C[odex] needed to deal with the early years of Mani, it seems that the history originally was comprised of several volumes." Although the last suggestion must remain quite speculative, the relation of the Cologne Mani Codex to P^{15997} as that of the Gospel of Luke to the Acts of the Apostles does suggest itself in terms of literary genres, though there is hardly any evidence of its having been composed as a two-volume (or multivolume) work.

12. Koenen, "Augustine and Manichaeism," 164.

13. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 29: "Unser historisches Werk war offensichtlich nicht aus der Feder eines einzigen Schriftstellers geflossen, sondern ein Sammelband aus verschiedenen kleineren Aufsätzen and Berichten, die unter den Namen der betreffenden Autoren hier zusammengestellt sind."

14. Koenen, "Augustine and Manichaeism," 164 n. 37.

15. Ibid., 165, and n. 38.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

It is no doubt Koenen's view that has led Michel Tardieu to characterize the Coptic codex largely in terms of the Greek codex:[16]

> 2) On the Birth of His Body
>
> Allusion to Mani's struggles of youth and to the birth of the Manichaean church . . . The complete Greek version of this text is known by means of the CMC.

Yet the Cologne Mani Codex does not contain a complete Greek version (if one were to assume the two codices overlap) for there is no material that is shared between the codices, to the extent that they are known. Only the Cologne codex alludes to Mani's struggles of youth, and some allusion to the birth of the Manichaean church may be found in the reports that follow, which is all that is known about the contents of P[15997].

A summary of the contents of the conserved leaves provided by Schmidt and Polotsky will tend to confirm the orientation of P[15997] to apocryphal Acts. Four passages are summarized, the second and third introduced as "ein anderes Stück" ["another piece"], the fourth as "ein weiteres Blatt" ["a further leaf"]. It is unclear whether Schmidt and Polotsky present them in the order in which they occur in the codex. To judge by their content, the chronological order might well be 2, 1, 4, 3. Their summary of the four passages, in their order, is as follows:[17]

> On the conserved leaves we read brief narrations about Mani's death, e.g., a narrative about the dialogue of the imprisoned Mani with the guard of the prison, which according to the subscription is attributed to a certain teacher (ⲥⲁϩ) named Ammôs; furthermore a narrative about the visit of a female catechumen named Anûschak to the imprisoned Mani, who is extremely worried that, if Mani were to forsake
>
> [p. 28] Auf den konservierten Blättern lesen wir kurze Erzählungen über Manis Tod, so z. B. eine Erzählung über die Unterredung Manis im Gefängnis mit dem Wächter des Gefängnisses, die auf einen gewissen Lehrer (ⲥⲁϩ) mit Namen Ammôs nach der Unterschrift zurückgeführt wird; ferner eine Erzählung über den Besuch einer Katechumenin namens Anûschak beim gefangenen Mani, die höchst betrübt darüber

16. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6: 2) Sur la naissance de son corps Évocation des conflits de jeunesse de Mani et de la naissance de l'Église manichéenne . . . La version grècque complète de ce texte est connue par le CMC.

17. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 28–29.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the world, the catechumens would be robbed of their "father" and come into danger of being lost. Mani consoles her with the observation that his nous remains in the church.

[p. 28] In another piece we hear that the day of the arrest was a sabbath, and that as a result of his arrest great weeping and mourning arose among the elect, the catechumens and the brethren. There follows a judgment scene before the king. The Μαγουσαῖοι, who, as is well known, staged the agitation against Mani, come forward with the accusation: "Manichaios has taught contrary to our law (νόμος)."

[p. 28] Another piece leads us into a later time of Manichaeism. Here we meet a quantity of unknown persons, such as the Queen Thadamor (ⲑⲁⲇⲁⲙⲱⲣ), the king Amarô (ⲁⲙⲁⲣⲱ), the hyparch Sapôres, Malôp, the son of Adb[jesu], the teacher Abiēsu (ⲁⲃⲓⲏⲥⲟⲩ), Yachias, the leader Sethel (ⲥⲏⲑⲏⲗ), Abira, etc. One has to do here apparently with events that take place within the Persian Empire. There are mentioned the ⲭⲱⲣⲁ ⲛ̄ⲟⲩⲉⲉⲟⲥ and the ⲭⲱⲣⲁ ⲛ̄ⲧⲁⲛⲁⲇⲓⲧ ⲁⲇⲟⲩⲣⲃⲁⲗⲁⲅⲁⲛ. Further, one has to do with the position of the provincial governments toward the Manichaean religion, some of which are disposed in a friendly way, especially Amarô, who is designated as "great patron" of the Manichaeans, since they can enjoy his support. One of the heads of the Manichaeans turns to him ist, dass, wenn Mani die Welt verlassen sollte, die Katechumenen ihres "Vaters" beraubt sind and in Gefahr des Verlorenseins kommen. Mani tröstet sie mit dem Hinweis, dass sein Nus in der Kirche verbleibe.

[p. 28] Wir hören in einem andern Stück, dass der Tag der Gefangennahme ein Sabbat war, und dass ob seiner Gefangennahme grosses Weinen und Trauern unter den Electi, den Katechumenen und den Brüdern entstand. Es folgt eine Gerichtssitzung vor dem König, Die Μαγουσαῖοι, die bekanntlich die Hetze gegen Mani inszeniert haben, treten mit der Anklage auf: "Manichaios hat gegen unser Gesetz (νόμος) gelehrt."

[p. 28] In eine spätere Zeit des Manichäismus führt uns ein anderes Stück. Hier tritt uns eine Fülle von unbekannten Personen entgegen, wie die Königin Thadmor (ⲑⲁⲇⲁⲙⲱⲣ), der König Amarô (ⲁⲙⲁⲣⲱ), der Hyparch Sapôres, Malôp, der Sohn des Abd[jesu], der Lehrer Abiēsu (ⲁⲃⲓⲏⲥⲟⲩ), Yachias, der Leiter Sethel (ⲥⲏⲑⲏⲗ), Abira usw. Es handelt sich offenbar hier um Ereignisse, die sich innerhalb des Persischen Reiches abspielen. Es werden genannt die ⲭⲱⲣⲁ ⲛ̄ⲟⲩⲉⲉⲟⲥ und die ⲭⲱⲣⲁ ⲛ̄ⲧⲁⲛⲁⲇⲓⲧ ⲁⲇⲟⲩⲣⲃⲁⲗⲁⲅⲁⲛ. Es handelt sich weiter um die Stellung der Provinzialregierungen zur manichäischen Religion, von denen die einen freundlich gesinnt sind, vor allem Amarô, der als "grosser Patron" der Manichäer bezeichnet wird, da sie sich dessen Unterstützung zu erfreuen haben. Eines der Häupter der Manichäer wendet sich deshalb an ihn mit der Bitte um Fürsprache für

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

for this reason with the request to intercede for the persecuted believers [p. 29] in Persia with the king Narsaph, i.e., Narses (293–302). Amarô assumes this responsibility and sends letters to the main king, which are crowned with success in that the persecutions cease. In these negotiations a certain ⲓⲛⲛⲁⲓⲟⲥ surfaces, who is apparently the transmitter of the letters of Amarô to the king. He has a discussion with King Narses, the result of which is that the oppressions and persecutions of the teacher and believers are suspended on the command of the king . . . [Evidence for Innaios as a disciple of Mani from other sources is listed.] According to the Berlin papyrus the tranquility under Narses continued up to his death. Under his successor Ormizd II (ϩⲱⲣⲙⲏⲍⲇ), the son of Narses, the agitation of the Mages resumed; as a result there were new persecutions. From these notes we see that the work contained precise historical records about the development of the Manichaean movement in the Persian Empire after the death of Mani from the pen of a Manichaean, and one may suspect that we will also receive important information about Mani and his times.

die verfolgten Gläu-[p. 29]bigen in Persien beim König Narsaph, d.i. Narses(293–302). Amarô übernimmt diese Aufgabe und sendet Briefe an den Oberkönig, die von Erfolg gekrönt sind, indem die Verfolgungen aufhören. Bei diesen Verhandlungen taucht ein gewisser ⲓⲛⲛⲁⲓⲟⲥ auf, der wahrscheinlich der Überbringer der Sendschreiben des Amarô an den König ist. Er hat eine Unterredung mit König Narses, deren Resultat ist, dass die Bedrückungen und Verfolgungen der Lehrer und Gläubigen auf Befehl des Königs sistiert werden . . . [Evidence for Innaios as a disciple of Mani from other sources is listed.] Nach dem Berliner Papyrus hat die Ruhe unter Narses bis zu seinem Tode angehalten. Unter seinem Nachfolger Ormizd II. (ϩⲱⲣⲙⲏⲍⲇ), dem Sohne des Narses, hat die Hetze der Magier wieder eingesetzt; die Folge sind erneute Verfolgungen gewesen. Aus diesen Notizen ersehen wir, dass das Werk genaue geschichtliche Aufzeichnungen über die Entwicklung der Manichäerbewegung im Persischen Reiche nach dem Tode Manis aus der Feder eines Manichäers enthielt, und man darf vermuten, dass wir auch wichtige Aufschlüsse über Mani und seine Zeit empfangen werden.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Given the fact that the book block is presumably permanently lost, and in view of the deplorable condition of the seven leaves in Berlin, this last hope must of course be given up.

Søren Giversen in a separate article[18] has provided a translation of some of this leaf, though without making the identification. Yet in light of the language used to describe the leaf in the facsimile edition, the language introducing the translation makes it clear that he has in view the same leaf.

> The last example is taken from the Addenda et Varia. It is a sheet, damaged, but not too bad[ly]. This sheet [h]as some historical informations [sic]. The handwriting reminds very much on [sic] that in the Homilies, published by H. J. Polotsky. But this text is not published, and for some reasons I think, that it was not restored together with the Homilies, because the glass and a black buckram frame is quite different from that of the Homilies. I am for the moment becoming more convinced that it has had its own history.
>
> This sheet mentions persons we know from other Manichean texts: Innaios and Sapores. I shall shortly give you a small part of it:
>
> (X, 11); . . . He told us [that] the king had arrived into the neighbourhood of our shepherd Innaios, together with the noble Persians [who were] his assistants. He spoke to him . . . He asked him to go to the king. He achieved mercy for us from him [and he] stopped our destruction. The king together with the nobelmen [sic], who were many . . . [In]naios, shall I raise . . . Innaios went into [. . .] of the king. Sapores . . .
>
> This was only to give you a little glimpse. Innaios (Zabed's brother in CMC 74, also mentioned in the great formula PG 1; 1468) is mentioned in connection with king Sapores. When the two pages are fully deciphered a more detailed definition of the text and where it comes from, can presumably be given.

The identification of the leaf need not await further decipherment; it is clearly the Berlin leaf reported upon by Schmidt and Polotsky.

Schmidt and Polotsky's report concluded with the summary of another leaf:

18. Giversen, "The Unedited Chester Beatty Mani Texts," 1985/1986, 179–80.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 29] A further leaf takes us in fact back into the time of the beginnings, for here, as mentioned above, the ARXHGOS Sisinnios is named, and a certain Salmaios, who bears the honorary title ASKHTHS. Also this Salmaios belongs, as does Sisinnios, to the first generation, for we find his name Salmaios among the disciples of Mani in the great abjuration formula. According to An Nadim in the Fihrist under Nr. 64 there is a letter of Mani directed to a certain Salam and Ansara. Besides, his name occurs on the top margins of a papyrus book [P[15999]] alongside of that of Kustaios, so that he himself must have left written material. Our historical work obviously did not flow from the pen of a single author, but was a collection of various smaller essays and reports that have been put together here under the names of the authors in question.

[p. 29] Ein weiteres Blatt führt uns nämlich in die Anfangszeit zurück, denn hier wird, wie erwähnt, der ARXHGOS Sisinnios genannt und ein gewisser Salmaios, der den Ehrentitel ASKHTHS führt. Auch dieser Salmaios gehört wie Sisinnios zu der ersten Generation, denn wir finden seinen Namen Salmaios unter den Schülern des Mani in der grossen Abschwörungsformel. Nach An Nadim im Fihrist unter Nr. 64 ist ein Sendschreiben des Mani an einen gewissen Salam und Ansara gerichtet. Ausserdem erscheint sein Name auf den oberen Rändern eines Papyrusbuches [P[15999]] neben dem des Kustaios, so dass er selbst auch Schriftliches hinterlassen haben muss. Unser historisches Werk war offensichtlich nicht aus der Feder eines einzigen Schriftstellers geflossen, sondern ein Sammelband aus verschiedenen kleineren Aufsätzen und Berichten, die unter den Namen der betreffenden Autoren hier zusammengestellt sind.

This codex, thus represented today by seven (or eight) largely illegible leaves in Berlin, 1 part of a leaf in Warsaw, and 1 more legible leaf in Dublin, a total of 9 (or 10) leaves = 18 (or 20) pages has not been published beyond the facsimiles of the leaf in Dublin and the part of this leaf published in English translation by Giversen. Stephen Patterson prepared a preliminary transcription of the leaves in Berlin during three trips there in 1987, and of the leaf in Dublin on the basis of the facsimiles in Claremont in 1988.

Photographs of both sides of the leaf without Roman numeration (here tentatively numbered [VI] 11*/12*) are on file at the Papyrus-Sammlung. One copy of each side was donated to the Manichaean Archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 12 —

P 15998: Letters

The basic report of Schmidt and Polotsky had stated:[1]

We now turn to the second papyrus book of the Berlin Manichaica. This can raise the indisputable claim to be an original work of Mani, for it has to do with the collection of his Letters. Unfortunately, thus far only 4 leaves have been separated from the pile and put under glass, but there can be no doubt of the fact itself, for again the papyrus transmits the title on the verso side and the name of the addressee on the recto side. Also in the text itself the whole title is repeated as a superscription. The papyrus book hence corresponds outwardly to the Kephalaia, except that it does not seem to be paginated. At least no numbers have thus far been found on the conserved leaves. As superscriptions there have been read ⲦⲘⲁϩⲤⲛⲦⲉ ⲛ̄ⲉⲡⲓⲥⲧⲟⲗⲏ on the verso, and on the recto ⲛ̄ⲥⲓⲥⲓⲛⲛⲓⲟⲥ, and

Wir wenden uns nun zu dem zweiten Papyrusbuch der Berliner Manichaica. Dieses kann den sicheren Anspruch erheben, Originalwerk des Mani zu sein, handelt es sich doch um seine Briefsammlung. Leider sind bis jetzt nur 4 Blätter von dem Haufen abgehoben und unter Glas gebracht worden, aber an der Tatsache selbst kann kein Zweifel bestehen, denn wiederum überliefert der Papyrus den Titel auf der Versoseite und den Namen des Adressaten auf der Rektoseite. Auch im Texte selbst ist der ganze Titel als überschrift wiederholt. Das Papyrusbuch entspricht also äusserlich den Kephalaia, nur scheint es nicht paginiert gewesen zu sein, wenigstens sind keine Zahlen auf den konservierten Blättern bisher gefunden worden. Gelesen sind als Überschriften ⲦⲘⲁϩⲤⲛⲦⲉ ⲛ̄ⲉⲡⲓⲥⲧⲟⲗⲏ auf dem Verso, auf dem Rekto ⲛ̄ⲥⲓⲥⲓⲛⲛⲓⲟⲥ,

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 24–27. The quotations are from pp. 24 and 27.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

ⲧⲙⲁϩⲱⲗⲙⲧⲉ ⲛ̄ⲉⲡⲓⲥⲧⲟⲗⲏ
on the verso, and on the recto ⲛ̄ⲥⲓⲥⲓⲛⲛⲓⲟⲥ; i.e., "the second letter (ἐπιστολή) of Sisinnios" and "the third letter (ἐπιστολή) of Sisinnios." Actually one should translate "to Sisinnios." . . . Hence we can with great expectation put this discovery of the collection of Letters worthily along side the discovery of the Kephalaia and welcome it as an important source for history contemporary with Mani.

und ⲧⲙⲁϩⲱⲗⲙⲧⲉ ⲛ̄ⲉⲡⲓⲥⲧⲟⲗⲏ
auf dem Verso, auf dem Rekto ⲛ̄ⲥⲓⲥⲓⲛⲛⲓⲟⲥ, d. h. "der zweite Brief (ἐπιστολή) des Sisinnios" und "der dritte Brief (ἐπιστολή) des Sisinnios." In Wahrheit muss man übersetzen: "an Sisinnios." . . . Wir können also diesen Fund der Briefsammlung dem der Kephalaia würdig an die Seite stellen und als eine wichtige Quelle für die Zeitgeschichte des Mani mit grossen Erwartungen begrüssen.

Wilhelm Schubart recorded in the Inventarbuch of the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum of Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR in black ink for P[15998] the entry: "Koptischer Papyruskodex" ["Coptic Papyrus Codex"]. The column regarding "Art der Erwerbung" ["Nature of the Acquisition"] reads "dsgl." ["the same"] as P[15995], i.e., "acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt in Cairo, 1931, gift of Mr. August Pfeffer 1933." Further notes added in pencil report "z. T. zwischen Glass" ["in part between glass"], "6 Blätter" ["6 leaves"], "s. Schrank 24" ["see cupboard 24"] "(Briefsammlung?)" ["(collection of letters?)"], "ähnlich 15995" ["similar to 15995"]. A rubber stamp reading "1958 vorhanden" ["1958 present"] records the return of the material from Leningrad. The stamp is followed by 6 counting marks. A faint purple carbon note reports "z. Zt. in Schondorf" ["at present in Schondorf"], and, in darker purple, "6 Blätter nach dem Osten" ["6 leaves to the east"], to which is added in black ink: "sind zurück. Codex nicht! [Rolf] Ib[scher]." ["[they] are back. Codex [is] not! [Rolf] Ib[scher]"]. Thus is recorded both the assumed fact that this codex, or, more precisely, the remains of the book block that had not yet been conserved by separating and glassing the leaves, was thought to be in Schondorf, whereas the 6 separated and glassed leaves had been taken east and were returned, as well as the contradictory assumption that the book block ("codex") was not returned from Leningrad, which seems to suggest that by now Rolf Ibscher or someone had realized that it too had been taken east. Another stamp reading "1972 vorhanden" ["1972 present"] records that 6 leaves were present at the time of the inventory of holdings made that year by Ulrich Luft, then of the Museum staff.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Böhlig reported as follows about this codex in 1960/68:[2]

3. Nobly written in very large format in decorative script is the codex P[15998], which unfortunately has also become a sacrifice of the war, except for a small residue. At the time of the report of the discovery, 4 leaves had been brought under glass, from which one could see that it had to do with the collection of Mani's letters. As page superscriptions the following were read at that time: "The Second Letter to Sisinnios" and "The Third Letter to Sisinnios." I have not found leaves with these page superscriptions now in looking through the material, but I have found a leaf with the following chapter superscription and the beginning of a letter: "The Seventh Letter to Ktesiphon on the pannychismoi (Vigils): Mani the apostle of Jesus Christ and Sisinnios and the believing elect who are with me . . ." Of this book are to be found in Berlin, put under glass already in the pre-war period, 6 leaves with the preliminary numbers 12, 13, 21, 23, 24, and 25, and about 22 leaves in half-conserved condition. The folders in which they lay were numbered, and supplement the numbers of the glassed leaves: 1–11, 14–20, 22. It is worth noting that the leaves 17–21 present an appreciably larger, quite differently arranged script, and that leaf 16 is perhaps uninscribed. Incidentally,

3. Herrlich geschrieben auf sehr grossem Format in zierlicher Schrift ist der Codex P[15998], der leider ebenfalls bis auf einen kleinen Rest ein Opfer des Krieges geworden ist. Zur Zeit des Fundberichtes waren 4 Blätter unter Glas gebracht, aus denen zu ersehen war, dass es sich um die Briefssammlung Manis handelte. Als Seitenüberschriften wurden damals gelesen: "Der 2. Brief an Sisinnios" und "der 3. Brief an Sisinnios." Blätter mit diesen Seitenüberschriften habe ich jetzt bei der Durchsicht nicht gefunden, wohl aber ein Blatt mit folgender Kapitelüberschrift und Briefbeginn: "Der 7. Brief an Ktesiphon über die pannychismoi (Vigilien): Mani, der Apostel Jesu Christi, und Sisinnios und die gläubigen Electi, die mit mir sind . . ." Von diesem Buch befinden sich in Berlin, noch in der Zeit vor dem Kriege unter Glas gebracht, 6 Blätter mit den vorläufigen Nummern 12, 13, 21, 23, 24, und 25 und ungefähr 22 Blätter in halbkonserviertem Zustand. Die Folien, in denen sie lagen, waren numeriert und ergänzen die Zahlen der verglasten Blätter: 1–11, 14–20, 22. Merkwürdig ist dabei, dass die Blätter 17–21 eine wesentlich grössere, ganz anders geartetete Schrift aufweisen, Blatt 16 vielleicht unbeschriftet ist. Die Blattzählung bedarf übrigens der

2. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 184.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the numeration of leaves needs to be corrected, for a leaf treated as an unseparated pair turns out to be triplets, and 2 leaves that were still unnumbered, with the note "Codex B from the volume of Letters of Mani," have to be given a place between 21 and 23.

Korrektur, da ein als ungelöster Zwilling betrachtetes Blatt sich als Drilling erweist und noch 2 ungezählte Blätter mit der Notiz "Codex B aus dem Bande Briefe Manis" zwischen 21 und 23 untergebracht werden müssen.

To judge by the similarity of language, it is apparently to these "half-conserved" leaves that Böhlig had referred earlier in his report of 1960/68, without identifying the codex involved (though it is distinguished from the 20 leaves of the Kephalaia that had remained in Berlin, since they are reported in the preceding text to have been conserved in 1952–1953):[3]

> The urgently needed reglasing of all the pieces that had been glassed by Hugo Ibscher and that returned to Berlin in 1958 was undertaken by Rolf Ibscher beginning in June of this year (1960), along with the conservation of a few half-conserved leaves that Ibscher Sr. had at first put to one side as too difficult, doubtlessly correctly, for it had to do usually with double or triple leaves.

It must also be these leaves that are intended in the confused statement of Rolf Ibscher in 1964–1965 quoted above:

> [p. 63] . . . a sizable number of leaves separated last, quite provisionally, by my father, with an entry on the paper cover that protected them which really creates puzzles: "from Codex B," i.e. then Chester Beatty [Synaxeis] or ?—and with the addition put in parentheses "Letters" i.e., then again Codex Nr. 15[9]98. What is one to make of that? But there is also among these leaves one with the number 361. To what does that belong?

The references by Böhlig and Rolf Ibscher are quite similar: "about 22 leaves" or "a few . . . leaves" / "a sizable number of leaves"; "half-conserved condition" or "half-conserved leaves" / "quite provisionally"; "folders" / "paper cover."

Müller's preliminary inventory of 1964–1965 listed for P[15998] "Briefsammlung, 6 Bl. in Berlin, Rest verloren" ["Collection of Letters, 6 leaves in Berlin, the rest lost"]. Here the 22 folders that created the

3. Ibid., 182.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms confusion have apparently not been identified with the Letters. They are in fact not mentioned at all in Müller's report. They may have been still in the Ibscher home.

The same omission is in Beltz's catalogue of 1978, which reported about the Letters without reference to the 22 folders as follows:

I 606 P[15998]. 6 leaves of a codex from the Mani discovery. 2 leaves of this codex are in Warsaw in the National Museum. The average height is 30 cm and an average width 17.5 cm. On an average there are 35–36 lines per page. The corpus of Mani's Letters. The state of preservation of the leaves is as poor as in the other Mani texts in Berlin. The remainder of the codex must be regarded as lost. Glass 13, recto, lines 4–8: ϵⲕⲕⲗⲏⲥⲓⲁ ϵⲧϵ . . . ⲱⲙⲟⲡⲛ / ⲛⲁⲁⲓⲛ ⲛⲁⲅⲅϵⲗⲟⲥ ⲛϵⲓ ϵⲧⲱⲙⲟⲡⲛ ⲧⲟⲩ ⲇⲟϵ . . . / ⲓⲱ . . . ⲁⲁⲛ ⲟⲩⲁⲛⲛⲓⲙ ϵⲫ . . . / ⲛⲫⲛⲁ2ⲧ ϵⲣⲁⲥ ϵⲥⲁⲱⲱⲡϵ ⲁⲁⲛ . . .

I 606 P[15998]; 6 Blätter eines Codex aus dem Manifund, 2 Blätter dieses Codex befinden sich in Warschau im National-Museum. Die durchschnittliche H. 30 und eine durchschnittliche B. 17,5. Durchschnittlich 35-36 Z., Briefkorpus des Mani. Der Erhaltungsgrad der Blätter ist so schlecht wie bei den übrigen Mani-Texten in Berlin. Der Rest des Codex muss als verloren angesehen werden. P1. 13, R. Z. 4–8: ϵⲕⲕⲗⲏⲥⲓⲁ ϵⲧϵ . . . ⲱⲙⲟⲡⲛ / ⲛⲁⲁⲓⲛ ⲛⲁⲅⲅϵⲗⲟⲥ ⲛϵⲓ ϵⲧⲱⲙⲟⲡⲛ ⲧⲟⲩ ⲇⲟϵ . . . / ⲓⲱ . . . ⲁⲁⲛ ⲟⲩⲁⲛⲛⲓⲙ ϵⲫ . . . / ⲛⲫⲛⲁ2ⲧ ϵⲣⲁⲥ ϵⲥⲁⲱⲱⲡϵ ⲁⲁⲛ . . .

Günter Poethke, Custos of the Greek manuscripts in the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR began on September–October, 1971, saw these materials in Warsaw, and on February 23, 1972, submitted a report preserved in the Archives of the Ägyptisches Museum to the effect that the two leaves are "(1/2; 3/4)." This is apparently an allusion to the two plates numbered 1 and 4, with the assumption that these are page rather than leaf numbers, and hence that the side of these leaves without a label could be numbered 2 and 3. Since he did not see the leaf numbered 3, such an assumption would have been possible, though apparently not correct. Beltz's information is based on what he saw in his own visit to Warsaw, recorded in his "Aktennotiz für die Papyrus-Sammlung der Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin" ["Memorandum for the Papyrus Collection of the State Museums in Berlin"] preserved in the same Archives. There he, following Poethke, listed "zwei Platten, die vermutlich die Seiten 1–4 enthalten" ["two plates that presumably contain the pages 1–4"].

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On December 23, 1985, Wlodzimierz Godlewski reported that 3 Manichaean leaves are at the National Museum in Warsaw. Wincenty Myszor reported on July 12, 1986, as follows on the material at the National Museum:

In the National Museum in Warsaw there are three plates that could belong to a Mani codex. All three are without number and at present only have the number of the National Museum [MN]. Two have 140 160 MN A and B and with the number 1 and 4 on the verso, one has the number 200 611 MN and with the number 3. W. Beltz has certainly seen the first two plates [cf. his catalogue]. The third plate [200 611 MN] has the same size and the same ductus, and so could, in terms of externals, belong to the same codex. On the recto the glass is cracked horizontally, but without damage to the text and the leaf. The leaf is in the same state of preservation as the two others. One can make out about 29 or 30 lines; but perhaps the text continues to 32 lines. But only traces of them survive. At the level of lines 7–8 on the verso the papyrus fibers are destroyed, so that one cannot read the text; on the recto on the other hand the fibers are preserved and hence the text is legible. On the edge a few papyrus parts are pushed [out of place]; the bottom margin of the leaf is completely destroyed except for individual fibers.

Im National-Museum in Warschau befinden sich drei Platten, die zu einem Mani-Kodex gehören könnten. Alle drei sind ohne Nummer und haben jetzt nur die Nummer vom National-Museum [MN]. Zwei sind mit 140 160 MN A und B und mit Ziffer 1 und 4 auf der Verso-Seite, und eine mit Nummer 200 611 MN und mit Ziffer 3 versehen. Die ersten zwei Platten hat bestimmt W. Beltz gesehen [vgl. seinen Katalog]. Die dritte Platte [200 611 MN] hat dieselbe Grösse und denselben Schriftductus: könnte also von aussen gesehen zu demselben Kodex gehören. Auf der Rectoseite ist die Verglasung horizontal angebrochen, aber ohne Schaden für den Text und das Blatt. Das Blatt ist in demselben Erhaltungsgrad wie die zwei anderen. Man kann circa 29 bis 30 Zeilen ausmachen; vermutlich aber geht der Text bis 32 Zeilen. Davon sind jedoch nur Spuren erhalten. In der Höhe der Zeilen 7–8 sind auf der Verso-Seite die Papyrusfasern zerstört, so dass man den Text nicht lesen kann; an der Recto-Seite dagegen sind die Fasern erhalten und ist also der Text lesbar. Am Seitenrand sind einige Papyrusteile verschoben; der untere Rand des Blattes ist bis auf einzelne Fasern ganz zerstört.

The third leaf, which has only recently been mentioned, has been in part transcribed by Myszor, which will help to clarify the identification and the nature of the text.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On September 11, 1986, Wolf-Peter Funk examined the 3 plates (and on October 29, 1986 measured the plates themselves: 35.5 to 35.7 cm by 23.0 cm), and on November 4, 1986, wrote a report that brings further clarity to the situation: The small labels with the numbers 1, 3, and 4 (as well as the Warsaw Museum labels) are on one side only, that with horizontal fibers, which is what Myszor hence meant by recto. If however one would use recto to refer to the right-hand page, as does Funk, the situation is as follows: Since broader margins are usually in the Manichaean codices not at the spine but at the leading edge, and broader margins on one side characterize the leaves in Warsaw, one can distinguish the right-hand page (Funk's recto), whose right edge would be broad, from the left-hand page (Funk's verso), whose left edge would be broad. On this basis one can determine the fiber directions of the 4 leaves (right-hand page / left-hand page) as follows: 1, vertical / horizontal; 3, vertical / horizontal; 4, horizontal / vertical. This would suggest that the numeration of the leaves could reflect the correct sequence of the leaves in relation to each other, i.e. the sequence in which they were successively separated from the book block (though it would not be clear whether the conservation took place from front to back or from back to front). For the numeration conforms to the pattern of like fiber directions facing each other as one turns the pages, i.e., the left-hand page of leaf 3 has horizontal fibers, and the facing right-hand page of leaf 4 also has horizontal fibers (or, if the conservation progressed from back to front, the left-hand page of leaf 4 has vertical fibers, which would face the right-hand page of leaf 3, which also has vertical fibers). If the missing leaf 2 had fiber directions like those of leaf 4, then leaf 2 would present like fiber directions on the side facing leaf 1 as well as on the side facing leaf 3.

This identification of which side is the left-hand page and which the right-hand page is continued by page superscriptions in the top margins. For on the left-hand page of leaves 1 and 4 is an ordinal number, and on the right-hand page of leaf 4 is a personal name, so that the page superscriptions would follow the pattern: The x-th Letter / of (or to) X. Schmidt and Polotsky already identified these page superscriptions. For on the left-hand page of leaf 1 there occurs ⲧⲙⲁϩⲱⲩⲁⲙ, and on the left-hand page of leaf 4 there occurs ⲧⲙⲁϩ . . . ϵ ⲛⲉⲡⲓⲥⲧⲟⲗⲏ . . . The three letters not transcribed could be, in Funk's opinion, ⲥⲛⲧ, though, not having the passage in Schmidt and Polotsky before him,

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

he did not actually examine the papyrus with these letters in mind. Thus the left-hand page of leaf 1 contains "The thir[d . . .]," the left-hand page of leaf 4 "The [second] Letter." Leaf 4 has on the right-hand page NCICIINNIOC. Though this would not be the continuation of the superscription read on the left-hand pages of leaves 1 and 4, but of the leaf next to leaf 4, it would nonetheless indicate the pattern of the superscriptions. This would seem to identify leaves 1 and 4 as those whose running titles Schmidt and Polotsky transcribed, even though they read the complete title. Perhaps merely because they did not indicate lacunae, as Funk expects on the basis of their complete transcription of running titles of the Synaxeis codex that are today and probably always have been fragmentary. It may well be that Schmidt and Polotsky did not actually see the page superscriptions on the right-hand facing pages to leaves 1 and 4, but only inferred from the pattern they had established what it may have been. They based preliminary codicological inferences regarding P[15998] upon their broader experience with P[15996] as they themselves state: "The papyrus book hence corresponds outwardly to the Kephalaia, except that it does not seem to be paginated."

Thus the left-hand page of leaf 4 would have contained part of a second letter, and the left-hand page of leaf 1 part of a third letter. This would suggest that the sequence of the numeration of the leaves is the reverse of their order in the codex. Leaf 4 could have been the first leaf of the codex only if one were to assume a first letter of less than two pages terminated and the second letter began on the left-hand page of that leaf. The second and/or third letters, present on the left-hand page of the first leaf (number 4, in the ordering of the leaves 4, 3, 2, 1) and the left-hand page of the fourth leaf (number 1), a total of nearly seven pages, would have been longer.

It is hence not surprising that Böhlig reported that after World War II he did not find in Berlin the pages with the superscriptions that Schmidt and Polotsky listed. His report to the effect that there were six already-glassed leaves together with the penciled notes in the Inventarbuch that six leaves were glassed and returned to Berlin would lead to the normal assumption that the four leaves that Schmidt and Polotsky reported as already glassed would be among these six. But now this would not seem to be the case. The fact that Böhlig listed the numbers on these six glasses as 12, 13, 21, 23, 24, and 25 would also tend to suggest that the 6 he located did not include the first four that Schmidt and Polotsky reported as glassed.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The inventory carried out in 1985–1986 did not locate what Rolf Ibscher referred to as "the paper cover that protected them" i.e., that protected "a sizable number of leaves." The paper contained the comments "from Codex B" and "Letters," which seemed to Rolf Ibscher confusingly contradictory, in that one reference seemed to point to Dublin (Codex B = Synaxeis), one to Berlin (Letters = P[15998]). If the "paper cover" is the same as the "folders" to which Böhlig referred, then one would no doubt have to do with the usual file folders in which papyri may well have been stored before being put in glass. They would have been left in such folders by Hugo Ibscher, since his conservation was only provisional, and would have been transferred into glass by Rolf Ibscher, even though the conservation was never adequately completed, in that in some instances parts of two leaves are still glassed together. The folders with the confusing information on them would then have been discarded.

But some of the information on the discarded paper cover has apparently been preserved on labels. The glassed but unboxed leaf labeled "Kephalaia 15996 Nr. 29" has inscribed on its label, though marked out, the numeral 361 (and on the back, also marked out, 362) as well as "zu 15998" ["to 15998"] (also marked out). Rolf Ibscher had reported in connection with the leaves provisionally preserved by his father and confusingly labeled "from Codex B" and "Letters": "But there is also among these leaves one with the number 361. To what does that belong?" Obviously the leaf has subsequently been reassigned to P[15996], but the reason remains unclear. For the numeration 361/62 should not lead to such an assignment, since that leaf of P[15996] is present at its correct position in the appropriate box. Yet such high numerations are known only in the case of P[15996], and this could have led to assigning the plate to P[15996] if the relevant box were not checked. In any case, one has here clear evidence that at least this one leaf among those that Rolf Ibscher thought might belong either to "Codex B" (the Dublin Synaxeis) or to the Berlin Letters (P[15998]) is currently assigned by its label to neither, but rather to the Kephalaia.

More extant leaves are currently assigned to the Kephalaia than one is required to postulate are from that codex. For there are only twenty-five leaves missing between the last bound leaf, pp. 439/440, and the last attested leaf, pp. 501/502. For the extant leaf pp. 455–56

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

is clearly identified as extant by its label, and the leaves pp. 447–54, 499/500 are in Warsaw. One leaf was atomized by a sneeze by Rolf Ibscher. This leaves a total of 24 leaves missing. Yet there are 32 leaves labeled P15996 (not counting plate 23, since it consists only of fragments, but recognizing that plate 30 contains 2 leaves). Up to eight leaves with this label may well belong to the Kephalaia, after p. 502, or to other codices. The leaf labeled "Kephalaia number 29," reassigned to P15998, might well belong there.

This may help to explain another instance, which, however, is less clear due to the fact that the earlier assignment is scraped off. This is a pair of leaves glassed together and labeled by hand "Kephalaia 15996 Nr. 30." This plate, like the one numbered 29, may originally have been assigned to the Letters.

When the inventory was begun in 1985, a stack of fifteen leaves (separate from the six leaves regularly listed as present) was found accompanied by a piece of paper with a note in the hand of Günter Poethke that read: "Wahrscheinlich zu P15998 gehörig (s. Vortrag von Böhlig in Moskau: 'Schweren Herzens'). 15 Platten. 26.7.72." ["Apparently belonging to P15998 (see the lecture of Böhlig in Moscow [that begins] 'With heavy heart . . .'). 15 glasses. July 16, 1972."] Poethke has explained the note as simply a pragmatic way to dispose administratively of the matter rather than as the result of new research on his part, which would account for the cautious term "apparently." The reference to Böhlig's paper of 1960/68 would no doubt have in view the passages cited above:

> . . . the conservation of a few half-conserved leaves that Ibscher Sr. had at first put to one side as too difficult, doubtlessly correctly, for it had to do usually with double or triple leaves . . .
>
> Of this book one finds in Berlin, put under glass already in the prewar period, 6 leaves with the temporary numbers 12, 13, 21, 23, 24, and 25, and about 22 leaves in half-conserved condition. The folders in which they lay were numbered, and supplement the numbers of the glassed leaves: 1–11, 14–20, 22. It is worth noting that the leaves 17–21 present an appreciably larger, quite differently arranged script, and that leaf 16 is perhaps uninscribed. Incidentally, the numeration of leaves needs to be corrected, for a leaf treated as an unseparated pair turns out to be triplets, and 2 leaves that were still unnumbered, with the note "Codex B from the volume of Letters of Mani," have to be given a place between 21 and 23.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Each plate in the stack of fifteen leaves is labeled P[15998], except for two plates labelled "Kephalaia o. Nr." "Kephalaia without number." This nomenclature recalls Böhlig's reference to "2 leaves that were still unnumbered, with the note 'Codex B from the volume of Letters of Mani.'" Since a folder was already numbered 22, there were no unoccupied digits between 21 and 23. This would account for the two leaves not having been numbered, pending a renumeration of all the leaves of P[15998], which apparently never took place. By some rather inexplicable transaction(s) they would, according to this conjecture, seem to have then been labeled Kephalaia rather than Letters, but nonetheless stored with the 13 leaves labeled P[15998], with the appended note to the effect that there were 15 leaves of P[15998]. One may suspect that originally the two plates labeled Kephalaia 29 and 30, if in fact they had been previously assigned to P[15998], may have been included in the stack of 15 plates of P[15998]. Once they had become (re)assigned to P[15996], they might have been replaced in the stack of 15 by those labeled "Kephalaia without number."

The ascription to the Letters of the six leaves (12, 13, 21, 23, 24, and 25) singled out by Böhlig as glassed by Hugo Ibscher, has never been questioned. Since what remains of the "about 22 leaves in half-conserved condition" is no longer in "folders" but has now been glassed, the distinction between the two groups can no longer be made in terms of what is glassed and what is in folders. But the 6 leaves always ascribed to the Letters can nonetheless be identified. When first seen on October 28–29, 1985, they were stacked separately. Böhlig's numbers largely confirmed this physical separation. Five bear the numbers 12, 21, 23, 24, 25, and the one lacking a label can be identified from the transcription of a few phrases of a leaf numbered 13 in Beltz's catalogue. These phrases do in fact occur, with but minor deviations from Beltz's transcription, on this leaf, which has hence been labeled in 1986 as number 13.

There is, however, a glass not stacked with the six that nonetheless is numbered 12, which thus repeats a number occurring on one of the 6 leaves that Hugo Ibscher conserved. The distinction of two stacks in which the two glasses numbered 12 lie is a weak criterion to distinguish which is among the 6 glassed by Hugo Ibscher, since the place where a glass is stacked can be so readily changed. But the 6 glasses stacked together measure 23 cm wide and 35.5 to 36.6 cm high, whereas the others assigned to P[15998] measure 25 by 35 cm. And whereas the others are framed in sticky reddish-brown tape, the 6 are framed in tan plastic tape that readily comes loose, exposing narrower white paper tape beneath. (The tan plastic tape was removed, and Gesa Schenke covered the underlying tape with Filmoplast P[90] on February 11, 1986.) Furthermore, those conserved by Hugo Ibscher have brown labels with the number prefaced by B (except for number 13 that had lost its label), and only one of the two leaves numbered 12 includes the letter B. For these reasons, the leaf labeled B 12 is clearly the leaf conserved by Hugo Ibscher.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Böhlig's report that he could not find on the 6 leaves the page superscriptions "The Second Letter to Sisinnios" and "The Third Letter to Sisinnios" that Schmidt and Polotsky quoted has been confirmed by a fresh examination of the leaves in Berlin. But these superscriptions were identified as among those in Warsaw (see above). Yet Böhlig did report finding a chapter titled, "The Seventh Letter to Ktesiphon on the pannychismoi (vigils)," which letter began: "Mani the apostle of Jesus Christ and Sisinnios and the believing elect who are with me . . ." This text, though less legible than this smooth translation suggests, is on leaf 24, the side with horizontal fibers. The title (set off from the text by horizontal lines above and below) is on extant lines 8–9, and the quotation from the opening of the text on the next two lines.

According to Böhlig, the group of about twenty-two leaves were in folders bearing the numbers 1–11, 14–20, and 22, a total of 19 numbers, 3 less than the total of about 22. Also when one adds the 6 leaves under glass and about 22 in half-conserved condition, one reaches a total of about 28 leaves, which, however, were conserved in glasses and folders numbered up only to 25, where again the discrepancy of 3 digits occurs. But this discrepancy could be explained in terms of Böhlig's observation that one folder contained 3 rather than the previously assumed 2 leaves, and that there were 2 unnumbered leaves labeled "Codex B from the volume of Letters of Mani" that belonged somewhere between 211 and 23.

Actually, the only glasses with numbers among the fifteen are the nine numbered 8–12, 14–16, and 18. All these numbers except number 12, which in Böhlig's list referred only to a leaf glassed by Hugo Ibscher and hence not to a folder, may be assumed to be the material from the folders with those numbers listed by Böhlig. The assumption is that one glass was by error given the number 12 when it was transferred from a folder that did not bear this number.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Number 10 has on its label, "Mani-Blatt gebleicht Nr 10" ["Mani leaf bleached No 10"]. The leaf is considerably lighter than the others, while the ink is dark. It is unclear why the bleaching technique, if successful, was discontinued. Perhaps concern for negative long-range effects was involved.

The numbers 1–7, 17, 19, 20, and 22 are all absent from the 15 glasses. This makes a total of 11 numbers, which would be over half of the 19 folders, or half of the original list of some 22 leaves. If one of these missing numbers may be assumed to be the glass inaccurately numbered 12, others of the missing material may be found among 4 glasses without numeration:

One unnumbered glass is labeled "Zwillingsblatt von No 8 abgelöst. Dr. I[bscher]." ["Twin leaf separated from Number 8. Dr. I[bscher]."] This label is in the same red ink as the notation on label 8 that reads "Zwillingsblatt zwischen Glas" ["Twin leaf between glass"]. The extant profile, when placed so that like fiber directions face each other, suggests they may indeed have been adjoining leaves.

One unnumbered glass is labeled (in English!) "Twins," no doubt reflecting Rolf Ibscher's (Germanic) English that he acquired in London, which is documented in his English letters. Its shape would suggest that it might have been part of Number 9, which still has part of a second leaf conserved with it. Especially the excess papyrus (covering the right edge of lines 5–10 of the side of the "Twins" that touches the horizontal fibers of leaf 9 when the contours are aligned) seems to correspond to a lacuna on leaf 9. The fact that leaf 9 is considerably smaller than the "twins" would indicate that as a single leaf, it was weaker, and when stuck would tend to lose papyrus to the stronger "twins." Thus we may have to do with what Böhlig described: "a leaf treated as an unseparated pair turns out to be triplets."

Since leaves 8 and 9 have similar profiles, one may conjecture that Hugo Ibscher separated two adjoining layers: one containing two leaves, the other three; and that Rolf Ibscher separated each layer again, producing a total of 4 plates with 5 leaves. On the assumption that like fiber directions faced each other, one could reconstruct the order as: "Twin leaf separated from number 8," with horizontal fibers facing up; followed by leaf 8, with vertical fibers facing up; followed by the twins, where horizontal fibers are visible on both sides, and hence the side facing up is determined by the extant profile; followed by leaf 9 with horizontal fibers facing up.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

One unnumbered glass lacks a label. It too contains two leaves, and hence may be assumed to fall within the category of half-conserved twins in P[15998]. Since faint traces of large letters seem to be visible, the pair could be the missing leaves 19–20 or the unnumbered two leaves belonging between 21 and 23. The extant profile is, however, so dissimilar as to make an identification difficult.

One unnumbered glass has a label that records: "Mittelteil ohne Schriftspüren, völlig zerstört, deshalb entfernt. Umbettung am 18. III. 1970." ["Middle part without traces of writing, completely destroyed, hence removed. Reconservation on 18 iii 70."] Günter Poethke has identified the handwriting as that of Rolf Ibscher's assistant, Otto Werner Luke (deceased).

Of the about 22 leaves put in folders by Hugo Ibscher and between glass by Rolf Ibscher, one may thus probably account for most of them:

- 8 folders numbered 8–11, 14–16, 18, may be presumed to be, the 8 leaves in 8 glasses with the same numbers.
- 1 leaf in a glass numbered 8 may be assumed to come from one of these folders also.
- 6 leaves are conserved in 4 unnumbered glasses, since in 2 of the 4 glasses there are 2 leaves each.

3 leaves currently labeled Kephalaia may have come from P[15998]:

1. 1 labeled as 29
2. 2 leaves in one glass container labeled as 30 (2 in 2 glass containers listed as without number are here assumed to belong to the Kephalaia.)

Böhlig conjectured that some of this codex was by mistake taken to London, on the erroneous assumption that the leaves belonged to Chester Beatty's Codex B, the Synaxeis:[4]

[p. 186] The question as to the situation regarding the last Chester Beatty codex, Codex B, is very problematic. In London there are 13 leaves, already glassed by Hugo	[p. 186] Sehr problematisch ist die Frage, was es mit dem letzten Chester-Beatty-Codex, dem Codex B, auf sich hat. In London liegen 13 Blätter, noch von Hugo

4. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 186–87.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Ibscher, unfortunately without any note as to content or titles that may have been read. Rolf Ibscher could only tell me that it has to do with an unusually large format. Thus far it has not been possible to take a look at these plates for myself. [Footnote 1: Unfortunately it is precisely their conservation that has not yet been completed; they still lie between paper and glass, so that one cannot read them without removing glass and paper. But Sir Chester Beatty has not permitted that, out of concern for the condition of the papyri.] However, with all due caution on the basis of minimal indications, I would nonetheless like to present an effort at a solution . . .

As has also been conjectured by C. Colpe, we will then indeed, in the case of the Göttingen manuscript, have to do with Codex B of the Chester Beatty collection. What then is the situation with the 13 leaves that are in London as Codex B? They ought to have been 13 leaves of the Göttingen manuscript that were the first separated and glassed by Hugo Ibscher. But if, as Rolf Ibscher recalls, they have an especially large format, that cannot be the case. I would hence like, with all due reservations, to conjecture that they were once brought to London by mistake. They are designated as Codex B. For it could perhaps be possible that Hugo Ibscher, who also designated the Berlin corpus of Letters as Codex B, once by mistake brought to London the plates, from the mass of the Ibscher verglast, leider ohne jede Notiz über Inhalt oder gelesene überschriften. Rolf Ibscher konnte mir nur mitteilen, dass es sich dabei um ein besonders grosses Format handelt. Eine eigene Ansicht dieser Platten war mir bisher nicht möglich. [Footnote 1: Gerade ihre Konservierung ist bedauerlicherweise noch nicht zu Ende geführt; sie liegen noch zwischen Papier und Glas, so dass man sie nicht lesen kann, ohne Glas und Papier zu entfernen. Das aber hat Sir Chester Beatty aus Sorge um den Zustand der Papyri nicht gestattet.] Ich möchte aber trotzdem aus minimalen Indizien in aller Vorsicht einen Lösungsversuch vortragen . . .

Wir werden es also in der Tat, wie auch von C. Colpe vermutet, bei der Göttinger Handschrift mit dem Codex B der Chester-Beatty-Sammlung zu tun haben. Was ist aber dann mit den 13 in London als Codex B befindlichen Blättern? Sie müssten 13 von Hugo Ibscher als erste abgehobene und verglaste Blätter der Göttinger Handschrift sein. Wenn sie aber, wie Rolf Ibscher sich erinnert, ein besonders grosses Format haben, so kann das nicht zutreffen. Ich möchte dann mit aller Zurückhaltung vermuten, dass sie einst versehentlich nach London gebracht wurden. Sie werden als Codex B bezeichnet. Es könnte ja vielleicht möglich sein, dass Hugo Ibscher, der auch das Briefcorpus von Berlin als Codex B bezeichnete, die Platten einmal versehentlich aus der Menge

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Mani manuscripts that were in the process of being worked on, but that they in reality belong to the corpus of Letters. For especially large format occurs only in the corpus of Letters. Besides, I was not able to find in Berlin the page superscriptions read by Schmidt on 4 glassed leaves of the corpus of Letters. But such reflections are actually idle—a glance at the London leaves should suffice to solve all these problematic questions with one blow.

der in Bearbeitung befindlichen Manihandschriften [p. 187] nach London gebracht hatte, sie aber in Wirklichkeit zum Briefcorpus gehören. Denn besonders grosses Format liegt nur beim Briefcorpus vor; ausserdem konnte ich ja die von Schmidt gelesenen Seitenüberschriften auf 4 verglasten Blättern des Briefcorpus in Berlin nicht finden. Aber solche überlegungen sind eigentlich müssig ein Blick auf die Londoner Blätter dürfte genügen, um alle diese problematischen Fragen mit einem Schlage zu lösen.

The simplest way to have identified the leaves now in Copenhagen with P[15998] would have been to identify on them the missing page superscriptions that Schmidt and Polotsky reported. But now that these missing materials would seem to have been located in Warsaw, other criteria would have to be used to identify leaves in Copenhagen as belonging to P[15998].

The 6 leaves that Hugo Ibscher conserved are labeled, in distinction to those that Rolf Ibscher glassed, with the letter B (but no codex number) preceding the number of the leaf. This may be a vestige of the designation of P[15998] as Berlin Codex B. Böhlig has reported:

The division according to capital letters A, B, etc. is in fact not the division of the Museums. It is a division that Hugo Ibscher used privately for himself. I have still seen with Rolf Ibscher file folders in which things were sorted according to such letters. It is not a claim by me that Hugo Ibscher proceeded this way also for the German parts, but here I repeat information from Rolf Ibscher from the year 196[4].

Die Einteilung nach grossen Buchstaben A, B usw. ist in der Tat nicht die Einteilung der Museen; das ist eine Einteilung, die Hugo Ibscher für sich privat benutzte. Ich habe bei Rolf Ibscher noch Verordner gesehen, in denen nach solchen Buchstaben sortiert war. Dass Hugo Ibscher das auch für die deutschen Teile so gemacht hat, ist nicht eine Behauptung von mir, sondern ich gab damit Informationen von Rolf Ibscher aus dem Jahr 196[4] wieder.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Yet this reference from the year 196[4] is precisely what is in need of clarification. For here Rolf Ibscher senses a problem that would not exist if he recognized B as the Ibscher designation for the Letters. The only other reference located thus far to the possibility that Hugo Ibscher designated as Codex B both the Berlin codex P[15998], the Letters, and Chester Beatty's Synaxeis is the confused statement of Rolf Ibscher to the effect that a sizable number of leaves separated last by his father (specified by Böhlig as "about 22") were in a paper cover; Ibscher's statement refers to them as "from Codex B" and "(Letters)." Rolf Ibscher's confusion here would seem to indicate that he was completely unaware of what Böhlig describes as his father's practice of designating the Berlin Codex P[15998], the Letters, as Codex B. For Rolf Ibscher's perplexity presupposes that the Berlin Letters were not designated Codex B. If he had known of such a practice, there would have been nothing confusing or contradictory in the two labels. Both would have affirmed that the leaves in question belong to the Berlin Codex B, P[15998], the Letters. Rolf Ibscher should not have hesitated to add these 22 leaves to the list of 6 leaves of the Letters still extant in Berlin, rather than leaving them unidentified.

Böhlig took Rolf Ibscher's reference to "an especially large format" of the 13 leaves as pointing to the Letters rather than to the Synaxeis. But this reasoning is unclear, since the format of the two codices is similar. The dimensions that Beltz gives for the extant leaves of P[15998], the Letters, is some 30 cm high by 17.5 cm wide. Leaf 18 actually measures 31.5 by 17.0, leaf 23 31.0 by 16.0, leaf 24 30.0 by 17.0, leaf 25 29.5 by 17.5 cm. This is considerably larger than the dimensions Beltz gives for P[15995], the Synaxeis, averaging 18–20 cm high by 11–16 cm wide. But here Beltz is basing his measurements no doubt on the 31 leaves in the Staatliche Museen of Berlin, which are approximately this size. But the book block in Berlin (West) measures 30 cm high (or even 31.8 cm when fringes of fiber are included) by 19 cm wide. Neither the Synaxeis nor the Letters is of unusually large format. P[15996]. The Kephalaia, measures according to Hugo Ibscher 31.5 cm high by 18 cm wide.[5] Hugo Ibscher also lists the measurements of Sir Chester Beatty's Homilies (= P[15999]) as 31.5 cm high by 18 cm wide.[6] Hugo Ibscher provides there the confusing observation:

5. Hugo Ibscher, in Polotsky and Böhlig, Kephalaia, xi.
6. Hugo Ibscher, in Polotsky, Manichäische Homilien, xiii.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

With the exception of the Psalms from the collection of Mr. Chester Beatty, which has a height of 27 cm and a breadth of 17.5 cm [measurements repeated by Ibscher in his introduction to the Psalms[7]], all the rest of the books are 31.5 cm high and 18 cm wide.	Mit Ausnahme des Psalmenbuches aus der Sammlung von Mr. Chester Beatty, das bei einer Höhe von 27 cm eine Breite von 17.5 cm besitzt [measurements repeated by Ibscher in his introduction to the Psalms[7]], sind alle übrigen Bücher 31.5 cm hoch and 18 cm breit.

For Hugo Ibscher seems, in this generalizing statement, to have overlooked P[15997], the Acts, which Beltz reports as averaging 22–25 cm high by 8–10 cm wide. Leaf IV measures 24.0 cm high by some 12.0 cm high. The leaf labeled P[15998] and 36, both changed to P[15997] and 32, is 24.9 cm high by 13.0 cm wide. It would seem that an "especially large format" would not dissociate the 13 leaves from the Synaxeis with which it had been initially associated, but only from the Psalms and the Acts, and would not associate it with any particular one of the other codices such as P[15998], the Letters. It would hence require other criteria to identify more precisely the 13 leaves.

The facsimile edition of 1986[7] presents the plates in natural size, reaching to a height only of 28.5 cm (plates 101/02, 111/12). The width reaches 17.5 cm once (plates 103/04), and, thanks to a fragment less than a centimeter in diameter at the end of a few apparently attached fibers, reaches 18.7 cm once (plates 115/16). The designation "especially large format" hence seems inappropriate, since the height lies between the smaller and larger codices, in fact nearer that of the smaller ones, and the width, which in any case varies only half a centimeter between large and small codices, in this case (with the one exception) only once reaches as much as the smaller dimension.

Tito Orlandi reported as follows on the material in Dublin in 1976:[8]

On another of the same shelves (to the right of the entrance) there are 16 numbered glasses that could represent the part of Codex B restored before the war by H.	Sur une autre des mêmes étagères (a droite de l'entrée), il y a 16 verres numérotés, qui pourraient representer la partie du Cod. B restaurée avant la guerre par H.

7. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, ix–x of the Introduction and the plates on pp. 101–26.

8. Orlandi, "Les manuscrits coptes de Dublin," 324–25.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Ibscher; the other part of Codex B, [p. 325] according to Böhlig, is in Germany (the codex of West Berlin, formerly at Göttingen). They are not of large format, according to what I could determine. This assures us that the fragments do not belong to the codex of Letters (= Berlin, Codex 3).

Ibscher; l'autre partie du Cod. B, [p. 325] selon Böhlig, se trouverait en Allemagne (codex de Berlin ouest, jadis a Goettingue). Its ne sont pas d'un grand format, d'après ce que j'ai pu constater: ce qui nous assure que les fragments n'appartiennent pas au codex des Lettres (= Berlin, Cod. 3).

Although Orlandi only states that these leaves are numbered, one may assume they are also labeled as Codex B, since Rolf Ibscher and, following him, Böhlig presuppose such an identification. The number of leaves that Rolf Ibscher had reported to Böhlig and that Böhlig had published was 13, not 16, as Orlandi reports. But Orlandi seems to have these 13 in view, in that he identifies the plates as Codex B, and in that he explicitly draws attention to the fact that the format is not large, as a correction of Rolf Ibscher's recollection that it was large. Orlandi takes this as evidence that the 16 leaves are not from the Letters, thus correcting the conjecture of Böhlig. Unfortunately, references to larger or smaller formats in this discussion are not accompanied by measurements, so that the base of comparison remains imprecise.

One must thus use all due caution with regard to Böhlig's conjecture that leaves of P[15998] are to be found in Copenhagen. Hence one should tentatively assume only that there survive of the codex of Mani's Letters: 6 leaves conserved by Hugo Ibscher, in the Staatliche Museen zu Berlin, 3 in the National Museum in Warsaw, and 15 leaves in 13 glass containers in Berlin listed in 1972 as belonging to this codex, 3 in two containers numbered 29 and 30 reassigned to the Kephalaia, and 1 reassigned to the Acts. This would make a total of 28 leaves or 56 pages that survive in whole or in part that are tentatively assigned to the Letters.

This codex has not been published.

In 1986 a facsimile edition was published[9] of the 13 leaves that Böhlig had discussed as perhaps belonging to this codex, though in Dublin. Giversen reports that those still in their original glass covers

9. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, ix–x of the Introduction and the plates on pages 101–26.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

bear the label "Codex B," which may have been the basis of the confusion. The pages had also been labeled 51–76, corresponding in the facsimile edition to pages 101–26, in such a way that facing pages have similar fiber directions. A division into two quires, each consisting of "four double leaves" is ascribed to Hugo Ibscher (with the first leaf of the first quire and the last two leaves of the second quire missing). The problem of the identity of the codex is stated, but no solution is indicated:

> The identity of this codex—or poor remnants of a codex—has been widely discussed, for example in the article by A. Böhlig cited above and in a series of other articles, as has the identity of the Mani codex in West Berlin, once called the Schondorf[f] papyrus.
>
> Since this edition should not pre-empt the results of a later critical edition, it has been decided to publish the pages in question in order to promote the work of identifying the papyrus with as little delay as possible. I have therefore refrained from offering any solution, preferring instead to provide some facts which together with the facsimiles should assist in this task.
>
> Not only are the glasses inscribed Codex B, but the frames also are marked "Kephalaia. Codex B." These labels are clearly in Hugo Ibscher's handwriting. The text in most cases is readable, although not easily.
>
> A precise description of the character and content of the text must wait until a critical edition can provide the text in full.

The labeling by Hugo Ibscher as Kephalaia would seem to suggest a still further identification than previously envisaged, either with the first volume of Kephalaia in Berlin (P[15996]) or with the second volume of Kephalaia in Dublin, Codex C, published as Volume I of the facsimile edition.[10] But Giversen does not enter further into the problem of the identification of the material, but contents himself with observing that "important subjects are clearly dealt with" and transcribing a few words.

Photographs of both sides of leaf 13 are on file at the Papyrus-Sammlung of Berlin. One copy of each side was donated to the Manichaean Archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity.

10. Giversen, Kephalaia.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 13 —

P[15999]: Homilies (Berlin Part)

Schmidt and Polotsky reported as follows:[1]

The papyrus book most recently added to the corpus of Berlin Manichaica could not yet be subjected to any further investigation. This much seems however to be certain, that it contains a collection of so-called λόγοι of different authors. The names of authors from the circle of disciples of Mani crop up on the upper margins, such as Koustaios, Salmaios.	Das jüngst zum Corpus der Berliner Manichaica gekommene Papyrusbuch konnte noch keiner weiteren Untersuchung unterzogen werden. So viel scheint aber festzustehen, dass es eine Sammlung von sogenannten λόγοι verschiedener Autoren enthält. Es tauchen auf den oberen Rändern die Autorennamen aus dem Kreise der Jüngerschaft des Mani auf, wie Koustaios, Salmaios.

Wilhelm Schubart recorded in the Inventarbuch of the Ägyptisches Museum of Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR in black ink to P[15999]: "Koptischer Papyruskodex. Erworben durch Herrn Prof. Carl Schmidt, in Cairo 1932. Geschenk des Herrn Dr. W. Kohlhammer." ["Coptic Papyrus Codex. Acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt in Cairo 1932. Gift of Dr. W. Kohlhammer."] A further note added in pencil reports under the "Standort" ["location"]: "ausgestellt" ["displayed"]. A similar hand in pencil reads "Mani." A purple carbon note reads "z. Zt. in Mo[skau]" ["at present in Mo[scow]"].

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:21 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Rolf Ibscher has reported that Kohlhammer paid 5,000 Marks for this part of a codex.[2]

Böhlig reported in 1960/68[3]:

4. P15999, not yet made accessible, is also lost. Whether this loss is so great can be doubted. For the condition of the manuscript was so desolate that among the collaborators of the papyrus collection it was generally designated as the "wig." Schmidt could determine on the basis of the captions at the top of the pages that it must have had to do with logoi of disciples of Mani.	4. Die noch nicht erschlossene Handschrift P15999 ist ebenfalls verlorengegangen. Ob dieser Verlust so schwer ist, kann man bezweifeln. Denn der Zustand der Handschrift war so desolat, dass sie unter den Mitarbeitern der Papyrussammlung allgemein als die "Perücke" bezeichnet wurde. Schmidt konnte nach Seitenüberschriften feststellen, dass es sich dabei um logoi von Jüngern Manis handeln musste.

Beltz's catalogue omits P15999, since none of it in Berlin in 1978.

This part of a codex in Berlin has not been published. But in fact it is part of the Homilies codex that is among Sir Chester Beatty's codices, which has been published (see below). Michel Tardieu[4] incorrectly refers to the Dublin Homilies as: "Codex complète de 48 feuillets conservé à Dublin (codex D)." ["Complete codex of 48 leaves conserved at Dublin (Codex D)."] He makes no reference to P15999.

2. Rolf Ibscher, in a letter of August 29, 1957, to Carsten Colpe.
3. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 184.
4. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:21 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 14 —

The Wooden Covers

From the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library the story of the acquisition that Schmidt and Polotsky reported has been augmented (above) with the information that on March 23, 1930, Beatty purchased from Maurice Nahman two bindings at £40 each, on the condition that if the British Museum decided they were later than the sixth century, they could be returned. This was the same acquisition that included two Coptic manuscripts on approval, which turned out to be part of the Psalms, which Beatty acquired, and part of the Homilies, which Beatty did not acquire, but which Schmidt did in 1932 (P^{15999}). But the two covers were paid for on March 23, 1930—there is a dated signed receipt from Nahman in the Archives. Yet a small ring binder that seems to have served in the early years as a kind of accessions book for Beatty's library records for July 30, when Nahman visited London to settle accounts with Beatty: "Sent by Nahman, belonging to him. Papyrus, with 1 cover. Safe B. (Ibscher 1930)." The reference to "Ibscher 1930" suggests this was with the Second Part of the Psalms taken in 1930 to Berlin. This suggests that one cover was associated with the manuscript on which Beatty had an option, what was to become P^{15999}, perhaps because the manuscript lay on the cover. A note in another hand reads: "Given to Dr. Ibscher for Nahman." This apparently refers to Beatty's releasing in 1932 his option for the part of the Homilies that he had on approval since 1930 and, on instructions from Nahman dated March 15, 1932, turning it over to Sir Alan Gardiner on May 10, 1932 for Ibscher to take to Berlin to be acquired there (P^{15999}). These notes would seem to indicate that one cover went with the manuscript to Berlin. Since Beatty had already paid for the cover,

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

it would presumably have been an oversight on his or his staff's part to include it in what was sent of Berlin to be purchased from Nahman.

In April 1931 Beatty again acquired two manuscripts, one listed in the ring binder as "Manichaean Hymns," that is to say, the first part of the Psalms codex, and the other as "Manichaean Ritual Laws," which is an early designation for what in fact was the other part of the Homilies codex, the part published by Polotsky. In the same record were listed "3 wooden covers."

Whereas the two covers acquired in 1930 have not been located at the Chester Beatty Library (or at the Egyptian Museum in Berlin), there is at the Chester Beatty Library a large paper envelope with a handwritten note on it stating "purchased Spring 1931," containing three wooden boards, two complete, one only partially so, each apparently a front or back cover of a codex.

Schmidt and Polotsky had reported about the wooden covers of the Manichaean codices as follows (see above):[1]

> In the process, a papyrus book [P^{15997}, Acts] emerged that lay in the original condition as when found, between two bare wooden covers, since one had risked no further handling . . .
>
> My man of confidence must have had the whole discovery before his eyes, for, according to a passing comment that he just now made to me on my visit in March 1932, the papyrus books, each surrounded by bare covers in wood, lay in a wooden box that was found in what had been a dwelling house.

In his more popular presentation of 1933, Schmidt had written: "The box contained a series of papyrus books, each surrounded by rough wooden covers."[2]

There was even a published photograph of the edges of two such boards. For Schmidt and Polotsky had reported concerning P^{15997}, the Acts:[3]

> Very briefly I can turn to the third papyrus book, which when acquired lay in the original condition between two wooden covers as remains of the binding. It too belongs to the Berlin holdings. A concept of the desolate condition of the preservation is given in the accompanying photograph . . .

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 7, 9.
2. Schmidt, Neue Originalquellen des Manichäismus aus Aegypten, 4.
3. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 27.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Wolfgang Müller listed three Coptic book bindings as still extant in 1964/65.[4] But Günter Poethke confirmed on September 31, 1986, that no Manichaean covers are included among them. There are also no references to Manichaean covers in the Inventarbuch (at least not at P15995–15999) or in the reports by Böhlig and Beltz, though they may be tacitly included in references to P15997 and P15999. Thus the two wooden covers to P15997 that apparently came from Egypt to Berlin and the cover of P15999 that apparently came to Berlin via London must be assumed to be lost.

In the case of P15996, the Berlin Kephalaia, by the time of the acquisition, the covers had apparently been ripped off of the book block, according to the report by Hugo Ibscher:[5]

> Of a binding nothing more could be discovered, since the covers had been undoubtedly removed with raw force, whereby along with the binding also at the same time any and every connection of the double leaves had been lost at the spine.
>
> Von einer Heftung war nichts mehr zu entdecken, weil die Einbände unzweifelhaft mit roher Gewalt entfernt worden sind, wobei mit der Heftung auch gleichzeitig sämtliche Zusammenhänge der Doppelblätter am Rücken verlorengegangen sind.

The existence of simple wooden boards, rather than ornate leather covers, initially posed a problem. For it had been assumed that the Manichaean codices were deluxe copies, for which ornate covers would be expected. In the initial report Hugo Ibscher had stated:[6]

> It stands beyond question that such elegantly furnished books must have also possessed valuable covers. The wooden covers without any decoration that lay along with the discoveries can never be looked upon as remainders of covers, at least not of our Mani books. It is possible that these extant wooden covers were once covered with leather. But one finds
>
> Dass derart vornehm ausgestattete Bücher auch kostbare Einbände besessen haben müssen, steht ausser jedem Zweifel. Niemals können die bei den Funden gelegenen Holzdeckel ohne jedwede Verzierung als Einbandreste angesprochen werden, wenigstens nicht für unsere Mani-Bücher. Möglich ist es, dass diese vorhandenen

4. Müller, "Die koptischen Handschriften," 66.
5. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," in Kephalaia: 1. Hälfte (Lieferung 1–10), xi.
6. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschriften," 85.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

no trace of such. But that they served the purpose of covers is proven by the extant holes and the furrows present on the long side, which was intended to receive the cord that binds the book block to the cover. It is after all well known that the Manichaeans decorated their books especially elegantly, which was on occasion turned into a reproach by their enemies. That the Copts were capable of producing precious covers is seen from the remains of covers that the Berlin Museum like the British Museum and Vienna's National Library possess. A rich collection of Coptic manuscripts with covers is also in the Pierpont Morgan Library. Even though all extant covers belong to the eighth to the tenth centuries A.D., one still does not need to doubt that 400 years earlier the Manichaeans were capable of producing even more expensive covers, which would mean for their divine works both protection and decoration. One may hope that the sand of Egypt will some day provide us attestation of this bookbinding art, of the greatest importance for the study of bookbinding.

Holzdeckel einmal mit Leder überzogen gewesen sind. Nur findet man hiervon keine Spur. Dass sie aber Einbandzwecken dienten, beweisen die vorhandenen Löcher und die längsseitig vorhandene Rille, die zur Aufnahme der Verschnürung des Buchblockes an den Deckel bestimmt war. Es ist ja bekannt, dass die Manichäer ihre Bücher besonders prunkvoll ausgestattet haben, was ihnen von ihren Feinden gelegentlich zum Vorwurf gemacht wurde. Dass die Kopten fähig waren, kostbare Einbände herzustellen, ersieht man aus den Einbandresten, die das Berliner Museum wie das British Museum und die Wiener Nationalbibliothek besitzen. Eine reiche Kollektion koptischer Manuskripte mit Einbänden birgt auch die Pierpont Morgan Library. Gehören alle vorhandenen Einbände auch dem 8. bis 10. Jahrhundert n. Chr. an, so braucht man nicht daran zu zweifeln, dass die Manichäer 400 Jahre früher in der Lage waren, noch kostbarere Einbände herzustellen, die für ihre göttlichen Werke Schutz und Zierde zugleich bedeuteten. Hoffentlich gibt uns der Boden Agyptens auch einmal Zeugen dieser Einbandkunst, die für die Einbandforschung von allergrösstem Werte wären.

In the introduction to Charles Allberry's edition of A Manichaean Psalm-Book Part II, Hugo Ibscher had conjectured:[7]

7. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," in A Manichaean Psalm-Book. Part II, xvii–xviii.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

No doubt there lay along side this one, as well as by a few other volumes of the find, raw wooden covers, and, as the dealers explained, the individual books had always lain between two such wooden covers. Here too it is regrettable that the expert could not be on hand as the treasure was dug out. In any case I doubt very much that in this condition the raw wooden covers could ever have been the cover for these valuable books. It is for me certain that the original covers have been removed by force from the book block. Whether this took place already in antiquity, or first after the discovery by the dealers, is left open. I personally assume that the destruction took place already in antiquity, perhaps by a later owner, who either used the valuable bindings for other works, or wanted to make money out of the precious stones and metals that had been used for the decoration of the holy books. Otherwise it cannot be explained that it is precisely at the spine of the books that the destruction appears so strongly. If the books had not been ripped out of the cover, the firm spine of the cover would have protected the book block at this place from harm [p. xviii], and the sewing would have been preserved for us. It is lucky for us that the scribe has left at the spine of the book about 2 cm of free space, otherwise much more line beginnings would have been lost by the brutal ripping out of the book block from the cover. On

Es lagen wohl bei diesem, wie auch bei einigen anderen Bänden des Fundes rohe Holzdeckel dabei, und wie die Händler erklärten, hätten die einzelnen Bücher immer zwischen zwei solchen Holzdeckeln gelegen. Es ist auch hier wieder zu bedauern, dass der Fachmann nicht zur Stelle sein konnte, als der Schatz gehoben wurde. Jedenfalls be-zweifele ich sehr, dass die rohen Holzdeckel in diesem Zustande jemals den Einband für diese kostbaren Bücher abgegeben haben. Fest steht für mich, dass die ursprünglichen Einbände mit Gewalt vom Buchblock entfernt worden sind. Ob dies schon im Altertum oder erst nach der Auffindung durch die Händler geschehen ist, sei dahingestellt. Ich persönlich nehme an, dass die Zerstörung bereits im Altertum, vielleicht durch einen späteren Besitzer erfolgte, der die kostbaren Einbände entweder für andere Werke verwendete, oder aber die zur Ausschmückung der heiligen Bücher verwendeten Edelsteine und Edelmetalle zu Geld machen wollte. Anders ist es nicht zu erklären, dass gerade am Rücken der Bücher die Zerstörung so stark in die Erscheinung getreten ist. Wären die Bücher nicht aus dem Einband gerissen worden, so hätte gerade der feste Rücken des Einbandes den Buchblock an dieser Stelle vor Scha- [p. xviii] den bewahrt, und die Heftung wäre uns erhalten geblieben. Ein Glück für uns, dass der Schreiber am Rücken des Buches etwa 2 cm freien Raum gelassen hat, sonst wären noch weit mehr Zeilenanfänge durch das brutale Herausreissen des Buchblockes aus dem Einband verlorengegangen. Auf der beigefügten the appended picture one can still clearly recognize the violent destruction on the spine of the book.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

If the covers really were of wood, and the dimensions of the two covers found with the Psalms book justify this conjecture, then Greek binding artists must have been at work, who already in very early times knew of the use of wood for covers. All early Coptic covers that have cropped up in Egypt—from the 6th to the 8th centuries A.D.—consistently present covers that have been constructed from the remains of the papyrus stalk, or in which the covers were pasted together from old cartonnage. It would have been very nice to come to know here for once old covers from the beginning of the 4th century A.D., which would have advanced considerably our knowledge in the area of research into book binding, since the earliest covers come from the 6th century A.D.

Abbildung kann man die gewaltmässige Zerstörung am Buchrücken noch gut erkennen.

Sollten die Einbanddeckel wirklich aus Holz bestanden haben, und die Grösse der beiden mit dem Psalmenbuch gefundenen Decked rechtfertigen diese Vermutung, dann müssen hier griechische Einbandkünstler am Werke gewesen sein, die die Verwendung von Holz zu Einbanddeckeln schon in sehr früher Zeit kannten. Sämtliche bisher in Ägypten aufgetauchten frühen koptischen Einbände—aus dem 6. bis 8. Jahrhundert n. Chr.—zeigen durchweg Deckel, die aus Abfällen von der Papyrusstaude hergestellt sind, oder bei denen die Deckel aus alter Makulatur zusammengeklebt wurden. Es wäre erfreulich gewesen, hier einmal alte Einbände aus dem Ausgang des 4. Jahrh. n. Chr. kennenzulernen, die unsere Kenntnis auf dem Gebiete der Einbandforschung ungemein gefördert hätte[n], da die frühesten Einbände aus dem 6. Jahrh. n. Chr. stammen.

In 1938 Charles Allberry was no doubt following Ibscher in conjecturing the bindings were ripped out in antiquity:[8]

> When the dealers divided each book up they had to tear the parts asunder. The books seem to have been ripped out of their bindings in antiquity and in consequence one margin has disappeared, so that on alternate pages for the most part the beginning and the end of the lines are more often than not destroyed.

Hugo Ibscher reported further about the luxurious covers of Manichaean codices in 1940:[9]

8. Allberry, "Manichaean Studies," 341.
9. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," in Kephalaia: 1. Hälfte (Lieferung 1–10), vii–viii.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The fact that the Mani manuscripts have come down to us in codex form does not mean in and of itself anything new, but is actually quite a matter of course. For also the manuscripts of the Manichaean primitive community that may have served as a Vorlage for the Coptic scribes usually already had this book form. Although [p. viii] according to the discoveries in Dura, in the region of the Euphrates, papyrus writing material was not unknown, in contrast to the Mani manuscripts from Egypt the writing material used for the manuscripts of the primitive community will have been parchment. This is clearly and unambiguously shown from the many reports of the Arabic writings, according to which, in burning the Mani writings in the time of persecution, "precious stones fell out and gold flowed out." Both were materials that were used only to decorate codex covers, but never for the protective coverings for papyrus rolls. Just so Augustine also as a fanatical opponent of the Manichaeans called on his followers in his polemical writings, "burn all those parchment manuscripts and those expensive leather covers."

Dass die Manihandschriften in Kodexform auf uns gekommen sind, bedeutet an und für sich nichts Neues, sondern ist eigentlich ganz selbstverständlich. Denn auch die Handschriften der Manichäischen Urgemeinde, die den koptischen Schreibern als Vorlage gedient haben mögen, trugen sicher schon diese Buchform. Obgleich [p. viii] nach den Funden in Dura im Euphratgebiet der Papyrus-Beschreibstoff nicht unbekannt gewesen ist, wird aber im Gegensatz zu den Manihandschriften aus Agypten der für die Handschriften der Urgemeinde verwendete Beschreibstoff Pergament gewesen sein. Dies geht klar und eindeutig aus den vielen Berichten der arabischen Schriftsteller hervor, wonach bei der Verbrennung der Manischriften in der Verfolgungszeit "Edelsteine herausfielen und Gold herausfloss." Beides Materialien, die nur zur Ausschmückung der Kodexeinbände Verwendung fanden, niemals aber bei den Schutzhüllen für die Papyrusrollen. Ebenso forderte auch Augustin als fanatischer Gegner der Manichäer in seinen Streitschriften seine Anhänger auf, "verbrennt alle jene Pergament-Handschriften und jene kostbaren Ledereinbände."

Such assumptions about luxurious Manichaean covers do not provide a solid basis for putting in question that these simple boards were in fact the original covers of these Manichaean codices. There are no grounds for further speculation implying something like a rebinding in antiquity, which of course could take place (P. Bodmer XIV–XV), but should not be conjectured merely as an inference from secondary literature.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

To judge by the similar position of the holes in two of the three Dublin boards and their similar overall dimensions and irregularities, these two belonged to the same codex. The two covers measure 34 cm high by 19.4 (at the top) to 19.8 cm (at the bottom) wide. The third board, presumably from a different codex, is incomplete, having a vertical break resulting in dimensions of 32.7 to 33.0 cm high by 12.5 to 14.4 cm wide. If one may calculate that the relative dimensions of the two codices would have been about the same, one may assume that the original width of the broken board would have been only slightly less than that of the other two boards, indicating an original size for it of about 33 by 19 cm.

These dimensions of the covers are slightly larger than the dimensions of any of the leaves, which reach to about 31.5 cm in height (P^{15996}, Volume 1 of the Kephalaia; P^{15998}, the Letters; the Synaxeis book block, Codex B; and the Dublin part of the Homilies, Codex D), with widths reaching 19 cm for the book block of the Synaxeis. But if one may assume that the covers would normally be slightly larger than the leaves, the measurements of the covers could correspond to any of these four codices. P^{15997}, the Acts, that Beltz reported to average 22–25 by 13.0 cm wide, was still between its wooden covers when Schmidt acquired it, and so does not come in question. The Psalms, Codex A, 27 by 17.5 cm, was also sufficiently smaller that one might doubt that the extant covers belonged to it, even though apparently acquired in the same transaction as that involving the front part of the Psalms. To be sure, Ibscher used "the size of the two covers found with the Psalms book" to justify the conjecture that the codices actually had wooden covers. But these covers would not seem to be the covers of the Psalms codex, but rather of the Homilies, parts of which were sold in each of the transactions (1930 and 1931) involving parts of the Psalms codex, or even to another of the Manichaean codices, given the jumbling of the material in the hands of middlemen, and the fact that both Schmidt and Beatty bought from Nahman.

The two completely extant boards at the Chester Beatty Library do have vestiges of leather on each side, with traces of tooling marks of circles and lines on the outside surfaces. There are a series of holes through the boards at positions near three edges of the boards, positioned on the two boards so that they correspond to each other. Two pegs are still in a hole each on one board, and one peg in a hole on the other, all three on the head and foot sides of the covers. These holes are no doubt near enough the lips of the covers that pegs or thongs could have passed through both covers to hold the codex closed without having to pass through the quires themselves. On the long side without holes, an indention some 2 cm wide and .5 cm deep has been chiseled out for the length of this side. This indention may have been intended to be covered with a leather band functioning as the flexible spine, to hold the two covers together. As to the four corners of each board, those at the end of the long chiseled edge are pointed; whereas those at the end of the long side with holes are rounded.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Since no covers are extant in Berlin, further information about the Manichaean covers is apparently limited to the three boards at the Chester Beatty Library. Unfortunately, the several publications by Berthe van Regemorter on the book bindings of the Chester Beatty Library do not seem to have made reference to such unpretentious boards.[10] Yet they are so dissimilar from the covers of the Nag Hammadi Codices and of the Disnha (Bodmer) Codices (though rather near in time and space), that a detailed analysis might result in the kind of new insight into the history of bookbinding that Ibscher had envisaged, in his appeal to the Greek tradition to explain them.

10. Van Regemorter, "Le Codex relié depuis son origine jusqu'au Haut Moyen-Age," 1–26; Van Regemorter, Some Early Bindings from Egypt in the Chester Beatty Library; Van Regemorter, Some Oriental Bindings in the Chester Beatty Library.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 15 —

Codex A: Psalms

Schmidt and Polotsky list in first place among Sir Chester Beatty's holdings the Psalms:[1]

One has to do in the London collection with a large papyrus book. The individual psalms were numbered. The highest number that has been read thus far is 230. If we could assume for the individual psalms an average length of (at least) 2 pages, this would require an extent of 460 pages = 230 leaves. Hence one does not go wrong in calculating that the whole book, as in the case of the Kephalaia, consisted of over 250 leaves. Unfortunately the individual leaves are not paginated, and there are no running heads on the upper margins. The individual psalms are simply distinguished by the numbers. Thus far about 50 of the extant leaves have been brought under glass, so that our knowledge of the content is still quite limited.

Es handelt sich in der Londoner Sammlung um ein umfangreiches Papyrusbuch. Die einzelnen Psalmen waren numeriert. Die höchste Zahl, die bis jetzt gelesen wurde, ist 230. Würden wir für die einzelnen Psalmen eine durchschnittliche Länge von (mindestens) 2 Seiten annehmen, würde dies einen Umfang von 460 Seiten = 230 Blättern erfordern. Deshalb geht man nicht fehl, das ganze Buch wie bei den Kephalaia auf über 250 Blätter zu berechnen. Leider sind die einzelnen Blätter nicht paginiert and finden sich keine Titelüberschriften auf den oberen Rändern; die einzelnen Psalmen sind einfach nur durch die Nummern unterschieden. Von den vorhandenen Blättern sind bisher nur etwa 50 unter Glas gebracht, so dass unsere Kenntnis des Inhalts noch beschränkt ist.

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30, 34. The quotation is from 34.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:27 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

C. R. C. Allberry published in 1938 the last half of the Psalms, which had been purchased and hence conserved first.[2] In the Preface he reported:

> What is presented here, in the same format as the Homilies and the Kephalaia, is the Psalm-book (see Mani-Fund, pp. 33ff. [actually 30–34]), or rather the second part of the Psalm-book: for before it appeared in the Cairo market the codex had already been split up into several blocks, and on the largest and least mutilated of these, together with a smaller block preceding it, the two forming approximately one half of the codex, Dr. Hugo Ibscher, the Papyruskonservator in the Berlin Egyptian Museum, began his work of reconstruction, and succeeded between 1931 and 1934 in separating and glassing about one hundred and twenty consecutive leaves. These are published here with an English version and a minimum of annotation.

In the Crum Archives of the Griffith Institute in the Ashmolean Museum in Oxford, there is a file of transcriptions (sometimes with translations and/or notes) by H. J. Polotsky. (Its classification in terms of published, inventory numbers II.28.1 ff. on the back of each leaf, and unpublished, II.30.1 ff., is inexact.) Some are pages published by Allberry, but others are unpublished:

- II.30.1 (= II.28.138, with Polotsky's English translation at II.28.142), with the Psalm numeration 213 and the comment that it precedes page 1 of Allberry, i.e., that it is from the unpublished first part of the Psalms (Allberry's volume began with the last 3 lines of Psalm 218)
- II.30.2 (= II.28.140)
- II.30.3 (= II.28.140)
- II.30.4 (= II.28.136)
- II.30.5 (= II.28.139)
- II.30.6 (= II.28.137), with II.30.7 representing a second transcription and a second hand (Allberry?) and
- II.30.10

Unpublished transcriptions or translations of the Chester Beatty holdings have not been located in the Chester Beatty Archives.

2. Allberry, A Manichaean Psalm-Book, Part II.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:27 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Torgny Säve-Söderbergh soon published an important comparison of the Psalms with Mandaean hymnody.[3]

Böhlig presented this first codex of Sir Chester Beatty as follows[4]:

1. The Psalms (Codex A) was edited in 1938 in its second part (115 [read: 117] leaves) by C. R. C. Allberry. It contains various types and collections of psalms and became the most noted work of the Manichaean discovery, especially since religious feeling came here more strongly to expression and addressed one's own religious feeling more than was the case in the rationalistic style of the Kephalaia. The remaining leaves, a total of 56, were conserved by Rolf Ibscher after the war. They have been awaiting editing for years.

1. Das Psalmbuch (Codex A) wurde in seinem 2. Teil (115 [read: 117] Blätter) von C. R. C. Allberry 1938 ediert. Es enthält verschiedene Typen und Sammlungen von Psalmen und wurde zum beachtesten Werk des manichäischen Fundes, insbesondere weil das religiöse Gefühl hier stärker zum Ausdruck kam und angesprochen wurde als durch den logizistischen Stil der Kephalaia. Die restlichen insgesamt 56 Blätter wurden von Rolf Ibscher nach dem Kriege konserviert. Sie harren seit Jahren der Edition.

Since none of this codex is in Berlin, it is not included in Beltz's catalogue. However, Tito Orlandi published a report on Coptic manuscripts in the Chester Beatty Library in 1976, where he reported:[5]

3. Säve-Söderbergh, Studies in the Coptic Manichaean Psalm-Book.

4. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 185. The typescript of the 1960 address that is in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library has been corrected by hand to read 117 rather than 115 leaves, though the text of Böhlig's address published in 1968 was not so corrected. There are in fact 234 Coptic pages that Allberry published, which would support the correction to 117 leaves. Böhlig's comment about the greater popularity of the Psalms is a reflection of Torgny Säve-Söderbergh, Studies in the Coptic Manichaean Psalm-Book, especially p. 1:

> Whereas the Kephalaia, edited by Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig, consist chiefly of a rather dry and dull systematization of the Manichaean dogma and the Homilies, edited by Polotsky, are unfortunately very fragmentary, the rather well preserved Psalm Book not only have an interesting content, but are also composed in a most charming poetical form.

5. Orlandi, "Les manuscrits coptes de Dublin, du British Museum et de Vienne," 324.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:27 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

During our visit we were able to verify that the already-edited manuscripts have been carefully separated from the fragments that are still unedited. They are also readily recognizable, leaf by leaf, by comparing them with the editions that one has. In effect we have noted that the part of Codex A edited by Mr. Allberry (Psalms Part II) is perfectly conserved in 9 little wooden boxes, in which the glasses containing the leaves are arranged in vertical position . . .

Let us now come to the unpublished materials. The first part of Codex A (Psalms), which had been conserved soon after the war, and which, according to Böhlig, included 56 glasses, consists in fact of 106 glasses (of which some conserve two fragments), arranged in their turn in 9 little boxes equal to those of the second part. On the shelves to the right of the entrance (where the unpublished leaves restored after the war by R. Ibscher are put) there are also 49 glasses numbered in relation to the recto and verso of the fragments (each glass hence has two numbers). They bear no identification. But, given the characteristics of some titles, of the hand and of the format, they must comprise a third part of the Psalms, [a part] whose existence seems unknown up to the present.

Pendant notre visite, nous avons pu verifier que les manuscrits déjà édités ont été soigneusement separés des fragments encore inédits; ils sont aussi aisément reconnaissables, feuillet par feuillet, en comparaison avec les éditions que l'on possède. En effet, nous avons constaté que la partie du Cod. A éditée par M. Allberry (Psaumes, IIe partie) est parfaitement conservée dans 9 petites caisses en bois, dans lesquelles les verres contenant les feuillets sont ranges en position verticale . . .

Venons-en maintenant aux inédits. La I^{e} partie du Cod. A (Psaumes), qui avait été restaurée peu après la guerre, et qui selon Böhlig comprenait 56 verres, se compose en fait de 106 verres (dont certains conservent deux fragments), rangés a leur tour dans 9 petites caisses, égales a celles de la IIe partie. Sur les étagères a droite de l'entrée (ou sont placés les feuillets inédits restaurés après la guerre par R. Ibscher) ii y a en outre 49 verres, qui sont numerotés par rapport au recto et verso des fragments (chaque verre a donc deux numéros); ils ne portent aucune indication; mais, étant donné les caractéristiques de certains titres, de l'écriture et du format, ils devraient former une IIIe partie des Psaumes, dont l'existence parait jusqu'a maintenant inconnue.

Thus one would be led to infer that there are 155 glasses containing unpublished leaves or fragments of Codex A.

The typed page in the Chester Beatty Library titled "Manichean Papyri on Loan to Royal Library, Copenhagen," dated January 13,

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:27 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

1984, lists under "Psalm Book" 9 boxes containing a total of 106 glasses, which is presumably the material that Orlandi listed as labeled as belonging to the Psalms but unpublished. The list of material taken to Copenhagen then itemizes folios numbered 219–308, 369–78, a total of 50 glasses; numbers 387–404, 9 glasses, marked as fragments; leaves numbered 51–76, a total of 13 glasses, marked as Codex B; and 6 glasses marked fragments and numbered x1–x12. The 13 glasses marked Codex B can safely be identified with plates 101–26 of the second volume of the facsimile edition.[6]

Søren Giversen explained in a telephone conversation of September 4, 1985, that the material taken to Copenhagen included the 13 unidentified leaves that Böhlig had conjectured might belong to the Berlin Letters, P[15998] (that in fact probably belong to the Synaxeis), as well as leaves that, according to the Dublin records, were not listed as from the Psalms but which, since Giversen detected in them psalms, might belong to the Psalms. This would lead one to conclude that the 50 unidentified leaves taken to Copenhagen include the 49 unidentified leaves that Orlandi ascribed to the Psalms. The remaining unidentified leaf in Copenhagen may be that of P[15997].

Søren Giversen published in 1986 an English translation of parts of two Psalms from Part One of the Psalms. He introduced the first with the comment: "From notes and decipherment from 1931, I can see, that something has gone [sic] lost since then, especially at the beginning of lines 30–33."[7] One must infer that this is an allusion to a transcription and/or translation and notes by H. J. Polotsky, such as he provided in 1931–1932 to Sir Herbert Thompson to translate into English and supply to Beatty, though Polotsky's Coptic transcription, translation, and/or notes have not yet been located in the Crum or Chester Beatty Archives. It is unclear why such a use of Polotsky's scholarship would not be clearly stated.

The other Psalm that Giversen translates is numbered 119 and entitled "Psalms on the Lord's Day."[8] From the work of Polotsky (recognizable by his abbreviated signature in the bottom right-hand corners: "P-y") preserved in the Griffith Institute, there is a page in his handwriting that he numbered "C.B.i, 'II'a" (Crum Mss II.30.2)

6. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, ix–x, 101–26

7. Giversen, "The Unedited Chester Beatty Mani Texts," 376.

8. Ibid., 378–79.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:27 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms with the title 'CALMOI THS KYRIAK' and the numeral RIQ, followed by 8 lines of text. Polotsky also provided a typed German translation (Crum Mss II.28.85 = Crum Mss II.28.7). Giversen, after quoting the title and numeral, presents, as "a," 8 lines of text in English translation corresponding to Polotsky's 8 lines, followed by "b," introduced with the comment "plus or minus 7 lines almost illegible" and then an English translation of lines 8–33. These lines correspond to those on the page that Polotsky numbered "C.B. i, 'II' b" (Crum Mss II.30.3 in Coptic transcription and Crum Mss 11.28.86 and Crum Mss II.28.8 in German translation). Since Giversen refers in the case of the first Psalm that he translates to the "notes and decipherment from 1931," it is hard to avoid the conclusion that the other English translation of a Psalm that he presents is also based at least in part on Polotsky's transcription and German translation. But it is very difficult to understand why, in that case, appropriate acknowledgement to Polotsky is not given: all the more so when one recalls that due to racist legislation in the Third Reich, the first volume of the Kephalaia could not carry Polotsky's name, so that the co-editor Böhlig left off his own name as well, and explained the lamentable situation after World War II, when the publication of the first double-fascicle of the second volume appeared. One would think that with such a background, one would be scrupulous to give Polotsky due credit for his excellent work. Only when the facsimile edition of the Psalms appears will it be possible to see to what extent the papyrus itself is still as legible as it was in Polotsky's day, and to what extent we all, including Giversen, are dependent on Polotsky for rescuing text subsequently lost, as Giversen indirectly concedes in the case of the first Psalm that he translates.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:27 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 16 —

Codex B: Synaxeis

Schmidt and Polotsky reported as follows: A third papyrus book, that surely had a size of 250 leaves, seems to belong together with the Living Gospel of Mani. Also a bundle from this papyrus, to the extent of 31 leaves, was brought under glass by Dr. Ibscher. Already there has been a brief report about the titles that were read (see above, P[15995]). The book would be of great importance for Mani research, if some kind of commentary to the Gospel of Mani would be hidden there.[1]

Thus Codex B of Sir Chester Beatty is identified as the bulk of the codex of which 31 leaves are in Berlin. For Schmidt and Polotsky had reported (see above) that these 31 leaves "were acquired in the Fayyum and without doubt belong to the London Mani pieces." For in the description of their acquisition, it was stated that "the antiquities dealer in the Fayyum had sold his manuscripts exclusively to Mr. Chester Beatty." The 31 leaves are an exception, for "one had removed the top and bottom layers of papyrus, which had suffered to an especial extent against the covers of the binding . . . , to give the whole a better appearance." In the spring of 1931, after Sir Chester Beatty had acquired the three codices of the Fayyum dealer, Schmidt "found such outwardly unimpressive remains, which doubtlessly belong to the papyrus books acquired by Mr. Chester Beatty in the Fayyum, and . . . acquired them for a cheap sum, since the dealer already had his great reward in his pocket." Thus only the 31 leaves from the Synaxeis that Schmidt acquired are inventoried in Berlin as P[15995], and the rest of the codex, to the extent extant, comprises Codex B of Sir Chester Beatty.

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 34. "Ein drittes Papyrusbuch, das sicherlich einen Umfang von 250 Blättern gehabt hat, scheint mit dem 'lebendigen Evangelium' des Mani zusammenzuhängen. Auch von diesem Papyrus ist ein Konvolut im Umfang von 31 Blättern von Dr. Ibscher unter Glas gebracht. Über die gelesenen Überschriften ist vorhin kurz berichtet [see above, P[15995]]. Das Buch wäre für die Mani-Forschung von grosser Wichtigkeit, wenn irgendeine Art von Kommentar zum 'Evangelium' des Mani sich dahinter verbergen würde."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Rolf Ibscher reported to Sir Chester Beatty that Codex B had by mistake been left in the anti-aircraft tower at the Zoo, rather than having been taken with Sir Chester Beatty's other codices to Schondorf, and that hence it had been taken to Leningrad along with the Berlin holdings. Rolf Ibscher maintained that the codex that was left in Schondorf when the others there were returned to Sir Chester Beatty was P[15998], the Letters, a codex belonging to Berlin. But once the scholarly study of the Schondorf codex was undertaken in Göttingen by Colpe and Böhlig, it became obvious that this codex was the Synaxeis Codex B, belonging to Sir Chester Beatty.

Böhlig presented in 1957 at the 24th International Orientalists' Congress in Munich a report to this effect:[2]

During the war, along with the codices belonging to Sir Chester Beatty, a Manuscript was stored outside into the territory that is now the Bundesrepublik. This text is at present in Göttingen for conservation. In 1957, while looking through the leaves that have thus far been separated (which are in an unusually bad condition), I thought I could reconstruct from individual words the same running head. [Footnote 3: For the possibility of being permitted to see the codex I am indebted to the friendliness of the Göttingen Egyptologist S. Schott, who was in charge of the undertaking. I also owe special thanks to C. Colpe and R. Ibscher, who occupied

Im Kriege wurde zusammen mit den Sir Chester Beatty gehörigen Codices eine Handschrift in das jetzige Gebiet der Bundesrepublik ausgelagert; dieser Text befindet sich gegenwärtig in Göttingen zur Konservierung. Bei einer Durchsicht der bisher abgehobenen Blätter, die sich in einem ausserordentlich schlechten Zustand befinden, im Jahre 1957 glaubte ich, aus einzelnen Wörtern die gleiche Überschrift rekonstruieren zu können. [Footnote 3: Die Möglichkeit, den Codex ansehen zu dürfen, verdanke ich der Freundlichkeit des Göttinger Agyptologen S. Schott, der das Unternehmen betreute. Besonderen Dank schulde ich auch C. Colpe und R. Ibscher, die sich um die Restaurierung und Abschrift be-

2. Böhlig, "Synaxis = Homilie," 485–86; "Zu den Synaxeis des Lebendigen Evangeliums," 229–30. The full text of this address is published in Mysterion and Wahrheit, 222–27. The quotation is from 222–23.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

themselves with the restoration and transcription.] On one leaf one could read "the first" in a page's running head, as the only surviving remnant at the top left, on another leaf in the middle synaxis, on a third leaf to the left above, logos. These readings could be combined with two chapter titles that for their part could not be completely recognized. One reads: "The [p. 223] synaxis of the [1]9th logos." Though synaxis is here hardly legible, it is nonetheless confirmed by a second chapter title, in which synaxis is to be recognized without doubt as the first word. Through these readings the same title can be assumed for the running heads of the book, as C. Schmidt also read in one of the 31 leaves mentioned above. The running heads of the pages would hence be divided as follows on verso and recto: "The 1st Synaxis of the 1st logos of the Living Gospel." Thus one can assume, as also C. Colpe thinks, that the vestige of a codex in Berlin discussed by C. Schmidt forms with this codex a unity of contents but not of ownership.

mühten.] Auf einem Blatt war als Seitenüberschrift als einziger Rest links oben "die erste" zu lesen, auf einem anderen Blatt in der Mitte synaxis, auf einem 3. Blatt links oben logos. Diese Lesungen konnten mit zwei Kapitelüberschriften kombiniert werden, die ihrerseits auch nicht vollständig zu erkennen waren; die eine lautet: "Die [p. 223] synaxis des [1]9. logos"; ist dabei synaxis kaum lesbar, so wird es doch bestätigt durch die 2. Kapitelüberschrift, in der SYNAXIS als erstes Wort einwandfrei zu erkennen ist. Durch diese Lesungen kann für die Überschriften des Buches derselbe Titel angenommen werden, wie ihn auch C. Schmidt auf einem der oben erwähnten 31 Blätter gelesen hat. Die Seitenüberschriften würden sich auf Verso und Recto folgendermassen verteilen: "Die 1. synaxis des 1. / logos des Lebendigen Evangeliums." Damit kann man annehmen, wie auch C. Colpe meint, dass der von C. Schmidt besprochene Berliner Restcodex mit diesem Codex eine inhaltliche, aber keine besitzmässige Einheit bildet.

Böhlig in 1960/68 reaffirmed this position:[3]

Carl Schmidt, in his report on the discovery, listed as belonging to the English acquisition a book that has to do with Mani's Living Gospel. He considered the Berlin remnant of a codex consisting of 31 leaves (P^{15995}), which we

Carl Schmidt hat in seinem Fundbericht zum englischen Besitz gehörig ein Buch angeführt, das es mit Manis Lebendigem Evangelium zu tun hat. Als Teil von ihm und von den Händlern abgetrennt betrachtet er den

3. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 186.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

listed above as the fifth book of the Berlin collection, to be a part of it separated off by the dealers. The manuscript that is now in Göttingen, and was considered as belonging to Berlin at the time of its rescue in the anti-aircraft tower in 1944, turned out, in the superscriptions identified by me in 1957 and confirmed by C. Colpe, to belong with the 31 Berlin leaves, what now also, on seeing the 31 leaves, is confirmed by the format. So we have to do indeed, as is also conjectured by C. Colpe, in the case of the Göttingen manuscript, with Codex B of the Chester Beatty collection.

Berliner Restcodex von 31 Blättern (P^{15995}), den wir oben als 5. Buch der Berliner Sammlung genannt haben. Die jetzt in Göttingen befindliche und bei der Bergung aus dem Flakturm 1944 als Berliner Besitz angesehene Handschrift erwies sich in den von mir im Jahre 1957 identifizierten und von C. Colpe bestätigten Überschriften als mit den 31 Berliner Blättern zusammengehörig, was jetzt auch bei In-Augenschein-Nahme der 31 Blätter das Format bestätigte. Wir werden es also in der Tat, wie auch von C. Colpe vermutet, bei der Göttinger Handschrift mit dem Codex B der Chester-Beatty-Sammlung zu tun haben.

Rolf Ibscher in 1964/65 (see above) conceded that the Schondorf-Göttingen–West Berlin codex is the same codex from which the 31 leaves P^{15995} come:

> Carsten Colpe, who worked for a time on the leaves that had been won up until then, brought into play in Munich at the International Orientalists' Congress [1957] the thesis that the manuscript does not belong to Berlin at all, but is identical with the 13 leaves of Codex B in Dublin . . . Böhlig on the other hand maintained that the 31 leaves of the Berlin codex Nr. 15995 belong, in view of the shared titles on the pages (SYNAXIS), together with the Göttingen codex, whereas he had earlier held it to be codex Nr. 15998 . . . What is then the situation with the 31 leaves in Berlin, that after all are identical with those of the codex in Göttingen?

Rolf Ibscher also raised the question as to whether leaves still in Berlin might belong to the Chester Beatty Library's Codex B, the Synaxeis:

> . . . a sizable number of leaves separated last, quite provisionally, by my father, with an entry on the paper cover that protected them, which really creates puzzles: "from Codex B," i.e., then Chester Beatty [Synaxeis]or ?—and with the addition put

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> in parentheses "Letters," i.e., then again Codex Nr. 15[9]98. What is one to make of that?[4]

These leaves are currently in the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin, where they are classified as belonging to P^{15998}. They present no running heads or chapter titles like those of the Synaxeis codex.

Rolf Ibscher had sought to maintain that the Schondorf-Göttingen codex belonged to the Berlin Museum on the grounds that it was part of P^{15995}, either ignoring or ignorant of the fact that the Berlin acquisition, P^{15995}, consisted only of 31 leaves. But here he seems indirectly to concede that the Schondorf-Göttingen codex belongs to Sir Chester Beatty by leaving open the question, presumably the question of the ownership, of the 31 leaves in Berlin. He does not seem to have accepted the fact of divided ownership. Carsten Colpe, in a Berlin interview of 1986, attributes this dangling uncertainty in Rolf Ibscher's interpretation to an intentional obscuring of the situation, an obfuscation useful in Rolf Ibscher's perennial efforts to secure German funding for his conservation work on this codex, in view of the fact that there were no papyri left in Berlin to conserve and that his wife pressured him constantly for more money.

Wolfgang Müller's preliminary inventory of 1964/65 had added, in reporting on P^{15995}, the 31 leaves of the Synaxeis: "The rest in Göttingen." Beltz's catalogue had reported similarly on P^{15995}, though by this time (1978) the rest was in West Berlin, at the Ägyptisches Museum in Charlottenburg: "The remainder of the codex is to be found for the time being in West Berlin . . . A. Böhlig and C. Colpe have defined the codex as "Synaxeis to the Living Gospel of Mani." This identification of the Schondorf-Göttingen–West Berlin codex with Sir Chester Beatty's Codex B has thus over the past generation had the support of Böhlig, Colpe, Ibscher, Müller, and Beltz, and has in fact not been contested. The most telling evidence is a list of eleven section titles collected by Colpe, in which the word SYNAXIS is in part or in its entirety preserved, occurring in at least the three more legible cases in the formula "The [e.g.] Fourth SYNAXIS of the [e.g.] First Logos of the Gospel" (on a page he identified as "1957 / 17 V" (= 19.2.2.66 vert.).

4. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand der Umkonservierung der Manipapyri" (1964–65), 52.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Rolf Ibscher's report on his conservation activities had referred to "ca. 145 leaves" that he had separated from the book block, which "still has about 100 to 120 unseparated leaves." Hence Müller's preliminary inventory had reported: "Here 145 leaf units separated, about 100-120 leaves still on the book block." Beltz had reported: "Since 1945, 145 new leaf units have been separated and conserved. The remainder of the book block is not yet conserved." Michel Tardieu continues to refer to 145 leaves.[5]

The inventory of the holdings in the Ägyptisches Museum in Charlottenburg in West Berlin in 1985–1986 located, in addition to the book block, 125 labeled leaves, plus 5 glass frames containing fragments. Thus the figure "ca. 145 leaves" would seem to be an inflated estimate, unless some material has been misplaced.

The combination of 125 conserved leaves in West Berlin and 31 in East Berlin makes a total of 156 leaves. This would mean 312 pages. But the top page of the book block is also accessible, making a total of 313 pages accessible to scholarship.

Such a listing of unpublished but extant leaves may be somewhat misleading. For although the size of the lacunae is relatively small in many cases, that is to say, although a large part of the papyrus is usually extant, the amount of extant ink varies considerably, and the resultant legibility of many pages is disappointingly small. Hence a rough classification of extant ink may, imprecise though it is, give a clearer picture of what one may expect. Each page is graded on a scale of 0 to 5: 0 = no ink is visible; 1 = some ink but no letters are legible; 2 = some letters but probably no words are legible; 3 = some words but probably no sentences are legible; 4 = some sentences but probably less than half the page is legible; 5 = probably more than half the page is legible.

5. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Codex B: Synaxeis

Category	Total pieces in category	Page numbers and fiber directions
No ink is visible	No pages can be listed.	No pages can be listed.
Some ink, but no letters are legible	11 pages and 4 fragment plates	2.2.3.5 (vert.); 3.2.2 [8 1/2] (vert. and hor.); 6.1.2.B (vert.); 13.1.1.85 (hor.); 13.1.1.2.86 (vert.); 13.2.3.90 (hor. and vert.); 14.1.3.93 (hor.); 17.2.1.59 (vert.); 18.2.2.115 (hor.); the fragmentary plates 9.1.3.96 (hor. and vert.); 21.2.3 (hor. and vert.); 22.1.2 (hor. and vert.); 22.1.3 (hor. and vert.)
Some letters but probably no words are legible	60 pages	2.1.2.4 (hor. and vert.); 2.2.2.4 (hor. and vert.); 2.2.3.5 (hor.); 3.1.2.2 (hor. and vert.); 3.1.3.6 (hor. and vert.); 3.2.1.8 (hor. and vert.); 3.2.3.9 (hor. and vert.); 4.1.2.117 (vert.); 5.2.3.16 (vert.); 6.1.2.A (hor. and vert.); 6.1.2.B (hor.); 6.2.2 (hor. and vert.); 7.2.25 (vert.); 8.1.2.39 (hor.); 8.1.3.40 (hor. and vert.); 8.2.1.41 (hor. and vert.); 9.1.1 (hor. and vert.); 9.1.2.95 (hor. and vert.);

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Some letters but probably no words are legible (cont.)	60 pages	9.2.1.97 (hor.); 10.1.100 (vert.); 11.2.2.77 (vert.); 12.1.1.79 (hor. and vert.); 12.1.3.81 (hor.); 13.1.2.86 (hor.); 13.2.1.88 (hor. and vert.); 13.2.2.89 (hor. and vert.); 14.1.1.91 (hor. and vert.); 14.1.2.92 (hor. and vert.); 14.1.3.93 (vert.); 14.1.4.94 (vert.); 14.2.1.106 (hor.); 14.2.2.107 (hor.); 15.2.1.111 (hor.); 16.2.1.48 (hor.); 17.1.2.52 (hor. and vert.); 17.1.3.53 (hor. and vert.); 17.2.1.59 (hor.); 17.2.3.61 (hor.); 18.2.2.115 (vert.); 21.1.2.55 (hor. and vert.)
Some words, but probably no sentences are legible	144 pages	1.1.1.30 (hor. and vert.); 1.1.2.33 (hor. and vert.); 1.1.3.32 (vert.); 1.2.1.31 (hor. and vert.); 1.2.2.124 (hor. and vert.); 1.2.3.123 (hor. and vert.); 2.1.1.27 (hor. and vert.); 2.1.3.29 (hor. and vert.); 2.2.1.3 (hor. and vert.); 3.1.1.1 (hor. and vert.); 3.1.4.7 (hor. and vert.); 3.2.4.10 (hor. and vert.); 4.1.1.116 (hor. and vert.); 4.1.2.117 (hor.); 4.1.3.118 (hor. and vert.);

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Some words, but probably no sentences are legible (cont.)	144 pages	4.2.3.13 (hor.); 5.1.1.119 (hor. and vert.); 5.1.2.34 (hor. and vert.); 5.1.3.35 (hor. and vert.); 5.1.4.36 (hor. and vert.); 5.2.1.14 (hor. and vert.); 5.2.2.15 (hor. and vert.); 5.2.3.16 (hor.); 6.1.1.17 (hor. and vert.); 6.1.3.18 (hor. and vert.); 6.2.1.19 (hor. and vert.); 6.2.3.21 (hor. and vert.); 7.1.1.20 (hor. and vert.); 7.1.2.22 (hor. and vert.); 7.1.3.23 (hor. and vert.); 7.2.1.24 (hor. and vert.); 7.2.2.25 (hor.); 7.2.3.26 (hor. and vert.); 8.1.1.38 (hor. and vert.); 8.1.2.39 (vert.); 8.2.2.42 (hor. and vert.); 8.2.3.43 (hor. and vert.); 8.2.4.44 (hor. and vert.); 9.2.1.97 (vert.); 9.2.3.99 (hor. and vert.); 10.1.1.100 (hor.); 10.1.2.101 (vert.); 10.1.3.102 (hor. and vert.); 10.2.1.103 (hor. and vert.); 10.2.2.104 (hor. and vert.); 11.1.3.75 (hor. and vert.); 11.2.1.76 (vert.); 11.2.2.77 (hor.); 11.2.3.78 (hor. and vert.); 12.1.2.80 (hor.); 12.1.3.81 (vert.);

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Some words, but probably no sentences are legible (cont.)	144 pages	12.2.1.82 (hor. and vert.); 12.2.2.83 (hor. and vert.); 12.2.3.84 (hor. and vert.); 13.1.1.85 (vert.); 13.1.3.87 (hor. and vert.); 14.1.4.94 (hor.); 14.2.1.106 (vert.); 14.2.2.107 (vert.); 14.2.3.108 (vert.); 15.1.2.110 (vert.); 15.2.1.111 (vert.); 15.2.2.112 (hor. and vert.); 16.1.2.37 (vert.); 16.1.3.47 (hor. and vert.); 16.2.1.48 (vert.); 16.2.2.49 (hor. and vert.); 16.2.3.50 (hor. and vert.); 17.1.1.51 (hor.); 17.2.3.61 (vert.); 18.1.1 113 (hor.); 18.1.2.121 (hor. and vert.); 18.2.1.114 (hor. and vert.); 19.1.2.63 (hor.); 19.1.3.64 (hor.); 19.2.1.65 (hor. and vert.); 19.2.2.66 (hor.); 19.2.3.67 (hor. and vert.); 20.1.1.68 (hor.); 20.1.2.69 (hor. and vert.); 20.1.3.70 (hor. and vert.); 20.2.1.71 (hor.); 21.1.1.54 (hor. and vert.); 21.2.1.56 (hor. and vert.); 21.2.2.57 (hor. and vert.); and the fragmentary plate 22.1.1 (hor. and vert.)

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Some sentences are legible; half the page is illegible	34 pages	1.1.3.32 (hor.); 4.2.3.13 (vert.); 9.2.2.98 (hor. and vert.); 10.1.2.101 (hor.); 10.2.3.105 (hor. and vert.); 11.1.1.45 (hor. and vert.); 11.1.2.74 (hor. and vert.); 11.2.1.76 (hor.); 14.2.3.108 (hor.); 15.1.1.109 (hor. and vert.); 15.1.2.110 (hor.); 16.1.1.46 (hor. and vert.); 16.1.2.37 (hor.); 17.1.1.51 (vert.); 17.2.2.60 (hor. and vert.); 18.1.1.113 (vert.); 19.1.1.62 (hor. and vert.); 19.1.2.63 (vert.); 19.1.3.64 (vert.); 19.2.2.66 (vert.); 20.1.1.68 (vert.); 20.2.1.71 (vert.); 20.2.2.72 (hor. and vert.); and 20.2.3.73 (hor. and vert.)
More than half the page is legible	1 page	12.1.2.80

This produces a total of 250 pages (not counting material that should be more accurately considered fragments), graded roughly as follows: 1:11; 2:60; 3:144; 4:34; 5:1. Thus there are hardly more than 35 pages from which one might hope to recover coherent text. This is a much more sober assessment of the quantity of conserved material than simply a list of the total number of conserved leaves.

Tito Orlandi reported as follows on the material in Dublin in 1976[6]:

6. Orlandi, "Les Manuscrits coptes de Dublin," 324–25.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On another of the same shelves (at the right of the entrance) there are 16 numbered glasses that could represent the part of Codex B restored before the war by H. Ibscher. The other part of Codex B, [p. 325] according to Böhlig, would be in Germany (the codex of West Berlin, formerly at Göttingen). They are not of a large format, from what I was able to ascertain. This assures us that the fragments do not belong to the codex of Letters (= Berlin, Codex 3).

Sur une autre des mémes étagères (a droite de l'entrée), it y a 16 verres numérotés, qui pourraient representer la partie du Cod. B restaurée avant la guerre par H. Ibscher; l'autre partie du Cod. B, [p. 325] selon Böhlig, se trouverait en Allemagne (codex de Berlin ouest, jadis a Goettingue). Its ne sont pas d'un grand format, d'après ce que j'ai pu constater: ce qui nous assure que les fragments n'appartiennent pas au codex des Lettres (Berlin, Cod. 3).

Here Orlandi apparently is here correcting Bohlig's conjecture that the 13, or 16, leaves come from the Berlin Letters, since these leaves do not have a large format such as does the codex of Letters (see above). But the format of the Synaxeis book block in West Berlin is comparable to the larger size, 30 (or with fringes 31.8) cm high by 19 cm wide. Beltz had listed the size of the 31 leaves of P^{15995}, the Synaxeis, in East Berlin, as 18–20 cm high and 11–16 cm wide, which is apparently what Orlandi has in view. But a smaller format for an extant leaf does not necessarily mean that the whole codex was smaller. In this regard, the report of a smaller format is not as decisive for identifying material as the report of a larger format, since a codex is as large in format as the largest leaf, but not as small as the smallest extant leaf, given the fragmentary nature of much of the material. The 31 East Berlin leaves were, after all, the worn outside leaves that the middlemen had discarded. The conserved leaves in West Berlin vary in size down from the maximum represented by the book block. The smaller format that Orlandi reported would of course open the question as to whether the leaves might belong to a smaller codex, the Psalms (or the Acts?). Since there is no reason to assume that leaves of the Berlin Acts would be in the Chester Beatty Library, it is possible that the 16, or 13, leaves belong to the Dublin Psalms, Codex A, and were erroneously labeled Codex B. But it is not necessary to conjecture such an error.

Michael Tardieu[7] refers to "16 feuillets" ["16 leaves"] of the Synaxeis being in Dublin, apparently dependent on Orlandi.

7. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 7.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

This codex has not been published.

The second volume of the facsimile edition[8] has reproduced the 13 (not 16) leaves labeled so confusedly "Codex B," which Rolf Ibscher sought to ascribe to P15998 (see above). Søren Giversen has commented in his introduction:

> The identity of this codex—or poor remnants of a codex—has been widely discussed, for example in the article by A. Böhlig cited above and in a series of other articles, as has the identity of the Mani codex in West Berlin, once called the Schondorff [read: Schondorf] papyrus.
>
> Since this edition should not pre-empt the results of a later critical edition, it has been decided to publish the pages in question in order to promote the work of identifying the papyrus with as little delay as possible. I have therefore refrained from offering any solution, preferring instead to provide some facts which together with the facsimiles should assist in this task.
>
> Not only are the glasses inscribed Codex B, but the frames also are marked "Kephalaia. Codex B." These labels are clearly in Hugo Ibscher's handwriting. The text in most cases is readable, although not easily.

The arguments that have been advanced to identify these 13 leaves with P15998 have proven to be without force. A comparison of the facsimiles with the leaves of the Synaxeis indicates that the hand is so similar that the 13 leaves could well belong to the Synaxeis codex, though no chapter titles have been identified to confirm such an identification. The labeling is misleading insofar as the reference to Kephalaia is incorrect, but the labeling as Codex B, the Dublin designation of the Synaxeis codex, may well be correct. Giversen's allusion in this connection to "the Schondorf papyrus," which Rolf Ibscher identified as P15998 (but is in fact the Synaxeis), indirectly suggests this identification.

Giversen reports that "the leaves were divided by [Hugo] Ibscher into two sections (quires)." Each quire consists of four sheets or eight leaves. The first leaf of the first quire and the last two leaves of the second quire are missing. Orlandi's report of 16 leaves may be due to having in view 2 quires but overlooking the absence of 3 leaves. Facing pages have like fiber directions, with the first page of each quire hav-

8. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, Facsimile Edition, ix–x, 101–26.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

ing vertical fibers. The first quire is reproduced on pages 101–14, the second on 115–26.

Giversen comments: "The sheets are marked from 51 to 76, the equivalent of this edition's 101–126." The document dated January 13, 1984, on the letterhead of the Chester Beatty Library, entitled "Manichean Papyri on Loan to Royal Library, Copenhagen," lists "Codex B 51–76 13 glasses." Thus it is clear that these 13 leaves of the Synaxeis were in Copenhagen.

The Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin gave to the Manichaean Archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity older photographs of pages 1.1.1.30 (hor.), 1.2.2.124 (hor.), 1.2.3.123 (vert.), and 4.1.1.116 (hor.); and newer photographs made at the Ägyptisches Museum itself of pages 1.1.1.30 (hor. and vert.), and 10.1.2.101 (hor. and vert.).

Carsten Colpe put at the disposal of a team that began to form in 1984 transcriptions he had made of the conserved leaves when they had been at Göttingen. In August 1985 Karen L. King made transcriptions in West Berlin of 16.1.2 (hor.), 16.2.3 (hor. and vert.), 17.1.1 (vert.), 18.1.1.113 (hor.), and, in August 1986, of 19.1.3.64 (vert.); and, together with Stephen Patterson, in July and August 1986, of 12.1.2.8 (vert.), 18.1.1.113 (vert.), and 19.2.2.66 (vert.). Wolf-Peter Funk provided draft translations of some of the material in April 1988.

From May to August 1987, Paul Allan Mirecki transcribed the following leaves in West Berlin: 4.2.3.13; 12.1.2.80; 14.2.3.108; 19.1.2.63; 19.1.3.64; 19.2.2.66; 20.1.1.68; and 20.2.1.71. He presented a preliminary report on his work under the title "The Coptic Manichaean Synaxeis Codex: Observations on the Ordinal System of the Synaxis Sections" at the First International Conference on Manichaeism held from August 5–9, 1987 at the University of Lund, Sweden.[9]

In August 1986 King received on loan from the Ägyptisches Museum, for study at the library of Occidental College in Los Angeles, 10 leaves: 9.2.2.98; 10.2.1.103; 10.2.3.105; 11.1.1.45; 11.1.2.74; 15.1.1.109; 16.1.1.46; 17.2.2.60; 19.1.1.62; and 20.2.3.73. King tran-

9. Mirecki, "The Coptic Manichaean Synaxeis Codex: Descriptive Catalogue of Synaxis Chapter Titles," 135–45. This is an expansion of part of the paper presented at the conference. An expansion of another part, entitled "The Coptic Manichaean Synaxeis Codex: Indicators for Codicological Reconstruction," was presented at the Consultation on Manichaeism at the Society of Biblical Literature convention at Chicago November 19–22, 1988.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

scribed in November 1987 10.2.1.103 (hor.), and on November 18, 1987, 19.1.1.62 (hor.) On November 7, 1987, Wolf-Peter Funk transcribed at Occidental College lines 18–19 of 10.2.1.103 (hor.), 11.1.1.45 (hor. and vert.), 16.1.1.46 (hor. and vert.), and 20.2.3.73 (hor. and vert.). On November 13, 1987, he transcribed at Claremont 11.1.2.74 (hor. and vert.) and 15.1.1.109 (hor. and vert.). In March 1988 he made partial draft translations of 10.2.1.103 (hor.), 11.1.1.45 (hor. and vert.), 11.1.2.74 (hor. and vert.), 15.1.1.109 (hor. and vert.), 16.1.1.46 (hor. and vert.), and 20.2.3.73 (hor. and vert.). The leaves were brought to the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity in Claremont for a concentrated teamwork period from June 13 to 23, 1988. There Harold W. Attridge, Charles A. Bobertz, Stephen Patterson, and Gesine Schenke Robinson transcribed as follows:

9.2.2.98 [Bobertz];

10.2.1.103 (hor.) [Robinson, Attridge], (vert.) [Attridge];

10.2.3.105 (hor. and vert.) [Bobertz, Attridge, Patterson];

11.1.1.45 (hor. and vert.) [Bobertz];

11.1.2.74 (hor. and vert.) [Patterson, Attridge];

15.1.1.109 (hor. and vert.) [Bobertz, Attridge];

16.1.1.46 (hor. and vert.) [Patterson];

17.2.2.60 (hor. and vert.) [Patterson];

19.1.1.62 (hor. and vert.) [Robinson and Bobertz]; (vert. only) [Patterson and Attridge];

20.2.3.73 (hor. and vert.) [Robinson, Attridge].

The leaves, though mostly among the better ones in terms of legibility, are nonetheless so obscure that the transcriptions are very far from complete and at best are provisional.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 17 —

Codex C: Kephalaia, Volume Two

The fourth codex of Sir Chester Beatty presented by Schmidt and Polotsky, though unidentified, is described as follows[1]:

A last and fourth papyrus book, which seems to be rather completely preserved—here too it is possible to assume about 250 leaves—has thus far been subjected to no conservation, so that a deep darkness still lurks over its content.

Ein letztes and viertes Papyrusbuch, das ziemlich vollständig erhalten zu sein scheint—auch hierfür wird man etwa 250 Blätter annehmen können—ist bis jetzt noch keiner Konservierung unterzogen, so dass noch ein tiefes Dunkel über dessen Inhalt lagert.

This codex has been identified as Kephalaia, though with chapters bearing higher numbers than those in the Berlin Kephalaia, so that one might think of this as a second volume, rather than as "la seconds partie du codex" ["the second part of the codex"] P15996.[2] Böhlig described it as follows:[3]

2. Already before the war Hugo Ibscher began the work of conservation on the text of Codex C, which was still completely unconserved at the time of the report of the discovery, so that by

2. An dem nach dem Fundbericht noch vollkommen unkonservierten Text Codex C begann schon vor dem Kriege Hugo Ibscher die Konservierungsarbeit, so dass sich bei Kriegsausbruch bereits 34 ver-

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund in Agypten," 34.

2. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6. This error may account for the problem of referring to "sept titles" ["seven titles"] and then listing only six.

3. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 185.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the time the war broke out already 34 glassed leaves were in London. One hundred forty five more leaves could be separated by Rolf Ibscher after the war. Whereas already at the beginning of the conservation the book could be recognized as Kephalaia with appreciably higher chapter numerations than the Berlin Kephalaia show, now a still-further surprise emerged, in that perhaps another text had been laid inside the book. This is not yet identified, since for this book as well still no arrangements for an edition have been made.

glaste Blätter in London befanden. Weitere 145 Blätter konnte Rolf Ibscher nach dem Kriege ablösen. Hatte man schon bei Beginn der Konservierung das Buch als Kephalaia mit wesentlich höheren Kapitelzahlen, als sie die Berliner Kephalaia aufweisen, erkennen können, so fand sich nun noch eine Überraschung dadurch, dass in das Buch vielleicht ein anderer Text hineingelegt worden war. Dieser ist noch nicht identifiziert, da auch für dieses Buch noch keine Anstalten einer Edition gemacht wurden.

Beltz's catalogue does not mention this codex, since it is not in Berlin. But Tito Orlandi reported in 1976 on the material at the Chester Beatty Library as follows[4]:

Finally, the most important piece in the collection, in my opinion, is Codex C, which contains the second part of the Kephalaia and another, unknown text. It consists today (a) of 30 glasses [in a footnote Orlandi presents this as a correction of Böhlig's figure 34] numbered in terms of recto and verso (hence two numerals per glass) up to the number 60; these are obviously the pieces restored before the war, which are now put on two sets of shelves (numbered 1 and 2). (b) After them are to be found the fragments conserved between plexiglass, more recently restored, which are numbered in the same way; nonetheless their numeration begins again with

Finalement, la pièce la plus importante du recueil est, a mon avis, le Cod. C, qui contient la deuxième partie des Kephalaia et un autre texte inconnu. Il consiste maintenant (a) en 30 verres [in a footnote Orlandi presents this as a correction of Böhlig's figure 34] numérotés par rapport au recto et verso (donc deux numéros par verre) jusqu'au numero 60; ce sont évidemment les pièces restaurées avant la guerre, qui sont maintenant placées sur deux étagères (numérotóes I et II). (b) Après eux, se trouvent les fragments sous plexiglas, restaurés plus récemment, qui sont numérotés de la même facon; toutefois leur numérotation recommence par le no 1. Comme

4. Orlandi, "Les manuscrits coptes de Dublin," 325.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

number 1. Since they were stacked pell-mell on the shelves, I put them all back in order, and I verified at the same time that no glass is lacking. They are in fact 368 numbers and hence 184 fragments, divided among 18 shelves (shelves 3 to 20). The 20th shelf contains 8 fragments without numeration, in very bad condition, which nonetheless seem to belong to Codex C; they are marked: Cl, C2, C3, C4, C20, C24, C25, C96 [C26?].

It is necessary to draw attention to the fact that the numeration of the part described under (b) is juxtaposed to a preceding numeration that seems to represent the primitive classification given at the time that the leaves were detached from the ensemble of the codex, in separating each quire, beginning with the last. The numeration of the quires (in Roman numerals) is hence the reverse of the new order; however the numeration of the pages inside the quires follows the same order. We give an example:

> "new numeration" = "other" numeration
>
> 31/32 . . . to 45/46 = C VIII 120 . . . to 127
>
> 47/48 . . . to 61/62 = C VII 113 . . . to 119 [?]

As much as we were able to determine, no other piece of the Manichaean collection is conserved at the Chester Beatty Library.

ils étaient déposés pêle-mêle dans les étagères, je les ai tous remis en ordre, et j'ai contrôlé en méme temps qu'aucun verre ne manque. Ils sont en fait 368 numéros, donc 184 fragments, partagés entre 18 étagères (étagères III a XX). La 20e étagère contient 8 fragments hors numérotation, en très mauvais êtat, qui toutefois semblent appartenir au Cod. C; ils sont marqués: Cl, C2, C3, C4, C20, C24, C25, C96 [C26?].

Il faut signaler que la numérotation de la partie décrite sous le par. (b) est juxtaposée a une numérotation précedente, qui parait representer la classification primitive, donnée au moment oû les feuillets ont éta détachés de l'ensemble du codex, en separant chaque cahier, a partir du dernier. La numérotation des cahiers (en chiffres romains) est donc contraire au nouvel ordre; cependant la numérotation des pages a l'interieur des cahiers suit le même ordre. Nous en donnerons un example:

> "nouvelle numérotation" = "autre" numérotation
>
> 31/32 . . . jusqu'a 45/46 = C VIII 120 . . .jusqu'a 127 47/48 . . . jusqu'a 61/62 = C VII 113 . . . jusqu'a 119 [?]

Pour ce que nous avons constaté, aucune autre pièce de la collection manichéenne n'est conservée à la Chester Beatty Library.

This codex has not been published.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The first volume of the facsimile edition[5] has published 354 plates.

In the preface (pages xi–xii) Søren Giversen indicates the limited objective of the edition:

> It was evident from the state of the papyri that if they were to be published in the foreseeable future, it would be necessary initially to abandon all thought of perfection. What was needed was first to establish the correct order of the unpaginated sheets, so far as this was possible within a reasonable time, and then [page xii] to publish a facsimile edition without delay. Once this was published, every interested scholar would have plenty of time and opportunity to work on the texts.

Thus plate 339 has the note: "Collocatio paginarum 339–354 incerta," ["the ordering of the pages 339–354 is uncertain."] But even plates 1–338 are not to be taken as pagination of the original codex. Thus when the Introduction refers to the plates as pages, what is meant is pages in the facsimile edition itself, not in the codex. This is clear from the comment (p. xvii) ". . . missing pages not being counted," and for the fuller observation (p. xxi):

> It must however be emphasized that the continuous numbering does not show the many lacunae which occur in the quires, and little can be said about the loss of perhaps one or more quires, for example between C.VI and C.B.

5. Giversen, The Manichaean Coptic Papyri in the Chester Beatty Library, Vol. 1, Kephalaia, Facsimile Edition, i–xxvi, 1–354. The title page reports that the edition is "Published under the Auspices of the Trustees of the Chester Beatty Library with the Support of the Carlsberg Foundation and under the Responsibility of the International Committee for the Publication of the Manichaean Coptic Papyri from Medinet Madi Belonging to the Chester Beatty Library (Søren Giversen, Rodolphe Kasser, Martin Krause)." The Preface, p. xii, reports concerning the facsimile edition: "Once this was published, every interested scholar would have plenty of time and opportunity to work on the texts." But it is also reported: "This committee . . . is also responsible for the critical edition of the texts." At the meeting of the Association francophone de Coptologie in Paris on May 23, 1986, Rodolphe Kasser circulated an announcement concerning the committee "qui repartira cette tache [les éditions critiques] entre les divers coptisants" ["who will distribute this task {the critical editions} among the various Coptologists."] "Seuls seront invités a participer aux editions princeps manichéennes coptes Chester Beatty ceux qui n'ont pas déjà obtenu cette faculté en ce qui concerne les éditions princeps manichéennes coptes des fragments de Berlin oû de Vienne." ["Only they will be invited to participate in the editio princeps of the Chester Beatty Coptic Manichaica who have not already received this privilege regarding the of the Coptic Manichaica of Berlin or Vienna."]

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

One should also note the disclaimer on page xvii:

> Both Hugo and Rolf Ibscher found the task of reconstructing the leaves and fragments in the right order extremely difficult, and as we are not in possession of all the observations made by the two conservators during their work, it is today perhaps impossible for us to so reconstruct them—or it will take a very long time and will probably necessitate the deciphering of the texts in some detail. According to the wishes of the committee, I have therefore chosen to publish the results of my work so far in the hope that these will be of use to scholars. Any improvement that they make will naturally be a pleasure to me.

The problem is partly ascribed to ambiguities on the part of Rolf Ibscher (p. xix):

> Rolf Ibscher later gives different figures for the number of leaves restored by his father. Sometimes he said that Hugo Ibscher had restored 34 leaves from Codex C, sometimes 36 and sometimes 47 . . . Rolf Ibscher perhaps added to the 34 leaves from Codex C the 13 leaves which Hugo Ibscher had already restored in 1934 and which are also mentioned in the letter quoted above as belonging to Codex B. This is borne out by the fact that on the frames of the glasses which contain these 13 leaves is written "Kephalaia. Codex B."

Thus Giversen concludes (page xvii) that Hugo Ibscher conserved only 34 leaves. But Rolf Ibscher is quoted (pages xviii–xix) as listing at times 136, at times 139 as the number of leaves he himself had conserved. Since there are 346 plates, one would assume the figure 139 to be correct (since 139 plus 34 equals 173 leaves, = 346 pages). This calculation admittedly, does not account for plates 347–54, of which it is said, p. xxvi: "The following pages or fragments are in such poor condition that it will be very difficult to locate their original position." Though they seem uninscribed, they are not just fragments—a characterization that actually only fits 347–48—but in three cases leaves (in one case hardly more than the vertical fibers), which must be assumed to have been consistently omitted from numerations (unless the figure 36 was reached by adding 2 from this group to the figure 34).

The confusion is augmented by Giversen's explanation (pages xix–xx):

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> The sheets restored by Hugo Ibscher were marked la–4b and 1–60, and Rolf Ibscher has arranged them into quires. The sheets which Rolf Ibscher restored are marked first according to codex with a C, then according to section (quire), so that indications are as follows: C.1–C.8, C.OI, C.I–C.X. To this a number is added, so that the sheets are numbered from 1 to 140. This last numbering was presumably given when Rolf Ibscher succeeded in rescuing the sheets, and as he sometimes had to work on the papyri from different ends this numbering does not always follow the order of the sheets in the codex. To this must be added the fact that the codex was in some disarray when it reached the conservators' laboratory. There is yet another numbering system to be mentioned. This may have been given when the sheets were photographed, or to indicate which of the papyri were restored by Rolf Ibscher. This system, however practical [page xx] it may have been for its special purpose, is now useless and possibly confusing for anyone who is not aware of its meaning, since it does not give any information about the reconstruction of the codex or the real order of the sheets. In my attempt to arrange the order of all the sheets in the collection which is called Codex C I have therefore not used this numbering at all.

The way to account for 139 sheets being numbered 1–140 is to note that the numbers 1, 2, 97, and 111 occur twice, whereas the numbers 91, 92, and 96 are missing, leaving a balance of one more number than there are sheets.

The hope is expressed (page xxi): "This introduction will, I hope, provide some background information until a much more detailed account is made available as a result of this facsimile edition."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 18 —

Codex D: Homilies (Dublin Part)

This codex is part of the Berlin codex P[15999]. Schmidt and Polotsky report:[1]

A second papyrus book contains a collection of Homilies (logoi) of various contents and by different authors. Here we have before us a completely faithful report about the last days of Mani, which must have come from the pen of an eye witness . . . 48 leaves of this papyrus book have been brought under glass and are to be published separated by Dr. Polotsky. As I mentioned above, a large part of this book has come to Berlin.

Ein zweites Papyrusbuch enthält eine Sammlung von Homilien (logoi) verschiedenen Inhalts und von verschiedenen Verfassern. Da haben wir vor uns einen ganz getreuen Bericht über die letzten Tage des Mani, der aus der Feder eines Augenzeugen geflossen sein muss . . . Von diesem Papyrusbuch sind 48 Blätter unter Glas gebracht und sollen von Dr. Polotsky separat publiziert werden. Von diesem Buche ist, wie ich oben erwähnt habe, ein umfangreicher Teil nach Berlin gekommen.

Polotsky's transcriptions of pages 8, 11, 12, 27–30, 44, 60, 69, 76, 78, 79, 82–84, 91, and 93 from 1931–1932 are in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library. Polotsky published Beatty's part of the Homilies in 1934.[2]

Tito Orlandi's 1976 report of the material in the Chester Beatty Library noted:[3]

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 34.
2. Polotsky, Manichäische Homilien, Band I.
3. Orlandi, "Les manuscrits coptes de Dublin," 324.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:37 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Indeed we have noted that the part of Codex A edited by Mr. Allberry (Psalms, Part II) is perfectly conserved in 9 little wooden boxes, in which the glasses containing the leaves are arranged in vertical position. The part of Codex A [read: D] edited by Polotsky (Homilies) has been arranged in the same way.	En effet, nous avons constaté que la partie du Cod. A éditée par M. Allberry (Psaumes, Ile partie) est parfaitement conservée dans 9 petites caisses en bois, dans lesquelles les verres contenant les feuillets sont ranges en position verticale. La partie du Cod. A [read: D] éditée par Polotsky (Homilies) a été rangée de la même façon.

Since in early reports the part of the Homilies codex that Sir Chester Beatty acquired was found with the Psalms codex, Orlandi lists the Dublin leaves of the Homilies also as A. But since these letters designate codices, and the leaves of the Homilies come from a different codex than those of the Psalms, the leaves of the Homilies should not be given the same codex designation as those of the Psalms. Rolf Ibscher hence introduced the letter D for the leaves of the Homilies, which is used in the present report.

Michael H. Browder has prepared an English translation of the published Homilies in machine-readable form.[4]

A facsimile edition of the Homilies of the Chester Beatty Library was published in 1986.[5] The glass panes could not be opened to make minor adjustments in the positioning of already-placed fragments, since the panes are stuck to the papyrus. But some have been "repositioned photographically" on pages 19–20, 25–26, and 97–98, while tiny fragments needing to be repositioned could not, "for technical reasons" be adjusted, "for example on pp. 3–4 and 49–50." A facsimile of page 29 published in the 1934 edition lacks a fragment present in the facsimile edition but also present in the transcription of page 34 in the 1934 edition, due presumably to the 1934 published photograph's being made prior to the placement of the fragment, which however, took place prior to the completion of the 1934 edition. Such

4. Browder, A Manichaean Anthology: A New English Translation of the Manichaische Homilien, 1985, unpublished.

5. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, vii–viii for the Introduction, from which the quotations come; and 1–96, plates corresponding to the pagination of Polotsky's edition, with pp. 95–96 reproducing the unplaced fragments that Polotsky did not publish.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:37 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

photographs made early in the conservation procedure would serve as a record "if some smaller, fragile pieces perhaps went missing in the process of conservation." Thus pages 41–42, "where some lines are now lost." Polotsky omitted pages 65–66 since so little text survived, but they are included in the facsimile edition.

Eleven fragments not placed by Polotsky are published on pages 97–98, still unidentified. "They will presumably be placed when the much needed critical study has been carried out." In view of the fact that the critical edition has already been published, it is unclear what occasion is envisaged for "the much needed critical study," if the publication of the facsimile edition itself did not provide such an occasion.

Michel Tardieu[6] has incorrectly stated: "Codex complet de 48 feuillets conservé à Dublin (codex D)." ["Complete codex of 48 leaves conserved at Dublin (Codex D)."] This is only part of the codex of which P^{15999} was also a part, no doubt the major part.

6. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:37 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Scholars, Collectors, Dealers, and Others

Charles R. C. Allberry (1911–1943). British Coptologist and Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge. He was editor of the Journal of Egyptian Archaeology from 1939–43. He translated and edited the first edition of A Manichaean Psalm-Book, Part II in 1938.

Hugh Murray Baillie (1916–1982). A British officer, who after World War II remained in Germany as a member of the Fine Arts Commission of the British Zone.

Sir A. Chester Beatty (1875–1968). Major collector of manuscripts and papyri. He founded the Chester Beatty Library. Born in the U.S., he became a naturalized citizen of Great Britain, and was an honorary citizen of Ireland. He made his fortune mining copper in the U.S. and around the world.

Alexander Böhlig (1912–1996). German Coptologist and Byzantinist, who taught first at the University of Halle and after 1963 at the University of Tübingen, where he was eventually emeritus. At Halle he was director of the Institut für Byzantinistik.

William M. Brashear (1946–2000). Papyrologist and curator of the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin-Charlottenburg.

Carsten Colpe (1929–2009). German professor of Iranian studies, first at the University of Göttingen and then at the University of Berlin.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Walter Ewing Crum (1865–1944). British Coptologist and Egyptologist. He edited the monumental reference work, Coptic Dictionary, and catalogued the Coptic manuscripts in the John Rylands Library and the British Museum.

Sir I. E. S. Edwards (1909–1996). Egyptian Egyptologist and leading expert on the pyramids. He became the Assistant Keeper in the Department of Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities at the British Museum in 1934. He was the Keeper of Egyptian Antiquities from 1955 to 1974.

Otto Firchow (b. 1912). Director of the Ägyptisches Museum and Papyrus-Sammlung in Berlin.

Wolf-Peter Funk. Coptologist and Research Associate at the Université Laval in Quebec. He is the editor of the series Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin.

Sir Alan Gardiner (1879–1963). One of the leading Egyptologists of the twentieth century.

Søren Giversen (1928–2009). Danish New Testament scholar and Coptologist who taught at Aarhus University. He was the president of the International Committee for the Publication of the Manichaean Coptic Papyri from Medinet Madi Belonging to the Chester Beatty Library.

Hugo Ibscher (1874–1943). Papyrus conservator from Kleinmachnow, near Berlin, who worked for Chester Beatty.

Rolf Ibscher (1906–1967). Son of Hugo Ibscher, who took over papyrus conservation for Beatty after his father's death.

Rodolphe Kasser (b. 1927). Swiss Coptologist and archaeologist. He was Professor at the University of Geneva until becoming emeritus in 1998. He is a member of the International Committee for the Publication of the Manichaean Coptic Papyri from Medinet Madi Belonging to the Chester Beatty Library and head of the archaeo-

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

logical excavations of the Swiss Mission of Coptic Archaeology in the Kelia, Lower Egypt.

Martin Krause (b. 1930). German Coptologist and Professor at the University of Münster. He was the first President of the International Association for Coptic Studies. He is a member of the International Committee for the Publication of the Manichaean Coptic Papyri from Medinet Madi Belonging to the Chester Beatty Library.

Wilfrid Lockwood. Librarian and Director of the Chester Beatty Library.

Otto Werner Luke. Assistant and then successor to Rolf Ibscher.

Paul Allan Mirecki. Coptologist and historian of religion at the University of Kansas.

Wolfgang Müller (1922–2012). Papyrologist and ancient historian. He became Director of the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin as well as overseer of the Papyrus-Sammlung.

Wincenty Myszor. Professor of Papyrology at the Institute for Papyrology at Warsaw University.

Maurice Nahman (1868–1948). The leading Cairo antiquities dealer prior to World War II, who showed H. O. Lange Manichaean manuscripts in 1929. He sold Manichaean manuscripts to Chester Beatty and Carl Schmidt in the 1930s.

Tito Orlandi. Italian Coptologist and Professor at La Sapienza University, Rome. He was President of the International Association for Coptic Studies (2000–2004). He is Director of Corpus dei Manoscritti Copti Letterari.

Günter Poethke (b. 1939). Custos of the Greek manuscripts in the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin and Professor of Papyrology at the Humboldt-Universität zu Berlin.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Hans Jakob Polotsky (1905–1991). German-born Israeli Egyptologist, Coptologist, and Semitist. He was professor at the Hebrew University, Jerusalem.

Berthe van Regemorter. Belgian bookbinder.

Gesine Schenke Robinson. New Testament scholar, Coptologist, and Director of the Coptic Texts Editing Project at the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity.

James M. Robinson (b. 1924). Professor of New Testament and Coptologist at Claremont Graduate University (emeritus). He is the founding Director of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, Director of the Coptic Gnostic Library Project, and the editor of the Nag Hammadi Library.

Carl Schmidt (1868–1938). German New Testament scholar, church historian, and papyrologist; his mentor was Adolf von Harnack. He discovered and published numerous ancient gnostic and Manichaean texts.

Wilhelm Schubart (1873–1960). German papyrologist, professor of ancient history, and Director of the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin-Charlottenburg.

Michel Tardieu (b. 1938). French Coptologist, historian of religion, and professor at the Collège de France, Paris. He became emeritus in 2008.

Sir Herbert Thompson (1859–1944). British Egyptologist and Coptologist who represented Chester Beatty beginning in 1931.

J. V. S. Wilkinson (d. 1957). After working in the Department of Oriental Manuscripts at the British Museum (1924–46), he became Librarian of the Chester Beatty Library in 1946.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Bibliography

Allberry, C. R. C., editor. A Manichaean Psalm-Book. Part II. Manichaean Manuscripts of the Chester Beatty Collection 2. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1938.

———. "Manichaean Studies." JTS 39 (1938) 337–49.

Beltz, Walter. "Katalog der koptischen Handschriften der Papyrus-Sammlung der Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin." APF 26 (1978) 57–119; 27 (1980) 121–222. The Manichaean codices are catalogued in 26 (1978) 97–98.

Böhlig, Alexander. "Die Arbeit an den koptischen Manichaica." WZUH Gesellschafts und Sprachwissenschaftliche Reihe 10 (1961) 157–61. Reprinted in Mysterion und Wahrheit. Also published in Actes du XXVe Congrès International des Orientalistes, Moscou 9–16 aut 1960, 1 (Moscow, 1962) 535–41.

———. "Aus den Manichäischen 'Kephalaia des Lehrers,' Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Universität Halle-Wittenberg 5 (1956) 1067–84 (translation of pages 244–92, 6th double fascicle).

———. Gnosis und Synkretismus: Gesammelte Aufsätze zur spätantiken Religionsgeschichte. 2 vols. WUNT 47–48. Tübingen: Mohr/Siebeck, 1989.

———. "Ja und Amen in manichäischer Deutung." ZPE 58 (1985) 59–70.

———. Kephalaia. Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin herausgegeben im Auftrag der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, zweite Hälfte, (Lieferungen 11/12 = Coptic pages 244–91). Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1966.

———. Mysterion und Wahrheit: Gesammelte Beiträge zur spätantiken Religionsgeschichte. Arbeiten zur Geschichte des späteren Judentums und des Urchristentums 6. Leiden: Brill, 1968. Reprints, revised. "Die Arbeit an den koptischen Manichaica," 177–87. The text has been copyedited, but not altered, in terms of the typescript of the address of 1960 in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library.

———. "Neue Initiativen zur Erschliessung der koptisch-manichäischen Bibliothek von Medinet Madi: James M. Robinson zum 65. Geburtstag gewidmet." ZNW 80 (1989) 240–62.

———. "Neue Kephalaia des Mani." BSAC 18 (1965/66) 5–22.

———. "Synaxis = Homilia?" WZUH 6 (1957) 485–86.

———. "Zu den Synaxeis des Lebendigen Evangeliums." In Mysterion und Wahrheit: Gesammelte Beiträge zur spätantiken Religionsgeschichte, 222–27. Arbeiten zur

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Geschichte des späteren Judentums und des Urchristentums 6. Leiden: Brill, 1968. Originally delivered at Akten des Vierundzwanzigsten Internationalen Orientalisten-Kongresses München 28 August bis 4 September 1957. Wiesbaden: Deutsche Morgenländische Gesellschaft, 1959.

———. "Zu den Synaxeis des Lebendigen Evangeliums," pp. 222–27. The text is enlarged (see above, 1957). "Neue Kephalaia des Mani," 252–66.

Browder, Michael H. "Al-Biruni as a Source for Mani and Manichaeism." PhD diss., Duke University, 1982.

———. A Manichaean Anthology: A New English Translation of the Manichäische Homilien. Floppy Disc, 1985.

Crum, W. E. A Coptic Dictionary. 1939. Reprinted with a new foreword by James M. Robinson. Ancient Language Resources. Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock, 2005.

Fackelmann, Michael. Restaurierung von Papyrus und anderen Schriftträgern aus Ägypten. Studia Amstelodamensia ad Epigraphicam, Jus Antiquum et Papyrologicam Pertinenta 24. Zuphen, The Netherlands: Terra, 1985.

Gardner, Iaian. Coptic Theological Papyri II Edition, Commentary, Translation: With an Appendix "The Docetic Jesus." Mitteilungen aus der Papyrussammlung der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek [Papyrus Erzherzog Rainer], n.S. 21 MPER XXI. Vienna: Österreiche Nationalbibliothek bei Verlag Brüder Hollinek, 1988.

Giversen, Søren. The Manichaean Coptic Papyri in the Chester Beatty Library. Vol. 1, Kephalaia. Facsimile edition. Cahiers d'Orientalisme 14. Geneva: Cramer, 1986.

———. The Manichaean Coptic Papyri in the Chester Beatty Library. Vol. 2, Homilies and Varia. Facsimile edition. Cahiers d'Orientalisme 15. Geneva: Cramer, 1986 [1987].

———. The Manichaean Coptic Papyri in the Chester Beatty Library. Vol. 3, Psalm Book Part 1. Facsimile edition. Cahiers d'orientalisme 16. Geneva: Cramer, 1988.

———. The Manichaean Coptic Papyri in the Chester Beatty Library. Volume 4, Psalm Book, Part 2. Facsimile edition. Cahiers d'orientalisme 17. Geneva: Cramer, 1988.

———. The Manichaean Papyri of the Chester Beatty Library. Proceedings of the Irish Biblical Association 11. Dublin, 1988.

———. "The Manichaean Texts from the Chester Beatty Collection." In Manichaean Studies: Proceedings of the First International Conference on Manichaeism August 5–9 1987; Department of History of Religions—Lund University Sweden, edited by Peter Bryder, 265–72. Lund Studies in African and Asian Religions 1. Lund: Lund University plus Ultra, 1988.

———. "The Unedited Chester Beatty Mani Texts." In Codex Manichaicus Coloniensius: Atti del Simposio Internazionale (Rende-Amantea 3–7 settembre 1984), edited by Luigi Cirillo with Amneris Roselli, 371–80. Cosenza: Marra, 1986.

Ibscher, Hugo. "Die Handschrift." In Kephalaia, edited by H. J. Polotsky and Alexander Böhlig, v–xiv. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1940.

———. "Die Handschriften." In A Manichaean Psalm-Book. Part II, edited by C. R. C. Allberry, i–xxiii. Manichaean Manuscripts in the Chester Beatty Collection 2. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1938.

Ibscher, Rolf. "Das Konservierungswerk an den Manichäischen Papyruscodices: Vortrag, gehalten auf dem VIII. Internationalen Papyrologen-Kongress in Wien 1955." Unpublished typescript.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

———. "Mani und kein Ende." In Atti dell'XI Congresso Internazionale di Papirologia, Milano 2–8 Settembre 1965, 218–24. Milan: Istituto Lombardo di Scienze e Lettere, 1966.

———. "Über den Stand der Umkonservierung der Manipapyri." In Koptologische Studien in der DDR: Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Martin-Luther Universität Halle-Wittenberg 1965, Sonderheft, 50–64. Originally presented December 14–15, 1964.

———. "Wiederaufnahme und neuester Stand der Konservierung der Manichäischen Papyruscodices." In Proceedings of the Twenty-third International Congress of Orientalists. Cambridge, 21st–28th August, 1954. London: The Royal Asiatic Society,- 1956. Abstract, pp. 359–360. Zusammenfassung des auf dem Internationalen Orientalisten-Kongress gehaltenen Berichts, typescript, 4 pp. [Cited according to the complete text in typescript, 12 pp., unless otherwise indicated.]

Ibscher, Rolf, Carsten Colpe, and Alexander Böhlig. "Der Mani-Fund." In Akten des Vierundzwanzigsten Internationalen Orientalisten-Kongresses München, 28. August bis 4. September 1957. Wiesbaden: Deutsche Morgenländische Gesellschaft, 1959.

Kasser, Rodolphe. "Projet international pour la publication des manuscrits manichéens coptes de Medinet Madi appartenant à la Chester Beatty Library (premier communiqué)." Newsletter of the International Association for Coptic Studies 19 (1986) 6–7.

King, Karen. "A Progress Report on the Editing of the Manichaean Synaxeis Codex." In Actes du IVe congrès copte, Louvain-la-Neuve, 5–10 Septembre 1988, edited by Marguerite Rassart-Debergh and Julien Ries, 281–88. Publications de l'Institut orientaliste de Louvain 40. Louvain: Université Catholique de Louvain, 1992.

Koenen, Ludwig. "Augustine and Manichaeism in Light of the Cologne Mani Codex." Illinois Classical Studies 3 (1978) 154–95.

Krause, Martin. Review of The Facsimile Edition of the Nag Hammadi Codices: Introduction. ZDMG 138 (1988) 378.

Kühnel-Kunze, Irene. Bergung—Evakuierung—Rückführung: Die Berliner Museen in den Jahren 1939–1959. Jahrbuch Preussicher Kulturbesitz, Sonderband 2. Berlin: Mann, 1984.

Lewis, Patricia K. G. Charles Allberry: A Portrait. Cambridge, UK: Plumridge, 1984.

Luke, Otto Walter. "Die Umkonservierung des Berliner Kephalaia-Kodex." Staatliche Museen Berlin: Forschungen und Berichte 12 (1970) 151–52.

Maugham, W. Somerset. The Razor's Edge. Introduction by Anthony Curtis. Penguin Twentieth-Century Classics. New York: Penguin, 1992.

Merkelbach, Reinhold. Mani und sein Religionssystem. Rheinisch-Westfälische Akademie der Wissenschaften. Geisteswissenschaften. Vorträge: G 281. Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag, 1986.

Mirecki, Paul Allan. "The Coptic Manichaean Synaxeis Codex: Descriptive Catalogue of Synaxis Chapter Titles." In Manichaean Studies: Proceedings of the First International Conference on Manichaeism August 5–9, 1987; Department of History of Religions, Lund University, Sweden, edited by Peter Bryder, 135–45. Lund Studies in African and Asian Religions 1. Lund: Lund University plus Ultra, 1988.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Müller, Wolfgang. "In memoriam Rolf Ibscher (18.9.1906—5.2.1967)." APF 20 (1970) 207.

———. "Die koptischen Handschriften der Berliner Papyrussammlung." In Koptologische Studien in der DDR, 65–85. Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg 1965, Sonderheft. Halle: Institut für Byzantinistik der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg, 1965. [The meeting at which the paper was presented took place December 14–15, 1964.]

Orlandi, Tito. "Les manuscrits coptes de Dublin, du British Museum et de Vienne." Le Muséon 89 (1976) 323–38.

Polotsky, H. J. Manichäische Homilien. Manichäische Handschriften der Sammlung A. Chester Beatty 1. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1934.

Polotsky, H. J., and Alexander Böhlig, editors. Kephalaia. Manichäische Handshhriften der staatlichen Museen Berlins, herausgegeben im Auftrage der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften unter Leitung von Prof. Carl Schmidt, 1. Hälfte (Lieferung 1–10). Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1940.

Putt, S. Gorley. "Charles Allberry and Roy Calvert." Encounter 69 (1987) 70–76.

Regemorter, Berthe van. "Le codex relié depuis son origine jusqu'au Haut Moyen-Age." Le Moyen Age 61 (1955) 1–26.

———. Some Early Bindings from Egypt in the Chester Beatty Library. Chester Beatty Monographs 7. Dublin: Hodges Figgis, 1958.

———. Some Oriental Bindings in the Chester Beatty Library. Dublin: Hodges Figgis, 1961.

Robinson, James M. "International Committee for the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi." Newsletter of the International Association for Coptic Studies 19 (1986) 3–4.

———. "Organizational Meeting and First Work Session: International Committee for the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi." Newsletter of the International Association for Coptic Studies 19 (1986) 5.

Säve-Söderbergh, Torgny. Studies in the Coptic Manichaean Psalm-Book: Prosody and Mandaean Parallels. Arbeten utgivna med Understöd av Vilhelm Ekmans Universitetsfond, Uppsala 55. Uppsala: Almqvist & Wiksells, 1949.

Schenke, Hans-Martin. "Gnosis-Forschung 1984–1988." Paper presented at the Fourth International Congress on Coptic Studies of the International Association for Coptic Studies. Louvain-la-Neuve, Belgium, 5–10 September 1988.

Schmidt, Carl. Neue Originalquellen des Manichäismus aus Ägypten. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1933.

Schmidt, Carl, and H. J. Polotsky, with a contribution, "Die Handschriften," pp. 82–85, by Hugo Ibscher. "Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten: Originalschriften des Mani und seiner Schüler." In Sitzungsberichte der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, philosophisch-historische Klasse, 4–90. Berlin: Akademie, 1933.

Snow, C. P. The Light and the Dark. Strangers and Brothers. New York: Scribner, 1947.

Strangers and Brothers. Original release date, January 11, 1984 by the British Broadcasting Corporation. Distributed by Masterpiece Theatre. Directed by Jeremy Summers and Ronald Wilson. Written by Julian Bond, based on novels by C. P. Snow.

Tardieu, Michel. "Les Manichéens en Égypte." BSFE 94 (1982) 5–19.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

GUIDES

Brashear, William, Joachim Selim Karig, and Jürgen Settgast. Ägyptisches Museum Berlin: Staatliche Museen Preussicher Kulturbesitz, 1982.

[In the pocketbook series Museum. Braunschweig: Westermann, 1981, reprinted 1984. This material is summarized in more or less detail in the hardback booklet published by the Ägyptisches Museum der Stattlichen Museen, Preussischer Kulturbesitz, Berlin (West) in German, English, and French: Kniese, Sigrid and Liselotte Robbel. Ägyptisches Museum Berlin (1983). Fay, Biri. Egyptian Museum Berlin (1982, revised 1984); Alte, Monique. Musée Égyptien Berlin (1984).

Geismeier, Willi. Die "Museumsinsel." Die kleine Berolina-Reihe. Berlin Hauptstadt der DDR: Berlin-Werbung Berolina, n.d. (1961?)

Hühns, Erik. "Zur Geschichte der Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin." In Schätze der Weltkultur, 8–28. Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR: Staatliche Museen zu Berlin, and Berlin-Information, 2. Überarbeitete Auflage, 1981.

Müller, Wolfgang. "Einleitung." Kleiner Führer durch die Ausstellung des Ägyptischen Museums, 5–7. Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR: Staatliche Museen zu Berlin, Ägyptisches Museum, 1981.

Wipprech, E. Schloss Berlin-Friedrichsfelde: Der Bau und seine Wiederherstellung. "Vorwort" by H. Dathe, J. Schuchardt, and L. Deiters. Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR: Magistrat, n.d.

Zauzich, Karl-Theodor. "Die Papyrussammlung." In Kunst der Welt in den Berliner Museen: Ägyptisches Museum Staatliche Museen Preussicher Kulturbesitz, 10–12. Stuttgart: Belser, 1980.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi

James M. Robinson

©

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:25:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:25:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

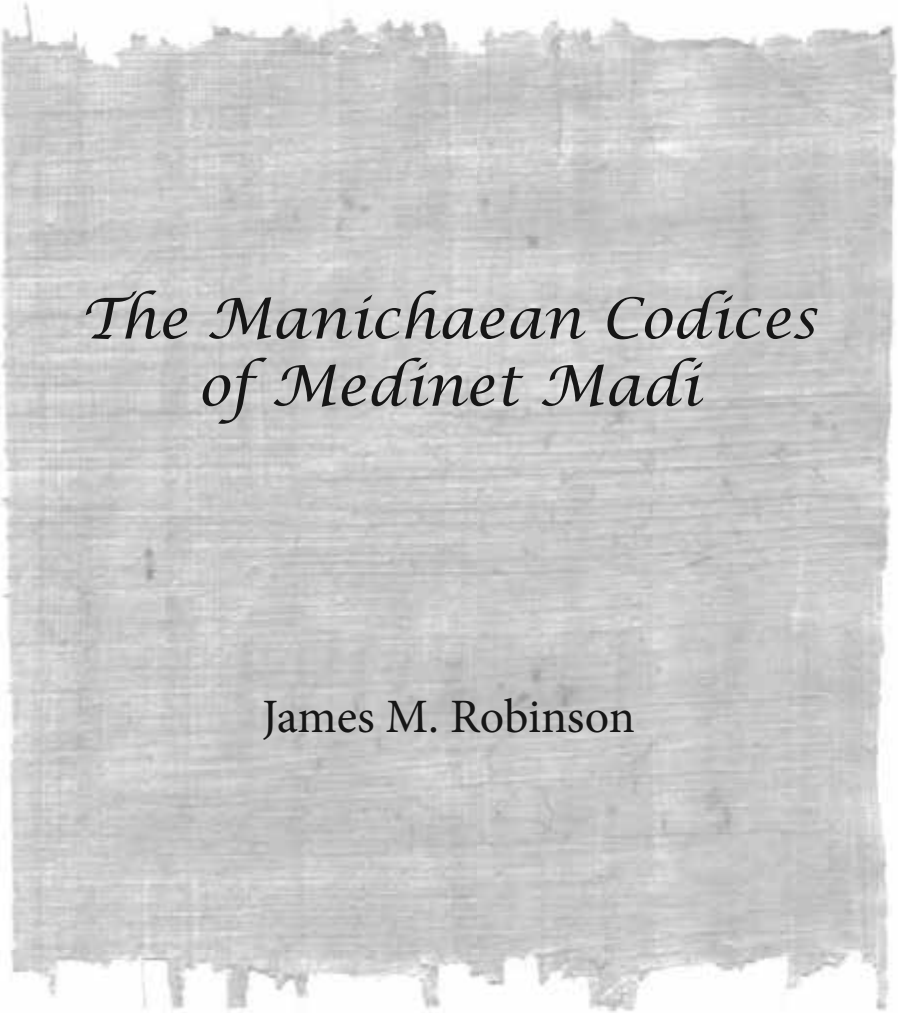
James Clarke & Co

and

The Lutterworth Press

Click on the links above to see our full catalogue for more excellent titles in Hardback, Paperback, PDF and Epub!

The Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi



ISBN: 9780227903896

C L

Would you like to join our Mailing List?

Click here!

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:25:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi

James M. Robinson

©

James Clarke & Co

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:25:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

James Clarke & Co
P.O. Box 60
Cambridge
CB1 2NT
United Kingdom

www.jamesclarke.co publishing@jamesclarke.co

ISBN: 978 0 277 17504 0

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
A record is available from the British Library

First published by James Clarke & Co, 2015

Copyright © James M. Robinson, 2014

Published by arrangement with Cascade Books

All rights reserved. No part of this edition may be reproduced, stored electronically or in any retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without prior written permission from the Publisher (permissions@jamesclarke.co).

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:25:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Contents

Abbreviations / vii
Preface / ix
Abstract / xi

Introduction: The Fate of the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi, 1929–1989 / 1

Part 1: The Acquisition and Initial Conservation and Editing

1 The Acquisitions of Carl Schmidt / 51
2 The Acquisitions of Chester Beatty / 61
3 The Conservation by Hugo Ibscher / 80
4 Beatty, Ibscher, and Polotsky / 92
5 The Effects of World War II / 113

Part 2: The Conservation by Rolf Ibscher

6 The Conservation of the Material in the State Museums of the Former East Berlin / 147
7 The Conservation of the Material in Schondorf/Göttingen/West Berlin / 163
8 The Conservation of the Material in London/Dublin / 182

Inventories of Individual Codices / 189

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:08 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Part 3: The Berlin Holdings

9 P^{15995} Synaxeis / 193
10 P^{15996} Kephalaia, Volume One / 198
11 P^{15997} Acts / 225
12 P^{15998} Letters / 248
13 P^{15999} Homilies (Berlin Part) / 268

Part 4: The Dublin Holdings

14 The Wooden Covers / 273
15 Codex A: Psalms / 282
16 Codex B: Synaxeis / 288
17 Codex C: Kephalaia, Volume Two / 303
18 Codex D: Homilies (Dublin Part) / 309

Collectors, Dealers, and Scholars / 313
Bibliography / 317

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:08 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Abbreviations

APF	Archiv für Papyrusforschung
BSAC	Bulletin de la Société d'Archéologie Copte
BSFE	Bulletin de la Société française d'Égyptologie
BZNW	Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der alten Kirche
JTS	Journal of Theological Studies
MPER	Mitteilungen aus der Sammlung der Papyrus Erzherzog Rainer
WUNT	Wissenschaftliche Unterschungen zum Neuen Testament
WZUH	Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Martin-Luther Universität-Halle-Wittenberg
ZDMG	Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft
ZPE	Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:15 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Preface

The present work, The Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi, is primarily a mass of unpublished documentation I excerpted from the Manichaean archives in the main depositories, Berlin and Dublin, in 1984–1986, and from interviews with those directly involved. Copies were given to these two depositories in 1991, as well as to Wolf-Peter Funk of the University of Laval in Québec, Canada, the leading authority in this field, to whom I hence also gave my own Manichaean archives themselves. Hence the present publication does not continue the history of research up to the present, but leaves that for the next generation of scholarship.

The presentation contains very extensive—but often inconclusive—information; this uncertainty is indicated here, lest their publication give them a degree of certainty that is not appropriate. Yet the amount of otherwise inaccessible but reliable information, from interviews, correspondence, and unpublished documents, should not be lost from sight, but should be made available to the scholarship of the future.

To facilitate reading, indeed to keep the reader from being lost in detail, the extensive documentation is preceded by two already published summaries. First is a brief abstract prepared for the 18th International Congress of Byzantine Studies in Moscow, August 8–15, 1991. This then is followed by a more extensive introduction: "The Fate of the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi, 1929–1989." It was originally published in International Kongress zum Manichäismus 6.–10. August 1989 St. Augustin/Bonn, edited by Gernot Wiessner and Hans-Joachim

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:20 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Klimkeit, in Studies in Oriental Religions 23 (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1992) 19–62.

The presentation of material is less complete for the material in the Chester Beatty Library, since the sorting and recording had to be done primarily for the scattered Berlin material. Yet the extensive archival material in Dublin makes it clear that considerably more detail could be added to the presentation of the return of the Chester Beatty codices after World War II, to the description of the work of Rolf Ibscher in London and Dublin, and to the analysis of the Dublin holdings.

James M. Robinson

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:20 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

ABSTRACT

The Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi

The seven Manichaean papyrus codices of the fourth or fifth century were found in illicit excavation in 1929 in the desert in the ruins of Τερενοῦθις near Medinet Madi at the southern end of the Fayyum. They were acquired in about equal halves by A. Chester Beatty for his library then in London, now in Dublin, and by Carl Schmidt for the Papyrussammlung (papyrus collection) of the Staatliche Museen of Berlin. The status of the seven codices follows:

CHESTER BEATTY LIBRARY CODEX A, THE PSALMS

Beatty acquired the front part of the codex from the Cairo dealer Maurice Nahman in 1931, and he had acquired the back part in 1930. The back part was conserved in Berlin by Hugo Ibscher and published by Charles R. C. Allberry in 1938. As Ibscher conserved each leaf of the front part, H. J. Polotsky transcribed each in Berlin. Copies went to both Beatty and W. E. Crum, for use in his Coptic Dictionary. Since the edition was never completed, it was not published, but in 1986/1988, Søren Giversen published a few lines of Psalm 119 he derived by Polotsky. The front part of the codex was put on loan at the Royal Library of Copenhagen in 1984 for Giversen to publish in facsimile and critical editions. He published both parts only in facsimile edition in 1988.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:24 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

CHESTER BEATTY LIBRARY CODEX B, THE SYNAXEIS

Beatty acquired this codex from a Fayyumic dealer in 1930 (except for 31 residual leaves that Schmidt acquired in 1931, P[15995]). Beatty turned it over to Ibscher to conserve. By 1939 only thirteen leaves of Beatty's part had been conserved and returned to London. They moved with the library to Dublin in 1953 and to Copenhagen in 1984. Giversen published a facsimile edition in 1986. Beginning in 1934, the rest of Beatty's part of the codex was kept in Hugo Ibscher's home in Kleinmachnow, near Berlin, for conservation. But after Ibscher's death in 1943, his son Rolf Ibscher reported putting Beatty's parts of the codex in a reinforced concrete bunker at the Zoo Train Station of Berlin for safekeeping. After the bombing of that bunker in 1944, Rolf Ibscher reported having his assistant P. Seidel remove the codex so that Ibscher could take it to the home of his father-in-law, Wolf Henry Doering, in Schondorf on the Ammersee in Bavaria. From time to time Rolf Ibscher worked at conserving the leaves there. The West German authorities took control of the codex and engaged Carsten Colpe to edit it in 1956–1957. So the codex was taken to Göttingen. When he died in 1967, Rolf Ibscher had conserved only about half this material. When the Egyptian Museum was created in West Berlin in 1967, the material was deposited there. In 1985 the curator of the papyrus collection in that museum, William Brashear, asked me to investigate this material. There are 125 extant unpublished leaves plus the unconserved remainder of the book block. I reported on it to the Fachkommission Byzantinistik of the Historiker-Gesellschaft of the German Democratic Republic in Halle in 1986. Both museums authorized me to organize an edition of all the Manichaean material in Berlin. The transcription of the scarcely legible conserved leaves was begun in 1985. Gesine Schenke Robinson worked on the thirty-one leaves on the Museums-Insel of East Berlin, and others (especially Wolf-Peter Funk and Paul Mirecki) worked on those leaves in West Berlin. The photographing took place in Berlin in preparation for a facsimile edition of all the Manichaean material in Berlin, Vienna, and Warsaw, planned to be published by the Akademie-Verlag of Berlin.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:24 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

CHESTER BEATTY LIBRARY CODEX C, VOLUME TWO OF THE KEPHALAIA

Beatty acquired this codex from the Fayyumic dealer prior to Schmidt's talking to that dealer in the spring of 1931. It was conserved by Rolf Ibscher after World War II and published in facsimile edition by Giversen in 1986. A committee of Søren Giversen, Rodolphe Kasser, and Martin Krause held exclusive rights to publish a critical edition of the Dublin–Copenhagen material. Kasser was entrusted with organizing the publication of the critical edition of this codex.

CHESTER BEATTY LIBRARY CODEX D, THE HOMILIES

Beatty acquired the bulk of this codex from Nahman with an option to buy in 1930. But Beatty released it to Carl Schmidt for Berlin in 1932 (P^{15999}). It was not considered conservable but was put on display as a showpiece for how impossible this task was. The unconserved book block is thought to have been among the materials stored in the bunker at the Zoo train station. From there it was thought to have been taken to the Soviet command post at the castle Friedrichsfelde in 1945–1946, and then to Leningrad in 1946, though it was not found when the material was returned to Berlin in 1958. A smaller part of the codex was acquired by Beatty in 1931, conserved by Ibscher, edited by Polotsky, and published in 1934. Giversen published a facsimile edition of the codex in 1987.

BERLIN PAPYRUS COLLECTION P^{15995}, THE SYNAXEIS

See Chester Beatty Library Codex B above.

BERLIN PAPYRUS COLLECTION P^{15996}, VOLUME ONE OF THE KEPHALAIA

Schmidt acquired this codex from Nahman in 1930. Ibscher conserved most of the leaves. H. J. Polotsky and Alexander Böhlig edited them. They were published in fascicles—by 1940, a first volume through page 244, line 20. Böhlig published through page 291 in 1966, and through page 292 in 1985. Professor Grohmann of Prague acquired three unpublished remains for the Austrian National Library, where they are still extant. Five unpublished Berlin leaves are in Warsaw, where they were brought after having been lost in transit between Berlin and Leningrad in 1946. In Berlin there are some ninety extant unpublished leaves, equaling 180 pages.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:24 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The total of unpublished extant leaves then becomes 3 + 5 + 90 = 98 leaves or 6 + 10 + 180 = 196 pages. Wolf-Peter Funk is preparing a critical edition. Polotsky has put at Funk's disposal for the critical edition his transcriptions and translations located at the Academy of Sciences in Berlin, at the Griffith Institute of the Ashmoleon Museum in Oxford, and at the Chester Beatty Library in Dublin.

BERLIN PAPYRUS COLLECTION P[15997], THE ACTS

This codex with its covers (which were photographed and published) was sold by a provincial dealer to Nahman, who sold the codex to Schmidt in 1931. One leaf that Ibscher conserved was returned to London, was moved with the library to Dublin, and was included in the material put on deposit in Copenhagen. Giversen published it in facsimile in 1987.

There are seven or eight unpublished leaves still in Berlin. Part of one unpublished leaf may be at the Institute for Papyrology of Warsaw University. There may thus be nine or ten extant leaves, eighteen or twenty pages. The unconserved book block and wooden covers did not return from Leningrad to Berlin in 1958. None of the leaves of this codex in Berlin or Warsaw have been published.

BERLIN PAPYRUS COLLECTION P[15998], THE LETTERS

This codex was also sold by the provincial dealer to Nahman, who sold it to Schmidt in 1931. There are six unpublished leaves that were returned from Leningrad to Berlin in 1958 and three unpublished leaves in the National Museum in Warsaw. There are also fifteen containers with eighteen leaves (three secondarily assigned to the Kephalaia) among those that probably lay half-conserved in the Ibscher home throughout the war that may belong to this codex. A leaf originally labeled as belonging to the Letters but reassigned to the Acts probably should be counted as belonging to the Letters. This would make a total of twenty-eight leaves or fifty-six pages. The book block did not return from Leningrad to Berlin in 1958. Hence none of the leaves of this codex were published.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:24 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

BERLIN PAPYRUS COLLECTION P15999, THE HOMILIES

See Chester Beatty Library Codex D above.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:24 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

INTRODUCTION

The Fate of the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi, 1929–1989

> As you will remember Terentianus Maurus in De litteris syllabic et metric: "Pro captu lectoris habent sua fata libelli" [The fate of the books depends on the intelligence of the readers] which is often taken as said in the sense that books have their history. They have indeed, and also the Medinet Madi manuscripts have their fate as we all know. Some details, however, are still unknown to many although they are important in order for better understanding of the texts.
>
> —Søren Giversen

The seven Manichaean codices from Medinet Madi (Τερενοῦθις), whose ruins are still impressive (in the desert on the southern edge of the Fayyum), were made known to the scholarly community primarily through the essay of Carl Schmidt and H. J. Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten,"[1] although much information not included there has more recently become available from the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library in Dublin.[2]

1. Schmid and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 4–90, with two plates and a contribution by Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschriften," 82–85. Most of the information in that essay is not repeated here but is presupposed as generally known or readily available.

2. Copies of relevant archive documents were kindly supplied to the Manichaean archive of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, which provided a chronological history of the Manichaean archive. This inventory was then supplied to Søren Giversen, who, in August 1987, asked the Chester Beatty Library to supplement material he already had with copies of some material listed in the inventory. Dr. Pat Donlon, then Reference Librarian and Curator of the Western Collection, graciously honored this request.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Schmidt narrated that he had been shown some of the material by antiquities dealers in Egypt on two trips, only the second of which is actually dated, to the spring of 1931. From this one has inferred that his first trip was in 1930,[3] which Schmidt has elsewhere stated to be the date of the discovery.[4] But Søren Giversen has reported that the Danish Egyptologist H. O. Lange was shown some of the material in Cairo on November 29, 1929, by Maurice Nahman, the leading Cairo antiquities dealer of the time, though he did not acquire anything.[5] Hence the date of the discovery, if one may assume such material tends to reach the market promptly, should be corrected to read 1929.[6]

SIR CHESTER BEATTY'S ACQUISITIONS

On Schmidt's first trip he had been shown what he was able to identify on the spot as part of the Kephalaia, since he had just been reading proofs on Karl Holl's edition of Epiphanius's Panarion that refers to it! Yet he did not acquire it when first shown it, but continued on his trip to Jerusalem, with plans to secure authorization for its acquisition by the time he passed through Cairo on his return trip. But before that time,[7] or, now to be more specific, on March 23, 1930, Chester Beatty had obtained on approval from the same Cairo antiquities dealer Maurice Nahman two other manuscripts and two wooden covers.[8]

3. Beltz, "Katalog der koptischen Handschriften."

4. Schmidt, Neue Originalquellen des Manichäismus aus Äegypten, 4. Similarly Allberry, "Manichaean Studies," 337–49, especially 340, gives 1930 as the date when the "library was brought to light," as well as the date when Schmidt was shown the Kephalaia "by a Fayum dealer." The dealer in question was actually the Cairo dealer Maurice Nahman, who obviously had contacts with the Fayyum, but not the dealer located in the Fayyum whom Schmidt first visited with regard to these codices in 1931.

5. Giversen, Psalm Book, Part 1, 7–8. He points out that this date, which Lange's extant diary documents, was also confirmed by Schmidt in an extant letter of February 20, 1936. A similar report (Giversen, "Manichaean Texts from the Chester Beatty Collection," 265–72), especially 271–72, states that the antiquities dealer who showed "one of the manuscripts" to Lange was Maurice Nahman.

6. Giversen, Manichaean Papyri of the Chester Beatty Library, 1, speaks of "their rediscovery in 1929," in the quotation used as the motto at the beginning of this paper. This motto is repeated in somewhat different terms in Giversen, "Manichaean Texts from the Chester Beatty Collection," 271.

7. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 6.

8. In the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library is a ledger sheet with the letterhead of Maurice Nahman, dated March 23, 1930. It was made out to Beatty and

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

At the end of May, Beatty had Hugo Ibscher, the Conservator of the Papyrus Collection of Berlin, who had worked periodically for him in London, assess the chances of conserving the material, since the leaves were stuck together by salt crystals resulting, one assumed, from lying in dampness over the centuries. Ibscher said the larger and more expensive manuscript, which only later was identified as the bulk of the Homilies codex (see below), could not be conserved.[9] Beatty apparently decided already then not to acquire it, for he did not send it along with the other to Berlin with Ibscher for conservation, but retained it in London for two years (see below).

Chester Beatty Library Codex A, the Psalms, Part Two

The smaller of the manuscripts acquired by Beatty on March 23, 1930, with an option to buy was assessed by Ibscher as "very difficult" to conserve.[10] Beatty cabled Nahman on May 31, 1930, that he was willing to pay only £200, rather than the £500 that Nahman had asked. But on June 2, 1930, Nahman cabled that he would not accept the offer. Yet Beatty had already turned over the manuscript to Ibscher, who had just taken it back to Berlin with him to conserve. On or before June 9, 1930, while in New York on a business trip, Beatty agreed by transatlantic cable to pay £500. It turned out to be the latter part of the Psalms codex, which was published by Charles R. C. Allberry in 1938.[11] Photographic reproductions were published by Søren Giversen in 1988.[12] listed fifteen items for sale with their prices, to which have been added annotations as to which are to be kept and which returned. A last item, offered for £1,200 reads: "Two Coptic manuscripts an[d] two binding[s] in wood." Underneath, notes were added that read:

---

> On approval
> £700 Mss
> £500 Mss
> £40 Binding

9. Hugo Ibscher arrived in London on May 26, 1930, according to Beatty's cable to an impatient Nahman on May 28, 1930. On May 31, 1930, Beatty cabled Nahman: "Doctor Ibscher thinks can do nothing with large book."

10. Quoted from Beatty's cable of May 31, 1930, to Nahman.

11. Allberry, A Manichaean Psalm-Book, Part 2.

12. Giversen, Psalm Book, Part 2, facsimile edition.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Chester Beatty Library Codex B, the Synaxeis

Schmidt reported that a Fayyumic dealer had explained to him in the Spring of 1931 that the discovery had been divided into eight parts among three dealers. The Fayyumic dealer himself had retained three parts, Nahman three, and a provincial dealer two. The Fayyumic dealer told Schmidt that he had already sold all three of his parts to Beatty.[13] Since there are apparently only two codices acquired by Beatty that he did not get from Nahman, the bulk of the Synaxeis and Volume Two of the Kephalaia (see below), one of these must have been dismembered by the time of the partition, a vandalism to which Schmidt referred in general, thereby producing three "codices" out of two codices. Since the Synaxeis codex is known to have been dismembered by this time (see below), one may assume that it was the one counted as two of the three "codices" acquired by Beatty from the Fayyumic dealer.

On November 27, 1930, Beatty turned over to Ibscher in London, to take back to Berlin for conservation, another "Coptic book."[14] Its acquisition is not otherwise documented, but it may be postulated to have been from the Fayyumic acquisition, which may have been cash and carry, without a written receipt. But the absence of documentation could be due merely to the incompleteness of the Archives or of our survey of them.[15]

Schmidt reported having acquired in the spring of 1931 for the sake of completeness "a few unimpressive piles" from a codex Beatty had acquired in the Fayyum.[16] Only two codices were shared between London and Berlin, the Homilies and the Synaxeis. This could not be the Homilies, since the Berlin part of this codex was later acquired from Nahman, once Beatty, who had it on approval, had decided not to acquire it (see below). Hence the Synaxeis must be for this reason also one of the codices Beatty acquired in the Fayyum, and indeed

13. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 8.

14. In a letter of November 27, 1930, to Sir Alan Gardiner, Beatty speaks of sending Gardiner a Coptic book to have Ibscher put in his bag after verifying that it is satisfactorily packed.

15. The two manuscripts brought to London in April 1931 (see below) are recorded to have been brought that month, but a receipt from an antiquities dealer has not been located. The fact that the two manuscripts are in each case the other part of the two codices acquired from Nahman a year earlier supports the assumption that these came from Nahman.

16. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 8.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms prior to the spring of 1931.[17] Thus it may be the book sent to Berlin for conservation at the end of November 1930, although this could also have been Volume Two of the Kephalaia. In fact, since both may have been unbound, and the Synaxeis was in more than one part, the "book" may have been a stack of papyrus pads without a clear distinction of where one codex began and another ended. In fact, someone had written in by hand on the typed letter of November 27, 1930, the word "Papyri" just before "Coptic Book," which might indicate that it looked less like a book than an amorphous stack of papyri.

Thirteen leaves of the Synaxeis codex were conserved by Hugo Ibscher and returned to London by the spring of 1939.[18] They were moved with the Chester Beatty Library to Dublin in 1953 and in 1984 were put on loan at the Royal Library of Copenhagen for Søren Giversen to study.[19] Giversen published photographic reproductions in 1986.[20] It is to be hoped that these thirteen leaves can be integrated fully in any future critical edition of the Synaxeis rather than being subjected to the either-or conditions announced by Rodolphe Kasser on behalf of an International Committee for the Publication of the Manichaean Coptic Papyri from Medinet Madi Belonging to the Chester Beatty Library (Søren Giversen, President; Rodolphe Kasser; Martin Krause), to the effect that persons editing Berlin materials

17. Ibid., 30, makes this explicit.

18. On April 22, 1939, Sir Alan Gardiner wrote Beatty that he had some Mani plates he would return soon. A day-book kept by Joan Kingford Wood of Beatty's library staff since 1927 recorded on May 3, 1939: "From Dr. G[ardiner]. Mani. Pap. Codex B.C. KEPHALAIA 49 in all (Cod. B. 51–62, 63–76 Cod. C. 1, 3, 4, 39–48, 49–58) = 49." An entry dated July 5, 1939, as "Fetched by Mr. A[llberry]" "Codex B KEPHALAIA pages 51–62, 63–76." Apparently two codices were distinguished, as B and C, yet both were on this occasion designated Kephalaia, whereas Beatty had only one Kephalaia codex, Codex C. Since Codex A, Psalms, is of a smaller format than the others (see below), and Codex D, the part of the Homilies owned by Beatty, had already been clearly identified and in fact published, the 13 leaves designated Codex B 51–76 must be from the only remaining codex acquired by Beatty, the Synaxeis.

19. Whereas Giversen had requested about 171 leaves on November 24, 1982, of Patrick Henchy, then librarian of the Chester Beatty Library, on November 7, 1983 he raised the figure to 184 in a request to the current director and librarian, Wilfrid Lockwood. The inventory dated January 13, 1984 and validated with the stamp of the Danish Royal Library lists as "Codex B" "13 glasses" numbered "51–76."

20. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, ix, states: "Pages 101–126 bear facsimiles of the leaves which Hugo Ibscher has labelled 'Codex B.' . . . The sheets are marked from 51 to 76, the equivalent of this edition's 101–126."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

(where the bulk of the Synaxeis codex is now located, see below) may not participate in editing Dublin materials.[21] Yet, as Alexander Böhlig has subsequently stated: "It is too onesided, when the Dublin team wishes to forbid simultaneous work on the two parts of the discovery, since, after all, overlappings of the material are present."[22] In fact the publication of the facsimile edition puts the facsimiles of these thirteen leaves in the public domain, free to the scholarly world to publish in critical editions as it sees fit. For, as Martin Krause, though a member of the committee advocating this segregation in the membership of the two teams, has said (with regard to the facsimile edition of the Nag Hammadi codices), the purpose of a facsimile edition is "so that the manuscripts after their publication in facsimile volumes stand avail-

21. At the meeting of the Association Francophone de Coptologie at the Louvre Museum in Paris on May 23, 1986, Rodolphe Kasser read and distributed an announcement entitled "Projet international pour la publication des manuscrits manichéens coptes de Medinet Madi appartenant à la Chester Beatty Library (premier communiqué)."

> Soon after this [the publication of a facsimile edition] the critical edition of the same texts will appear under the responsibility of the same committee [Søren Giversen, president; Rodolphe Kasser; Martin Krause], which will distribute this task between coptologists . . . only those persons will be invited to participate in the editio princeps of the Manichaean Coptic texts in the Chester Beatty Library who has [sic] not already obtained this possibility concerning the editio princeps of the Manichaean Coptic papyri of Berlin or Vienna.

This announcement followed directly upon my invitation to French-language Coptologists to participate in the work of an "International Committee for the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi" that was being planned. This invitation was published in Newsletter 19 of the International Association for Coptic Studies, August 1986, Annex 1, pp. 3–5, especially p. 4: ". . . qualified scholars are welcome to offer their services . . . For it is not the intention of the project to limit access to the material, but rather to facilitate access to it." The announcement by Kasser, president of the International Association for Coptic Studies, followed in French and English on pp. 6–9.

The Board of the International Association for Coptic Studies, at its meeting on June 12, 1986, "expressed its approval of both [projects], and hoped that there will be collaboration between the two projects," as published on page 1 of the same Newsletter.

22. Böhlig, "Neue Initiativen zur Erschliessung der koptisch-manichäischen Bibliothek von Medinet Madi," 245. "Es ist zu einseitig, wenn das Dublin-Team gleichzeitige Arbeit an beiden Fundgruppen verbieten will, sind doch Uberkreuzungen des Materials vorhanden."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

able to all scholars for study and work" (Krause's emphasis).[23] A transcription of the published facsimiles of the 13 Synaxeis leaves that has been prepared by Wolf-Peter Funk in conjunction with transcriptions of the leaves in Berlin that he is preparing should preferably be published together, for which purpose access to the papyri in Copenhagen should be granted to him and others working on the Berlin part of codices also represented in Dublin/Copenhagen. Negotiations during the conference at Bonn produced an agreement to at least a degree of cooperation:

> Persons participating in the editio princeps of material in Berlin can work together with persons participating in the editio princeps of material in Dublin / Copenhagen as a joint team to edit a shared text. In the naming of persons on such joint editorial teams Giversen will represent the Dublin group and Robinson the Berlin group. The person or persons named by each group will be primarily responsible for editing the leaves of that group, but members of such a joint team can study the papyri at both places, work in close collaboration with each other, and publish a joint edition.

A first step toward the implementation of this policy was a visit of Wolf-Peter Funk to Copenhagen, where he was permitted to study the 13 leaves of the Synaxeis codex. (Giversen has not approved subsequent plans to cooperate in editing the two volumes of the Kephalaia.)

Some of the material, while undergoing conservation, was not kept at the Papyrus Collection in Berlin, but in the Ibscher home, where Ibscher was permitted to work three days a week from the age of 60, i.e., from 1934 on.[24] Though Beatty himself went to Berlin before the war to bring back his papyri, he apparently brought back 23. Krause, review of The Facsimile Edition of the Nag Hammadi Codices: Introduction, 378.

24. Reported by Alexander Böhlig in a letter of February 10, 1986. A letter from Otto Firchow of October 28, 1960, had stated:

> In my opinion the papyri [Chester Beatty Library Codex B, the Synaxeis] ought to be found with Dr. Rolf Ibscher probably already mounted and glazed. Dr. Hugo Ibscher used to carry out this kind of work in his own home. If I were still in Berlin, or if I had known about the matter a few months ago, I could have offered you my help. I should suggest that you get in touch with Rolf Ibscher, who has no connection with the Berlin Museum. Let me say again that the papyri cannot be in the Berlin Museum but must have been in Hugo Ibscher's private possession.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms only what had been conserved.[25] C. R. C. Allberry reported in May 1940 "that Dr. Ibscher had the remainder of Mr. Beatty's papyrus at his house in the country, at Kleinmachnow."[26] But there were in the home also materials belonging to Berlin, such as unconserved leaves of P[15996], the Kephalaia,[27] and P[15998], the Letters.[28] It would be to these Berlin holdings that Ibscher referred in 1949, to the effect that the remainder of the (Berlin) Papyrus Collection was in his home.[29]

25. Joan Kingford Wood wrote on February 7, 1960, her reminiscences:

> . . . it must have been when things were boiling up in Germany against the Jews, before hostilities began with us, that Sir Chester went over to Berlin to fetch the remainder of the papyri, the Manichaean . . . He went and brought back the papyri. But then Sir Chester has a way of overcoming difficulties with authority and persuasion.

26. The black loose-leaf folder in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library entitled "Papyrus. Biblical Manichaean Hieratic Greek etc. General Catalogue," in the section "Manichaean Pap." presents this quotation, with the reference: "(see letter from Allberry)."

27. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 182: "Of the material in Berlin only a very small part has always remainded in Berlin. It was the last 20 leaves of the Berlin Kephalaia book."

28. Ibid., 184, 182:

> Of this book one finds in Berlin, put under glass already in the pre-war period, 6 leaves . . . , and about 22 leaves in half-conserved condition. The folders in which they lay were numbered . . .
>
> The urgently needed reglassing of all the pieces that had been glassed by Hugo Ibscher and that returned to Berlin in 1958 was undertaken by Rolf Ibscher beginning in June of this year (1960), along with the conservation of a few half-conserved leaves that Ibscher Sr. had at first put to one side as too difficult, doubtlessly correctly, for it had to do usually with double or triple leaves.

The half-conserved leaves are here distinguished as in folders rather than as glassed. And the reference to material being returned to Berlin is limited to the glassed material. This would indicate that the half-conserved material in folders had not been taken to Leningrad and returned in 1958 to Berlin. The Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection of Berlin lists only 6 glassed leaves as going "to the East" and "back."

29. Ibscher wrote J. V. S. Wilkinson, the librarian of the Chester Beatty Library, on December 31, 1949: "The misfortune of our persecuted Museums with the destroyed rooms of the Papyrus Collection led after all to this, that the collection was stationed with me in [my] house, and that brought us many a convenience."

Actually the material was already in the Ibscher home; it is very doubtful (see below) if any papyri were still in the museum when it was very heavily damaged by air raids, or that Ibscher could have rescued any such material from the gutted Neues Museum to take to his home. There is a similar allusion to material in the home in a letter of January 9, 1949 from Ibscher to Beatty, of which only a translation of the

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The bulk of the Papyrus Collection not in the Ibscher home, along with other Museum holdings, was put for safekeeping during the war in a reinforced concrete bunker (removed after the war) at the Zoo Train Station, in what became West Berlin. The Museum was indeed very heavily damaged in a massive air raid on February 3, 1945, which left intact only the outer walls of the gutted Neues Museum, where the Papyrus Collection had been housed.

Rolf Ibscher reported that after his father's death on May 26, 1943, he added to the storage deposit in the Zoo bunker "the Manichaean papyrus books,"[30] presumably meaning the book blocks that had been in the home where his father had been conserving them, i.e., separating off the individual leaves. "But after 20 July 1944 [when the Zoo bunker was itself bombed[31]] this place too did not seem to me safe enough." Hence "with the approval of General Director Kümmel, in xi 1944."[32] Ibscher had an assistant, P. Seidel, get three book blocks from the bunker, in order to take them for safekeeping to Schondorf on the Ammer Lake in Bavaria, to the home of his father-in-law, the publisher Wolf Henry Doering. Rolf Ibscher maintained that he removed relevant paragraph is in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library: "We are grateful for one piece of good fortune which follows from my present situation in so far as it has been possible up to now to maintain our house properly heated on account of the fact that since the destruction of the Museums, I have continued to work at home and also harbour the remainder of the Papyrus collection which has not yet been transferred to West Germany."

---

None of the Berlin holdings of the Manichaean codices are known to have ever been taken to West Germany; the suggestion that some might already be in West Germany is no doubt a reference to the Synaxeis, which Ibscher mistakenly took to be the Berlin Codex, P[15998], the Letters, which he had taken to West Germany (see below).

30. Rolf, Ibscher. "Wiederaufnahme," 359–60 (abstract). The Archives of the Chester Beatty Library include Ibscher, "Zusammenfassung des auf dem Internationalen Orientalisten-Kongress gehaltenen Berichts," typescript, 4 pages; and the typescript of the complete paper, "Wiederaufnahme und neuester Stand der Konservierung der Manichäischen Papyruscodices," 12 pages, unpublished; the quotations come from p. 3.

31. On November 9, 1960, I. E. S. Edwards of the Department of Egyptian Antiquities of the British Museum wrote R. J. Hayes, then acting head of the Chester Beatty Library, that he had heard from Rudolf Anthes (director of the Papyrus Collection of Berlin 1935–1939, 1945–1950, but also enlisted during the war to move the objects from the Museum to safekeeping) that this was the reason for the removal of the material from the Zoo bunker.

32. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 181.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the material "on my own responsibility."[33] Böhlig has reconciled the divergence as to the person responsible as follows:[34]

> Rolf Ibscher had the authorization from General Director Kümmel to get the Dublin material from the anti-aircraft tower and take it to Bavaria. He did this in the company of the Museum worker P. Seidel, who has since died. In the process the idea came to him that it would perhaps be useful, in case worst came to worst, also to take along one of the Berlin codices. This decision was, as far as I know, spontaneous. That it was worth it, is shown by the success. These things remained completely preserved, in contrast to what the Soviets had "saved."

After the war, Beatty had sought with the help of Sir Alan Gardiner to establish contact with Rolf Ibscher so as to secure the return of his codices, but apparently without success. Rolf Ibscher himself seems to have been the first to establish contact, by writing to England on January 28, 1946, to the effect that he had saved Beatty's material, "together with a part of the Berlin Mani Codices," whereas the rest of the Berlin part had been taken East.[35]

Ibscher's initiative may have resulted from contact with the occupying forces, for it was at precisely the same time that these official channels seem to have located the material that had been kept at Schondorf. Alexander Böhlig has given 1946 as the date and Schondorf the place that two codices (Part 1 of the Psalms and Volume

33. Rolf Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," unpublished typescript, 3: ". . . which on my own responsibility I had brought out of the danger zone of Berlin . . ."

34. Böhlig in a letter of February 10, 1986.

35. In a letter of November 16, 1946, Sir Alan Gardiner wrote to Joan Kingsford Wood, translating from a letter of Ibscher's of January 28, 1946 to him: "However much there is to say on this topic (his family affairs) it is more important to tranquillize you in the matter of the Mani MSS. or rather Codices. They are saved! After Father's death I took them, together with a part of the Berlin Mani Codices to Bavaria to my Father-in-law outside the danger zone; for also here in Kleinmachnow bombs often fell."

In a letter of May 17, 1946, from Gardiner to Wood, Gardiner reported that a letter of January 28, 1946, from Rolf Ibscher to Sir Herbert Thompson, who had died, had been forwarded to him. Gardiner quoted from Ibscher's letter: "You will know, perhaps through Dr. Gardiner or via the British Museum, that and how I could save the London possession from the effects and consequences of the war." Gardiner added: "He goes on to say that all the remainder of the MSS. belonging to the Berlin Museum had been taken East."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

two of the Kephalaia) were released to Beatty,[36] information that is all the more reliable in view of the fact that it was Böhlig himself (who was in Munich at the end of the war) who had "separated them at Schondorf."[37] Böhlig considered it possible that, in view of inadequately marked parts, some material belonging to Berlin may have been released to London, and some belonging to London retained at Schondorf.[38] The 13 leaves that were in London (later in Dublin and then in Copenhagen), to which Böhlig here refers as perhaps belonging to Berlin but by mistake sent to England, do not, however, belong to the Berlin Letters codex P[15998], as he at the time conjectured (see below), but rather to the Synaxeis codex that belonged to Beatty; they had been quite appropriately returned to London before the war (see above). But regarding the converse possibility, that London material may have been retained in Schondorf: Böhlig himself was the first to publish, in 1957, the admission that by mistake the book block of Beatty's Synaxeis stayed at Schondorf rather than being returned to London (see below).

At the beginning of 1946 Sir John Forsdyke, director of the British Museum, received a vague report about Beatty's codices having been located in Germany, according to "the military authorities."[39] The

36. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit an den koptischen Manichaica," 180–81: "There [at the house of the father-in-law in Schondorf] Sir Chester Beatty had the parts of the Codices A and C picked up in the year 1946."

37. Rolf Ibscher reported in his broken English in a letter of October 6, 1955, to Beatty: "This wooden box [taken from the Zoo bunker] contained one Berlin manuscript (for which I had specially asked Mr. Seidel) to make certain, that at l[e]ast part of the Berlin collection also was saved, in addition those papyri which reached you in London in 1947 after Dr. Böhlig had separated them at Schondorf." In an interview on July 10, 1986, Prof. and Mrs. Böhlig confirmed the fact that they went to Schondorf in the absence of Rolf Ibscher and recalled having turned over the material after only a superficial examination of the contents.

38. Böhlig, in a letter of February 10, 1986: "Whether something was then confused when turned over to the emissaries of Chester Beatty, so that in the end result a Berlin part came to Dublin and an English part (the Synaxeis codex) to Göttingen / West Berlin, I consider to be quite possible. That the individual parts were not adequately marked I also consider possible."

39. From a letter of Forsdyke to Wilkinson of November 15, 1946: "The facts (so far as I have any) about Mr. Chester Beatty's papyri in Germany are that a box of papyri marked 'British Museum' but identified by us as his was found there and reported to me by the military authorities. I told them that I wished to receive them as soon as they could be released and despatched, and I have no doubt that this will ultimately be done in that order—if they are not in the Russian zone."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

military authorities in this case would seem to have been Squadron Leader Christopher Norris, in charge of seeking "works of art, etc., in Germany that come from Britain."[40]

Forsdyke had written Norris as early as February 15, 1946, that the British Museum would receive Beatty's material if he could deliver it.[41] This suggests that Norris had just written Forsdyke that Beatty's material had been located. The timing of such a letter would thus fit that of Ibscher's letters of January 28, 1946, to London. From this, one may infer that the unpublished Part One of Beatty's Psalms, Codex A, and his Volume Two of the Kephalaia, Codex C, were probably turned over to the American forces in Schondorf about 1946, and were kept in the Fine Arts Repository that the Americans established in Munich in 1946.[42]

At the beginning of October 1947 Lieutenant Colonel Hugh Murray Baillie, of the Fine Arts Commission of the British Zone located in Düsseldorf, brought to Düsseldorf two codices thought to belong to the British Museum. Norris realized that the material was that of Beatty he had been expecting.[43] Baillie brought the manuscripts to

40. From a letter to Wilkinson dated July 16, 1946, whose author is not known: ". . . a British officer who was charged with the duty of investigating the whereabouts and present condition of works of art, etc., in Germany that come from Britain. The officer in question saw Forsdyke, and it was, I think, from Forsdyke that I got the most detailed information." References to Norris in this capacity recur in subsequent correspondence.

41. A letter of F. Francis, Secretary of the British Museum, to Wilkinson of July 25, 1946 reports this fact.

42. Wilkinson wrote Beatty on October 9, 1947, what Baillie (see also the following note) had reported (based on a rough memorandum also in the Chester Beatty Archives and dated the same day): "Dr. Ibscher handed the Papyri to a relative of his in Bavaria. (This corresponds more or less with what young Ibscher told Dr. Gardiner, i.e. that after old Ibscher's death, young Ibscher handed them to his father-in-law in Bavaria). This relation (i.e., apparently the father-in-law) handed the MSS. to the Fine Arts Repository which was established by the Americans last year, and they were held by the Americans together with other property which was to be sent back to the Allies, or other quarters."

43. Wilkinson's letter of October 9, 1947, to Beatty continued:

> About a week ago Mr. Baillie was in Munich, arranging for the transfer of some fine arts property from the American to the British Zone, and these two parcels were handed to Mr. Baillie. He was told by the Americans that they thought it was British Museum property, and that it had been handed over by Dr. Gardiner to Dr. Ibscher. They handed it over readily, and were satisfied that it had come to Germany before the War. Mr. Baillie brought the parcels

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

London[44] and delivered them on October 8, 1947, to Joan Kingsford Wood[45] of the staff of the Chester Beatty Library, who commented:[46]

> Evidently untouched and as they were when handed to Dr. Ibscher, as far as it is possible to tell.

Part of the London concern to recover the material had involved an effort to determine just how much and which material belonging to Beatty was in Germany. It turned out that no one actually knew; the only documentation that could be turned up referred only to two manuscripts, the parts of the Psalms and of the Homilies brought to London in April 1931 (see below).[47] Since this part of the Homilies back to his office in Düsseldorf, and informed Squadron-Leader Norris at the. Head Office; Norris recognized the parcels as your property about which I had had correspondence with him, i.e. Norris. Baillie was coming home on leave, and offered to bring the parcels to London himself. He had noticed that the Papyri, which he had opened, were very fragile.

---

44. Baillie's letter of October 5, 1947, to Beatty stated: "I have just brought over from Germany, on my return on leave, two codices, which I understand you sent to Dr. Ibscher of Berlin before the war. I collected them from Munich and it seemed the safest and quickest way of getting them back. Perhaps you would be good enough to let me know when it would be convenient for me to hand them over to you officially."

45. On October 8, 1947, Wood signed a receipt for "two parcels containing one labelled 'CODEX C' and the other 'MANICHEAN PSALM BOOKS.'"

46. Her note is not written on the receipt itself, but is handwritten by her on a letter of October 8, 1947 she received from John Wooderson, Beatty's secretary. In the note she refers to the "Psalm book "in the singular, thereby in effect correcting the receipt (see the preceding note).

47. On November 25, 1945,Wilkinson wrote Beatty asking "which MSS. were left with Ibscher." Beatty must have turned to Wood for information, for on November 28, 1945, she wrote him: "I have no note at all what Manichaean ms. or mss. were with Dr. Ibscher." The same day she wrote to Gardiner for assistance. On November 4, 1946, Wooderson wrote Wilkinson, asking him to inquire of Wood or Gardiner "exactly what were sent." Wilkinson talked to Wood, and on November 14, 1946, reported to Wooderson: "The MSS. were not, I should explain, dealt with by Mrs. Wood personally, in the first instance." She herself wrote Gardiner on November 14, 1946, "to ask if you happened to keep any note at all, of the number of Manichaean papyrus MSS. that were handed to Dr. Ibscher?"

He responded on November 16, 1946: "I am very sorry to say I cannot give you the information about the Manichaean papyri for which you ask. I never knew the number of rolls entrusted to Dr. Ibscher, but I believe his son to be perfectly honest and he will give Mr. Beatty the right information."

On November 16, 1946, she wrote to Wilkinson:

> There was one other source for details about the Mani MSS. which I fetched away yesterday morning, a day-book I used to keep. I found in it an entry

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

(like Part Two of the Psalms codex taken to Berlin the end of 1930) had long since been conserved, published, and returned to London, the only material that was actually identified as having gone to Germany and that was actually still in Germany was Part One of the Psalms codex. Overlooked were the materials in the Chester Beatty Library Archives (cited above) concerning Part Two of the Psalms codex being taken by Ibscher to Berlin at the end of May 1930, and the bulk of the Synaxeis codex and Volume Two of the Kephalaia being taken by Ibscher to Berlin—perhaps both November 27, 1930. Of the three items at Schondorf, the English team had been aware of only one as being in Germany. It is thus out of ignorance and oversight that the false conclusion was reached that everything had been returned from Germany.[48]

Inquiries were immediately begun as to who might be enlisted to conserve the two book blocks. No one in England could be recommended, but several recommended Rolf Ibscher. For this reason, and also no doubt in gratitude, Rolf Ibscher was offered employment to continue the conservation begun by his father. On May 27, 1948, he

---

for—

"May 8 1931 To Dr. Gardiner for Dr. Ibscher, the 2 Manichaean Coptic books, Hymns and Ritual Observances."

This is the only record I have found of ever having taken any Manichaean ms. in its original state to Dr. G.[ardiner] for Dr. I.[bscher]. The title 'Ritual Observances' may later have turned into 'Homilies' on examination? . . . As to whether these '2 Coptic books' later turned into 3 books, so-to-speak; or Mr. Beatty had one more afterwards, I cannot say.

This faint glimmer of awareness of there having been more than two that were turned over to Ibscher to conserve thus seems to have been dismissed. After the two codices had been returned from Germany, Wood appended a handwritten note to her file copy of her letter of November 28, 1945, to Beatty, to correct her comment to the effect that she had no notes about material going to Ibscher; she now quoted the note dated May 8, 1931, and added: "This date tallies fairly with that of 'April 1931,' written on one of the boxes returned Oct 8/47 from Munich." This must be the box containing the first part of the Psalms, since this was first brought to London April 1931 (see below) and was returned October 8, 1947.

48. Wilkinson wrote Wooderson on October 9, 1947: "the parcels appear to contain all the material which remained in Dr. Ibscher's hands. None of it has been mounted; it is still in its original condition. The two parcels contain (1) Codex C (2) The Psalm-books Papyri." In his letter the same day to Beatty, he also stated: "Further, a number of the mounted leaves marked 'Codex C,' at Baroda House, tally in size and appearance with the unmounted fragments of Codex C which have just arrived. The probability is, therefore, that we have got everything back at last."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

wrote Beatty accepting the offer, and incidentally covered himself by blaming careless American soldiers for whatever damages may have been suffered by the codices.[49] In the argosy from the Neues Museum to the Zoo bunker and on to Kleinmachnow, to Schondorf, to Munich, to Düsseldorf, and to London, American personnel of the Fine Arts Repository were responsible only for the approximately one-hour trip from Schondorf to Munich. Fortunately, a placing of blame was apparently not necessary.

Rolf Ibscher maintained as late as 1954 that all of Beatty's material thus survived,[50] though only a year later he explained to Beatty that the Synaxeis codex was among those taken to Leningrad.[51]

The other museum objects still stored in the Zoo bunker were taken by the Soviet forces to the Soviet sector of Berlin, before the Soviet forces vacated that part of Berlin in which the Zoo Station is located, which became the British sector. The loot from the Zoo bunker was deposited temporarily in a Soviet command post at the Friedrichsfelde Castle in the Soviet sector, as was indicated by a few glassed papyrus leaves turned in to the museum by persons reporting they found them there.[52] The hoard was then transported by train to

49. Ibscher wrote in his wooden English: ". . . I am not knowing how are the manuscripts being kept by the foolish way of acting of the American Military Service arbitrary, contrary to my entreaty. [Ibscher was not even in Schondorf when the codices were turned in. See note 37 above.] Surely the manuscripts were not treated carefully during the travelling over hedge and ditch. But how could this be expected by any soldier having not the slightest notion of the delicate material keeping in his hands!"

50. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 3.

51. Rolf Ibscher reported in his limited English to Beatty in a letter of October 6, 1955:

> The papyri were removed according to my arrangement from the bomb proof shelter (Zoo Bunker) in 1944 by my assistant at the Museum, Mr. Seidel, but Codex B [Synaxeis], sorry to say, seems to have been left behind. The reason being that the papyri had to be removed secretly in a frantic hurry, thus you can imagine how glad I was, when Mr. Seidel got past the SS-Guards with the invaluable little wooden box . . .
>
> Thus Codex B [actually the Berlin codex P^{15998}, the Letters], together with 3 Berlin manuscripts [P^{15996}, P^{15997}, P^{15999}] and all other glazed [glassed] Berlin Manichaean Papyri of the Museum [P^{15995} and leaves of P^{15996}, P^{15997}, and P^{15998}] were taken to Russia.

52. Wolfgang Müller, director emeritus of the Papyrus Collection in (East) Berlin, reported in 1986 that Rolf Ibscher told him this. Müller himself did not move to Berlin until 1951.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Leningrad in 1946 (see below) and in principle returned to Berlin in 1958. But none of the book blocks were returned.

Although Michel Tardieu has reported that the bulk of P^{15997} and P^{15998} had been "destroyed or lost during the Second World War,"[53] no evidence has emerged indicating any loss during the war, though the loss of the P^{15997} and P^{15998} book blocks (and of P^{15999}, the unconservable bulk of the Homilies that Tardieu overlooked) remains unexplained. Otto Firchow, director of the Papyrus Collection in (East) Berlin at the time, moved to the British sector of Berlin in August 1960, and commended himself to the British as a refugee by reporting that he had brought with him Beatty's missing codex.[54] But when the package finally reached the British Museum in October 1960, it turned out to contain "only blank leaves of papyrus and a few inscribed fragments."[55] Firchow maintained that the packet had been "packed by Dr. Ibscher" and that he himself was not involved.[56]

On May 23, 1985, I visited the British Museum to go through the files left behind in the office of the retired conservator of papyrus Stanley Baker, and came upon what seemed to be the box turned in by Firchow. My inventory of this item reads:

53. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 5–19, especially 6. With regard to his estimate of 1,000 lost leaves as "that which would have been lost in Berlin at the time of the events of the Second War," (7), he refers to Rolf Ibscher, "Mani und kein Ende," 223, who, however, does not here date the loss to the time during the war.

54. In a letter of August 29, 1960, Otto Firchow, replying to a letter from I. E. S. Edwards, who had written to him at the Papyrus Collection inquiring about Beatty's material, described his move as follows: "I myself have been compelled to surrender during the past few days under political and personal pressure the Direction of the Berlin Museum, Egyptian Department, and to flee to West Berlin. I have used this opportunity to take the Mani Papyri with me. In the next few days I will hand them over to the British Military Authorities."

Johannes Irmscher, at the time director of the Institut für griechisch-römische Altertumskunde of the Academy of Sciences of the German Democratic Republic entrusted with editing the Manichaean codices, has in a letter of March 27, 1989, interpreted Firchow's move as not a "Politicum," but merely as an effort to improve his situation.

55. In a letter to Beatty dated October 26, 1960, Edwards reported that the package had arrived the preceding Sunday, was opened on Monday, and had the contents as quoted above.

56. In a letter of October 28, 1960, from Firchow to Edwards.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> Flat wooden box. Contains vestiges of Mani codex without text. Sheets of paper presumably used in conservation contain German writing presumably by Ibscher.

There were in Baker's office also 15 large green folders containing remnants of the Mani material (as well as a German newspaper fragment dated May 15, 1931). I submitted the inventory to the director of the Chester Beatty Library, Wilfrid Lockwood, on May 26, 1985. On June 25, 1985, Lockwood wrote Giversen to the effect he might want to consult the items I had located at the British Museum. Giversen has identified the material turned in by Firchow as insignificant vestiges of the Psalms codex, which, however, Giversen did not include in the Facsimile Edition.[57] Perhaps it is from Part Two of the Psalms codex acquired March 23, 1930, since the box containing Part One of the Psalms acquired in April 1931 had already been returned to London in 1947 along with Part One of the Psalms (see note 47 above). Presumably Hugo Ibscher had not gone to the trouble to separate and put between glass what he considered insignificant unidentified vestiges (even though they may impress us as relatively large and numerous), but apparently had left them in the box in which the codex had been kept prior to its conservation.

57. Giversen, Psalm-Book. Part 1, vii, xi:

> Still remaining to be published are some fragmentary pages and small fragments of the Psalm Book which were entrusted to Hugo Ibscher for conservation by A. Chester Beatty in the 1930s. These remained unrestored at Ibscher's death in 1943 and in 1960 they were transferred to the British Museum by the German Egyptologist Otto Firchow.
>
> Since the material taken to the British Museum [actually only to the British Sector of Berlin] by Otto Firchow has not yet been conserved, it has not been included in this publication. It is to be hoped that the extremely difficult and tedious work of restoring this material will be carried out by a skilled expert.

It is apparently to this same situation that Giversen referred vaguely in his Lund essay, "The Manichaean Texts from the Chester Beatty Collection," 269:

> A few fragments and a couple of fragmentary pages also from the Psalm-Book, are not yet conservated as they were left in Hugo Ibschers [sic] home in Berlin. It cannot be doubted that they belong to the Chester Beatty effects but they were, in a strange way, brought to the British Museum in the 1960's.
>
> A now deceased scholar informed me some years ago that they were there, but since there are some problems attached to them I will not say more about them here.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Rolf Ibscher did not return the codex that he had kept in Schondorf to Berlin, to which he maintained it belonged, but rather, on his trips to and from London, worked at conserving the leaves while visiting his wife's family in Schondorf. Søren Giversen saw the material in Munich in 1955, by which time the West German authorities had taken control of the material.[58] He apparently did not identify it and presumably for that reason did not notify the Chester Beatty Library at the time. Carsten Colpe was engaged to edit it (from September 1, 1956, to November 30, 1957),[59] for which purpose it was moved to Göttingen. Böhlig was brought in as a consultant. In 1957 they noted running heads and chapter titles that identified the material as the Synaxeis codex.[60] Against this evidence, Rolf Ibscher's arguments that it must be the Berlin Letters codex P[15998] were in vain, and he ultimately somewhat grudgingly conceded the point.[61]

58. Mentioned by Giversen to P. Henchey, then librarian of the Chester Beatty Library, on May 8, 1980.

59. According to Carsten Colpe, in an interview on March 16, 1986.

60. Böhlig reported this discovery at the 24th International Orientalists' Congress in Munich in 1957. Böhlig published a summary, "Zu den Synaxeis des Lebendigen Evangeliums," 229–30. The full text was published in Mysterion und Wahrheit, 222–27, where Colpe's concurrence in this conclusion is expressly stated: "Thus one can assume, as C. Colpe also thinks, that the remainder of a Berlin codex discussed by C. Schmidt [P[15995]] forms with this codex a content unity, but no unity in terms of ownership."

Regarding Böhlig's views on the Synaxeis codex, see also Böhlig, "Synaxies = Homilia?" 485–86, "Die Arbeit," and Mysterion und Wahrheit, 186, for the identification of the Synaxeis codex.

61. Rolf Ibscher, "Der Mani-Fund," 227, referred to the codex as "for the time being the only Mani manuscript that remains to Germany." He combined this claim with the concession that the codex was the Synaxeis by appeal to the 31 leaves of the Synaxeis that Schmidt had acquired for Berlin and that were inventoried as P[15995]:

> . . . our so-called Schondorf manuscript from the Berlin Museum holdings, and hence now stationed in Göttingen, does not contain the corpus of Mani's letters, as was assumed at first. Quite clearly however . . . it belongs . . . to the codex that was entered by my father still, with 31 leaves, under the old Berlin catalogue number 15995. That is to say, my father began among the Berlin holdings with the conservation of this codex, and then deferred further work on it in favor of the more important Kephalaia manuscript that bears the number 15996.

This special pleading ignores the fact that P[15995], according to the Inventory Book, consists only of 31 leaves, which is all that Schmidt purchased for Berlin. The rest of the codex had already been acquired by Beatty. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30, make this clear:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Colpe gave up the editing assignment as hardly possible and called for a suspension of further conservation of individual leaves until that process could be accompanied by photographic documentation of each stage, which in effect brought the conservation to an end in 1957.[62] This termination of the funding and of the work could also have to do with the recognition that it had to do with property that did not belong to Germany. Rolf Ibscher died February 5, 1967.

As a result of the transport of Egyptological artifacts stored in West Germany to West Berlin from Celle in 1957 and from Wiesbaden in 1958, the creation of an Egyptological Section there in 1962, and the opening of the Egyptian Museum in Berlin-Charlottenburg in 1967, the conserved leaves and book block that Rolf Ibscher had not lived to finish conserving were deposited there.

In 1985 William Brashear, the curator of the Papyrus Collection of the Egyptian Museum of Berlin-Charlottenburg, asked me to provide whatever information I could about this material there in storage (of which the present report is the outcome), and to activate interest in it. On November 18, 1985, Joachim Karig, acting director of the Egyptian Museum, wrote me that he had consulted with the general director of the State Museums, Prof. Dube, and his representative, the director of the Antiques Museum, Prof. Heilmeyer, and they approved my request, made orally August 2, 1985, and in writing October 5, 1985, for authorization to enlist scholars to prepare an edition. Similar discussions with Dr. Wolfgang Müller, director of the Egyptian Museum and Papyrus Collection, and with Dr. Gisela Holan, first representative of the general director of the State Museums of Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR, led to a letter of authorization of August 14, 1987, from Müller, granting "approval for the scholarly work on > . . . a collection of 31 leaves that have been brought under glass, which were acquired in the Fayyum and without doubt belong to the London Mani pieces.

Ibscher made the same erroneous inference in his report, "Über den Stand," 50–64, especially 60. The meeting at which the paper was presented took place on December 14–15, 1964. Thus he never surrendered the claim to German ownership, upon which he no doubt considered his chances of employment as conservator depended, since by this time his working relationship with Beatty had dissolved.

62. Ibscher held Colpe thus responsible for terminating the conservation, "Über den Stand," 60. But in fact Colpe thus rescued something for more sophisticated procedures than those of Rolf Ibscher, if in fact such can be at least hoped for from the future.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

and editing of the Coptic Mani texts of our Papyrus Collection according to the shared oral discussions." Wilfrid Lockwood, librarian and director of the Chester Beatty Library, who was kept abreast of the developments from 1985 on, also expressed himself willing to participate in such a cooperative plan, in such a way as to respect the commitment the Library had under his predecessor made with Søren Giversen (see below). I wrote Giversen proposing such cooperation on October 21, 1985 but received no reply.

I had invited scholars to participate, in announcements made at the 121st annual meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature in Anaheim, California, on October 19, 1985, at a conference of the Fachkommission Byzantinistik of the Historiker-Gesellschaft of the German Democratic Republic in Halle on February 21, 1986, at a conference of the Association Francophone de Coptologie at the Louvre in Paris on May 23, 1986, at the Second International Conference on Manichaeism in Bonn on August 9, 1989, and at the 18th International Congress of Byzantine Studies in Moscow on August 8–15, 1991.

During a sabbatical semester in Berlin the first half of 1986, I inventoried and organized for study the Manichaean material, and wrote the bulk of an extensive report, published below, of which the present paper is a summary. With regard to the Synaxeis codex, there are 125 conserved leaves (plus 5 glass frames of fragments) in Berlin-Charlottenburg, plus the remainder of the book block, where one page is exposed, making a total of 251 available pages that when added to the 31 leaves or 62 pages in East Berlin, makes a total of 156 conserved leaves and 313 accessible pages, with about 100 to 120 leaves unconserved in the book block.[63] The amount of legible ink is appallingly small, and the amount of text that can be recovered correspondingly minimal. Transcription efforts have been undertaken in West Berlin by Karen King, Stephen Patterson, Paul Allan Mirecki, and Wolf-Peter Funk. And 10 leaves were on loan for study in California from 1986 to 1988, where transcription work was done by Harold W. Attridge, Charles A. Bobertz, and Gesine Robinson, and in addition by Funk and Patterson. In 1988 these leaves were returned to Berlin, when 9 others plus 2 of the original leaves were brought to California for study; they were returned to Berlin the summer of 1989. In 1989 five 63. Ibscher estimated this number remaining in the book block after his work had come to an end, "Über den Stand," 60.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

further leaves were brought to America and returned in 1991. Nothing from this Berlin-Charlottenburg part of the Synaxeis codex has been published, except transcriptions of ten chapters or Synaxis titles by Paul Allan Mirecki,[64] and English translations of some phrases and sentences prepared by Wolf-Peter Funk are being published.[65]

The material brought to California was photographed by Bruce Zuckerman, director of the West Semitic Research Project of the University of Southern California, and his brother, Kenneth, a professional photographer. They photographed the bulk of the material in Berlin from July through August 1991. They are already well known for their success in the photography of otherwise hardly legible sections of the Dead Sea Scrolls. The results of their photography seem very promising. This will be even more the case if the computer enhancement technology that is already available to them can be enlisted in this project. This involves what is called a microdensitometer: A photographic negative is scanned in units (called picture elements) as small as 5 microns (i.e., five thousandths of a millimeter), each of which is assigned a number in terms of its shade of gray, with more than a thousand grades of gray to choose from (the human eye can distinguish only some 22 shades). These numbers can then be entered into the computer so as to project the image on the screen. Then the numbers derived from the shades of gray can be changed at will, e.g., reducing the number of all picture elements with a shade of gray below a certain number, thus lightening the light gray, and increasing the number of all picture elements with a shade of gray above a certain number, thus darkening the dark gray—from which a picture of much higher contrast results. Or the shades of gray can be assigned any color or shade of color, which is a promising alternative, given the ability of the eye to detect more distinctions among colors and their shades than among shades of gray. And the picture can be enlarged on the screen at will, producing the added effect of microscopic examination. A demonstration by the Perkin-Elmer firm of Pomona, California, at the Ancient Biblical Manuscript Center in Claremont

64. Mirecki, "Coptic Manichaean Synaxeis Codex," 135–45, has transcribed and translated what remains of thirteen chapter or Synaxis titles, ten from the material in Berlin-Charlottenburg, three from the material in Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR.

65. Funk has translated a number of phrases and sentences that he and other members of the Mani team transcribed. Karen King quoted these translations in King, "Progress Report."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms on May 19, 1989, indicates that the technology is already functional, though still prohibitively expensive.

Chester Beatty Library Codex C, Volume Two of the Kephalaia

Schmidt reported that the Fayyumic dealer had sold all three of his parts of the discovery to Beatty. As in the case of the Synaxeis, no definite reference to the acquisition of this codex has been located in the Dublin Archives, and yet one may assume that this material was acquired from the Fayyumic dealer. For since the Psalms and the Homilies may more probably have come from Nahman (see below), one may assume by the process of elimination that Volume 2 of the Kephalaia is from the Fayyumic dealer.[66] Since Schmidt talked to this dealer only in the spring of 1931, Beatty's acquisitions from him must have been earlier than that date.

In 1986 Søren Giversen published in the Facsimile Edition photographic reproductions of Volume 2 of the Kephalaia.[67] Though publication of a facsimile edition puts the facsimiles in the public domain, publication rights for an editio princeps are to be awarded by a committee consisting of Søren Giversen, president, Rodolphe Kasser, and Martin Krause.[68] Kasser was supposed to take administrative responsibility for editing this codex, but plans to involve Wolf-Peter Funk did not receive Giversen's approval.

In the Crum Archives (see below) there is a transcription (Crum Mss 11.30.10) of the page reproduced on plate 341 of the Facsimile Edition.

Chester Beatty Library Codex A, the Psalms, Part One

In April 1931 Beatty brought from Egypt two further Manichaean manuscripts and three wooden covers (i.e., three front or back covers, out of an original total of fourteen such covers). The covers are at the Chester Beatty Library in a large envelope, on which is written:

66. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 8. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," ix, has referred to Beatty's acquiring three books "in the Cairo antiquities market" "in the year 1930," but this may have not been meant in any more precise sense than to say that beginning in 1930 he had been buying Manichaean texts in Egypt, i.e., the location may not have been intended to be any more precise than the inexact date.

67. Giversen, Kephalaia, facsimile edition.

68. See note 21.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

"Purchased Spring 1931." Apparently, these are the only covers still extant today, since those that Beatty acquired in 1930, and those of P^{15997} that Schmidt acquired in 1931 cannot be located at the Chester Beatty Library or at the Berlin Egyptian Museum.

No documentation has been located as to the dealer (or dealers) from whom Beatty acquired this material. The Fayyumic dealer is reported to have had three of the eight parts, and to have sold all his holdings to Beatty (except the scraps of P^{15995} removed to make the codex look clean for Beatty—a codex that Schmidt subsequently acquired). Since only seven codices were involved in the discovery, one must assume that one codex had been divided. If the initially divided codex had belonged to the Fayyumic dealer, then in selling his three parts to Beatty he would in fact have only sold two codices, presumably the bulk of the Synaxeis in two parts, and Volume Two of the Kephalaia (see above). Thus the report that Beatty acquired three units from the Fayyumic dealer does not require that one postulate that he acquired Part One of the Psalms from that dealer. It may be more probable that he acquired it from Nahman, from whom he had acquired the other part a year earlier.

The "good manners" of leading Cairo antiquities dealers has to do with the fact that they have a vested interest in the goodwill of a regular client. Some such manners may be suspected in the case of Nahman. For he showed Volume 1 of the Kephalaia to Schmidt early in 1930 when Schmidt was on his way to Jerusalem, and, even though Schmidt did not acquire it then, Nahman did not proceed to sell it to Beatty shortly thereafter, when Nahman offered Beatty parts of other codices that Beatty took on approval. Thus Nahman was careful to offer Beatty other codices than what he had offered Schmidt, thereby avoiding offending Schmidt but, by informing him of Beatty's acquisitions (without making clear to Schmidt that they had only been taken on approval), also making clear to him that these were fast-selling items of which he should take advantage. Schmidt did in fact concede that Beatty's decision to acquire the material was one factor in persuading him on his return trip from Jerusalem, in spite of a lack of funding, to go ahead with the purchase of the Kephalaia. On subsequent trips he acquired other parts of the same codex—acquisitions that indicated the continuing practice, to which Schmidt referred, of subdividing codices to increase their value, making a total of seven units of the one Kephalaia codex (see below), none of which seems to have been offered in the meantime to Beatty. It would have been in keeping with such an enlightened policy of self-interest that Nahman, having turned over to Beatty part of the Psalms codex and part of the Homilies codex in 1930, did not offer these to Schmidt, but held them for Beatty to acquire in 1931. Whereas Schmidt portrayed Nahman as "rejecting" Beatty after Schmidt got to him (see below), this fits much better the impression Nahman would have wanted to leave with Schmidt than the documented reality of his continuing business relationships with Beatty.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

One of the two manuscripts brought to London in April 1931 was at the time designated "Manichaean Hymns" or "Manichaean MS. (Hymns) Psalms. Codex A,"[69] obviously the first and major part of the Psalms codex, of which Beatty had acquired the smaller concluding part the preceding year (see above).

Schmidt was eager to have access to the whole discovery. Ibscher informally broached in London cooperative procedures that Schmidt had envisaged; these procedures were incorporated in a letter of May 7, 1931, from Sir Alan Gardiner to his friend of long standing, Wilhelm Schubart, director of the Berlin Papyrus Collection. Beatty had initially sought to enlist his Egyptological friend Sir Alan H. Gardiner as his consultant and potential English coeditor. But Gardiner did not want to undertake such a large Coptic assignment, nor could Walter Ewing Crum, who was engrossed with completing his Coptic Dictionary. Hence Sir Herbert Thompson was settled upon as the British scholar to represent Beatty. On June 11, 1931, Thompson met with Schmidt in London, and they agreed formally on such a cooperative procedure:[70] Just as Ibscher had already been entrusted with conserving in Berlin

69. A two-ring binder that served as a kind of accessions book in the early years, now in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library, lists for April 1931 Cairo "Manichaean Hymns," "Manichaean Ritual—Laws," "3 wooden covers." The black loose-leaf folder entitled "Papyrus: Biblical Manichaean Hieratic Greek etc. General Catalogue," in the section "Manichaean Pap.," p. 5ff., contains "DETAILS of when MANICHAEAN PAPYRUS were received and sent to Dr. Ibscher, for mounting." The first entry, dated April 1931, notes: "Brought by Mr. Beatty from Egypt," and itemizes: "Manichaean MS. (Hymns) Psalms. Codex A. With Dr. Ibscher. May 8, 1931." "Manichaean Ms. Ritual Laws. With Dr. Ibscher. May 8, 1931." "3 Covers." P. 6 reports "Entries from Day-Book." The first, dated May 8, 1931, reads: "To Dr. G.[ardiner] for Dr. I.[bscher] The 2 Mani Coptic books. Hymns and Ritual Observances."

70. Documented in letters of June 15, 1931, from Thompson to Beatty; of June 27, 1931, from Gardiner to Beatty, and of April 3, 1932, from Thompson to Beatty.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

both collections, H. J. Polotsky would be entrusted with transcribing and translating the material in Berlin as it was conserved. He would be under the supervision of Schmidt and Thompson, to both of whom copies of his work on both the Berlin and London parts would be regularly sent, to be translated by Thompson into English and distributed to Crum (for the Coptic Dictionary) and to Beatty. Polotsky's work and salary would be divided equally between Berlin and London. As the leaves were conserved and transcribed, those belonging to Beatty would be brought back to London, usually by Ibscher on his annual London trips to conserve other materials owned by Beatty, but, as it turned out, at times also by C. R. C. Allberry, and once by Beatty himself.

Thompson was concerned that Beatty's codices be published in England, where he would be primarily involved. But on February 6, 1932, Schmidt wrote Thompson proposing that some of Polotsky's transcriptions and translations of material belonging to Beatty be published in the forthcoming essay for the Prussian Academy. Thompson appealed to Beatty to block what he considered to be a serious breach of the agreement. Beatty wrote Schmidt on March 21, 1932, forbidding him the right of even mentioning his codices in print. And on April 16, 1932, Beatty wrote Ibscher to stop all conservation work on his codices until the matter could be discussed on his forthcoming visit to London.

Thompson protested to Beatty on April 3, 1932, that terminating the arrangement completely would violate the valid agreements that had been made, which would be especially unfortunate with regard to Polotsky, whose high quality was recognized and whose livelihood depended largely upon this work.[71] Yet on May 2, 1932, Beatty wrote Thompson that "very difficult business conditions" made it necessary for him to terminate the arrangement, though some phase-out for Polotsky should be arranged. Polotsky was then instructed to concentrate his work for Beatty on the one manuscript nearest to completion, 71. Thompson wrote Beatty: "He is an extremely learned and able young man; but he is not a naturalized German (being a Russian) and hence has no prospect of an official or University post; and has to make a living. I believe he has nothing but these 270Rm. (orig. 300Rm.) per month, i.e., at par £180 p. ann." The letter explains that the ten percent reduction had been a German reduction of all salaries effective the first of that year. The Prussian Academy paid half the salary, and Beatty paid the other half.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the Homilies, with his salary terminating the end of May 1932. He was given until the end of June 1933 to edit it, with the right then to publish it in German, at no expense to Beatty, in Germany.[72] Thus Thompson's role, based on his assumption of an English edition, came abruptly to an end. The result was Polotsky's publication of the Homilies in 1934.[73]

The decisions not to acquire part of the Homilies and to terminate work on the Manichaean material, both of which were made by Beatty in the spring of 1932, seem to relate to each other in the sense that Beatty had decided not to engage further in the Manichaean venture. But he did later relent in part, permitting Schmidt and Polotsky in their article for the Prussian Academy to summarize Beatty's material though not to quote it. With regard to Ibscher, Beatty continued to use his valuable services to conserve his Manichaean and other papyrus holdings. Yet already on May 1, 1932, Thompson had quit in protest over Beatty's procedures, a move which facilitated the decision to permit Polotsky to publish in German. To judge by the exchange of correspondence, Beatty had really never fully accepted Thompson to replace his friend Gardiner as his representative in such negotiations.

The transcriptions and translations from various codices that Polotsky sent to Thompson for Beatty and Crum during this period of about a year of active collaboration are preserved at least in part in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library in Dublin and in the Crum Archives at the Griffith Institute in the Ashmolean Museum in Oxford. The copies that Polotsky provided to Schmidt (and later some that Alexander Böhlig provided) were preserved by the Archives of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin. In view of the fact that what has survived is considerably less legible than it must have been half a century ago, and in view of the unusually high quality of Polotsky's work, these transcriptions and translations, a number of which were never 72. Documented in a memorandum of a conference between Beatty and Gardiner on May 8, 1932, and letters of May 12, 1932, from Gardiner to Beatty, May 13, 1932, from Beatty to Gardiner, May 20, 1932, from Beatty to Thompson, and May 24, 1932, from Thompson to Beatty. Alexander Böhlig, in a letter of February 5, 1989, has speculated that Polotsky's learning in the spring of 1932 that he would lose this employment may have led him already then to begin inquiries regarding a position at Hebrew University in Jerusalem to which he moved in the spring of 1933, in view of the fact that the kind of salary paid by the Prussian Academy was not in itself a living wage, as Böhlig, his successor, himself experienced.

73. Polotsky, Manichäische Homilien.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

published, are among the most important material to have survived the tragic postwar story of the Manichaean codices of Medinet Madi.

In the Crum Archive are copies of Polotsky's transcriptions from Part One of the Psalms, corresponding to the facsimile edition, Volume 3 (see note 78 below), plates 140, 161, 162, 243, 313, and 314.

On June 16, 1980, Søren Giversen applied to the Chester Beatty Library for permission to publish their Manichaean papyri, both for a facsimile edition and for a critical edition. The Trustees granted permission on June 26, 1980.[74] On November 24, 1982, Giversen applied for permission to have about 171 leaves sent on loan to Denmark. On January 14, 1984, 184 leaves (his original request plus the 13 Synaxeis leaves, see above) were deposited at the Royal Library in Copenhagen.

On December 11, 1980, the librarian of the Chester Beatty Library at the time, Patrick Henchy, offered Giversen access to two files, one titled "Berlin Manichaean Papyrus Transcriptions," "From Sir H. Thompson July 1931 to May 18, 1932," obviously the transcriptions Polotsky had sent Thompson to pass on to Beatty during that time (see above); the other "A. Chester Beatty Manichaean Papyrus Codex A and B Translations," presumably Polotsky's translations and the English translations Thompson prepared for Beatty.

In 1984 Giversen presented, at the International Symposium on the Cologne Mani Codex, English translations of Psalms 136 and 119 that were published in 1986; and at the First International Conference on Manichaeism in 1987, he presented a Coptic transcription of the title and opening eight lines of Psalm 119 that was published in 1988. In the published form of the first speech, Giversen introduced his translation of Psalm 136 with a comment that apparently should actually have introduced Psalm 119, where the comment had in fact stood in the earlier transcript of his 1984 speech:[75]

74. Patrick Henchy, the librarian at the time, communicated this to Giversen on June 26, 1980.

75. Giversen, "Unedited Chester Beatty Mani Texts," 371–80, especially 376. Though in the published essay this statement comes immediately before the English translation of Psalm 136, this cannot be its correct place. For the opening of lines 30–33 in Giversen's translation of Psalm 136 is intact without lacunae, whereas Giversen's comment calls attention to something that has "gone lost." Furthermore Giversen had submitted to the trustees of the Chester Beatty Library on November 23, 1982, as a sample of his work, the transcription and translation of this same page, where lines 30–33 in his Coptic transcription have no lacunae at all. And there are no lacunae here in the Facsimile Edition, Volume 3, plate 189, where the text is unusually

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> From the notes and decipherment from 1931 I can see, that something has gone lost since then, especially at the beginning of lines 30–34.

Polotsky's name was not mentioned in connection with the reference to material of 1931, which was not clarified beyond the cryptic expression "notes and decipherment." In discussion during the 1989 conference at Bonn, Giversen explained that he had referred by name to Thompson and Polotsky, but that due to a typesetter's error, the names had fallen out; when I drew to his attention that in the typescript of his paper he had sent me prior to publication, the names were also absent, he said this must be due to a typist's error.

The publication of 1988 that contained the Coptic transcription made no reference to Polotsky's work at all. Polotsky had in 1931–1932 provided a Coptic transcription, a German translation, and notes to Psalm 119, each page of which concludes with his distinctive abbreviation of his name, "P-y." Since copies of Polotsky's transcriptions and translations were also forwarded by Thompson to Walter Ewing Crum, they are preserved in the Crum Archives in the Griffith Institution of the Ashmolean Museum in Oxford, where, according to records on file there, Giversen worked in August 1981.[76] Indeed Giversen's comment in 1986 in introducing his translation of Psalm 119 ("in fact it is possible that a new Psalm begins on page b, but unfortunately the upper part is almost illegible") would seem to reflect not only Polotsky's designation of the pages as a and b, but also his comment at the legible. In fact, in the typescript of Giversen's lecture of 1984, the statement about the lacunae at the opening of lines 30–33 occurs immediately before the second English translation he presented—that of Psalm 119—where indeed the opening of the lines numbered 30–32 of his translation begins with lacunae, then with illegible material and a lacuna at the end of the English translation of line 33, as on p. 379 of the published lecture. In the Facsimile Edition, Volume 3, plate 162, the bottom left corner of the leaf (including text) is not extant. Thus one must assume that the statement has in view Psalm 119, rather than Psalm 136. Giversen confirmed this conjecture at the 1989 conference in Bonn.

76. In the Crum Archive, Polotsky's transcription and German translation of Psalm 119 occur on two pages each, since the Psalm straddles two pages of the codex. The first (Crum Mss 11.30.2 for the Coptic, Crum Mss 11.28.85 = Crum Mss 11.28.7 for the German = Facsimile Edition, Volume 3 [see note 78 below], plate 161) contains the first 8 lines of the chapter, which Giversen designates as "a." The second (Crum Mss 11.30.3 for the Coptic, Crum Mss 11.28.86 = Crum Ms 11.28.8 for the German = Facsimile Edition, Volume 3, plate 162) corresponds to what Giversen designates as "b," which ends with line 33. In Polotsky's Coptic transcription there are lacunae at the opening of lines 30–33.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

opening of the second page: "[Beginning of new hymn]," since hardly more than the illegibility of the opening lines suggests this alternative. Indeed Giversen apparently later reached a quite different view on this point from that of Polotsky, for the Facsimile Edition, Volume 3, plates 162 no longer considers this page as Psalm 119, lines 9–33 (or as Psalm 120, lines 1–25), but rather has the note: "[Incipit psalmus XII in linea 13.]"

The Coptic transcription of the title and opening eight lines of Psalm 119 that Giversen published in 1988 agree completely (except for dots under a few letters on two lines) with the work produced but not published by Polotsky in 1931.[77] This is particularly striking in the case of the eighth, the last line on the page, which reads identically in Polotsky's and Giversen's transcriptions.

The facsimile published in the Facsimile Edition, Volume III, Plate 161, shows that this last line of the page is almost completely illegible, with perhaps three or four letters that with great difficulty could be read, a few dots of ink that could be taken to be any letter, and lacunae in the bulk of the line. Yet Giversen's transcription is complete except for three letters restored in square brackets and two letters dotted, just as in Polotsky's. This transcription could not possibly be derived from the papyrus in its present condition. It is hence hard to avoid the inference that it derives from the transcription of Polotsky, obviously made at a time when more of the papyrus was extant, perhaps even before the leaf was removed from the book block. This is in a different way suggested also in the case of lines 30–33, where Giversen had commented "that something has gone lost since then [1931], especially at the beginning of lines 30–33," since his own translation does not have more lacunae than Polotsky's transcription and translation, whereas the published facsimile does indeed indicate that much less is now legible on these four lines than is present in Polotsky's transcription and in Giversen's translation.[78]

77. Giversen, "Manichaean Texts from the Chester Beatty Collection," 271.

78. Giversen, Psalm Book, Part 1, facsimile edition, plate 62, the last 4 lines. Polotsky's translation:

> (Wir sind) freudig zum Kampf (ausgezogen) und haben mit unseren Feinden gekämpft. (. . .) uns, o unser Gott, dass Du uns nicht verlassen wirst . . . . wir haben sie empfangen. Du weisst, o unser Herr, dass unsere Freunde und unsere Feinde (?) alle mit uns.

Giversen's translation:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

In the discussion at Bonn in 1989, Giversen explained that though he had worked in the Crum Archive more than once and had made use of Polotsky's transcription, this did not need to be mentioned in his article, since Giversen was not presenting a critical edition. He explained further that with the help of a microscope, he had been able to detect vestiges of ink from the top of the letters (the bulk of which are now in lacunae) that could fit the letters that Polotsky had read. Thus he could concur with Polotsky, though with dots under all these letters, though the dots disappeared due to typesetting errors—except for the two dots that are present, which happen to agree with those of Polotsky,—just as a typesetting error misplaced a diaeresis in another line.

Giversen published photographic reproductions of this major part of the Psalms codex in 1988, as volume 3 of the Facsimile Edition.[79] Publication rights for an editio princeps were to be awarded by the committee consisting of Søren Giversen, president; Rodolphe Kasser; and Martin Krause.

Chester Beatty Library Codex D, the Homilies

The other manuscript that Beatty brought from Cairo to London in April 1931 is designated in the Chester Beatty Archives as "Ritual Laws," and "Ritual Observances" (see above), though it apparently was a minor part of the Homilies codex—the major part of which (Berlin's P[15999]) Beatty had acquired with an option to buy in 1930, an option that he decided in 1932 not to exercise (see below). Presumably Beatty did not realize that what he decided not to buy in 1932 as unconservable was part of the same codex that he had bought in 1931 and had [rejoicing to the agony; we have contended with our enemies; [ ] us, our God, that you will not abandon us. [ ] have we received. You know, O Lord, that all our friends and our enemies . . .

79. Wood also suggested this identification in a letter of November 16, 1946 to Wilkinson (see note 44): "The title 'Ritual Observances' may later have turned into 'Homilies' on examination?"

Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," ix, confirmed the identification of the text acquired in 1931 with the Homilies: "The Mani text published here lay as a shapeless mass along with the Psalm Book when Mr. A. Chester Beatty turned this over to me in London to work on."

Alexander Böhlig, in a letter of February 5, 1989, has suggested that the designation "ritual laws" or "ritual observances" may have been due to the subscript title of the first text in the Homilies reading (7,7) "The Sermon of the Prayer Is Completed."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

already paid to have conserved and edited. In view of the fact that the major part of this codex had been obtained on approval in 1930 from Nahman, one may assume that it was Nahman who sold Beatty the other part in 1931, perhaps in hopes thus to move Beatty actually to complete the transaction for the first part (whose price had already been reduced in 1930 from £700 to the same level of £500 that Beatty had paid in 1930 for part of the Psalms codex).

H. J. Polotsky has published this part of the codex, the first text from this discovery to be published.[80]

In 1987 Søren Giversen published photographic reproductions of the Homilies as Volume 2 of the Facsimile Edition.[81]

CARL SCHMIDT'S ACQUISITIONS

One may now turn to the 5 holdings (three codices and parts of two others) in the Papyrus Collection of the State Museums of Berlin that were acquired by Carl Schmidt in a series of transactions from 1930 to 1932.

Papyrus Collection, Berlin, P^{15995}, 31 leaves of the Synaxeis

Schmidt reported that in the spring of 1931 he had acquired in the Fayyum for the sake of completeness the remains of a codex, the bulk of which Beatty had already acquired, and that from this jumble 31 leaves could be conserved. This must be the 31 leaves of the Synaxeis codex in the Papyrus Collection of Berlin, inventoried as P^{15995}, since the only other codex shared between Beatty and Berlin was the Homilies codex, the Berlin part of which (P^{15999}) was acquired from Nahman after Beatty had released his option (see below). The Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection of the Berlin Museum's records in Wilhelm Schubart's hand concerning P^{15995} (and also concerning P$^{15996–8}$): "Acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt, in Cairo, 1931. Gift of Mr. August Pfeffer 1933." These 31 leaves were taken with the other Berlin Museum holdings in 1946 to Leningrad, to be returned to Berlin with the other material in 1958 (see above). They went together with the other glassed Manichaean leaves in the Storage of the Papyrus Collection of (East) Berlin. Gesine Robinson prepared two

80. Polotsky, Manichäische Homilien.

81. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, facsimile edition.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms draft transcriptions of the 62 pages in 1985 and 1986, but nothing has been published, except for three titles included among those that Paul Mirecki published.[82] The quality of the leaves varies considerably, but, as in the other cases, the amount of retrievable text is much less than the number of extant pages might lead one to expect.

Papyrus Collection, Berlin, P15996, Volume One of the Kephalaia

It was part of this codex that had been shown first to Carl Schmidt early in 1930 in Cairo, which he was able to identify from Epiphanius's reference to it. Schmidt, in transit to Jerusalem, did not acquire it, but on his return trip through Cairo he acquired it on credit. On his second trip early in 1931 and on his last visit to Cairo in the spring of 1932, Schmidt was shown each time two further lots, apparently from the same codex, which he also acquired.[83] Ultimately, Hugo Ibscher listed a total of 7 acquisitions by Schmidt of parts of this one codex.[84] A Prof. Grohmann of Prague acquired vestiges from the missing pages 311–30 for the Austrian National Library.[85]

82. See note 64 above.

83. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 7–8.

84. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," vi-vii:

> Hence the Kephalaia did not come to Berlin in one volume, but in two larger packets and five weaker layers. All of course nicely jumbled! . . . Purchase I is now pp. 1–18. Purchase II is now pp. 19–310. Purchase III is now pp. 331–56. Purchase IV is now pp. 357–76. Purchase V is now pp. 377–94. Purchase VI is now pp. 395–414. Purchase VII is now pp. 421 to the end.

What survived of the missing segment pages 415–20 are described as "paltry remains," "which can hardly be identified." What was considered the last extant leaf, though lacking pagination, was identified with the help of the chapter number 200 as being pages 501/502. A fragment with the pagination 514 stuck to this leaf indicates that the codex originally continued beyond the last extant leaf. Wolf-Peter Funk examined on August 11, 1986, the Warsaw leaf labeled pages 499/500 and detected there a chapter number in the 200s, which would require a pagination in the 500s, thus putting in question whether what was considered the last extant leaf is pages 501/502.

85. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 8 n. 1. This material, forwarded from Vienna to Berlin for Ibscher to conserve , and then returned to Vienna (Kephalaia, 1. Hälfte, vii), is in four glass containers with the inventory number K 11010. Remains of three leaves labeled pages 311–16, but perhaps more likely pages 313–16, 319–20, have been identified, together with a dozen unidentified fragments. Schmidt and Polotsky refer only to fragments of two leaves having been "rescued," no doubt since the third is no more than a larger fragment hardly deserving the designation leaf. Gardner, Coptic Theological Papyri. "III. Unpublished pages from the Manichaean

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

After World War II five of the Berlin Kephalaia leaves emerged in Warsaw, presumably the result of the looting of trains taking Berlin Museum holdings to Leningrad in 1946. Lothar Berfelde,[86] founder of the Gründerzeit Museum of turn-of-the-century furniture now in Mahlsdorf near Berlin, had lived for a brief time in the Friedrichsfelde Castle (with whose previous owners he was distantly related), after it was no longer used as a Soviet command post. During the period in which it was a command post (spring 1945 to spring 1946), he recalled libraries being stored there awaiting shipment to the Soviet Union, though he did not know the specific contents of the crates. German crews, even after the war, manned the trains from Germany through Poland (though different gauge tracks at the border to the Soviet Union called there for different trains and crews). Berfelde reported that a friend since childhood, who worked for the German railroads, told him that in the countryside Poles would stop these trains, disconnect the engine, and make the German crews drive away in the engine, leaving the freight cars in the fields unattended, for the Poles to loot.

Wincenty Myszor reported on July 14, 1986, concerning these leaves:

> The Manichaean manuscripts that are now in Warsaw surfaced shortly after the last war under not fully clarified circumstances. One always speaks about a place Brodnica, near Toruń (Thorn) . . . The plates are said to have been at first in a private collection, then in some way (bought? acquired?) reached Prof. J. Manteuffel, the leader of the Institute for Papyrology of Warsaw University; he turned over a part of the manuscripts to the National Museum as a deposit. There are also rumors according to which the plates in the National Museum came directly from Brodnica to Warsaw, to Prof. Michalowski. Prof. J. Manteuffel and Prof. K. Michalowski wanted to return the leaves to Berlin. This did not succeed. In the '60s this matter is said to have almost landed in the Ministry.

Thus far H. J . Polotsky and Alexander Böhlig have published pp. 1–292 of the Kephalaia.[87] Of these, only pages 35/36 and 61/62 are missing from the boxes containing pp. 1–440.

Kephalaia," 53–55, gives a more detailed report.

86. Lothar Berfelde was interviewed on April 18, 1986, in Mahlsdorf and East Berlin.

87. Polotsky and Böhlig, Kephalaia (Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

In Vienna there are three unpublished leaves, labeled pp. 311–316 (though they may be pages 313–16, 319–20, see note 85), as well as fragments.

In Warsaw there are five unpublished leaves, labeled pp. 447–54, 499–500. The pagination assigned to the last leaf may be inaccurate, since Wolf-Peter Funk has detected on it a chapter number beyond 200, which would require pagination in the 500s.

In Berlin 120 unpublished pages are in boxes: pages 293–310, 331–82, 387–414, 417–18, 421–40. Pages 455–56 are also present, making a total of 122 unpublished pages (61 leaves) that have been assigned pagination.

All that remains of pages 311–30 is in Vienna (see above). The absence of pp. 383–86, 415–16, and 419–20 is noted on cards in the relevant boxes in the hand of Rolf Ibscher's assistant, Otto Werner Luke. Since only the bottom half of pages 417–18 is extant, it is possible that it may be part of pages 413–14, of which only the top half is extant; the alignment of vertical fibers is inconclusive.

There are also 30 plates numbered not by pagination but by plate, 1–30, and 2 plates listed as "Kephalaia without number." Since item 23 is more a group of fragments than a leaf, there would be a total of Museen Berlin), herausgegeben im Auftrage der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften unter Leitung von Prof. Carl Schmidt, 1. Hälfte (Lieferung 1–10): v–xiv, "Die Handschrift," by Hugo Ibscher; pp. 1–102 by Polotsky, and pp. 103–244, 20 by Böhlig, according to p. iv (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1940). Böhlig, in a letter of February 5, 1989, has confirmed that there were no draft transcriptions or translations by Polotsky of pp. 103ff. on which Böhlig's work was based, but that Böhlig edited them alone. Böhlig, Kephalaia (Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin), herausgegeben im Auftrage der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, zweite Hälfte (Lieferungen 11-12 = Coptic pages 244, 21–291) (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1966). Concerning the publication of these pages one may note the comment in the Jahrbuch der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Jahrgang 1942 (Berlin: Akademie, 1943), 66–67 (see also n. 90 below):

---

> Since Dr. Böhlig was enlisted in the army from x 41 on, the first double fascicle of the second volume of the Kephalaia could not yet be completed, although already 4 quires had been sent in to the publisher ready to print. Besides, the printing house has been limited by the lack of specialists. But it hopes in a while to be able again to take up the work on the Kephalaia. In the second half of August work could begin again on the reading of quires 5 and 6. It was possible to improve them materially. But as a result of the bad condition of preservation, the manuscript could not be finally completed.

Böhlig has also published p. 292, "Ja und Amen in manichäischer Deutung," 59–70, reprinted in his Gnosis und Synkretismus 2:638–53, especially 2:640–41.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

31 plates without assigned pagination but labeled as belonging to the Kephalaia. But since plate 30 contains 2 leaves, the figure rises again to 32 unpublished leaves numbered by leaf rather than by an assigned pagination.

The last reported page is page 501–2, but since a fragment with the pagination 514 was stuck to this last extant page (see note 84), one may assume the codex continued, perhaps to include as quire 22 pages 505–28. But if in fact the leaf 501–2 were the last extant leaf (it has not been identified), the extant leaves without assigned pagination would fall within the area of pages 441–46, 457–98, and 501–2, a total of at least 25 leaves. Since Rolf Ibscher, to illustrate how fragile the material was, admitted atomizing a leaf with a sneeze, one may assume there should be a total of at least 24 leaves (48 pages) without assigned pagination. Thus the 32 leaves labeled Kephalaia might include 8 more than one would minimally expect to be extant from the Kephalaia. But if in fact the Warsaw leaf labeled 499–500 should be renumbered in the 500s (see above), then all the leaves labeled Kephalaia could in fact belong to that codex. Otherwise one would need to assume that the excess 8 leaves belong to another codex, such as P^{15998}, the Letters. Plate 29 had originally had a printed label reading P^{15998}, and perhaps Plate 30 as well, though now the number is rubbed off, with 15996 written in by hand in both cases; these may hence be tentatively ascribed to P^{15998}. The two without numbers that had been stacked together with P^{15998} are, however, tentatively included still with P^{15996}. Hence the number of unpublished leaves that have not been assigned pagination would tentatively stand at 29 equals 58 pages (those numbered plates 1–28, minus 1 that consists of fragments, equals 27; plus 2 leaves labeled "Kephalaia without number," equals 29 leaves).

Thus 122 unpublished pages with assigned pagination and some 58 pages without assigned pagination in Berlin, plus 6 pages in Vienna and 10 in Warsaw—a total of some 196 unpublished pages of Volume 1 of the Kephalaia—are still extant, although here, as in other cases, the amount of extant text is very much smaller than this figure would suggest.

Wolf-Peter Funk resumed transcription for a time (using P and a raised numeral to identify fragmentary pages), but it extended only from P^{293} to P^{295}, line 11 (concluding with the title of chapter 123).

Hugo Ibscher had not completed the conservation of some leaves, and for this reason they lay unglassed in folders in his home during the war. But his conservation had apparently left no book block of unconserved leaves of the Kephalaia.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On July 16, 1986, 8 additional plates of only temporarily sealed plates of fragments were located in the Storage of the Papyrus Collection of (East) Berlin, with a note on a piece of paper reading: "Defined and undefined Mani fragments (framed without color)—8 plates." They contain largely unidentified fragments, presumably from the Kephalaia, including a few labels: "P[479] to Kephalaia," "459/60," "Kephalaia top right 503/4??," "Kephalaia 423–424." Plate 1 does contain a fragment with the pagination 479, but fragments with the other paginations were not found. The leaf 423/424 is extant in its proper box, though the pagination is not present.

Reinhold Merkelbach has remarked that chapter 138 is lost except for Polotsky's published German translation: "The Coptic text is lost, there still exists only the German translation."[88]

However, an examination of the papyri in the Papyrus Collection of (East) Berlin on December 13, 1988, tended to indicate that the papyri containing this chapter are in fact not lost.[89] Merkelbach has confirmed that he had no specific reason for postulating that the leaf or leaves containing this chapter were lost. (Polotsky's transcription has subsequently been located in Berlin; see note 90.)

Transcriptions of 51 unpublished pages of the Berlin Kephalaia preserved in the Archives of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin (42 by Polotsky and 9 probably by Böhlig)[90] may contain more text than 88. Merkelbach, Mani und sein Religionssystem, 18, n. 9.

89. Chapter 136 begins on page 337, chapter 137 on p. 338, chapter 138 on page 340, chapter 140 and 141 both on page 343. The leaf labeled 341/342 is also extant, on which the continuation and conclusion of chapter 138 (and the beginning of chapter 139) presumably take place. Yet the identity of the leaf in question seemed at first uncertain. For the labels reading 339/340, and with the chapter numeration 138, were affixed in such a way that when the labels were at the top of the page, the writing was upside down, so that the leaf needed to be returned to its upright position. Nor did the fiber directions conform to the pattern of like fiber directions on facing pages. But if the side labeled 339 is relabeled 340, and that labeled 340 relabeled 339, the fiber pattern becomes normal. Furthermore, only on the basis of these corrections do the profiles of this leaf and that of the preceding and following leaves conform to one another. Thus once I made these corrections, the codex seems at this part to be intact, though the text is less legible that it was half a century ago, to judge by the extant German translation.

90. Schenke, "Gnosis-Forschung 1984–1988," a paper read at the Fourth International Congress on Coptic Studies of the International Association for Coptic the surviving unpublished papyrus itself, in view of the deterioration that the papyrus may have undergone during the intervening half century. Five of these same pages of transcriptions from the Kephalaia by Polotsky are also in the Archives in Dublin (pp. 343, 344, 353, 354, 366). There are also 2 pages of transcriptions from the Kephalaia by Polotsky in the Archives in Oxford; although they have not yet been definitely identified (they are right-hand and hence odd-numbered pages), the conventional numeration that Polotsky assigned would suggest that Crum Mss 11.30.23 is page 341 and Crum Mss 11.30.24 (= 11.30.27) is page 347, thus indicating they are also duplicates of those of the Academy in Berlin.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The transcriptions of half a century ago should be made promptly available to the public in some way, with due recognition to the scholar who actually did the work, and especially to Polotsky, in view of the fact that none of Polotsky's work on the Kephalaia published during the Nazi period could appear with his name on the title page.[91]

Papyrus Collection, Berlin, P^{15997}, the Acts

According to Schmidt's report, the Fayyumic dealer had explained that the provincial dealer had sold his two parts to Nahman, who had sold them to Schmidt. By the process of elimination, it can be determined that P^{15997} is one of these two: Nahman told Schmidt he acquired for Schmidt the two codices held by the provincial dealer after Nahman had "rejected" Beatty. This so-called rejection cannot be dated to a

Studies in Louvain-la-Neuve, Belgium, September 5–10, 1988, lists the following pages: 293, 301–7 (= chs. 125–29), 334, 337–57, 359–73 (= chs. 135–50), 395–99 (= chs. 157–60), 413. Alexander Böhlig, in a letter of February 5, 1989, reports that from samples that Schenke provided him of the script, he could ascribe pages 334, 337–57, 359–73, and 395–99 to Polotsky; and pages 293 (broken off), 301–7 (307 broken off), and 413 probably to himself. The Jahrbuch der Preussichen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Jahrgang 1941 (Berlin: Akademie, 1942), 63, reported concerning Böhlig's work: "The fascicle 11/12 has been worked out apart from a few details (pages 244 to 292). Over and above that, transcriptions of the pages 300ff. could be carried out."

91. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 183 n. 1, stated: "The names of the real editors are missing from the title page for the following reason: The name of H. J. Polotsky was not supposed to appear on the title page in the Nazi time because of the racial legislation. But I turned down the naming of my name alone." It was in fact reported in Kephalaia, 1. Hälfte (1940), iv, at the conclusion of the preface: "The first two double fascicles Dr. H. J. Polotsky prepared. From p. 103 on Dr. A. Böhlig has taken his place."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

time prior to Schmidt's seeing the Kephalaia on his first trip, for on his return from Jerusalem Nahman admitted having sold in the intervening time to Beatty. Thus it can hardly be the Kephalaia that belonged to the provincial dealer. Schmidt acquired the 31 leaves of the Synaxeis from the Fayyumic dealer. And he acquired the bulk of the Homilies codex from Nahman via Beatty (see below), when Beatty released the option that he had held on it since March 23, 1930. Thus the two codices in the hands of the provincial dealer must by the process of elimination have been the Acts and the Letters (see below). In fact the Acts must be the codex that Schmidt reported acquiring in the spring of 1931, when he said he had acquired a codex still in its original wooden covers.[92] For in describing P^{15997}, he reported that it was acquired in its covers, and a photograph of this codex in its covers was published. The covers cannot be found at the Egyptian Museum of (East) Berlin, according to Günter Poethke, Custos of Greek Manuscripts in the Papyrus Collection.

Apparently only a few leaves were conserved, just enough to identify the codex. Alexander Böhlig saw one in 1953, which hence must not have been taken to Leningrad (whence material was returned only in 1958), but must have stayed in Berlin in 1946, presumably in the Ibscher home, though the leaf had been conserved well before the war. When Böhlig could not relocate it in Berlin in 1960, he was told by Rolf Ibscher that Ibscher by mistake had taken it to London.[93] It was moved from London to Dublin, but was among those leaves put on deposit in Copenhagen. Facsimiles were published in 1987 in volume 2 of the Facsimile Edition, though the identification is there left open. When one compares Schmidt and Polotsky's summary with the segments that Giversen translated,[94] there can be little doubt that 92. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 7, 8, 27, and Plate 2.

93. Böhlig reported this in an interview in Tübingen on July 10, 1986.

94. Giversen, "Manichaean Texts from the Chester Beatty Collection," 269: "This must either be a parallel text to that mentioned by C. Schmidt or physically be the same. I shall not say much more about this here, since I have dealt with it in the edition Vol. II pp. VIII–IX and I hope to return to it in connection with a preliminary critical edition and translation of the text." The plates are published in Giversen, Homilies and Varia, viii–ix, plates 99–100. On page viii Giversen states:

> The two pages have a text with some historical information, and this can be identified with similar information reported by C. Schmidt from a leaf in Berlin . . . Exactly the same persons are mentioned: Thadamor, Amarô, Sapores the hyparch, Narsaph, Hormezd, Innaios, Abiesus and others. This it is in fact the same text, and, since there is no second copy of the Acts among the codices from Medinet Madi,[95] it is no doubt the same copy.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

---

must either be a parallel text to that mentioned by C. Schmidt, or the leaf must physically be the same. Parallel texts are well known from other papyri, e.g., in the Nag Hammadi texts the two very close long versions of the Apocryphon of John, and the two versions of the Gospel of Truth.

The reference is to Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 28–29:

> Another piece leads us into a later time of Manichaeism. Here a mass of unknown persons come forward . . . Obviously it is here a matter of events that take place within the Persian Kingdom . . . It has to do further with the position assumed by provincial governments toward the Manichaean religion, some of which are disposed positively, especially Amara, who is designated as the "great patron" of the Manichaeans, since they enjoyed his support. Hence one of the heads of the Manichaeans turns to him with the request that he intervene for the persecuted believers in Persia with the king Narsaph, i.e., Narses (293–302). Amaro Innaios takes on this task and sends letters to the higher king that are crowned with success in that the persecutions cease. In these negotiations there occurs a certain, who is apparently the transmittor of the communication of Amaro Innaios to the king. He has an audience with King Narses, the result of which is that the suppressions and persecutions of the teachers and believers are suspended on the order of the king.

Giversen, "Unedited Chester Beatty Mani Texts," 379–80, republished in "Manichaean Texts from the Chester Beatty Collection," 269, has translated segments of this text:

> He told us that the king had arrived into the neighbourhood of our shepherd Innaios, together with the noble Persians who were his assistants. He spoke to him . . . He asked him to go to the king. He achieved mercy for us from him and stopped the (1986: our] destruction. The king together with the noblemen, who were many . . . Innaios, shall I raise Innaios went into . . . of the king [Sapores].

At the 1989 conference in Bonn, Giversen reported that after a visit to the Papyrus Collection in (East) Berlin he had decided that the relevant leaf is not there and that the leaf in Copenhagen is from this codex.

95. There is a Kephalaia codex in Dublin and one in Berlin, but they are not two copies of the same text, but rather a two-volume set. The Homilies material in Dublin and that (originally) in Berlin apparently belong to the same codex, rather than being two copies of the same text. With regard to Giversen's reference to duplicates in the Nag Hammadi library, all the duplicate texts within that collection of 13 codices prove on closer examination to belong to separate subgroups, only secondarily merged into a collection of collections. Of course in larger manuscript discoveries there are duplicates, e.g., among the Dishna Papers (as the discovery is referred to in Upper Egypt that the academic community has usually referred to as the Bodmer Papyri, since these form the largest block), the Gospel of John: in Greek, P^{66} = P. Bodmer II, and P^{75} = P. Bodmer XIV–XV; and in Coptic, P. Bodmer III, Chester Beatty ac. 1390, and perhaps P. Palau Ribes 182. Yet the Dishna Papers

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

There are 7 (or 8) leaves of this codex in the Papyrus Collection of (East) Berlin.[96] Thus there are extant 9 (or 10) unpublished leaves, 18 (or 20) unpublished pages.

Transcriptions of 3 pages that Schmidt and Polotsky used in their essay are preserved by the Archives of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin.[97]

Part of one leaf has perhaps turned up at the Institute for Papyrology of Warsaw University.[98]

---

also comprise a collection of collections or of individual codices and scrolls from a variety of provenances, whereas the Manichaean codices seem to be a set emanating from a single scriptorium.

96. The Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection in (East) Berlin has penciled notes: "partially glassed," "8 leaves," and, initialed by Rolf Ibscher, "8 leaves are back." It is this reference in the Inventory Book that is no doubt responsible for the comment, "8 leaves in Berlin," in Müller's preliminary listing, "Die koptischen Handschriften," 65–85. This number was then repeated in Beltz's catalogue. But one of the 8 leaves there now has a printed label that reads P^{15998}; where the 8 has been marked out and a 7 written in by hand, a hand identified by Poethke as that of Luke. The leaf also has a separate label in ink reading 36, with the 6 marked out and replaced in pencil with 2. But the labels for the individual leaves of P^{15997} use Roman numerals, with the highest IX, whereas P^{15996} and P^{15998} use Arabic numerals for individual leaves (and where some renumbering also occurs, see there). When one notes that the size of the glass panes in which the leaf in question is conserved is not the large format, used for P^{15998}, but a smaller format used for the 7 leaves of P^{15997}, one can wonder if one smaller leaf of P^{15998} was packed for transport by size along with P^{15997}. When the material was returned from Leningrad, it may have been merely assumed that the eighth small leaf was part of the same codex with which it was packed, and the label "corrected" accordingly. Yet though the extant papyrus is indeed smaller in its dimensions than is usual for P^{15998}, the profile and the frayed edges are not what is characteristic of P^{15997}, though Stephen Patterson has noted a similarity in the scribal hands. The numeration attached to the leaves in Berlin does reach IX, which might suggest that nine leaves had been identified as belonging to P^{15997}. It could have been that the apparent contradiction of these 9 plates with the record in the Inventory Book of 8 having been conserved is what led Rolf Ibscher to "return" one to London. But there is also a leaf (actually only a narrow strip) in Warsaw (see note 98). The identity of the eighth leaf in Berlin thus remains uncertain.

97. Schenke, "Gnosis-Forschung 1984–1988" (see note 90 above).

98. Beltz, "Katalog der koptischen Handschriften," 97–98, states to I 605 = P^{15997}: "In Warsaw there is at present a leaf from this codex at the University." Inventories of July 12, 1986 by Wincenty Myszor and of August 11, 1986 by Wolf-Peter Funk indicate that there is a plate numbered 499/500 that is labeled P^{15997}, though it seems to belong (with 4 other leaves) to P^{15996} (though Beltz does not list it at P^{15996}). But a sixth leaf, between much smaller panes of glass and taped with a different colored tape, has a label whose last digit is illegible (P^{1599}). Myszor read the last digit as 7 but added, it "is not quite clear—it can also be 6!" Funk could not read the digit, since part of

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Stephen J. Patterson has made draft transcriptions of the seven leaves in Berlin and has as well transcribed the facsimiles of the one leaf in Copenhagen.

The unconserved book block is assumed to have been among the (East) Berlin Museum holdings that were taken to Leningrad in 1946, but when those holdings were returned in 1958, the book block was not present. What actually happened to it is not known. The missing wooden covers may have shared the same fate as the book block, from which they may never have been separated, since the conserved leaves may not have been the first and/or last leaves of the codex, but may have been exposed by the dealers breaking the codex open in the middle.

Papyrus Collection, Berlin, P^{15998}, the Letters

The second of the two codices that the provincial dealer acquired, and passed on to Nahman to sell to Schmidt, can be determined by the same process of elimination to be P^{15998}.

As in the case of the Acts, only a sampling of leavings was conserved, to provide an initial identification. Six leaves are recorded in the Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection of Berlin as having been taken to Leningrad and returned in 1958. They have been identified in a recent inventory of the material currently in the Papyrus Collection of Berlin as a separate stack with plates of a distinctive format numbered B 12, 13, 21, 23, 24, and 25. (Though 13 had lost its label, it could be identified by means of letters transcribed in Beltz's inventory; see note 3.) But 3 leaves, presumably also conserved by Hugo Ibscher, turned up after World War II in the National Museum in Warsaw.

Alexander Böhlig conjectured that 13 leaves of this codex were by mistake taken to London.[99] This conjecture is based in part on a comment by Rolf Ibscher that the 13 leaves in London were of "an unusually large format," a description that Böhlig thought singled out the paper was broken off, but noted on the other side of the leaf a label of recent date reading "to P^{15997}." This "narrow strip of papyrus" that is scarcely legible (Funk) may hence come from P^{15997}, though this is far from certain. Whether it would be part of one of the leaves taken to Leningrad or counted as a separate leaf is unclear, and hence it is unclear whether it would have been a separate one of the nine leaves that the numeration system suggests, an ambivalence that would tend to obscure even further the identity of the uncertain leaf in Berlin.

---

99. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 186–87.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the Letters codex. Yet all the codices may have about the same dimensions, except for the smaller Psalms codex.[100] Böhlig's view is in part based on the absence from the leaves in Berlin of the running heads of 4 pages that Schmidt and Polotsky read, which suggested to Böhlig that these running heads might be on the leaves then in London. But, according to Wolf-Peter Funk's transcriptions, they have been located on the leaves in Warsaw. Böhlig concluded his argument with the comment that "a glance at the London leaves should suffice to solve all these problematic questions with one blow." It was not at the time possible for him to examine them in London. But the Facsimile Edition alone suffices:[101] The leaves are not unusually large and do not contain the running heads that Schmidt and Polotsky quoted. Hence these 13 Dublin leaves that Hugo Ibscher labeled as Codex B seem to belong to Chester Beatty Library Codex B, the Synaxeis codex, not to the Letters, though the 6 leaves of this codex conserved by Hugo Ibscher were also labeled B.

Rolf Ibscher kept half-conserved materials in the family home throughout the war (see above) and then returned them to the Papyrus Collection of (East) Berlin, where they are currently held. Among the 15 plates stacked together with Poethke's note to the effect that they belong to the Letters, 2 are labeled as "Kephalaia without number," 9 are numbered (8–12, 14–16, and 18), and 4 are unnumbered. One unnumbered plate, labeled by Rolf Ibscher "twin separated from number 8," does have the same profile as number 8. A second, labeled "twins" (in Rolf Ibscher's best English) does contain two leaves and has the same profile as number 9, on which a fragment of a second leaf is still stuck; the fragment seems to fit the location of a missing segment of the material labeled "twins." A third also contains two leaves. A fourth lacks the middle segment and was reglassed by Luke in 1970. Thus the 13 plates contain actually 15 leaves, in view of the two instances of "twins."

One plate that originally had the printed label P[15998] and was numbered 29 has the 8 marked out and replaced by 6; and the plate numbered 30 (which actually contains two leaves) has the printed

100. Hugo Ibscher, in Polotsky, Manichäische Homilien, xiii. The extant leaves of P[15997], the Acts codex, are also in a smaller format, but the book block, to which Ibscher may have had access but we do not, apparently had the larger format.

101. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, ix–x, plates 101–26.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

label scraped off and replaced by 15996, thus shifting both to the Kephalaia, and in both cases perhaps from the Letters. Two others listed "Kephalaia without number" were stacked with the 13 leaves, making up the stack of 15 that Poethke ascribed to the Letters, which seems to suggest that these two leaves were thought to belong to the Letters. In fact as many as 8 leaves labeled as belonging to the Kephalaia could belong to another codex, such as the Letters (see above). One leaf with a printed label P[15998] has the 8 marked out and replaced by 7, thus suggesting it earlier was assigned not to the Acts but to the Letters (see above).

One may hence speak rather tentatively of 28 leaves or 56 pages of the Letters codex being extant today: the 6 leaves = 12 pages returned to Berlin that Hugo Ibscher conserved; the 3 leaves = 6 pages that emerged in Warsaw after the war; 15 leaves = 30 pages from among those that lay half conserved in the Ibscher home during the war and were put in 13 glass containers labelled by Rolf Ibscher; 3 leaves = 6 pages in 2 glass containers as belonging to the Kephalaia; and 1 leaf = 2 pages currently labeled as belonging to the Acts may actually come from the Letters codex. None of it has been published. The amount of text that survives is very much less than these figures suggest.

The unconserved book block is assumed to have been among the Berlin Museum holdings that were taken to Leningrad in 1946, but when those holdings were returned in 1958 the book block was not present. What actually happened to it is not known.

Papyrus Collection, Berlin, P[15999], the Bulk of the Homilies

On March 23, 1930, Beatty received from Nahman with an option to buy for £700 the bulk of the Homilies codex, which Hugo Ibscher advised him could not be conserved.

At the beginning of 1932, Beatty learned that Schmidt had a second option to buy the manuscript if Beatty decided not to exercise his option.[102] On March 29, 1932, Beatty finally wrote Nahman that he would not make the purchase, and on May 10, 1932, the manuscript was turned over to Ibscher in London to take back with him to Berlin for Schmidt.[103] The publisher W. Kohlhammer purchased it for the 102. Sir Herbert Thompson wrote on January 4, 1932, this news that he had just received in a letter from Schmidt.

103. In the two-ring binder in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library, there is

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Papyrus Collection of Berlin for a price reported to have been 5,000 marks,[104] and it was inventoried as P[15999]. Though it was suspected to be the bulk of the Homilies codex, the rest of which Ibscher had in fact successfully conserved (Chester Beatty Library Codex D),[105] it was never considered to be conservable. Rather it was kept as a sort of showpiece of how impossible the conservation of these codices was.[106] a note concerning this manuscript: "Given to Dr. Ibscher for Nahman." Technically speaking, the manuscript was released back to Nahman to dispose of as he saw fit. Yet Ibscher was not going to Cairo, but rather to Berlin. On May 14, 1932, before leaving London for Berlin, Ibscher wrote a receipt for Beatty, "to confirm that I have correctly received the Mani manuscript for Prof. Schmidt."

---

104. In a letter of August 29, 1957, from Rolf Ibscher to Carsten Colpe. The Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection reports: "Acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt in Cairo 1932. Gift of Dr. W. Kohlhammer." The reference to the acquisition in Cairo is literal only in the sense that Schmidt was in Egypt when Beatty released his option, and Schmidt exercised his option with Nahman in Cairo. But the manuscript itself had long since permanently left Egypt.

105. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," in Polotsky, Manichäische Homilien, xii: "Whether the text published here is part of a lost Mani book, or belongs to one of the extant volumes not yet undertaken by me, can for the time being not be determined." This undecidedness corresponds to the statement of Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30, concerning the Berlin part: "The papyrus book that has most recently been added to the corpus of the Berlin Manichaica could not yet be subjected to any further investigation. But this much seems to be certain, that it contains a collection of so-called λογοι (both the Coptic and the English use the same Greek loan word) of various authors. On the upper margins authors' names from the circle of Mani's disciples occur, such as Koustaios, Salmaios." But in the same essay, page 34, concerning the London part, the identification is affirmed: "A second papyrus book contains a collection of homilies (λογοι) of various contents and by various authors . . . Of this book, as I mentioned above [!], a voluminous part has come to Berlin." Alexander Böhlig, in a letter of February 3, 1989, has pointed out that in view of the frequent occurrence of homilies in Manichaean literature, one cannot be certain that this is part of the same codex of homilies as that of Beatty's that contains homilies. But then one would have to assume that the minor part of a codex of homilies that Beatty acquired in 1931 was part of an otherwise lost codex, whereas the homilies codex that Beatty obtained on approval from Nahman in 1930 would be a separate codex. It would seem simpler to assume that here, as in the case of the Psalms codex sold to Beatty in two installments, at the same time as were sold the two texts with homilies, and hence probably in the same two transactions, one has to do with two parts of the same codex. By marketing the two parts of a single codex in separate transactions, the dealer might assume a client would not notice that one had to do with two parts of the same codex—all the more so given the condition of the papyrus and Beatty's status as an amateur, not a scholar. Nahman probably had two codices that he succeeded in selling as four.

106. The Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection of Berlin listed its location not, as in the case of the others, as a shelf in the work area, but as "displayed," i.e. on

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The unconserved book block is assumed to have been among the Berlin Museum holdings that were taken to Leningrad in 1946, but when those holdings were returned in 1958 the book block was not present.[107] What actually happened to it is not known.

Few manuscript discoveries of the importance of the Manichaean codices of Medinet Madi have undergone such an ambivalent fate after their discovery. Since the leaves had been stuck together by salt crystals due to the dampness in which they were conjectured to have lain for a millennium and a half, their condition was such that the first scholar to see them, Lange, did not acquire them. Schmidt passed them up the first time he saw them; neither did Adolf von Harnack favor their acquisition; Schmidt's decision to acquire them was in part based upon his hearing that the famous bibliophile, Beatty, had acquired some. But Beatty at first acquired only with an option to buy, which he exercised only in part, and then only on receiving encouragement from Schmidt via Ibscher. Thus the material barely escaped being bypassed by the academic community.

The conservation and editing began under what might seem to be a lucky star, with two competing geniuses—Ibscher and Polotsky—working in collaboration,[108] so that each newly exposed leaf on the book block could be transcribed before being removed, thus producing a better transcription for at least the exposed side than might be possible after it had been removed and perhaps damaged in the process, and providing an aide memoire for reassembling the leaf after it was exhibit. Rolf Ibscher, "Der Mani-Fund," 228: "Codex 15999, because of its unimpressive appearance, immediately wandered into the permanent display of the Berlin Museums, as a visible example of the terrible degeneration of the whole manuscript find." See Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 157–61; and Actes du XXVe Congrès International des Orientalistes, Moscou 9–16 août 1960, 535–41; but here it is cited according to Böhlig's collected essays, Mysterion und Wahrheit, 177–87, especially 184: "The condition of the manuscript was so desolate that among the collaborators of the Papyrus Collection it was generally designated as the 'wig.'"

107. The Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection of Berlin includes a note added in purple carbon reading, "at present in Moscow." Presumably this should read: Leningrad. This is the only indication in the Inventory Book as to the fate of any of the book blocks.

108. Böhlig, in a letter of February 5, 1989, recalls that the actual relationship was more nearly that of hostility. Polotsky was dependent on the speed, regularity, and success of Ibscher's conservation; Ibscher was dependent on Polotsky for the correct placement of fragments removed from the book block one by one, and may have been delayed by Polotsky's wishing to transcribe a surface before the leaf was removed from the book block.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

peeled off the book block. Alexander Böhlig, who became Polotsky's assistant in 1933 and successor in 1934, himself was never so involved, though he might well have been, had the procedure in fact been functioning well. Efforts by the son, Rolf Ibscher, to reestablish such teamwork after the war, though several alternatives were envisaged, did not actually materialize in a way to produce comparably successful results, though Böhlig would have liked to have become more involved with Ibscher's work than an occasional visit to Göttingen made possible. After the material was returned from Leningrad to Berlin in 1958, he proposed in 1959 to the German Academy of Sciences in Berlin that it resume publication. In 1960 the Academy's Institut für griechisch-römische Altertumskunde (rather than the Academy's Orientalische Kommission, which, prior to the war, had been in charge), through the subdivision Kommission für spätantike Religionsgeschichte, commissioned Böhlig to prepare the publications. On July 5, 1960, Böhlig wrote T. C. Skeat of the British Museum for permission to see the conserved leaves there, expressing particular interest in the 13 unidentified leaves and leaves reported to have been found lying inside Beatty's Kephalaia codex. Böhlig proposed bringing Ibscher with him to remove opaque cellophane paper that lay between the papyrus and the glass, which would, if left in place, effectively prevent reading the text. On July 13, 1960, R. J. Hayes, honorary librarian of the Chester Beatty Library, replied that Böhlig could see the leaves, but that one could not remove the cellophane—a restriction apparently intended to insure that Rolf Ibscher, whose work had been terminated with some hard feelings, not return again.[109]

At the Twenty-Fifth Congress of Orientalists in Moscow in August of 1960, Böhlig presented the status of the Manichaean codices. A resolution was passed advocating international cooperation in publishing the codices.[110] On August 15, 1960, Johannes Irmscher, then director of the Institut für griechisch-römische Altertumskunde of the Deutsche Akademie der Wissenschaften in Berlin, wrote to Hayes informing him of this resolution and soliciting his cooperation, commending both Böhlig and Ibscher. Hayes responded on December

109. T. C. Skeat forwarded Böhlig's letter to Hayes on July 11, 1960, with the comment: "I must leave you to deal with the suggestion that he should bring Ibscher with him!"

110. See note 106 above.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

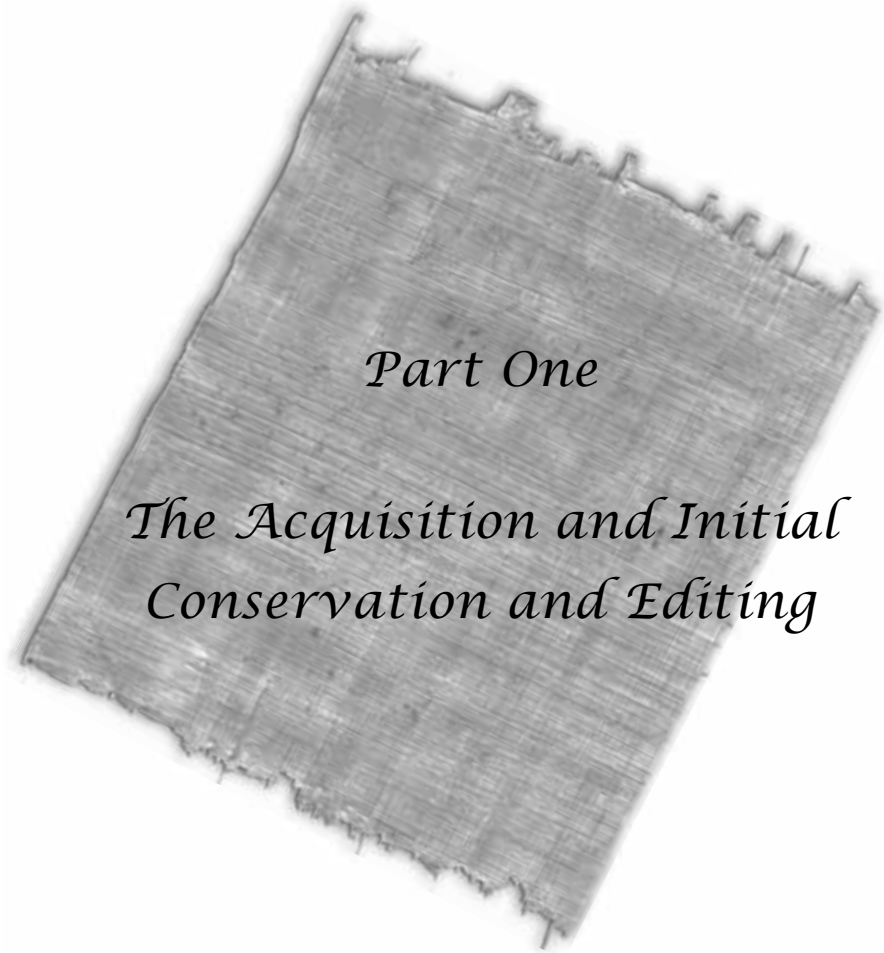
5, 1960, that the restoration was being done at the British Museum, and that the Coptic experts there would converse with Böhlig on the occasion of a visit anticipated for 1961. Böhlig in fact did not go, since without Ibscher he could not remove the cellophane to make the leaves legible, and because of the impossibilities of his making such a trip at the time. The Berlin Wall was erected August 13, 1961. Böhlig hoped that Peter Nagel would take over his work in Berlin after he himself moved in 1963 to West Germany. Böhlig hoped that, for his part, he would be able to activate the English. But none of this materialized, and Coptological scholarship moved increasingly into Nag Hammadi studies.

The book blocks with the unconserved bulk of three codices (the Acts, the Letters, and the Homilies) have been lost. Of the four largely extant codices, half of one (the Synaxeis) has not been conserved but is extant as a currently unconservable book block. Of the leaves that have been conserved from all seven codices, about half have been published in critical editions; the unpublished half, most of which was conserved by Rolf Ibscher, is largely illegible, as the Facsimile Edition makes apparent.

This discovery was caught up to a very abnormal degree in the political disasters of the time: the departure of Polotsky for Jerusalem in 1933 to avoid the baneful auspices of the Third Reich; the death of C. R. C. Allberry through the shooting down of his plane over the Netherlands just before midnight on April 3, 1943;[111] the inaccessibility of the material in the Zoo bunker during the war and then in Leningrad for twelve years (1946–1958)—it actually became accessible again only in 1960, a hiatus of two decades. By this time Carl Schmidt and Hugo Ibscher had died, and the next generation simply did not succeed in carrying forward the work as it had been initiated so promisingly by the first generation, though Alexander Böhlig and Rolf Ibscher worked vigorously, though largely in isolation.[112] Alexander

111. Allberry's tragic life led a classmate C. P. Snow to write a novel, Light and the Dark, whose hero, Roy Calvert, is based largely on Allberry but also on the character Larry Darrell in Somerset Maugham's The Razor's Edge. When the novel was included in a series of television renderings of Snow's sequence of novels, Strangers and Brothers, Allberry's widow, Mrs. Patricia K. G. Lewis, felt called upon to clear Allberry's name by publishing privately a collection of testimonials and recollections: Lewis, Charles Allberry: A Portrait. See also Putt, "Charles Allberry and Roy Calvert," 70–76; see also Giversen, Psalm-Book, Part 1, viii.

112. See most recently, Böhlig, Gnosis and Synkretismus, especially, in vol. 1, 71–180; and, in vol. 2, the section "Manichäismus," 457–653.



This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Böhlig is the only member of the earlier team who has continued to be active and thus to provide some continuity in the current revival of interest in the Manichaean codices of Medinet Madi.

The plans worked out in 1931 for a complete coordination in the conservation, editing, and publication of the material, in spite of the plurality of ownership, began to be implemented successfully, as is evident from the publications between 1934 and 1966 by Polotsky, Böhlig, and Allberry from three codices in two parallel series at Kohlhammer in Stuttgart. Now, a generation or more later, the academic community has become aware that a salvage operation is urgently needed if the editing and publishing of this important manuscript discovery, which began so auspiciously, is not to end quite dismally.

The International Association for Coptic Studies expressed its approval of both the projects that have recently been proposed and hoped that there will be collaboration between them. This is a hope that we all, as participants in the Second International Conference on Manichaeism should heartily share, and that the newly founded International Association of Manichaean Studies might seek to implement.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:30 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Part One

The Acquisition and Initial Conservation and Editing

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 1 —

The Acquisitions of Carl Schmidt

The basic publication reporting on the circumstances of the acquisition of the Manichaean codices of Medinet Madi (Τερενοῦθις) is the report to the Berlin Academy of Sciences by Carl Schmidt and H. J. Polotsky, with a contribution by Hugo Ibscher, submitted July 28, 1932, and published the following year:[1]

On the occasion of a research trip to Palestine [early in 1930] . . . while passing through Cairo, I [Carl Schmidt] paid a visit to the various antiquities dealers I knew. Among other things, a papyrus book [P[15996], Kephalaia] was put before me that was in an extremely desolate condition, so that I hardly dared to touch it. Fortunately I could decipher in the upper margin the word ⲛ̄ⲕⲉϕⲁⲗⲁⲓⲟⲛ and in the text read the beginning of a section: "Again the Illuminator (ϕⲱⲥⲧⲏⲣ) spoke" . . . and the content must go back to an author who ascribed to himself the honorary title of an "Illuminator" or was honored as such by his followers, and who

Bei Gelegenheit einer Forschungsreise nach Palästina . . . [early in 1930] stattete ich [Carl Schmidt] auf der Durchreise in Kairo den verschiedenen mir bekannten Antikenhändlern einen Besuch ab. Unter anderem wurde mir ein Papyrusbuch [P[15996], Kephalaia]vorgelegt, das sich in einem höchst desolaten Zustande befand, daher ich es kaum zu berühren wagte. Zum Glück konnte ich auf dem oberen Rande das Wort ⲛ̄ⲕⲉϕⲁⲗⲁⲓⲟⲛ entziffern und im Texte den Anfang eines Abschnittes lesen: "Wiederum sprach der Erleuchter (ϕⲱⲥⲧⲏⲣ)" . . . , und der Inhalt musste auf einen Verfassser zurückgehen, der sich selbst

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 4–90, with a contribution by Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschriften," 82–85. The quotations here are from pp. 6–10.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

had collected a circle of disciples around himself . . . In happy excitement about this discovery I communicated information about it to his Excellency [Adolf] von Harnack and others whom I knew in Berlin, but I struck upon great skepticism, since no one wanted to believe in the discovery of original works of Mani. I was referred to anti-Manichaean writings from Egypt such as Alexander of Lycopolis or Serapion of Thmuis. So I drew back from an acquisition. Only on my return from Jerusalem was my attention led again to the papyrus, as I learned from the antiquities dealer that Mr. Chester Beatty, a well-known collector of manuscripts, had acquired [March 23, 1930] papyrus books similar to the one offered to me. This gave me the courage to acquire the papyrus at my own risk, especially since no downpayment was required of me. But I had not taken into account the fact that in the meantime a severe financial crisis had occurred in Germany, which also involved the museums and libraries too heavily for larger amounts to be provided for acquisitions. Hence all the efforts that were so kindly supported by my colleague Prof. Erich Seeberg seemed to be without success. Thus the danger was near that this valuable treasure might be lost to German scholarship. Then at the last minute a lucky star arose in the person of an unnamed Maecenas [August Pfeffer], who had been made aware of the significance of the den Ehrentitel eines "Erleuchters" beigelegt hatte oder als solcher von den Anhängern verehrt wurde, und der einen Jüngerkreis um sich versammelt hatte . . . In freudiger Erregung über diese Entdeckung machte ich Exzellenz [Adolf] von Harnack und anderen Bekannten in Berlin davon Mitteilung, stiess aber auf grosse Skepsis, da niemand an die Auffindung von Originalwerken des Mani glauben wollte. Ich wurde auf manichäische Gegenschriften aus Ägypten wie Alexander von Lycopolis oder Serapion von Thmuis hingewiesen. So trat ich von einer Erwerbung zurück. Erst bei meiner Rückkehr von Jerusalem wurde meine Aufmerksamkeit auf den Papyrus wieder gelenkt, als ich von dem Antikenhändler erfuhr, dass Mr. Chester Beatty, ein bekannter Sammler von Handschriften, ähnliche Papyrusbücher wie das mir angebotene erworben hätte [23 March 1930]. Dies gab mir den Mut, den Papyrus auf mein eigenes Risiko zu erwerben, zumal keine Anzahlung von mir verlangt wurde. Aber ich hatte nicht damit gerechnet, dass in Deutschland inzwischen eine schwere Finanzkrise ausgebrochen war, die auch die Museen und Bibliotheken zu stark in Mitleidenschaft zog, um grössere Summen für Ankäufe bereitstellen zu können. Daher schienen alle Bemühungen, die von meinem Kollegen Prof. Erich Seeberg in dankenswerter Weise unterstützt wurden, erfolglos zu sein und damit die Gefahr in die Nähe gerückt, dass dieser kostbare Schatz der deutschen Wissenschaft verlorenginge. Da tauchte im letzten Moment ein Rettungsstern in der Person eines ungenannten Mäzens [August Pfeffer] auf, der durch find by my friend Dr. E. Lubowski. In great-hearted liberality he provided the Egyptian Museum with the purchase price, indeed he even expressed his willingness, in case further pieces of the papyrus book should come on the market in the Egyptian antiquities trade, to provide further means for their acquisition. German scholarship hence owes warm appreciation to this Maecenas, especially since such understanding patrons can be counted as rarities in the hard times of today.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

So in the spring of 1931 I could again begin a trip to Egypt . . . My trip had as its main purpose to investigate further the find as such, i.e. to collect more precise information about the site of the discovery, but especially to determine whether still further papyrus books from the same find had cropped up on the antiquities market. For anyone who is familiar with the antiquities trade knows very well that in the case of larger papyrus discoveries all the material is never brought to market at once, either by the discoverers or by the dealers, so as not to depress the price in offering larger quantities. My intuition had not deceived me, for already on my first visit to an antiquities dealer in Cairo he put before me two piles of papyrus [P[15996] Kephalaia] that outwardly recalled only too well those that had been earlier acquired. And again I could decipher on the upper margin the word ⲛ̄ⲕⲉⲫⲁⲗⲁⲓⲟⲛ. Thus it was proven that it belonged to meinen Freund Dr. E. Lubowski auf die Bedeutung des Fundes aufmerksam gemacht war. In hochherziger Liberalität hat er den Kaufpreis für das Ägyptische Museum erstattet, ja, er erklärte sich bereit, sollten weitere Stücke des Papyrusbuches im ägyptischen Antikenhandel auf den Markt kommen, weitere Mittel zu deren Erwerbung zur Verfügung stellen zu wollen. Die deutsche Wissenschaft ist daher diesem Mäzen zu heissestem Dank verpflichtet, zumal in der heutigen Notzeit so verständnisvolle Mäzene zu den Seltenheiten zu rechnen sind.

So konnte ich im Frühjahr 1931 wiederum eine Reise nach Ägypten antreten . . . Meine Reise hatte den Hauptzweck, dem Funde als solchem weiter nachzugehen, d.h. über den Fundort nähere Erkundigungen einzuziehen, insbesondere aber festzustellen, ob noch weitere Papyrusbücher aus demselben Funde auf dem Antikenmarkte auftauchen würden. Denn wer mit dem Antikenhandel vertraut ist, weiss zur Genüge, dass bei grösseren Papyrusfunden niemals das ganze Material, sei es von den Findern, sei es von den Händlern, auf einmal auf den Markt gebracht wird, um den Preis bei Angebot grösseren Umfangs nicht herabzudrücken. Meine Ahnung hatte mich nicht betrogen, denn gleich beim ersten Besuche eines Antikenhändlers in Kairo legte er mir zwei Papyrushaufen [P[15996], Kephalaia] vor, die dem Äussern nach nur zu sehr an jene früher erworbenen erinnerten. Und wieder konnte ich auf dem oberen Rande das Wort ⲛ̄ⲕⲉⲫⲁⲗⲁⲓⲟⲛ entziffern. Damit war die Zugehörigkeit zu dem Originalwerke erwiesen. Daneben kam ein Papyrusbuch [P[15997], the original work. In the process, a papyrus book [P[15997], Acta] emerged that lay in the original condition as when found, between two bare wooden covers, since one had risked no further handling. The whole was in such a condition of decomposition that even the dealer did not think he could recommend the acquisition to me, to spare me a later deception or a protest to him . . .

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Unfortunately, I was completely in the dark thus far about the site of the discovery. The dialect used in the text pointed to Upper Egypt, but many indications regarding the dealers spoke for the Fayyum. Hence my next visit, accompanied by Privy Councillor Moritz, was paid to an old business friend there. And again I had not been deceived, for he [p. 8] showed me a few unimpressive piles that on the first glance betrayed the fact that they belonged to the Mani discovery. So here the source was uncovered from which Mr. Chester Beatty had carried out his acquisition. And now there was no further difficulty in obtaining from the mouth of this well-versed dealer further information about the whole discovery. First of all, the news was important that three dealers had divided the discovery among themselves, and in fact there had been eight parts, of which he himself had gotten three parts, the dealer in Cairo also three parts, and a provincial dealer two parts. Of course this first partition was not the end of it, but each had carried out further divi-

Acta] zum Vorschein, das noch in dem ursprünglichen Zustande bei der Auffindung zwischen zwei kahlen Holzdeckeln lag, da man keine weitere Berührung gewagt hatte. Das Ganze befand sich in einem solchen Zerfall, dass selbst der Händler den Ankauf mir nicht empfehlen zu können glaubte, um mir eine spätere Enttäuschung bzw. Reklamation bei ihm zu ersparen . . .

Leider war ich bis dahin über den Fundort ganz im unklaren. Der im Text gebotene Dialekt wies nach Oberägypten, aber manche Anzeichen in Rücksicht auf die Händler sprachen für das Fajum. Daher galt mein nächster Besuch in Begleitung von Hrn. Geheimrat Moritz einem dortigen alten Geschäftsfreunde. Und wieder hatte ich mich nicht getäuscht, denn er [p. 8] zeigte mir einige unansehnliche Haufen, die ihre Zugehörigkeit zu dem Mani-Funde auf den ersten Blick verrieten. Hier war also die Quelle entdeckt, aus der Mr. Chester Beatty seine Erwerbung getätigt hatte. Und nun machte es keine Schwierigkeit mehr, aus dem Munde dieses sehr versierten Händlers über den ganzen Fund nähere Kunde zu erhalten. Zunächst war von Wichtigkeit die Mitteilung, dass drei Händler den Fund unter sich geteilt hätten, und zwar wären es acht Teile gewesen, davon er selbst drei Teile, der Händler in Kairo ebenfalls drei Teile und ein Provinzhändler zwei Teile erhalten hätten. Natürlich war es bei dieser ersten Teilung nicht geblieben, sondern jeder hatte weitere Teilungen vorgenommen, um möglichst viel Geld herauszus-

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

sions in order to squeeze out of it as much money as possible. And what was even worse, one had removed the top and bottom layers of papyrus, which had suffered to an especial extent against the covers of the binding—a phenomenon that we experience in almost all codices—, to give the whole a better appearance. How much was lost in this manipulation one is not able now to judge. So I found such outwardly unimpressive remains, which doubtless belong to the papyrus books acquired by Mr. Chester Beatty in the Fayyum [only the Synaxeis was acquired in Egypt partly by Beatty, partly by Schmidt], and, for the sake of completeness, so as not to let the least bit get lost, acquired them for a cheap sum, since the dealer already had his great reward in his pocket. [Note 1: Prof (Adolf) Grohmann of Prague has acquired such rags for the papyrus section of the Vienna State Library from a dealer in Eshmunen (the remains of Kephalaia, 311–20)]. Ibscher recently saved fragments of two leaves from this junk heap. —On my last trip in the Spring of 1932 I found still two further piles [P[15996], Kephalaia] that had been peeled off, and brought them to Berlin.] I do not regret my decision, for in the conservation 31 leaves could be brought under glass in more or less fragmentary preservation [P[15995], Synaxeis]. Whereas the antiquities dealer in the Fayyum had sold his manuscripts exclusively to Mr. Chester Beatty, the Cairo one had divided his holdchlagen. Und was noch schlimmer war, man hatte die oberen und unteren Papyruslagen, die unter den Einbanddecken in besonderem Masse gelitten hatten—eine Erscheinung, die wir bei fast allen Kodizes erleben—abgehoben, um dem Ganzen ein besseres Aussehen zu geben. Wieviel bei dieser Manipulation zugrunde gegangen ist, entzieht sich jetzt der Beurteilung. So fand ich solche äusserlich unscheinbaren Reste, die ohne Zweifel zu den von Mr. Chester Beatty im Fajum erworbenen Papyrusbüchern gehören [only the Synaxeis was acquired in Egypt partly by Beatty, partly by Schmidt], und habe sie der Vollständigkeit halber, um nicht das geringste verlorengehen zu lassen, für billiges Geld erworben, da der Händler seinen grossen Verdienst bereits in der Tasche hatte. [Note 1: Derartige Fetzen hat Prof. (Adolf) Grohmann, Prag, für die Papyrusabteilung der Wiener Staatsbibliothek von einem Händler aus Eschmunen erworben [the remains of Kephalaia, pp. 311–20]. Ibscher hat jüngst Fragmente von zwei Blättern aus diesem Müllhaufen gerettet.—Bei meiner letzten Reise im Frühjahr 1932 fand ich noch zwei weitere abgehobene Haufen [P[15996], Kephalaia] vor und brachte sie nach Berlin.] Ich bereue meinen Entschluss nicht, denn bei der Konservierung konnten 31 Blätter in mehr oder weniger fragmentarischer Erhaltung unter Glas gebracht werden [P[15995], Synaxeis]. Hatte der Fajumer Antikenhändler ings between Chester Beatty and myself, and, after he had turned him away, bought up the two pieces of the provincial, in order to offer them to me. But what was of the greatest importance: My man of confidence could give me a precise statement about the site of the discovery, which doubtless no one would have been able to guess. For the Mani books are written in the so-called Subachmimic dialect. Hence the translation must have originally been done in the region where this local dialect was at home. That was an Upper Egyptian dialect, which, as we will come to see in more detail, was spoken in the region of Assiut. According to what was told me, the site of the discovery was what is now called Medinet Madi, a place little known even to papyrologists . . . [p. 9]

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

My man of confidence must have had the whole discovery before his eyes, for, according to a passing comment that he just now made to me on my visit in March 1932, the papyrus books, each surrounded by bare covers in wood, lay in a wooden box that was found in what had been a dwelling house. The wooden box was said to have been rotten, so that saving it would not have been worthwhile. It seems as if the whole discovery had been offered by the Arabic discoverers to the antiquities dealer of the Fayyum, but the dealer had not risked putting his money alone in these unimpressive papyrus books, which is why he divided seine Handschriften ausschliesslich an Mr. Chester Beatty verkauft, so hatte der Kairener seinen Besitz zwischen Chester Beatty und mir geteilt und hatte, nachdem er diesen abgestossen, die beiden Stücke des Provinzlers aufgekauft, um sie mir anzubieten. Aber was von höchster Wichtigkeit war: Mein Gewährsmann konnte mir auch eine genaue Angabe über den Fundort machen, den wohl niemand hätte erraten können. Denn die Mani-Bücher sind im sogenannten sub-achmimischen Dialekt abgefasst; die Übersetzung muss also ursprünglich in dem Gebiet stattgefunden haben, wo dieser Lokaldialekt heimisch war. Das war ein oberägyptischer Dialekt, der, wie wir noch näher erkennen werden, im Gebiete von Assiut gesprochen wurde. Den Mitteilungen zufolge war der Fundort das heutige Medinet Madi, ein selbst den Papyrologen wenig bekannter Ort . . . [p. 9]

Den gesamten Fund muss mein Gewährsmann noch vor Augen gehabt haben, denn nach beiläufiger Mitteilung, die er mir jetzt beim Besuch im März 1932 machte, lagen die Papyrusbücher, jedes von kahlen Deckeln in Holz umgeben, in einer Holzkiste, die in einem früheren Wohnhause aufgefunden wurde. Die Holzkiste soll zerfallen gewesen sein, so dass eine Aufbewahrung sich nicht lohnte. Es hat den Anschein, als ob dem Antikenhändler im Fajum der ganze Fund von den arabischen Findern angeboten wurde, dieser aber sich nicht getraute, sein Geld allein in diesen unansehnlichen Papyrusbüchern anzulegen, weshalb er den Fund mit anderen Händlern teilte. Damit wird auch eine Beobachtung von Dr. Ibscher bestätigt, dass die Mani-Handschriften infolge ihrer feuchten Lagerung in absehbarer

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the discovery with other dealers. This also confirms an observation by Dr. Ibscher to the effect that the Mani manuscripts were near disintegration in the foreseeable future as a result of their damp storage; that is to say, they could not have been lying in the dry desert earth. For the basements of the houses of Medinet Madi were exposed to dampness from above and below, so that the papyri could be drenched through and through with salt crystals. The whole region is a swamp area, even if the old settlement was placed on the back of a hill . . . [p. 10]

Meanwhile Dr. Ibscher has brought the Mani holdings of Chester Beatty from London to Berlin to put them under glass right here at his leisure. I myself had a conference in London with those interested in the discovery, Sir Herbert Thompson, Dr. W. E. Crum and Prof. Alan H. Gardiner, concerning some kind of collaboration with regard to a literary whole that basically belongs together, and it was agreed that expenses should be shared to interest a young collaborator. I could present such a one in the person of Dr. Polotsky, after my Maecenas [August Pfeffer] in the most generous way had assured his involvement for two years, so that the work could be begun seriously in July 1931.

Zeit dem Zerfall nahegebracht wären, also nicht in der trockenen Wüstenerde gelegen haben können. Denn die Keller der Häuser von Medinet Madi waren der Feuchtigkeit von oben und unten ausgesetzt, so dass die Papyri von Salzkristallen vollständig durchsetzt werden konnten. Die ganze Gegend ist Sumpfgebiet, wenn auch die alte Siedlung auf dem Hügelrücken angelegt war . . . [p. 10]

Inzwischen hatte Dr. Ibscher den Mani-Besitz von Chester Beatty von London nach Berlin gebracht, um ihn hier an Ort und Stelle in aller Ruhe unter Glas zu bringen. Ich selbst hatte in London mit den Interessenten des Fundes, mit Sir Herbert Thompson, Dr. W. E. Crum und Prof. Alan H. Gardiner eine Konferenz betreffs einer gewissen Zusammenarbeit bei einem im Grunde zusammengehörenden Literaturganzen, und es wurde vereinbart, dass auf gemeinsame Kosten ein jüngerer Mitarbeiter angeworben werden sollte. Ich konnte diesen in der Person von Dr. Polotsky präsentieren, nachdem auch mein Mäzen [August Pfeffer] in hochherziger Weise seinen Anteil auf zwei Jahre sichergestellt hatte, so dass die Arbeit im Juli 1931 ernstlich in Angriff genommen werden konnte.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Schmidt published a more popularized summary of this lengthy article in a speech presented to the annual meeting of the Gesellschaft für Kirchengeschichte in Berlin on November 9, 1932. In general there is no new information in it, except for an occasional formulation that happens to be more precise or detailed than the equivalent section of the lengthier report. Thus the statement about the discovery and acquisition:[2]

In the year 1930 fellahin, so-called sebachin, who rummage through the junk heaps in old abandoned towns and settlements in search of salty earth to fertilize the ground as a substitute for expensive potash, discovered in Medinet Madi, in the ruins of a town in the southwest of the Fayyum, a wooden box in the ruins of a house. The wooden box disintegrated when brought out to the light, but its content remained intact. The box contained a series of papyrus books, each surrounded by rough wooden covers. The discoverers immediately offered their treasure to an antiquities dealer in the Fayyum, who acquired the whole, surely for a ridiculously low sum. Unfortunately the dealer divided the papyrus books with two other antiquities dealers, so that they surfaced at different places on the antiquities market . . . [p. 6]

Meanwhile the London private collector had enlarged his possession by new acquisitions, and I too could in the spring of 1932 add a new

Im Jahre 1930 haben nun Fellachen, sog. Sebachin, die in den verlassenen alten Städten und Siedlungen die Schutthügel durchwühlten nach salzhaltigen Erdmassen für die Bedüngung des Bodens als Ersatz für das zu teure Kali, in Medinet Madi, einer Ruinenstadt im Südwesten des Fajum, eine Holzkiste in den Ruinen eines Hauses aufgefunden. Die Holzkiste zerfiel beim Herausheben ans Tageslicht, erhalten blieb ihr Inhalt. Die Kiste enthielt eine Reihe Papyrusbücher, jedes von rohen Holzdeckeln umgeben. Sofort haben die Finder ihren Schatz einem Antikenhändler im Fajum angeboten, und das Ganze ist von ihm sicherlich für ein Spottgeld erworben wooden. Leider hat der Händler die Papyrusbücher noch auf zwei andere Antikenhändler verteilt, so dass sie an verschiedenen Stellen auf dem Antikenmarkt auftauchten . . . [p. 6]

Inzwischen hatte auch der Londoner Privatsammler seinen Besitz durch neue Ankäufe vermehrt, und auch ich konnte noch im Frühjahr 1932 ein neues Stück

2. Schmidt, Neue Originalquellen des Manichäismus, 4, 6.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms piece to the Berlin Manichaica [P15995, Synaxeis]. Thus, as far as one can now tell, the whole find is united in the London and Berlin collection; each possesses about a half.

[P15995, Synaxeis] den Berliner Manichaica hinzufügen. So ist denn, so viel man jetzt übersehen kann, der ganze Fund in der Londoner und Berliner Sammlung vereinigt; jede besitzt ungefähr die Hälfte.

Schmidt did not state the purchase price. Later Rolf Ibscher mentioned a price that seems very high:[3]

In acquiring the discovery, sold very expensively by the three dealers for about 80,000 gold marks, it was clear to C. Schmidt that, apart from skill at restoring that yielded to no difficulties, this terribly rotted papyrus discovery could never be made accessible to scholarship. But he took upon himself the risk.

Bei der Erwerbung des von den drei Händlern mit rund 80.000 Goldmark reichlich teuer verkauften Fundes, war es C. Schmidt klar, dass ohne eine keine Schwierigkeiten kennende Restaurierungskunst dieser masslos verrottete Papyrusfund niemals wissenschaftlich erschlossen werden könnte. Aber er nahm das Risiko auf sich.

The bulk of one codex, P15999, was in so bad a condition that it was referred to as the wig, and its conservation was ruled to be impossible. Yet, according to Rolf Ibscher, it was purchased for five thousand marks through a gift by Dr. W. Kohlhammer, the publisher of the Manichaica, who was enthusiastic enough about them to produce a Coptic type font imitating one of the hands of these codices.[4] In the spring of 1932 an exchange rate of 18 Reichsmark = £1 was reported.[5] This would mean that 80,000 marks equaled £4,444, and that 5,000 marks = £347.

C. R. C. Allberry's article of 1938, based primarily on the published report by Schmidt and Polotsky, only added occasional details to what was already in print. He dated Schmidt's initial experience of

3. Ibscher, "Mani und kein Ende," 219.

4. Rolf Ibscher in a August 29, 1957 letter to Carston Colpe.

5. In a letter from Sir Herbert Thompson to Chester Beatty concerning Ibscher's salary.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

being shown a codex that he was able to identify as Kephalaia to 1930, which the original report had not made explicit.[6]

Søren Giversen reported in 1988 that the discovery dates to 1929, since a Danish Egyptologist, H. O. Lange, saw some of the material in Cairo on November 29, 1929, a dating that Schmidt verified in 1936.[7]

6. Allberry, "Manichaean Studies," 340.

7. Giversen, Manichaean Papyri, 1, speaks of "their rediscovery in 1929," and explains on page 3: "The first European scholar to see them was the Danish Egyptologist H. O. Lange who saw them in November 1929, when parts of them were offered for sale in Cairo. At that time they had been split up into blocks; outer pages, which were not very nice, had been removed and the papyri had also been damaged in other ways." Giversen, Manichaean Coptic Papyri, 3:vii–viii, reports in more detail: "The first scholar to see one of the Manichaean Coptic papyri from Medinet Madi was the Danish Egyptologist H. O. Lange, who saw the papyrus on 29 November 1929. This was noted in Lange's diary on a journey to Egypt in 1929–30 (The diary is in The Royal Library in Copenhagen, Ny kgl. Samling 3919, 4o), and is verified by Carl Schmidt in a letter to H. O. Lange dated 20 February 1936 (The Royal Library, Copenhagen, Ny kgl. Samling 3736, 4o)."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 2 —

The Acquisitions of Chester Beatty

The Archives of the Chester Beatty Library have made unpublished materials available that fill in many details omitted in the published German reports.

Sir Chester Beatty already had in place a procedure for the procurement and processing of Egyptian manuscripts when the Manichaean materials appeared on the market. As early as January 26, 1925, he purchased two Coptic manuscripts from the leading Cairo antiquities dealer of the day, whose ledger sheet on which the receipt was written had as its printed heading: Maurice Nahman Antiquaire, 27, Rue El-Madabegh, 27. Early in 1930, Beatty had Nahman send to Eric G. Millar of the Department of Manuscripts of the British Museum various manuscripts he acquired on approval. Beatty wrote from Cairo to J. W. Corble of his London staff to notify Millar to that effect. Beatty asked Corble to "cable his [Millar's] opinion," using a "code" in cables. The code consisted of "Copper Mine" for a Coptic manuscript, "Silver" for a Greek papyrus, and "Gold Mine" for "rare and valuable." In at least one instance Millar consulted Sir Harold I. Bell, whereupon John Wooderson, Beatty's secretary, cabled to Beatty the contents of a resultant phone conversation between Millar and himself, Wooderson. This content was also communicated orally to Edwards, a mutual friend, who must have been traveling just then from London to Cairo. Millar also wrote to Corble enclosing for Beatty a letter providing written confirmation of the oral telegraphed message. This letter graded as a "Silver Mine" a third-century Septuagint text of Daniel (Chester Beatty Biblical Papyrus X) and as a "Gold Mine" a fourth-century text of Genesis (Chester Beatty Biblical Papyrus IV).

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Thus, Beatty, himself no expert in such matters, but a mining entrepreneur, had at his disposal the British Museum and its access to British scholarship.

As recently as January 23, 1930, Hugo Ibscher had sent from Berlin a bill for conservation work recently completed in London; he anticipated returning to London in June 1930 to resume this activity. Thus, Beatty had at his disposal the leading papyrus conservator of the day.

A ledger sheet with Nahman's letterhead dated March 23, 1930, and made out to Beatty, at the time in Cairo, listed prices alongside fifteen items for sale. There are also notes as to which are to be returned and which kept. A last item, offered for £1200, was separated from the rest by an empty space. It was described as follows: "Two Coptic manuscripts a[nd] two binding[s] in wood." Underneath, notes were added that read:

On approval	£700	Mss
	£500	Mss
	£40	Binding

The figure 40 was written on top of "incl."

On the back of the ledger sheet is then a list of the items to be purchased, with their prices, and a total. The last in the list reads:

Two Bindings	£80

Beside this entry is the note: "Can be returned if B[ritish] M[useum] says they are later than VI century." Apparently the two bindings had originally been included in the price of the two codices, then had been priced apart as £40, then sold at £40 each. There is then a second ledger sheet, where these purchased items are listed, with the concluding handwritten note: "Settled with thanks, M. Nahman." The last in this list of acquired objects reads: "Two binding[s] in wood. 80." Thus, it seems clear that the two bindings were acquired, that they were associated with the two Coptic manuscripts taken on approval without payment at the time of the transaction, and that the covers, paid for on the spot but with the option to return them if not satisfied, were thought to be no later than the sixth century, which would also indicate the assumed date of the manuscripts. The wooden bindings indicate that at least one of the Coptic manuscripts was a codex, or part of a codex, although the fact that the bindings could come to be priced and acquired separately indicates they were no longer attached to the manuscript.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On May 26, 1930, Nahman cabled from Cairo to Beatty in London: "Am expecting your kind answer regarding the books please wire your decision I am leaving tenth June." On May 28, 1930, Beatty replied by cable: "Ibscher Berlin only arrived two days ago expect wire you few days."

On May 31, 1930, Beatty cabled again:

> Doctor Ibscher thinks can do nothing with large book [part of the Homilies] also smaller book for which you ask five hundred pounds [second part of the Psalms] will be very difficult. Prepared to give two hundred pounds for smaller manuscript which was the cheaper one otherwise prefer to return same.

If the difference in size is not merely that of thickness, but of height and breadth, then the Psalms, measuring 27 by 17.5 cm, is the smallest (with the possible exception of the Acts, whose no-longer extant book block is of unknown dimensions, but whose eight extant leaves are also small), the others being 31.5 by 18 cm.[1]

On May 31, 1930, Beatty also wrote Nahman a confirming letter:

> With regard to the two manuscripts in question, one of which I have the option to buy from you for £500 and the second for £700, Dr. Ibscher's opinion is that nothing can practically be done with the more expensive one as it was too difficult, but that there was a chance of doing something on the other though from what I could gather he thought the price is very high; therefore, I would not care to exercise either of the options. I would be willing however to pay £200 for the book for which you asked £500 and take the chance of making something out of it.

But on June 2, 1930, Nahman cabled Beatty, who was by then in New York, so that on June 5, 1930, Corble cabled its text to him there:

> Surprised cost too high cannot accept your kind offer Professor Schmidt bought damaged one [Kephalaia] five hundred please keep till my arrival.

1. Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," Manichäische Homilien, 1:xiii. Ibscher's statement that all except the Psalms have the larger dimension would presumably presuppose his having measured the book block of the Acts, though this is not made explicit.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Meanwhile Ibscher had returned to Berlin, taking with him the smaller manuscript [the second part of the Psalms] to conserve, as well as a report about the two manuscripts by Sir Alan H. Gardiner. On June 3, 1930, Ibscher wrote Gardiner (a letter extant only in English translation):

> In the Museum everybody was impatiently waiting for your report about the new discovery. Schubart is so glad that the beautiful papyri have gone to London. As I suspected, Prof. Schmidt has also bought a Coptic book [Kephalaia] from Nahman. I think it is better for everybody that no mystery should be made about it. When Schmidt showed me his purchase and I could see that it was an exactly similar book to the larger one which had been offered to Mr. Chester Beatty, I told him what I had seen in London. Upon this, Schmidt showed his bill for the book, from which I saw that he had paid for his book over £400. But I did not tell anybody about the London prices. As Schmidt is probably the greatest expert on such things, I showed him Mr. Chester Beatty's book [the second part of the Psalms]. He told me at once what it was, and when he called today he said that it was an exceedingly valuable purchase. The language according to him was "Achmimic II." He considers that the book originated from Assiut—at least so I understood. Mr. Beatty's book contained, from what Schmidt could see, songs about the original man. He considers the complete books are the works of the "Manichaeans," in other words, there is no other known example of this work in existence. For this reason alone Schmidt considers that it would be very advisable to buy if possible everything which can be bought. Schmidt considers the book which has been purchased by Mr. Beatty—that is to say, the book I have here—is the most valuable book of the whole lot. I am very pleased for Mr. Beatty that he has made such a lucky purchase. Since I have been told what valuable treasures these books are, I must of course put aside all my considerations and recommend him to complete the purchase.
>
> I should also like to save the badly preserved books. Of course, Mr. Beatty should try to get a lower price on account of the great expense incurred by the restoration.
>
> Where Schmidt's purchase will ultimately go, he does not know himself because the local collections and libraries here have no money and he will be forced to resell them very soon because he has purchased them on borrowed money. Perhaps it may be possible for this book also to be bought by Mr. Chester

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> Beatty. It is in better preservation than the large book which has been offered to him. Of course, this is only a suggestion of mine. Schmidt would probably be able to dispose of this book in Germany, only in case it should ultimately go to America I think it would be well if it went to its brothers in London.

Gardiner thereupon telephoned Wooderson on June 6, 1930, who passed on to Corble the phone conversation in typed form, which read in part as follows:

> Dr. Alan H. Gardiner (Park 5109) rang up about the COPTIC MANUSCRIPTS for which Mr. Chester Beatty is negotiating with Mr. Maurice Nahman. He has received the MSS. from the little man (? Dr. Ibscher) who was working with the papyri in England, and who has now gone back to Berlin. This man thought at first that it was not desirable to purchase the better of these two manuscripts, but now he writes that, having found out what it is, he certainly does advise the purchase of it, as it is a very valuable MS. . . .
>
> If he could not get it cheaper, he should pay the full price asked, i.e., £500 . . .
>
> Of the series, it is by far the most important manuscript and of greater importance than the one Dr. Schmidt has bought. Dr. Ibscher writes very excitedly about it. The date is well known. It is the upper part of the one Mr. Beatty has already got. It was cut in two and Nahman is selling it as two manuscripts. Mr. Chester Beatty has bought one-half and it is the other half which Dr. Gardiner has in his house and is telephoning about.
>
> The manuscript offered for £700 should be rejected.
>
> The above is Dr. Gardiner's message verbatim.

In spite of the claim that the written text is the verbatim equivalent of Gardiner's oral report, there seems to be considerable garbling at some stage in the transmission. For Ibscher had all along advocated the purchase of the better of the two manuscripts (in terms of conservation), the one offered at £500 [the second part of the Psalms]. The purchase of this manuscript is considered a fait accompli: Ibscher in his letter called it "Mr. Chester Beatty's book," and referred to it as "the book which has been purchased by Mr. Beatty." The point at which Ibscher has changed his mind in the light of Schmidt's enthusiasm is, in Ibscher's letter, clearly the larger manuscript for which £700 was the asking price and which Ibscher had initially described in London as not conservable and hence had left with Gardiner in London before returning to Berlin (part of the Homilies). The reversal of opinion is in the formulation "Schmidt considers that it would be very advisable to buy if possible everything which can be bought," and in Ibscher's resultant comment, "I should also like to save the badly preserved books."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

When Ibscher continues, "Of course, Mr. Beatty should try to get a lower price on account of the great expense incurred by the restoration," this is not only motivated by a concern to protect funds from which his restoration work might be paid, but reflects his recognition that the manuscript Schmidt had purchased for "over £400" "was an exactly similar book to the larger one which had been offered to Mr. Chester Beatty," in that the dimensions of both were 31.5 by 18 cm, so that the price might well be negotiated down from £700 to something "over £400."

The second part of the Psalms had already begun to be conserved, as Schmidt's reference to a manuscript containing "songs about the original man" would indicate. For among the unpublished materials that H. J. Polotsky submitted to Sir Herbert Thompson for distribution to Beatty and Crum, there is (in the Crum Archives in the Griffith Institute of the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford) a leaf labeled by Polotsky "C.B.1," containing his Coptic transcription (Crum Mss. 11.30.1) together with another leaf containing his English (!) translation (Crum Mss. 11.28.84 and Crum Mss. 11.28.122). At the top of the transcription is written "Hymns to the Primal Man." The translation begins: "We praise our father, the Primal Man." The psalm is numbered 213. Beside the numeral in the Coptic transcription is the appended note: "(precedes Allberry p. 1)." We apparently have before us here the beginning of both Ibscher's and Polotsky's work for Beatty, as "C.B.1" may suggest.

This identification of the second part of the Psalms as the first thing conserved for Beatty was confirmed in its publication:[2]

When I then succeeded in Berlin in detaching a leaf of the part acquired by Prof. C. Schmidt, he was able to conclude with certainty	Als es mir dann in Berlin gelang, eine Seite des von Herrn Prof. C. Schmidt erworbenen Teiles freizulegen, konnte dieser mit

2. Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," Manichaean Psalm Book, 2:vii.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms that this discovery had to do with works of Mani. A few weeks later in London I succeeded in detaching a leaf from one of the volumes acquired by Mr. A. Chester Beatty, and the conclusion of Prof. C. Schmidt found a complete confirmation.

If the examination of the manuscript in Berlin showed that one had acquired here a part of the Kephalaia, the first separated leaf of the Chester Beatty possession showed us that here the Psalms of the Mani community lie before us.

Sicherheit feststellen, dass es sich bei dem Funde tatsächlich um Werke des Mani handelte. Wenige Wochen später gelang es mir dann auch in London, von einem der von Mr. A. Chester Beatty erworbenenen Bände ein Blatt abzuheben, und die Feststellung von Herrn Prof. C. Schmidt fand eine volle Bestätigung.

Ergab die Prüfung der Handschrift in Berlin, dass man dort einen Teil der "Kephalaia" erworben hatte, so zeigte uns das erste losgelöste Blatt des Chester Beatty Besitzes, dass hier die Psalmen der Manigemeinde vorlagen.

Hence the discussion was not about whether to acquire the second part of the Psalms, which was already being conserved as Beatty's property, but rather whether to acquire the unconservable larger codex which was in Gardiner's home (part of the Homilies). One might hope to get it for about the same price Schmidt had paid for a similar-sized manuscript. This was especially true since "Professor Schmidt's manuscript is better preserved than the one which is offered to Mr. Beatty," according to Ibscher's letter. This refers to the manuscript offered at £700 that Ibscher had ruled could not be conserved. However, Wooderson misunderstood Ibscher's comment to refer to the smaller and hence cheaper manuscript offered at £500: "Professor Schmidt's manuscript is better preserved than the one which is offered to Mr. Beatty . . . If he could not get it cheaper, he should pay the full price asked, i.e., £500."

This confusion is apparently responsible for the further inaccuracy in Wooderson's report:

> Prof. Schmidt thinks that it comes from Akhmim, and it contains poems about the first man. It is the upper part of the one Mr. Beatty has already got. It was cut in two and Nahman is selling it as two manuscripts. Mr. Chester Beatty has bought one-half and it is the other half which Dr. Gardiner has in his house and is telephoning about.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The grain of truth in this statement about two halves of a codex is that Nahman, or middlemen from whom he acquired the manuscripts, had broken in two the Psalms codex as well as the second codex (the Homilies, see below), no doubt to increase the profit. But Nahman intentionally or unintentionally offered Beatty part of each of two codices on March 23, 1930, and the other part of each of the same two codices in April 1931. The fact that the two offered in 1930 were from different books should have been clear from references to them as different sizes, but this detail seems here overlooked. At the time, one was in Berlin, the other in London, so that the difference in size was not immediately apparent.

The most reasonable assumption is that the manuscript in Gardiner's home is the one offered at £700, which Ibscher initially ruled was not conservable, and hence which he did not take to Berlin to conserve, and which, as a result, Beatty proposed not to buy, but which now Ibscher (and no doubt Gardiner, assuming the situation was clear to him) was recommending should be bought. Wooderson, misunderstanding the situation, would have inferred, based on his misunderstanding, that "the manuscript offered for £700 should be rejected." The whole point of Ibscher's letter (and Gardiner's phone conversation) was apparently just the reverse: to urge the purchase of the larger codex offered at £700, part of the Homilies, for whatever price it would take, but presumably about the amount Schmidt had paid for another manuscript of the same larger format, the Kephalaia, namely somewhat "over £400." This figure suggesting £500 may have in part led to the false identification of the manuscript in question with the one offered at £500.

On June 6, 1930, Corble cabled Beatty what was wrongly taken to be Ibscher's (and Gardiner's?) recommendation—that the smaller manuscript, the second part of the Psalms, be acquired "whatever the price."

> Doctor Gardiner hears from Ibscher that after further study he advises you purchase Coptic manuscript offered by Nahman five hundred pounds. Manuscript bought by Professor Schmidt better preserved but one offered by Nahman of greater importance and they think you should purchase it whatever the price. Schmidt thinks manuscript comes from Akhmim and contains poems about first man.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On June 9, 1930, Beatty cabled Corble ("have answered Nahman direct"), though the decision, much less the price offered, is not recorded, neither is the cable nor hence the price preserved (presumably "over £400"). Nahman cabled Beatty the same day: "Accept your offer for small manuscript many thanks if you are interested in large one will accept same price will be in London end June."

Nahman arrived in London July 9, 1930, and in the coming days settled his accounts with Beatty's staff. A sheet in Nahman's hand reads:

> Mr. Chester Beatty
>
> Two Coptic manuscripts on papyrus.
> Fayoumic language and two wood binding of a Coptic manuscript on approval in London £1200

An appended note reads, in another hand, "One purchased and paid for at £500-0-0." Other scrawled notes coordinating with other acquisitions of that time tend to indicate that Nahman submitted this document in July 1930, and hence that the acquisition of the smaller codex, the second part of the Psalms, was completed then. This would indicate that Beatty had not quibbled further about the price Nahman asked for the smaller codex, but had followed fully what was taken to be Ibscher's advice to "pay the full price asked, i.e., £500" (Ibscher had actually proposed negotiating down the price of the part of the Homilies for which Nahman had asked £700), and that Nahman had hence returned to his original asking price for the second, larger codex (£700), after having in fact come down to £500 in his cable to Beatty of June 9, 1930.

On July 16, 1930, Wooderson handed Nahman a letter from Beatty:

> I understand you wish to leave the damaged Coptic manuscript . . . with me so that I can study them further . . . If you decide to do this Miss Kingsford will give you a receipt for them and will hold them subject to your instructions.

A two-ring binder that seems to have served in the early years as a kind of accessions book at the Chester Beatty Library has a page dated "1930—July," that apparently refers to this manuscript and to one of the wooden covers:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Sent by Nahman, belonging to him.
Papyrus with 1 cover. Safe B.
(Ibscher 1930)
Given to Dr. Ibscher for Nahman.

A similar entry is on another page, completely marked through, apparently when its contents were transferred to another filing system:

—Coptic Ms. With 1 cover belonging to Nahman in Box. [Marked out: Study Safe B]
—2 Magical vellum fragments, 10 pages in each (Marked out: BM) belonging to Nahman. Both given to Dr. Ibscher for Nahman, May 10, 1932

The cryptic reference to giving the material to Ibscher for Nahman on May 10, 1932, can be explained by tracing the story from 1930 to 1932 as follows: At about the end of June 1930, Ibscher wrote Gardiner from Turin (a letter conserved only in an undated English translation):

> I hope you received my letter from Berlin, when I wrote to you about the Coptic manuscripts. Schmidt's hope to dispose of his book in Berlin or Germany has become rather doubtful, after the death of Harnack [June 10, 1930], on whose support he counted a lot. The Berlin Library intended to buy the book, and Harnack's decision would have been the determining factor. Has Mr. Chester Beatty bought both books?

On May 19, 1931, Ibscher wrote Beatty from Berlin (with the English translation made at that time):

The Berlin purchases are still in Egypt. Prof. Schmidt has brought with him only one very badly preserved volume which looked quite hopeless [part of the Kephalaia]. Nevertheless I have succeeded in saving some more or less complete pages. I therefore would still advise you to acquire the volume that is still at the British Museum. Certainly one should obtain more from this volume than from the indifferent purchase of Prof. Schmidt.	Die Berliner Ankäufe sind noch in Ägypten, nur einen sehr schlecht erhaltenen Band hat Prof. Schmidt mitgebracht, der hoffnungslos aussah [part of the Kephalaia]. Trotzdem ist es mir gelungen, auch daraus ziemlich vollständige Seiten zu gewinnen. Daher möchte ich doch raten, dass Sie den noch im British Museum befindlichen Band erwerben. Sicher muss daraus noch mehr zu holen sein, wie aus dem schlechten Ankauf von Prof. Schmidt.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Our Berlin volume which we already have here is 30 centimeters in height and 20 centimeters in width. As soon as the other purchases arrive I will let you know their dimensions.

I presume that the dealers have divided the individual books in order to obtain more money. Of course we shall only know the real position when we can compare all the volumes.

Meanwhile I have already been able to separate several pages of your papyri, but I must first arrange here the fibers and place pieces before I can put them under glass.

Unser Berliner Band, den wir bereits hier haben, ist 32 ctm. hoch and 20 ctm. breit. Sowie die übrigen Ankäufe eintreffen, teile ich Ihnen die Grösse mit.

Ich vermute, dass die Händler die einzelnen Bücher geteilt haben, um mehr Geld heraus zu schlagen. Genaues wird man darüber erst sagen können, wenn alle Bände beieinander sind.

In der Zwischenzeit habe ich bereits einige Blätter von Ihrem Papyrus wieder ablösen können, doch muss ich hier erst die Fasern in Ordnung bringen and Stücke ansetzen bevor ich sie verglasen kann.

"The volume which is still at the British Museum" must be the part of the Homilies offered at £700 that had been in the home of Gardiner.

On January 4, 1932, Sir Herbert Thompson wrote Beatty:

> I have a rather urgent letter from Dr. Carl Schmidt in Berlin, asking me to send him some news as to the Mani papyrus, which you had, I believe, on approval, as scholars are very anxious—and not in Germany only—to have some public statement as to these "mysterious" Manichaean manuscripts. But Dr. Schmidt, rightly I think, wishes to defer any such statements till the fate of this outstanding papyrus of the Mani find is settled—either by its passing into your collection—or finding an assured home, perhaps at Copenhagen, or else in Berlin. The important point is that it should be in hands where it would be accessible for study in association with those in your hands and those in the Berlin Museum.
>
> So I venture again to trouble you with a question as to whether it is still in your custody—and if so, may I be allowed to see it? and also whether you still have any thought of acquiring it, or not? If you do not, Dr. Schmidt tells me that Nahman has given him the first option of purchase; but he fears that if the matter is delayed much longer, Nahman may change his mind, and the opportunity of fixing it in safe hands may be lost.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On January 26, 1932, Wooderson replied on behalf of Beatty to the effect "that the Mani Papyrus is still the property of Mons. Nahman and is being held in safekeeping by Mr. Beatty at Baroda House." Thus, the manuscript must have been moved again, from the British Museum to Beatty's home.

On March 15, 1932, Nahman wrote in his wooden English to Beatty in Cairo concerning it:

> The present is to inform you that I have sold the Coptic manuscript I left towards you in London. When you honoured me of your kind visit you told me that you are not interested in this manuscript neither the magical parchemins [sic] Coptic and I expected two years and with my regret I missed you in London and to-day I think you will not be angry with me if I have found a buyer. Then I beg of you, Dear Sir, to be as so kind to hand to Mr. Ibscher the manuscript and the magical Coptic parchemin [sic].
>
> Will you be as so kind to send the answer of this letter to me that you agree to hand the manuscript and the magical parchemin [sic] to Mr. Ibscher when he will be in London. Your letter will allow to me to prove to my buyer that the matter is settled.

On March 19, 1932, Schmidt, also in Cairo, wrote on his calling card a note to Beatty regretting that he had to leave the next day for Luxor and hence would not be able to see Beatty in Cairo as he had hoped. At this time in Cairo, he would have liked to have completed the transaction with Nahman.

On March 21, 1932, Beatty replied to Nahman: "I will be pleased to deliver the same to Dr. Ibscher when he comes to London." A handwritten note at the bottom of the letter states: "Taken to Dr. Gardiner's—May 10."

In the initial essay presented by Carl Schmidt and H. J. Polotsky to the Berlin Academy of Sciences, published in 1933, P^{15999} is referred to as "the papyrus book very recently added to the corpus of Berlin Manichaica."[3] Such a designation tends to set this codex off from the others as the most recent acquisition. Wilhelm Schubart recorded in the Inventarbuch of the Papyrus-Sammlung: "Coptic Papyrus Codex. Acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt in Cairo 1932. Gift of Dr. W. Kohlhammer." The Inventarbuch had recorded for P^{15995}–P^{15998}:

3. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

"Acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt, in Cairo, 1931. Gift of Mr. August Pfeffer 1933." The disparity in time between the acquisition in 1931 and the gift of the purchase price in 1933 reflects the difficulties Schmidt had finding funding for his initial acquisitions, a procedure that seems to have been quite independent of the acquisition of P^{15999} in 1932 through Kohlhammer's gift. Thus, even though in the cases of P^{15995} through P^{15998} more than a single transaction in Egypt was involved (as many as seven transactions in the case of P^{15996}), the manuscripts shared a common date and a common donor that set them apart from P^{15999}. This would tend to indicate that it was P^{15999} that had been offered unsuccessfully to Beatty and was ultimately acquired by Schmidt for Berlin. The reference in the Inventarbuch to acquisition in Cairo is not contradicted by Ibscher's securing the manuscript in London and taking it directly to Berlin. For Schmidt and Nahman had completed their negotiation in Cairo in March 1932.

Schmidt knew that Ibscher planned to be in London in April 1932 (Ibscher had written to London already on February 19, 1932), and Schmidt would have proposed to Nahman that Ibscher deliver the manuscript to the new owner on Ibscher's return to Berlin. Ibscher's decidedly negative assessment of possibly conserving this manuscript for Beatty is the same as the assessment of the impossibility of conserving P^{15999} that prevailed when the manuscript was in Berlin.

At the time Beatty released his option and thus let Schmidt exercise his option, it was not known that the manuscript was part of the Homilies of which Beatty by then had acquired a second, smaller part (see below), which was being actively conserved in Berlin by Ibscher and edited for Beatty by Polotsky.

Of the initial acquisition of two manuscripts on approval of March 23, 1930, we may hence conclude that one seems to have been acquired in July 1930 (the latter part of the Psalms, Codex A), the other to have been turned down on March 21, 1932, so that Schmidt could buy it for Berlin (part of the Homilies, P^{15999}).

At some time, Beatty also acquired the rest of the Psalms, Codex A; the Synaxeis, Codex B; volume two of the Kephalaia, Codex C; and the smaller part of the Homilies, Codex D. Documentation available is inadequate to identify the actual acquisition of each of these, but some information is available.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

In a letter of November 27, 1930, from Beatty to Gardiner, a codex is to be entrusted to Ibscher to take to Berlin for conservation:

> I am sending you the tin box containing the [inserted by hand: Papyri] Coptic Book.
>
> I suggest, before Dr. Ibscher puts it into his bag, that he carefully looks at it to be sure it is satisfactorily packed.
>
> I hope this book will act in a more gentlemanly manner than the other, and respond to the treatment better.

On November 27, 1930, Ibscher also wrote Beatty a receipt for "the new treasures of your collection . . . handed over to me by Mr. Alan H. Gardiner," with the hope that he can complete the conservation of much of them before his expected return to London in March 1931.

This "new treasures" must refer to an otherwise undocumented acquisition after Ibscher's return to Berlin at the end of the spring of 1930, since at the end of May or the beginning of June Ibscher had already taken to Berlin the part of the Psalms codex acquired March 23, 1930, whereas the part of the Homilies acquired March 23, 1930, was kept on approval in London until Beatty decided on March 21, 1932, not to acquire it and turned it over to Ibscher for Schmidt on May 10, 1932.

On December 30, 1930, Beatty had £300 cabled to Nahman, no doubt the payment of a bill. A memo to Nahman while in London of July 16, 1930, confirmed a telephone conversation listing acquisitions ("the Greek Papyri and the bindings") with the stipulation that "the balance of £600 [be paid] on or before the 1st January, 1931." Thus the payment of £300 cannot be associated convincingly with a Manichaean purchase.

Another leaf in the two-ring binder that served as a kind of acquisitions notebook records:

> 1931. April. Cairo.
>
> —Manichaean Hymns (box: 15 1/4 x 10 1/4 in.)
>
> Ibscher.
>
> —Manichaean Ritual (box 14 5/8 x 9 1/2 in.)
>
> Laws Ibscher.
>
> —3 Wooden covers [Marked out: "Safe B." Added: "IX"]

The page with the marked-out entries reads similarly:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Brought by Mr. Beatty April 1931.
—Manichaean Ms. Hymns
[Added note: With Dr. Ibscher May 8/31] PSALMS. Codex A.
—Manichaean Ms. Ritual Laws
—3 Covers [Marked out: Safe B.] Cup X.c

A handwritten note on a large paper envelope in which three wooden boards are presently stored at the Chester Beatty Library states: "purchased Spring 1931." This confirms that the reference "Brought by Mr. Beatty April 1931" is the date of this acquisition.

What is underlined in addition to a characterization of the contents is no doubt the reference to where the material was currently deposited. The words "Safe B" are marked through, and "IX" added, no doubt when the covers were removed from the safe. The "Manichaean Hymns" are no doubt the other part of Codex A, the Psalms, completing the acquisition of this codex, of which only a part had been acquired in 1930. But the identification of the manuscript referred to with the terms Ritual and Laws is less clear, as is the identify of another possible acquisition late in 1930 suggested by the following:

On May 19, 1931, Ibscher wrote Beatty from Berlin:

> According to your wish I have photographed your papyri, and I am sending you proofs thereof.
>
> Should you wish to have more proofs, I will gladly have several more made.
>
> Besides these three books I have another thinner one which certainly belongs to the smaller book. Should you wish to have the photograph of that I will also have it done. I have already taken a few leaves from the books which are already under glass.

It is unclear what the reference to three books in Berlin belonging to Beatty envisages. If the "smaller" book means the Psalms, the only codex with smaller dimensions, then what is referred to as "another thinner one" that "belongs to" that codex would be the part of the Psalms acquired in April 1931. Then the "three books" would be the Psalms, part of which was taken to Berlin in May and June of 1930 and the rest after its acquisition April 1931; the unidentified codex taken to Berlin November 27, 1930; and the part of the Homilies acquired in April 31 and taken to Berlin shortly thereafter.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On June 11, 1931, Thompson met with Schmidt, and on June 15, 1931, wrote to Beatty:

> He [Schmidt] has been recently in Egypt, making inquiries about the find, and he is satisfied that the whole find was divided into 8 parts, between 3 dealers, of which I understand 5 are coming to Berlin, and he declared you had two Mss. and one on approval, viz. your Hymn book, now in Ibscher's hands and another (?). Is this so? and if so, would you let me see it—and also the papyrus on approval? I should very much like to get some idea of its (their?) size and contents, if possible.

On January 4, 1932, Thompson again wrote Beatty inquiring whether Beatty still had in his custody the manuscript on which he had an option, and, if so, whether Thompson could see it. Apparently, Beatty did not respond to this part of either letter. In the same way that Beatty's unresponsiveness to Thompson is unintelligible, Thompson's identification of Schmidt's material is unclear. The two manuscripts Thompson writes about could be the two parts of the Psalms, counted as one or as two, and the part of the Homilies acquired in April 1931, without reference to the unidentified codex taken to Berlin on December 27, 1930; or it could be counted, but the part of the Homilies not counted as a separate book.

Ibscher's translation of a report of February 19, 1932, concerning the state of his conservation gives evidence that by then, Beatty had acquired the three and a half codices that were ultimately to be his part of the Manichaean discovery, in addition to the part of a codex that he held but finally did not acquire:

> Now as regards your question, how many leaves are still [to] be expected. From my Report herewith (draft of proposed paper for the Berlin Academy) on the Mani-books, you will see how many leaves I have been able to reckon on in the Berlin Kephalaia-book (viz. 498 pages—c. 250 leaves), and I expect that all the volumes were of approximately the same size. If we assume that the Hymnbook [Codex A, the Psalms] was so, as would appear from its external appearance, there should result from it a further 150–200 leaves. The other two volumes [Codex B, the Synaxeis; Codex C, volume two of the Kephalaia], which Mr. Beatty has purchased, may contain as much. If therefore fortune favours me, I may hope to get 450–600 leaves from the entire property of Mr. Chester Beatty, of which about 100 are already separated. The Homilies [the > part of the codex that Ibscher had left in London in 1930 as not conservable] are not included in this calculation (?). It was a hopeless-looking mass which lay beside the Hymn-book. At first I did not think that anything could be done with it—and yet you see what important things have come out of it. I am proposing now first to finish up the 37 leaves which constitute it, as that will exhaust it. These leaves do not belong to any of the others here—nor I expect to the volume which is still in Mr. Beatty's possession [actually they do belong to the same codex: the Homilies]. Perhaps I shall be able to establish this point, when I come to London in April and we may perhaps be able to see the volume together. I shall certainly bring over a number of the completed Homily leaves. I think you will also agree that I had better finish up this portion of the collection first; and the next work will be to complete the Hymnbook, at the same time working on the two other books, from which it may be that more important results will come.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The comment that the Homilies "lay beside the Hymn-book" would tend to identify the second manuscript acquired in April 1931 ("Manichaean Ritual Laws") as the Homilies. This would mean that in March 1930 and in April 1931 Nahman offered Beatty parts of the same two codices—the Psalms and the Homilies. The reason for Beatty's not acquiring the part offered in 1930 was no doubt Ibscher's initial opinion that it could not be conserved, and Ibscher's failure to communicate his subsequent willingness to attempt it. This is much the same reaction as that reported concerning the part acquired in 1931: "a hopeless-looking mass . . . At first I did not think that anything could be done with it—and yet you see what important things have come out of it." This would hence be an added confirmation that one has to do in both cases with the same hopeless-looking codex. On March 21, 1932, Beatty released his option on the second manuscript of 1930; he no doubt did not yet realize that it completed a manuscript he had bought in 1931. For Ibscher was not yet aware of it on February 19, 1932, but hoped to investigate the question when in London in April that year. By this time Beatty had released his option, and Schmidt had closed his deal with Nahman.

Ibscher's reference to "the two other volumes, which Mr. Beatty has purchased," would seem to envisage complete codices, since they are assumed to be the same size as the Kephalaia, yielding some 150–200 leaves. They would then be Codex B, the Synaxeis, and Codex C, volume two of the Kephalaia. The details of their acquisition are not known, beyond the reference to one being taken by Ibscher to Berlin in the autumn of 1930.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

A document entitled "Notes of Conference Mr. A. C. B. had with Dr. Alan Gardiner on Sunday, 8th May, 1932" (in which, according to a letter of May 10, 1932, from Beatty to Thompson, Ibscher was also involved), confirms the identity of the manuscript not acquired by Beatty with the Berlin manuscript P^{15999}, in the context of an imprecise overview of all the holdings (no doubt a garbled version of Ibscher's view reported more accurately in his letter of February 19, 1932, quoted above):

> It seems that Berlin has four manuscripts; one is the epistles [P^{15998}], one seems to be about the life of Mani [P^{15997}], one seems to be of the principles of the Mani religion [P^{15996}]—this latter manuscript consists of two parts which were bought separately, and really represents one book of about 500 leaves [read: pages]. The other two are of about 200 leaves each. [P^{15995} involves only thirty-one leaves; there is no further Berlin codex, other than P^{15999} treated below. A handwritten note in the margin reads: "This makes five in all."]
>
> Schmidt has recently bought, I assume through Berlin, another manuscript [P^{15999}] from Nahman which was the one stored with Mr. A. B. C.
>
> The Manichean manuscripts owned by Mr. A. C. B. consist of four: one is in the form of homilies of about 200 pages; one seems to be an epistle of 200 pages; one is a book of travels and journeys of about 500 [above the figure is written by hand: 50] pages, and one which was in two parts of about 400 pages [added in hand: "? in the form of hymns;" hence Codex A, the Psalms].

Søren Giversen quoted the third paragraph above about Beatty's acquisitions and interpreted it as follows:

> The book of travels and journeys is apparently identical to the Homilies, later published by Polotsky, and in a letter of 12 May 1932 Alan H. Gardiner speaks of "the 50 leaves relating to the journeyings of Mani" which Polotsky was going to publish. In a formal letter of 13 May 1932 A. Chester Beatty writes: "I am to cede to Dr. Polotsky publication rights in the 50 leaves relating to the journeyings of Mani provided he produces his work within a reasonable time."[4]

4. Giverson, Manichaean Coptic Papyri, 2: ix.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

This identification of the third item as the Homilies is in part based upon accepting the correction of "500 pages" to read "50." A page of handwritten notes on which the formal typed report is apparently based does in fact use the figure 50. This figure and the reference to travels are clearly used in the later quotations to refer to Codex D, the Homilies, Polotsky's first publication. This would mean that the first item listed in the Notes of May 5 1932 as belonging to Beatty, though described as "in the form of homilies," is not Codex D, the Homilies. It and the second item ("an epistle") would have to be, one, Codex B, the Synaxeis; and the other, Codex C, volume two of the Kephalaia. For the fourth item "in two parts" would be, as the handwritten note ("? in the form of hymns") would indicate, Codex A, the Psalms. Thus, between March 23, 1930 (when one part of Codex A, the Psalms, was acquired), and February 19, 1932 (the date of Ibscher's report mailed from Berlin), Beatty must have acquired four additional items: a second part of Codex A and Codices B–D. If the second part of Codex A and Codex D were acquired in April 1931, the details of the acquisition of Codices B and C remain unknown.

Rolf Ibscher has indicated that the nomenclature of Beatty's codices as A, B, and C was used by Hugo Ibscher, but that the designation of the Homilies with a letter D was first introduced by himself.

> Hence, up until 1938, of Sir Chester Beatty's part of the discovery, fully conserved were only the pack of the Psalms and the incomplete Homilies that lay beside it at the acquisition of the discovery, which also as the first publication could be presented by Polotsky to an expectant public.
>
> Of the three codices, which my father had designated A, B, C as working titles (whereby the independent Homilies should actually have been designated D), A, B, and C were only partially restored.[5]

This is a further reflection of the sense in which the minor part of the Homilies codex that Beatty actually purchased, though it was the first thing that Hugo Ibscher completely conserved and that Polotsky published, was not fully recognized as an entity in its own right but was associated with the Psalms, in light of the fact that the Psalms and the Homilies had been acquired together.

5. Ibscher, "Mani und kein Ende," 220.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:38 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 3 —

The Conservation by Hugo Ibscher

The original essay of Schmidt and Polotsky had been accompanied by a report from Hugo Ibscher, who had been entrusted with the conservation of the codices. Here he described their physical condition as follows:[1]

When the Mani manuscripts reached the Berlin Museum through the good offices of Prof. Schmidt, they were described by a few gentlemen as much-used foot mats, and by others as balls of peat. This is the best way to describe the state of preservation of these precious treasures. Surely every observer stood before these so-called books in doubt as to whether anything could ever be gotten out of them . . .

The bad state of preservation does not come from the age of the manuscripts, but must be attributed to the place of discovery, which, according to the information of Prof. Schmidt given above, is to be sought in a Coptic settlement not far from the south end of the Moris sea. Much older papyrus

Als die Mani-Handschriften durch Hrn. Prof. Schmidt in das Berliner Museum gelangten, wurden sie von einigen Herrn als vielbenutzte Fussmatten und von andern als Ballen Torf angesprochen. Hiermit ist die Erhaltung dieser kostbaren Schätze am besten gekennzeichnet. Zweifelnd stand wohl ein jeder Beschauer vor diesen sogenannten Büchern, ob sich jemals daraus etwas würde gewinnen lassen . . .

Der schlechte Erhaltungszustand liegt nicht am Alter der Handschriften, sondern muss auf den Fundort zurückzuführen sein, der nach den obigen Mitteilungen von Prof. Schmidt in einer koptischen Niederlassung unweit des Südendes des Mörissees zu suchen ist. Weit ältere Papyrusfunde, wie

1. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschriften," 81–82.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

finds, such as, e.g., the large Bible discovery that I have worked on in the most recent past, and many others, even if they have fallen into numberless fragments, are much firmer in their structure and can readily be handled with a little caution. In the case of the Mani manuscripts, water must have exerted its destructive effect, for all the volumes have after all been brought rather near to disintegration by the effect of the dampness. Only a few decades would have sufficed to make of the extant treasures a pile of humus, if the fortunate though unknown finder had not preserved them from that fate. The greatest danger for the manuscripts lies in this, that they are shot through and through with salt crystals, which penetrated through the effect of the water. Unfortunately the disintegration has advanced so far, however, that one may not apply any kind of dampness, through which the salt could have been removed, if one does not wish to endanger the manuscripts. Yet with the prerequisite knowledge, patience and skill one will succeed in saving even this treasure for science, as the successes attained thus far show quite adequately.

z.B. der von mir in letzter Zeit bearbeitete grosse Bibelfund und viele andere, sind, wenn auch in unzählige Fragmente zerfallen, in der Struktur viel fester und lassen sich bei einiger Vorsicht leicht hantieren. Bei den Mani-Handschriften muss das Wasser seine zerstörende Wirkung ausgeübt haben, sind doch alle Bände durch die Einwirkung der Feuchtigkeit dem Zerfall recht nahe gebracht. Nur wenige Jahrzehnte hätten genügt, um aus den vorhandenen Schätzen einen Haufen Humuserde zu machen, wenn nicht der glückliche, unbekannte Finder sie davor bewahrt hätte. Die grösste Gefahr für die Handschriften liegt darin, dass dieselben vollständig von Salzkristallen, die durch die Einwirkung des Wassers hineingedrungen sind, durchsetzt sind. Leider ist der Zerfall aber schon so weit vorgeschritten, dass man keinerlei Feuchtigkeit anwenden darf, wodurch das Salz entzogen werden könnte, will man nicht die Handschriften gefährden. Mit der nötigen Sachkenntnis, Geduld und Geschicklichkeit wird es aber gelingen, auch diesen Schatz für die Wissenschaft zu retten, wie die bisher erzielten Erfolge zur Genüge beweisen.

In 1964–1965 Rolf Ibscher summarized in retrospect the conservation activity of his father, Hugo Ibscher, as follows:[2]

2. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 50–51.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 51] [The Dublin] Homilies and Psalmbook and the Berlin Kephalaia—that was the sequence to which he [Hugo Ibscher] adhered. The other codices were worked on from time to time, to make it possible for Carl Schmidt to dip into them and thus to provide an overview for him and for himself . . .

[p. 50] Actually already in 1937 my father had . . . stopped exerting his over-taxed strength regularly on them.

[p. 51] [The Dublin] Homilien, Psalmbuch und Berliner Kephalaia—das war die Reihenfolge, bei der er [Hugo Ibscher] blieb. Die anderen Codices wurden zwischendurch ankonserviert, um Carl Schmidt ein Anlesen zu ermöglichen und damit einen Überblick ihm und sich zu verschaffen . . .

[p. 50] Mein Vater hatte eigentlich . . . schon 1937 aufgehört, regelmässig seine überforderte Kraft daran zu setzen . . .

In 1965 Rolf Ibscher reported on his father's conservation as follows:[3]

The making accessible of the papyrus material that at first was put in motion with so much effort, since it was rotted, made into peat, with the leaves completely bonded together because of salt crystals that had soaked in, of which Hans Heinrich Schaeder wrote: "Ibscher is performing true miracles of meditation and concentration when confronted with the material," came after about seven years in 1938 [the year Schmidt died] to what amounted to a standstill, since this work overexerted excessively the eyes and the nerves.

A letter of my father to Sir Chester Beatty of 1938 expressed that clearly: "The tension is too great. I must for a while interpose smaller tasks in between that provide a great deal of variety. One cannot make marathon runs constantly without paying the price."

Die anfänglich mühsam in Gang kommende Aufschliessung des verrotteten, vertorften, durch eingeschwemmte Salzkristalle die Blätter miteinander vollig verfilzenden Papyrusmaterials, von der Hans Heinrich Schaeder schrieb: "Ibscher vollbringt wahre Wunder der Andacht und Konzentration vor dem Material," kam nach rund sieben Jahren 1938 [the year Schmidt died] so gut wie zum Stillstand, da diese Arbeit masslos die Augen und die Nerven überbeansprucht.

Ein Brief meines Vaters an Sir Chester Beatty 1938 drückt das klar aus: "Die Anspannung ist zu gross. Ich muss einmal eine Zeitlang [p. 220] abwechslungsreiche kleinere Arbeiten da zwischen schieben. Man kann nicht ungestraft dauernd Marathonläufe machen."

3. Rolf Ibscher, "Mani und kein Ende," 219–20.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Hence, up until 1938, of Sir Chester Beatty's part of the discovery, fully conserved were only the ball of the Psalms and the incomplete Homilies that lay beside it at the acquisition of the discovery, which also as the first publication could be presented by Polotsky to an expectant public.

Of the three codices, which my father had designated A, B, C as working titles (whereby the independent Homilies should actually have been designated D), A, B, and C were only partially restored.

Of the four Berlin codices, only the codex of the Kephalaia was being worked on, and was edited by Polotsky and from 1934 on by Böhlig.

So war bis 1938 denn restlos vom Fundanteil Sir Chester Beattys nur das Konvolut des Psalmenbuchs und das diesem beim Erwerben des Fundes beiliegende unvollständige Homilienbuch, das auch als erste Edition durch Polotsky einer erwartungsvollen Mitwelt präsentiert werden konnte, restauriert worden.

Von den drei Codices, die mein Vater mit A, B, C als Arbeitstitel signierte, wobei die selbstständigen Homilien eigentlich mit D hätten bezeichnet werden müssen, waren A, B, C nur partienhaft restauriert worden.

Von den vier Berliner Codices war nur der Codex der Kephalaia in Arbeit und wurde von Polotsky und ab 1934 von Böhlig ediert.

In 1954 Rolf Ibscher had described the teamwork as follows:[4]

Dr. Polotsky functioned as coworker and the actual first editor both for parts of the London as well as for the Berlin manuscripts and, following him from 1934 on, when the awful political conditions in Germany forced a change, the young Charles Allberry for London and Dr. Böhlig for Berlin. From 1939 on, the continuation of the work for London stood still, and for Berlin too both the conservation [p. 3] and the editorial work came to a standstill in the

Als Mitarbeiter und eigentlicher Erstherausgeber sowohl für Teile der Londoner als auch Berliner Handschriften fungierte Dr. Polotsky und in seiner Nachfolge ab 1934, als die unseligen politischen Verhältnisse in Deutschland zu einer Änderung zwangen, für London der junge Charles Allberry und für Berlin Dr. Böhlig. Ab 1939 ruhte die Weiterarbeit für London, und auch für Berlin kam im Laufe des Jahres 1940 sowohl die konserva-

4. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 2–3. This unpublished lecture was presented at the twenty-third International Congress of Orientalists on August 23, 1954. The Chester Beatty Library supplied a typescript of this lecture to the Manichaean archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity. The work is cited according to the typescript except where otherwise indicated. See also Proceedings of the Twenty-Third, 359–60.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

course of the year 1940. My father no longer found inner repose for the minute detailed work on the Mani manuscripts.

torische [p. 3] als auch die editorische Arbeit zum Erliegen. Mein Vater fand keine innere Ruhe mehr für die minutiöse Feinarbeit an den Mani-Handschriften.

In 1955 Rolf Ibscher described as follows the way the project had finally ground to a halt:[5]

During the war this minutely detailed work, which could only be carried out in an atmosphere of the greatest repose, under secure conditions and with an absolute freedom from nervous strain, by the very nature of the case ultimately came to a complete halt. Also the scholarly work, handled at the end by Böhlig alone after the death of Schmidt in 1938, came to a standstill. The death of my father on May 26, 1943, marked a temporary end to all further conservation of the material.

Im Kriege kam diese minutiöse Feinstarbeit, die nur in einer Atmosphäre grösster Ruhe, gesicherter Verhältnisse und bei absoluter nervlicher Nichtbelastung geleistet werden kann, naturgemäss schliesslich zum völligen Erliegen. Auch die wissenschaftliche Erschliessung, zuletzt nach dem Tode von Schmidt 1938 von Böhlig allein bewältigt, kam zum Stilistand. Der Tod meines Vaters am 26. Mai 1943 setzte einen vorläufigen Schlussstrich unter jegliche weitere konservatorische Aufbereitung des Materials.

Rolf Ibscher itemized in 1954 what his father had conserved:[6]

For about 9 years my father had occupied himself almost without interruption with separating the leaves from the book blocks and impregnating and glassing the rescued material. His annual trips out of the country had become his recreation from this work that exhausted eyes and nerves.

Rund 9 Jahre hatte mein Vater fast ununterbrochen sich mit der Ablösung der Blätter von den Buchblöcken und der Imprägnierung des geretteten Materials und mit seiner Verglasung beschäftigt. Erholung von dieser die Augen und Nerven strapazierenden Arbeit

5. Rolf Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 2. This is an unpublished lecture presented at the Eighth International Papyrologists Congress in Vienna in 1955; Carsten Colpe supplied a typescript of this lecture to the Manichaean archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity.

6. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 5–6.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

According to his last estimation my father hoped at the beginning of the war to be able to end the work in nine more years. But it was to come otherwise. Then what was the status of the whole undertaking when the fateful year 1945 created also for this discovery a completely new kind of situation. What was extant conserved, how much was edited, and what ended up behind a thick question mark?

I begin with the Berlin part of the discovery:

Since 1941 10 fascicles of the important Kephalaia manuscript were in print, i.e., 125 leaves or 250 pages of text. In addition 25 leaves or 50 pages were in manuscript form with Kohlhammer in Stuttgart.

There may have been 100 more leaves or 200 pages of text already glassed, but not yet read.

Except for a remainder of some 20 leaves, this manuscript in the original has not, or not yet, returned to German possession. Neither I nor anyone else can say more about it.

The remainder of the manuscript, designated by my father as no longer conservable, was conserved in 1951 in connection with my first stay in London.

The second important Berlin manuscript is the collection of Mani's Letters. It was taken by me in 1944 to Bavaria together with the British manuscripts, where it still is, and in the meantime is being worked on there.

waren ihm dabei seine jährlichen Auslandsreisen geworden. Nach seiner letzten Schätzung hoffte mein Vater zu Beginn des Krieges, das Werk in weiteren 9 Jahren beenden zu können. Aber es sollte anders kommen. Wie war nun der Stand des ganzen Unternehmens, als das schicksalsschwere Jahr 1945 auch für diesen Fund eine völlig neuartige Lage schuf. Was lag konserviert vor, wieviel war ediert und was endete hinter einem dicken Fragezeichen? —

Ich beginne mit dem Berliner Fundanteil:

Seit 1941 lagen 10 Lieferungen der wichtigen Kephalaia-Handschrift gedruckt vor, d.h. 125 Blatt oder 250 Seiten Text. Dazu kamen 25 Blatt oder 50 Seiten im Manuskript bei Kohlhammer in Stuttgart liegend.

Verglast schon, aber noch ungelesen mögen weitere 100 Blatt oder 200 Seiten Text vorgelegen haben.

Bis auf einen Rest von einigen 20 Blatt ist diese Handschrift im Original jetzt nicht mehr oder noch nicht wieder in deutschen Besitz zurückgekehrt. Mehr kann weder ich noch irgend jemand anderes darüber aussagen.

Der Rest der Handschrift, von meinem Vater als nicht weiter konservierbar bezeichnet, wurde 1951 im Anschluss an meinen ersten Londonaufenthalt konserviert.

Die zweite wichtige Berliner Handschrift ist die Briefsammlung Manis. Sie wurde zusammen mit den Britischen Handschriften von mir 1944 nach Bayern gebracht, wo sie noch liegt und inzwischen dort bearbeitet wird.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[Six] leaves of this collection of Letters separated by my father as well as 41 [31] leaves of another manuscript [P15995] still conserved by my father and two complete book units thus far unconserved [P15997 and P15998] have also not yet returned into German possession. That means ca. 500 leaves yet to be conserved or about 1,000 pages of text . . .

[p. 6] The Chester Beatty part of the discovery was in the fortunate situation of having survived the war and its consequences complete and intact.

The book of Homilies is edited and conserved. It appeared in 1934 after four years of work, as the first publication of the discovery. It was followed in the autumn by the first fascicle of the Berlin Kephalaia manuscript. Hence 20 years have passed since it began to appear. The text of the Homilies embraces 48 leaves or 96 pages of text. Further, the second part of the Psalms was edited by Charles Allberry. In 1938 it appeared with 117 leaves or 234 pages of text. The first part is on hand with 53 leaves conserved, i.e., 106 pages of text. It too was edited by Allberry, but up to the present the manuscript has not yet been printed. To this one must add 47 leaves or 94 pages of text of Codex C of the Chester Beatty manuscripts, which alongside of another text is a continuation of the Berlin Kephalaia.

[Sechs] von meinem Vater abgelöste Blätter dieser Briefkollektion sowie 41 [31] Blätter einer anderen Handschrift [P15995], von meinem Vater noch konserviert und zwei vollständige bisher unkonservierte Bucheinheiten [P15997 and P15998] sind ebenfalls noch nicht in deutschen Besitz zurückgekehrt. Das bedeutet ca. 500 noch zu konservierende Blätter oder rund 1000 Seiten Text . . .

[p. 6] Der Chester Beatty-Fundanteil ist in der glücklichen Lage gewesen, den Krieg und seine Folgeerscheinungen komplett und heil überstanden zu haben.

Konserviert und ediert ist das Homilienbuch. Es erschien im Jahre 1934 nach vierjähriger Arbeit als erste Veröffentlichung des Fundes. Ihm folgte im Herbst die erste Lieferung der Berliner Kephalaiahandschrift. [Zwanzig] Jahre sind also mithin seit diesem Ersterscheinen vergangen. Der Homilientext umfasst 48 Blatt oder 96 Seiten Text. Ferner wurde der zweite Teil des Psalmenbuches ediert durch Charles Allberry, im Jahre 1938 erscheinend mit 117 Blatt oder 234 Seiten Text. Der erste Teil liegt mit 53 Blatt konserviert vor, d.h. also 106 Seiten Text. Er wurde ebenfalls von Allberry ediert, aber bisher wurde das Manuskript noch nicht gedruckt. Dazu kommen 47 Blatt oder 94 Seiten Text des Codex C der Chester Beatty Handschriften, der neben einem anderen Text eine Fortsetzung der Berliner Kephalaia ist.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

A typescript containing a summary of this speech presents somewhat different figures:

The discovery as conserved and edited up until 1951:

A) Sir Chester Beatty

1. Homilies, 48 leaves or 96 pages of text
2. Psalms, Part 2, 117 leaves or 234 pages of text
3. Psalms, Part 1, 53 leaves or 106 pages of text by Charles Allberry, extant only as a manuscript
4. Codex C, 47 leaves or 94 pages of text, thus far unpublished.

B) Berlin part of the discovery

1. Kephalaia, 10 fascicles published

Ca. 100 further leaves were conserved, of which only 25 leaves have been read by Böhlig, extant as a manuscript with Kohlhammer. The remainder has not been read . . .

Not yet returned, up to the present, are two unconserved manuscripts. According to the Berlin catalogue of accessions of what was then the Papyrus Collection, it is a matter of the numbers: 15995 and 15999 [read: P^{15997} and P^{15998}]. Both books may produce ca. 500 leaves or 1,000 pages of text. Furthermore not yet returned are Codex No. 15996 Kephalaia as well as 31 leaves of Codex No. 15997 [read: P^{15995}] and 6 leaves of Codex 15998, which is identical with the codex that is in Bavaria.

Bis 1951 konservierter und edierter Fund:

A) Sir Chester Beatty

1. Homilien 48 Blätter oder 96 Seiten Text
2. Psalmbook Part II 117 Blätter oder 234 Seiten Text
3. Psalmbook Part I 53 Blätter oder 106 Seiten Text durch Charles Allberry nur als Manuskript vorliegend
4. Codex C 47 Blätter oder 94 Seiten Text unpubliziert bisher

B) Berliner Fundanteil

1. Kephalaia 10 Lieferungen publiziert

Konserviert wurden ca. 100 Blätter mehr, davon nur 25 Blätter durch Böhlig gelesen, als Manuskript bei Kohlhammer liegend. Der Rest ungelesen . . .

Bisher noch nicht zurückgekehrt sind zwei unkonservierte Handschriften, nach dem Berliner Standkatalog der früheren Papyrussammlung handelt es sich um die Nummern: 15995 und 15999 [read: P^{15997} and P^{15998}]. Beide Bücher dürften ca. 500 Blätter oder 1,000 Seiten Text ergeben. Ferner sind noch nicht zurückgekehrt Codex Nr. 15996 Kephalaia sowie 31 Blätter von Codex Nr. 15997 [read: P^{15995}] und 6 Blätter des Codex 15998 der identisch ist mit dem in Bayern befindlichen Codex.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The full text and the summary present both garbled and conflicting information about the conservation carried out by Hugo Ibscher:

P15995: THE SYNAXEIS

The full text lists 41 leaves from an unidentified codex, which is presumably an inaccurate reference to the thirty-one leaves of this codex Hugo Ibscher conserved. The summary lists the figure correctly as 31, but identifies these leaves inaccurately as belonging to P15997, the Acts. The rest of the Synaxeis codex was in Schondorf being conserved by Rolf Ibscher. However, he did not seem to know this but maintained inaccurately he was conserving P. 15998, the Letters.

P15996: THE KEPHALAIA

The full text lists 125 leaves published, twenty-five edited for publication, and a hundred conserved but not edited, for a total of 250 leaves or 500 pages The summary includes the 25 edited for publication within the 100, thus making a total of 225 leaves or 450 pages. A statistical table appended to the summary lists for the Berlin part "ca. 230 Blätter oder 460 Seiten," ["ca. 230 leaves or 460 pages"]. The following line reads, "Kephalaia," which may mean that these figures refer only to that codex. Perhaps only Kephalaia leaves are listed because the summary was designated "conserved and edited" material. For even though the statistical table lists its contents as what was "conserved," it probably is intended to be limited to what is conserved and edited. But even if the figure is intended to refer only to the Kephalaia, there is still a discrepancy between the three statements: 250, 225, or ca. 230 leaves. In addition, the full text listed "some 20 leaves" as still accessible in Berlin, and the summary listed as conserved by Rolf Ibscher: "Rest der Kephalaia ca. 25 Blätter oder ca. 50 Seiten Text" ["remainder of the Kephalaia ca. 25 leaves or ca. 50 pages of text"]. Both references, in spite of the discrepancy, are presumably to the same material (see below). Thus, the total number of the leaves of the Kephalaia that had been conserved could be variously calculated as 270, 275, 245, 250, or 255. In this data no distinction is made between the number of leaves originally in the codex, the number conserved, and the number extant.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

P^{15997}: THE ACTS

The full text refers to "two complete, thus far unconserved, book units" as not yet returned, one of which must, by a process of elimination, have been this codex. In the summary it is inaccurately ascribed the number P^{15995} (just as, conversely, the 31 leaves of P^{15995} are inaccurately given the number P. 15997). Since Hugo Ibscher had conserved at least eight leaves not mentioned by Rolf Ibscher, it was inaccurate to refer to this text simply as "thus far unconserved."

P^{15998}: THE LETTERS

The full text and the summary list six leaves conserved by Hugo Ibscher. Both inaccurately identify the codex in Schondorf as the rest of P^{15998}, since in reality it was the rest of the Synaxeis codex. Some 22 leaves of P^{15998}, reported subsequently to have been in the Ibscher home throughout the war and immediate postwar period, are not mentioned (see below).

P^{15999}: THE HOMILIES (BERLIN PART)

The full text apparently includes this codex among the "two complete books thus far unconserved," "ca. 500 leaves or 1,000 pages of text" that have not yet been returned. The summary stated that the two complete codices that had not yet been returned contained a total of "ca. 500 leaves or 1,000 pages of text." This reflects the standard estimate (based on the Kephalaia) of codices of about 250 leaves each. But the Berlin part of this codex was not a complete codex, but was part of the same codex as the Homilies text of Sir Chester Beatty, which consisted of forty-eight leaves. Hence, the Berlin part should have involved about 200 leaves.

It is clear that this list of what Hugo Ibscher had conserved is seriously imprecise and self-contradictory. It is obviously not based on well-organized records prepared during the conservation procedure. Nor is it based on a new inventory of the conserved leaves themselves, which had been taken to Leningrad after the war and had not yet been returned (see below). The list could have been based on published information and the Inventarbuch (inventory book) of the papyrus collection, to which it actually refers. But so many of its errors would have been corrected by a careful study of such materials that one must assume that the list was based on such records only in a superficial way or on memory or on word of mouth. The list reads more as if it were heavily based on memory or oral tradition, whatever Rolf Ibscher could hurriedly put together, given the death or departure of the principals in the story. Alexander Böhlig, the only scholar still connecting the prewar and postwar periods, apparently did not have much clearer information than Rolf Ibscher. Thus, the postwar academic community began with fragmentary, very inexact, and often quite misleading information about each codex in the Berlin collection. It may be just as well that Rolf Ibscher's first public report was not published.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The amount of material that Hugo Ibscher conserved in the Berlin holdings cannot as a consequence be stated with precision, but can only be estimated as around 300 leaves, if one includes half-conserved material.

With regard to the London material, the situation may be less confused. For Rolf Ibscher's report is based on his having actually seen the material in London, none of which was lost. Thus the listed total of 265 leaves conserved by Hugo Ibscher may be accurate.

Such numbers would suggest that Hugo Ibscher succeeded in separating a total of about 565 leaves. This was no doubt a remarkable achievement, given the condition of the codices when entrusted to him, the degree of legibility of much of what he separated, and the fragile nature of his health at the time. His lifetime of conservation work meant that he represented the state of the art in the 1930s, which is one of the few fortunate dimensions of an otherwise misfortune-ridden story.

Alexander Böhlig has reported on the administrative dimensions of the original project:[7]

In Germany the Berlin Academy of Sciences took over the task. As long as Carl Schmidt was an	In Deutschland nahm sich die Berliner Akademie der Wissenschaften der Aufgabe an.

7. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 180ff. See also WZUH 10 (1961) 157–61; and Actes du XXVe Congrés International des Orientalistes, Moscou 9–16 août 1960, 1 (1962) 535–41. A typescript of the address of 1960 is in the Chester Beatty archives. The form published in Mysterion und Wahrheit has been copyedited but not substantively altered. Quotations are from Mysterion und Wahrheit.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

official of the Kommission für spätantike Religionsgeschichte, the enterprise belonged to that area. After his departure, it was transferred to an enterprise under his leadership in the Orientalische Kommission. Meanwhile Hugo Ibscher had separated and put under glass rather large numbers of leaves, so that it was quite appropriate, after Polotsky had been called as full professor to Jerusalem, for each of the owners to engage one's own worker. For the Chester Beatty manuscripts C. R. C. Allberry was engaged, whose death in the war I would like also here bitterly to lament. The Berlin Academy commissioned me, and I am very happy that I had been introduced into this work and its problems back then by Polotsky himself. After Carl Schmidt's death in 1938 I took over the work on my own responsibility. Up to the war there were a total of 574 pages that were presented in print. W. Kohlhammer of Stuttgart, who had new Coptic letters cut just for this purpose based upon the hand of the Kephalaia, took over the printing and publishing.

Solange Carl Schmidt Beamter der Kommission für spätantike Religionsgeschichte war, gehörte das Unternehmen zu deren Bereich, um nach seinem Ausscheiden als ein unter seiner Leitung stehendes Unternehmen in die Orientalische Kommission überführt zu werden. Inzwischen hatte Hugo Ibscher grössere Mengen von Blättern abgelöst und unter Glas gebracht, so dass es durchaus angemessen war, nach der Berufung von Polotsky als Ordinarius nach Jerusalem für jeden der Besitzteile einen eigenen Bearbeiter zu bestellen. Für die Chester-Beatty-Handschriften wurde C. R. C. Allberry bestellt, dessen Tod im Kriege ich auch an dieser Stelle aufs tiefste beklagen möchte. Die Akademie Berlin beauftragte mich, und ich bin sehr froh, damals von Polotsky selbst in diese Arbeit und ihre Probleme eingeführt worden zu sein. Nach Carl Schmidts Tode im Jahre 1938 übernahm ich die Arbeit in eigener Verantwortung. Bis zum Kriege wurden von allen Beteiligten insgesamt 574 Seiten im Druck vorgelegt. Den Druck und Verlag hatte W. Kohlhammer, Stuttgart, übernommen, der eigens nach dem Schrifttyp der Kephalaia neue koptische Lettern schneiden liess.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 4 —

Beatty, Ibscher, and Polotsky

On May 7, 1931, Sir Alan H. Gardiner wrote to Paul Schubart:

> As you know, Coptic is not my immediate branch of study, but it appears that both Mr. Chester Beatty and Dr. [Hugo] Ibscher wish me to take a hand in negotiating the arrangements for the publication of the Manichaean books belonging to the former. Both Dr. [W. E.] Crum and Sir Herbert Thompson have been here and have discussed the matter fully with Ibscher and myself and this letter is intended to set forth Mr. Chester Beatty's wishes after hearing the results of our consultations. Crum's interest is confined to the lexicographic aspects of the books, which he wishes to utilize for his dictionary. Sir Herbert Thompson is too busy to devote any large part of his time to this work, but since Mr. Chester Beatty naturally desires an English editor for his publication, Thompson has declared himself ready to accept such an editorship, provided that the preliminary copying and translation are performed by someone else.
>
> Everything points to the employment of Herr [H. J.] Polotsky for the purpose as an almost ideal solution, the more so if he is engaged, under Professor [Carl] Schmidt's direction, to copy the corresponding Berlin books. Mr. Chester Beatty would be ready to remunerate Herr Polotsky at the same rate of payment as is arranged for Polotsky in connection with the Berlin books, and would be most grateful if you would administer the requisite sum of money for the purpose. He would send you through me a preliminary sum of £50 for the beginning of the payments, but asks that when this sum is approaching its end he should receive (through me) an exact account of the work done and the payments made.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> Mr. Chester Beatty will be most glad to grant Professor Schmidt the right to study and utilize in a general way the books belonging to him, if Professor Schmidt is prepared to give to his English colleagues the same rights with regard to the Berlin books. As I have already said, Crum wishes merely to use the texts for his Dictionary, but it would be useful for Thompson to have copies of the Berlin books to utilize alongside the Chester Beatty books. If I might make a suggestion of my own, would it not be well for Polotsky to make these copies in copying ink, so that separate copies could be kept by Schmidt, Polotsky, Crum and Thompson? The existence of separate copies in the hands of each of the scholars interested would, I think, be of great value. A point on which Mr. Chester Beatty lays great stress is that he would like his books, after they have been unrolled by Ibscher, to be kept in the Papyrusabteilung of the Neues Museum and to be accessible for study by Professor Schmidt and Herr Polotsky only there. Mr. Chester Beatty would be most grateful if you would consent to take this matter up with the Director of the Museum and to obtain the latter's consent and authorization.
>
> I think that the most practical procedure would be if the copies for Crum and Thompson, as well as the accounts for Mr. Chester Beatty, could be sent to me from time to time. I would act as a sort of London agent, and distribute what is sent to the persons concerned.
>
> It is a wonderful discovery and also a wonderful opportunity for friendly and sensible international co-operation. That is one of the reasons, as you can imagine, why I personally am so much interested in it.

On June 6, 1931, Sir Herbert Thompson wrote to Miss Kingsford of Beatty's staff:

> I venture to trouble you with a question or two, as I know Mr. Beatty is an extremely busy man, and you can probably judge best when and how he can be approached on the side of his MSS. I dare say you have heard from Dr. A. H. Gardiner, that, owing to the impossibility of my friend, W. E. Crum, undertaking the supervision of the treatment of Mr. Beatty's new Coptic papyri, it has fallen to me—subject to Mr. Beatty's approval —to consider the questions of his relation to Berlin. Of course you know that these papyri relate to the Manichaean religion, and that part of the same find has gone to Berlin. Prof. Carl Schmidt (of Berlin University) is coming over here "early in June" to consider questions of joint dealing with this material.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

My proposed attitude is somewhat as follows:—

1. Mutual communication of the material on both sides.

2. Working out of the material by a single editor, if possible—Polotsky being proposed—under supervision of C. Schmidt and myself.

   These two conditions are almost essential. It may be found that parts of the same MS are divided between the two collections. This cannot be settled till the whole mass has been taken to pieces and mounted under glass.

3. The question of publication. I feel that this is a subject which in the present state of affairs may, and should be, postponed. There is no hurry about it and I think it very desirable that Mr. Beatty should not be committed hastily to any scheme. I should not (nor, I fancy, would he) wish to see his MS appear as an appendix to a German publication. Such a publication would have to be a Government publication, and would almost necessarily be a slow—(also, entre nous, Prof. C. Schmidt has the reputation of being a very slow hand at producing things). At present, judging from the photographs I have seen of both Mr. Beatty's papyri and the German ones, they are distinct volumes, and there is no reason why the former should not be issued in a separate form. Of course if Polotsky is the sole editor of the texts, he would have to be allowed to take his own course in running the two sets of papyri side by side. But that is no reason why they should be one publication and I suggest that in any case, in the present state of affairs, no definite arrangement as to publication should be entered into.

I shall be very glad to hear how far these views have Mr. Beatty's approvation—and what he may have further to suggest. I may add that a joint publication would give rise to rather difficult questions on the financial side—besides details of printing, illustrations, etc.

On June 15, 1931, Thompson wrote Beatty following the meeting with Schmidt on June 11, 1931:

I met Dr. Carl Schmidt last Thursday, and had satisfactory discussions of the Mani-papyri question. I found him quite ready to take up a reasonable attitude. He quite agreed there is no need to consider any question of publication at present; and that, except as to any MS. that may be found to be divided > between your collection and Berlin, you would of course be free to publish in England and in any form you wished, and he did not press for any form of joint publication. As to any joint MS, that can be dealt with when the time arrives.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> As far as possible, he agrees to Dr. Polotsky working alternate weeks for Berlin and yourself respectively—in detail, it would have to depend somewhat on the material supplied by Ibscher. He does not foresee any difficulty except as to the latter being able to keep his part of the work going at a sufficient rate, as it is difficult work and trying to his eyes—and also he can only work on your papyri out of his official hours. But the initial work on each papyrus is the most difficulty, and once the outer or more fragmentary portion is removed, the faster it proceeds . . .
>
> He quite agreed about mutual interchange of material and nothing to be published on either side without consent, and I pressed him to keep the whole matter as quiet as possible. He told me he was being urged already to make a brief communication to the Berlin Academy, but I told him he must postpone it for the present till the material is separated and sifted. He has been recently in Egypt, making inquiries about the find, and he is satisfied that the whole find was divided into 8 parts, between 3 dealers, of which I understand 5 are coming to Berlin, and he declared you had two MSS. and one on approval, viz. your Hymn book, now in Ibscher's hands and another (?). Is this so? and if so, would you let me see it—and also the papyrus on approval? I should very much like to get some idea of its (their?) size and contents, if possible.

Thompson's English translation of a letter from Schubart to Thompson of July 19, 1931, reports:

> Our common friend Gardiner wrote to me asking me to address myself directly to you in all that concerns the Manipapyri . . . Dr. H. J. Polotsky, Berlin-Charlottenburg 4, Waitzstr. 20, has already worked on the Chester Beatty papyri during May and June so far that it is justifiable to pay him on June 30 the first of the monthly instalments [sic] of 150 Rm. How the payment shall be made is of course entirely a question for Mr. Chester Beatty; perhaps you would kindly speak to him about it. In future then Dr. Polotsky might expect the payment to be made always on the last day of the month. He binds himself to divide his work conscientiously between the Berlin and the Chester Beatty papyri, but it goes without saying that this can> not be done mechanically and exactly according to the number of pages. I will see to it that both parts are carried forward evenly. Each month Dr. Polotsky shall send you copies of the Chester Beatty and Berlin pieces as far as possible with translation. It is understood that these copies are only provisional and that Dr. Polotksy will have to work on them further to improve them. I would ask you to write to Dr. Polotsky your idea as to the working out of the Chester Beatty papyri so that he may know how far he is also to occupy himself with the contents of the New Texts. Dr. Polotsky must also write to you thereon on his part.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> I shall be very grateful to you if you will communicate to me any questions or doubts that may arise, and I am convinced that we shall be able to settle everything in an amicable manner. In any case it will be a pleasure to me to do anything I can to forward the great work without delay.

On June 23, 1931, Thompson wrote Miss Kingford inquiring if Beatty had received his unanswered letter of June 15, 1931, and forwarding his translation of Schubart's letter with the request that she ask Beatty "to act upon it:"

> I am very glad to find that Prof. Schubart will keep the supervision in his own hands rather than leave it all to Dr. C. S.— Entre nous, I trust Schubart entirely—Dr. C. S. is apt to be dilatory and not to be depended on to the same extent.

Thereupon on June 26, 1931, Beatty sent Schubart's letter to Gardiner "and also the answer I propose to send," apparently proposing Ibscher as the intermediary in Berlin, with this request:

> I shall be very glad if you will kindly look through this and let me know if you have any suggestion to make before I send the letter to Sir Herbert Thompson.

On June 27, 1931, Gardiner replied to Beatty as follows:

> When I met Sir Herbert Thompson, Crum, and C. Schmidt about a fortnight ago, it was agreed between us that I had better retire from any concern with the Manichaean texts, because they belong to a province which is rather remote from my own. But since you are kind enough to ask me to comment upon your letter to Thompson here returned, I hope you will allow me to do so quite frankly. In my opinion, knowing as I do all the people concerned except Polotsky, I think it would > be the greatest possible mistake to entrust the controlling of Polotsky's work to Ibscher instead of to Schubart. Schubart is the head of the Papyrus Department, a distinguished man and Ibscher's chief. Ibscher, though a great friend of mine and a most splendid and trustworthy fellow, is an underling in the department and would not be regarded as able to exercise any authority over Polotsky except through Schubart, with whom he is on the best of terms.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> I see through Schubart's letter to Thompson that he personally undertakes to see that both parts of the work are carried on evenly. If he says that, then in my opinion there is not the least doubt in the world that it would be done. If, after a month or two had passed, Thompson, who will be controlling the work, considered that your portion was being neglected in favor of C. Schmidt's the arrangement could at once be terminated. In a word, if the books were mine and I had to negotiate the matter on my own behalf, I should not hesitate to accept Schubart's offer without any reservation whatever.
>
> I have written very frankly, because I think it is by so doing that I shall be of most help both to you and to this most important scientific undertaking . . .
>
> P.S. I notice from your letter that you say you would rather prefer to deal with this business through Ibscher and not through Schmidt. I don't think that the latter course is proposed at all. Indeed, in taking charge of the matter himself doubtless Schubart's idea, like Ibscher's, is to keep the control out of Schmidt's hands.

On June 28, 1931, Thompson wrote Miss Kingsford inquiring whether the mail was functioning since he had still no reply from Beatty to his letters. On July 2, 1931, Beatty wrote Gardiner to the effect he was writing Thompson to work through Schubart rather than Schmidt or Ibscher. On July 7, 1931, Beatty wrote Thompson to arrange for Polotsky to be paid by Schubart not by the month but by the actual amount of work done, since he might work more for Berlin and Ibscher's work may move slowly.

On July 11, 1931, Thompson wrote Beatty, reporting on his implementation of the new arrangements Beatty proposed:

> However I have this morning received from Schubart the results viz. transcription (Coptic), translation and (occasionally) notes of 5 more leaves, of which 4 are from your papyri and 1 from the Berlin papyri.—He sent me 4 copies (mechanical) of > each and I enclose one copy of each of your 4 new pages. One copy will go to Crum for his Dictionary and the other two will remain with me for the present.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> Schubart remarks in his letter: "This time the C.B. pages are the more numerous; another time it may be so with the Berlin pages. That naturally depends on the quality of the leaves [he means that as Ibscher divides his time equally on the two jobs, the number of each that he gets off depends on the condition of the papyrus]. But both parts, C.B. and Berlin, will be as far as possible carried forward equally." I feel sure that Schubart may be trusted to do his best to see this carried out. But we must await further results in due course . . .
>
> I have not been able to go through these pages of Polotsky at present; but I see that he has got out the whole text and it looks very satisfactory as far as I can judge from a cursory glance.

On September 24, 1931, Thompson again wrote Beatty:

> I sent you on July 11th last the first results of Dr. Polotsky's work; but as I received no acknowledgement, I presumed, you were too busy to find time for giving attention to them. So I ceased troubling you with any more. They have been coming in regularly each month. Shall I send them all on to you now? He is doing most excellent, indeed remarkable work on them, and the results are of the highest interest—both in the contents—and philologically for the Coptic language in which they are written, and seems to have sprung up specially equipped for this particular job.

On October 12, 1931, Beatty wrote that he had been very busy, was leaving for New York, and would be glad to receive Polotsky's reports on his return in five or six weeks. On January 4, 1932, Thompson wrote him:

> I have a rather urgent letter from Dr. Carl Schmidt in Berlin, asking me to send him some news as to the Mani papyrus, which you had, I believe, on approval, as scholars are very anxious—and not in Germany only—to have some public statement as to these "mysterious" Manichaean manuscripts. But Dr. Schmidt, rightly I think, wishes to defer any such statement till the fate of this outstanding papyrus of the Mani find is settled—either by its passing into your collection—or finding an assured home, perhaps at Copenhagen, or else in Berlin. The important point is that it should be in hands where > it would be accessible for study in association with those in your hands and those in the Berlin Museum.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> So I venture again to trouble you with a question as to whether it is still in your custody — and if so, may I be allowed to see it? and also whether you still have any thought of acquiring it, or not? If you do not, Dr. Schmidt tells me that Nahman has given him the first option of purchase; but he fears that if the matter is delayed much longer, Nahman may change his mind, and the opportunity of fixing it in safe hands may be lost.

On January 5, 1932, Beatty left for Egypt, but the letter was forwarded to him. On January 26, 1932, J. W. Corble, of Beatty's staff, replied to Thompson on Beatty's behalf that the papyrus was still the property of Nahman and Beatty had it in safekeeping.

Schmidt wrote Thompson on February 6, 1932, in a disturbing way, which Thompson reported to Beatty in a letter of February 14, 1932:

> I am sorry to have to trouble you with Mani matters again so soon, as I fear they are not very welcome. However, it is necessary that you should know that Prof. Carl Schmidt of Berlin, who is controlling Dr. Polotsky's work over there on behalf of the Berlin papyri, will very shortly be in Egypt, and purposes to call on you.
>
> He has prepared a Report which he purposes to lay before the Berlin Academy, relating to the find of Mani papyri. He first referred to it as a "Provisional report";—I assumed that he would give an account of the find—of the number of the papyri, their dates, their language and its dialect and some details of the nature of the contents. But about 10 days ago he wrote and informed me that he proposed to use 10 pages of your papyrus, i.e., publish in his report the Coptic texts and translations—and moreover 4 of those 10 pages have never been forwarded to me nor any account even of their contents. I at once protested, both to Prof. Schubart and to Dr. Schmidt. Schubart (head of the papyrus department of the Berlin Museum) mildly interposed and thought my point of view had not been considered sufficiently. But Schmidt is offended and wrote me an immensely long letter to show that—well, I was spoiling his game, but he was off to Egypt in a few days and would see you and hopes to get your permission for what he wants. He is one of those people to whom if you give him an inch, he will take an ell—and I have been warned of this by people who know > him much better than I do. He wants to publish your papyrus by driblets in successive reports to the Berlin Academy.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> So I have written him today—it will catch him before he leaves—a very straight letter of which I enclose you a copy—so that you may know exactly what is the position I have taken up, and which I consider necessary, if you intend to keep any control over your exceedingly valuable papyrus.
>
> I hope it will meet with your approval.

Thompson's blunt letter to Schmidt of February 14, 1932, is as follows:

> . . . But with regard to the Beatty papyrus, you remark "es wäre mir sehr angenehm einmal Ihre Meinung angesichts der von mir geschilderten Lage zu hören" [it would be very agreeable to me to hear once your view regarding the situation portrayed by me"].
>
> I am the more willing to do as you ask, because I fear that, in your anxiety to inform the Academy, you have overlooked certain fundamental conditions, which are these:—
>
> 1. The Ch. B. papyrus belongs to Mr. Chester Beatty.
> 2. The right of publication is vested in him solely.
> 3. He will decide when and how it is to be published.
> 4. His present intention is to publish it completely as soon as possible.
> 5. His publication will not form part of that of the Berlin papyri but will no doubt be made in England, as soon as Dr. Polotsky—on one-half of whose working time he has an exclusive claim—shall produce it in a condition fit for publication.
> 6. He objects to any piece-meal form of publication.
> 7. Your knowledge of the contents of the papyrus is confidential, and you have no right to the use of it, except by asking for, and receiving permission.
> 8. I have, as at present instructed, no authority to give you that permission.
>
> I informed you, that you might "state in general terms["] the "contents of the Ch. B. papyrus." You answer, "Was will der Gelehrte mit allgemeinen Bemerkungen anfangen?" [What > does the scholar make of general comments?] But the "contents" include a great deal more than that and cover details: but not quotations.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> I am very sorry to have to write to you in such unqualified terms. But you compel me to it. There is nothing in the above 8 points, which was not either common ground between us, or was stipulated for (especially—"no partial publication without common agreement") at our meeting in London.
>
> I am fully aware of the immense difficulty of the work of decipherment on which you and Dr. Polotsky are engaged. I have a number of photographs of the Ch. B. papyrus by me, and can form a good judgment of it; and how necessarily slow it is.
>
> But your calculations as to the length of time likely to be required for the Berlin papyri, do not apply to the Ch. B. papyrus, which I hope will be ready for publication much earlier.
>
> Last autumn I wrote to Dr. Polotsky that my object was to have the text, with English translation, and such notes, philological and historical, as may be found necessary, printed, but it is not to include any elaborate commentary, as that cannot be adequately undertaken until the whole of the papyri have seen the light.

On February 22, 1932, Thompson wrote Miss Kingsford:

> Shortly before Mr. Chester Beatty left for America, he asked me to hold back the results of Dr. Polotsky's work on the Mani papyrus till his expected return some weeks later from the U.S.A.
>
> I fear I forgot that he had ever asked for them; but I have now been through the papers, and added a considerable number of translations, as I told Dr. Polotsky to cease making [English?] translations of the Beatty papyrus, so that he may have more time for deciphering. I send you the results up to the present date and will ask you kindly to keep them till Mr. Beatty's return from Egypt.

On March 19, 1932, Schmidt wrote on his calling card in Cairo a cryptic note to Beatty, also in Cairo, since he had failed to meet him there and was leaving the next day for Luxor. Later Thompson was to provide Beatty with an accurate translation of the relevant part of Schmidt's note:

> I should like to discuss with you a report on the Mani find, which I wish to place before the Academy in Berlin. I have > already corresponded with Sir Herbert Thompson about it. The important point is as to your permission how far I may in my Report also make use of (the material in) your possession. I had proposed to give some examples in illustration from your most valuable Hymn-book so that scholars might be able to judge of the Hymn to Christ and to Mani. Perhaps you will be good enough to talk this over with Sir (H.) Thompson.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On March 21, 1932, Beatty wrote Schmidt already from Cairo, without awaiting an accurate translation, but responding in terms of what Thompson had already written him about Schmidt's proposals:

> I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your note but unfortunately as I do not read German I have only been able to get a rough translation of it. I wish however to have it definitely understood that you are not to use in any way, shape or manner any of the material owned by me, in any article, lecture or quotation. Upon my return to London I will have a careful translation made of your note and will write you further, but in the meantime let there be no misunderstanding. You were allowed to see certain papyri as a matter of courtesy but any thing you have seen is strictly confidential and you are not permitted to make any mention of it or make any use whatever of it, without either my consent or Sir Herbert Thompson's consent in writing.

On March 29, 1932, Beatty sent a copy of his sharp reply to Thompson, with the further comment:

> I think the best solution is that I arrange with Ibscher for him to stop work on the thing, so that we will not have any further complications with Schmidt.

The same day Beatty wrote Nahman, agreeing to return the manuscript on which he had an option via Ibscher, knowing that this meant that Schmidt would acquire it. Apparently, Beatty had soured on the whole Mani enterprise. On April 3, 1932, Thompson wrote Beatty, quite annoyed that Beatty had gone too far:

> Thank you for your letter of Mar. 29th, acknowledging mine of Feb. 10th. I could wish you had done so sooner, as you left me during my controversy with Prof. Schmidt in some doubt as to how far I was justified in maintaining so strict an attitude toward him as I did. But your letter to him of March 31 [21?] is so stiff that it rather puts me into fresh difficulty.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

When Prof. Schmidt came over here in June of last year, I made certain arrangements with him as regards the common working out of the Berlin and your Mani papyri. The main points were:—

1. They were to be worked out by Dr. Polotsky under the supervision of Prof. Schmidt and myself, so far as I could control his work by photographs, or the originals when returned.

2. All the material, as worked out in Berlin, was to be sent to me.

3. Publication was reserved, to be dealt with by each party as they thought best; but no publication of any kind was to be permitted meanwhile without the consent of the other party.

4. I told Schmidt distinctly that Dr. Polotsky was to edit your papyrus for you, and that it would be published over here and not in Germany.

5. Dr. Polotsky was to divide his working time equally between the two parties and each party was to pay him 150 Rm. monthly. (This was before the gold standard was abandoned in England. Therefore, whereas 150 Rm. = £7.10.0 at par originally, it now, at 14 Rm. to the £ = £10.15.0. But, on the other hand, by German Govt. decree all salaries have been reduced by 10% since Jan. 1, so Dr. P.'s salary stands now at 135 Rm. per month).

6. It was agreed that some communication of the contents of these papyri should be made to the public as soon as it could reasonably be done; and that this should take the form of a Report by Prof. Schmidt to the Berlin Academy as to their nature and contents.

Accordingly, when Prof. Schmidt on Feb. 2 announced to me that he was preparing a Report to the Academy and that he intended to make large extracts from your papyrus, I protested at once that he was not entitled to do so, as this amounted to a part-publication. After many letters on both sides, Prof. Schmidt yielded on my writing to him the formal letter, of which I sent you a copy.

But I have given him permission to state the nature and contents of your papyrus with details as to names of persons

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

mentioned and places, and chronological references, provided he makes no quotation whatever; and so much I consider to be desirable in the public interest. This you have now withdrawn by the terms of your letter to him.

After our controversy, which I conducted, I hope, with due politeness, Prof. Schmidt, having conceded my points, gave in with a good grace, and we are again on excellent terms. As Prof. Schubart of the Berlin Museums, who has the custody and control of all the Mani-papyri, supported me throughout, I think it would be deplorable if you refused to sanction the further use of your papyrus, and withdrew from the agreed common work.

Further, with regard to your papyrus, I obtained from Dr. Ibscher on Feb. 22 a report as to his work on it, of which I enclose a translation. He will also make an appendix to Schmidt's Report, on the technical condition and treatment of the papyri. He has sent me a copy of his paper, and I see nothing whatever to object to in it.

In consequence of Ibscher's statement, (from which I learned for the first time that you own, not one papyrus only, but 3 or 4), I wrote to Dr. Polotsky that I advised him to concentrate on finishing up the shortest one of 37 leaves; and, as, if he were to wait till the whole 460–600 leaves were worked out, it would probably be some years before anything appeared, he should finish this short one up and you would arrange for a publication of it separately—which would bring him into prominence. He is an extremely learned and able young man; but he is not a naturalised German (being a Russian) and hence has no prospect of an official or University post; and has to make a living. I believe he has nothing but these 270 Rm. (orig. 300 Rm.) per month, i.e. at par £180 p. ann.

I hope very earnestly that you will not withdraw from the scheme as originally laid down. It cannot be carried out without the collaboration of Prof. Schmidt; and I have put matters on such a footing that I feel sure he will now act reasonably; as he has discovered that he has not a "man of straw" to deal with on this side. But if this is to be effected, I must ask you to back me up also in the concessions I have made both as regards Prof. Schmidt and Dr. Polotsky. They are no more than was allowed in the original agreement.

On April 16, 1932, Beatty wrote Ibscher:

We have had a good deal of trouble and dispute with Professor Schmidt with reference to the Mani papyrus, and I understand

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> from Dr. Gardiner that you are coming to London, so I wish you would stop all expenditure and work on the Mani papyrus and just leave the matter as it is until I can see you in London. We can then discuss the best policy to pursue, but at present I do not like Professor Schmidt's attitude; I feel the most satisfactory way is to stop all work in order not to have any complications.

Thompson wrote Beatty on April 22, 1932, on hearing from Berlin of Beatty's letter to Ibscher:

> I have this morning received a letter from Prof. Schubart telling me that you [have] written to Dr. Ibscher that he is to stop work on your Mani papyri in Berlin "on account of disagreement with Prof. Schmidt." As the latter is still in Egypt, Schubart naturally wishes to know what it means and applies to me for information.
>
> As you put the relations between you and Berlin into my hands, and as I had reminded Prof. Schmidt of his duty to you in respect of his use of your papyri, and replaced everything again on an amicable basis, after establishing a proper control over the use to be made of your property, I think it would have been better, had you continued to leave the matter to be conducted through me. Instead of which you have written letters of a very decisive import both to Prof. Schmidt and now to Dr. Ibscher without any reference to me whatever.
>
> Frankly, I cannot work for you on this double basis. Either you must leave the conduct of the business to me, or you take it all into your own hands. It is for you to choose.
>
> But I must remind you that you are under definite obligations to Dr. Polotsky, which cannot be suddenly cut short without notice.
>
> Will you kindly let me know what your intentions are as soon as possible, so that I may know where I stand in relation to the Berlin Museum authorities . . . I understand that Ibscher will be in London some time next week; and I shall be meeting him of course.

On May 1, 1932, Thompson again wrote Beatty:

> On April 22 I wrote you a letter in which I described the position in which you had placed me, and to which I asked for a speedy answer, but I have heard nothing from you.
>
> From the neglect with which you treat all my letters I can only conclude that you do not want me or my services any > more. And so, much to my regret, I have to inform you that you must now find some one else to do the work, which, under more favourable circumstances I was so anxious to do in the interests of science.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> After three days, if I do not hear any further from you, I shall inform Prof. Schubart that, as far as I am concerned, I can take no further part in the working out of the Mani papyri.
>
> With regard to Dr. Polotsky, I have made certain engagements with him in your name, which I must see carried out, and if you repudiate them, then it will be a matter of honour to me to see that a proper compensation is made to him.

This bitter letter crossed in the mail with a more conciliatory letter from Beatty to Thompson of April 30, 1932:

> I am so sorry that there has been such a mix-up in the matter of the Schmidt business. I got your letter in Egypt, from which I gathered that Schmidt was not acting very well, and I got his letter and also a reprint in German apparently of a Biblical papyrus which he had been interfering with, and then I wrote to him. I thought in view of the dispute that the best way to bring him to terms was to stop the work absolutely. I quite understand that with reference to Dr. Polotsky we may have some work still to settle with him.
>
> I met Dr. Alan Gardiner the other day and understand that Dr. Ibscher is here, so that I will be seeing him within the next few days, and if you will let me know what days you expect to be in London I will try to call on you so that we can have a talk and straighten the matter out.
>
> I am sorry for any upset I have caused in your plans, but it was done with the best intentions.

On May 2, 1932, Thompson replied to Beatty:

> I have just received your letter of Apr. 30th and it has crossed mine, which was written to you yesterday. Your letter still gives me no answer as to your intentions in relation to the arrangements made through me with the authorities in Berlin. You speak of "stopping the work absolutely." If you have done so, or are doing so, you might have told me of it, before leaving me in the lurch. I have nothing to alter in my letter written to you yesterday; but if you think it worth while, I will come up to town and see you any day this week between 10:30 and 3 pm, that you like to name.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On the same day Beatty wrote a further conciliatory letter to Thompson, in which he nonetheless announced a formal closing down of the arrangements:

> I feel I owe you many apologies for my seeming discourtesy in not replying to your letters, but the fact is that since my return from Egypt I have been so engrossed with business matters that everything else had had to take a secondary place, and I have put off from day to day attending to my personal correspondence with the usual result that it has been entirely neglected. As a matter of fact, I did dictate a letter to you on Friday evening which was sent to my house for signature, but I had to go unexpectedly to the country and so unfortunately it was not dispatched at once.
>
> I quite understand that with regard to Dr. Polotsky and Professor Schubart there will be some settlement needed, and I am of course ready and willing to accept responsibility for this. I met Dr. Alan Gardiner the other day and understand that Dr. Ibscher is here, so I will be seeing him within the next few days.
>
> I regret very much any upset I may have caused in your arrangements, but it was done with the best intentions.
>
> In view of the very difficult business conditions which demand the whole of my time, I have decided to discontinue all work in regard to manuscripts at present. I do not want to offend my friends who have assisted me so much in the work on the library, and I feel I may inadvertently offend them if I try to continue the library work and at the same time have to look after business. I am Chairman of a number of Companies, and I feel that during these difficult times I must devote all my time to them; I am glad to say they are doing all right, but until we get through this world crisis I feel my first duty is to them, and so I cannot devote the time to manuscripts which I would like and would be able to in normal conditions.

A memorandum of a conference between Beatty and Gardiner on May 8, 1932, reported the following policy:

> Under the arrangement with Dr. Polotsky, he was to be paid 150 Rm. by each party monthly, and was to divide his working time equally between the two parties (Mr. A.C.B. and Berlin). Half of this is for Mr. A.C.B.'s account. Polotsky has now almost finished his work and has been working specially on the books of travels [Homilies] of which there are about ten pages

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms > left; the idea is to dispense with Polotsky's time after he has finished these ten pages and to arrange through Dr. Schubart that he will finish the work by a certain time.

>
> Then, if Sir Herbert Thompson approves, the idea would be to give Polotsky the right to publish it within a year at his own expense through some scientific paper.
>
> Then in regard to the arrangement with Dr. Ibscher, who was to receive 50 marks (about £3) per page, he charges by the page and his work comes to about £200 a year. He has separated or has in process of separation about 100 leaves of which about 30 are under glass. The idea is that he will not separate any more leaves of the manuscript but gradually put the present leaves which he has separated under glass within the next year or so. He is not to undertake any new work on the remaining part of the manuscript without my approval.

On May 10, 1932, Thompson wrote Beatty:

> The enclosed pages (7 of your MS. and 3 of the Berlin papyrus) reached me yesterday from Berlin, representing last month's contribution by Dr. Polotsky.
>
> I have written to him to stop working on your papyri, since you wrote to me on the 2nd inst. that you decided to discontinue all work in regard to manuscripts at present. So this will be the last that he will send. I have not troubled (as with former sendings) to make a translation of them, as I do not suppose you will have time to read them, and it naturally takes a good deal of my time to do it.

On the same day Beatty wrote Thompson that he had "had a long talk with Dr. Alan Gardiner and Dr. Ibscher in reference to the Manichaean manuscripts and have taken some notes with regard to the matter," no doubt the memorandum of the meeting May 8, 1932, and inquiring if he could see Thompson in London. On May 11, 1932, Thompson responded, commenting "I wish you could have seen me when I offered it last week," and pointing out that the times Beatty now proposed were inconvenient. On May 12, 1932, Gardiner wrote Beatty:

> I have had some further talks with Dr. Ibscher and Sir Herbert Thompson with regard to the best way of bringing the arrangement with Sir Herbert and Dr. Polotsky to a satisfactory conclusion. If I understand rightly, you are ready to cede to Dr. Polotsky publication rights in the 50 leaves relating to > the journeyings of Mani [Homilies] provided he produces his work within a reasonable time. I would suggest that, to treat Polotsky very liberally, you would allow him to retain those rights until this time next year, say the last day of June 1933. The publication would appear in Germany and no cost in connection with it would be incurred by you. Furthermore, after the end of this month, no further obligation for payments to Dr. Polotsky for his studies would rest upon you.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

>
> If this arrangement seems satisfactory, I should be grateful for a line at your earliest convenience. Ibscher is leaving for Germany on Saturday, and would like to go back bearing your consent with him.

On May 13, 1932, Beatty responded to Gardiner accepting his proposals.

On May 14, 1932, Ibscher wrote Beatty from London:

Before I return again to Germany, I would not want to neglect to confirm that I have correctly received for Prof. Schmidt the Mani manuscript . . .	Bevor ich wieder nach Deutschland zurückfahre, möchte ich nicht versäumen zu bestätigen, dass ich das Mani-Manuskript für Herrn Prof. Schmidt richtig erhalten habe . . .
As agreed, I will continue treating the Mani text until the already unstuck 100 leaves are assured. I hope I can soon provide you more precise communications about this.	Die Manitexte werde ich wie verabredet weiter behandeln, bis die bereits losgelösten 100 Blätter gesichert sind. Ich hoffe Ihnen hierüber bald nähere Mitteilungen machen zu können.

On May 20, 1932, Beatty wrote Thompson a summary of the situation, including a statement concerning Ibscher:

> Dr. Ibscher is just completing the work on the present pages he is doing which will probably take another six or nine months, and when he has finished this work I have promised to let him know whether I wish him to continue separating any more of the leaves.

On May 24, 1932, Thompson replied to Beatty:

> Thank you for your letter, which was forwarded to me here where I shall be nearly to the middle of next month. I have also heard from Dr. Gardiner with regard to the result of your conferences with him. It is quite satisfactory to me, but I note > that you write to me: "that he (Dr. Polotsky) would have the right for a certain period to publish an article on the pages (i.e. of the work he was lately doing) in a German publication." In your letter to Dr. Gardiner you said: "I am to cede to Dr. Pol. publication rights in the 50 leaves relating to the journeyings of Mani [Homilies], provided he produces his work within a reasonable time," defined as the end of June 1933. The difference is material and I have taken the latter as the more authoritative, and I have written to Dr. Polotsky that he has the right to publish the text of the short papyrus in question, with introduction, translation and notes, as an independent volume in Germany. That is what he was engaged to do in relation to your papyri before the matter came into my hands, with the difference that hitherto the stipulation was that the publication was to be in England. The difference now is that he is restricted to this short papyrus and the publication is to be in Germany. I hope this is quite clear; as also that he has no claim on you for future expenses either as to his work or the publication.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On May 30, 1932, Beatty acknowledged the correctness of Thompson's interpretation, which Thompson acknowledged on June 2, 1932. This seems to be the conclusion of this correspondence.

It would seem that Beatty's initial proposal of working through those with whom he already had good working relationships, Gardiner and Ibscher, was the procedure to which he had returned, after the relationship with Thompson repeatedly failed to become close, and Schmidt had come to be seen as a problem.

The conserved material has been partially published: Sir Chester Beatty's part of the Homilies by H. J. Polotsky in 1934; part two of Sir Chester Beatty's Psalms by C. R. C. Allberry in 1938; and the first part of the Berlin Kephalaia by H. J. Polotsky and Alexander Böhlig in double fascicles from 1935–1940, with fascicles 11–12 published by Böhlig in 1966, and the next page, 292, by Böhlig in 1985.[1]

1. Polotsky, Manichäische Homilien; Allberry, Manichaean Psalm-Book, Part 2 (the preface reported that fascicles 1–8 had appeared in 1935–1937); Polotsky and Böhlig, Kephalaia. Manichäische Handschriften der staatlichen Museen Berlin, Band 1, herausgegeben im Auftrage der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften unter Leitung von Prof. Carl Schmidt, 1. Hälfte (Lieferungen 1–10), pages 1–102 by Polotsky, pages 103–244 by Böhlig; Kephalaia. Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin, Band 1, herausgegeben im Auftrag der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin; zweite Hälfte (only Lieferungen 11/12 = pages 244–92), by Böhlig; Böhlig, "Ja und Amen," 59–70.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The unconserved book blocks belonging to Berlin are no longer extant, whereas three belonging to Sir Chester Beatty were saved and conserved after the war. The conserved leaves belonging to Berlin are largely extant (though the exact dividing line between what was ever conserved and what was still unconserved when the book blocks disappeared is not clear), and those belonging to Sir Chester Beatty are extant.

Some of the material transcribed by Polotsky but not published has been preserved, in the archives of the Chester Beatty Library, in the Crum Archives of the Griffith Institute at the Ashmolean Museum in Oxford, and at the Academy of Sciences in Berlin. None has survived at the Egyptian Museum in East Berlin or in the possession of H. J. Polotsky.

A ring binder at the Chester Beatty Library has two leaves that have the appearance of title pages, one reading: "A. CHESTER BEATTY. MANICHAEAN PAPYRUS. CODEX A. Psalms (Hymnbook). CODEX B. Homilies (Discourses). Transcriptions and Translations. From Sir H. Thompson. July, 1931—May 18, 1932." The other reads similarly: "BERLIN MANICHAEAN PAPYRUS. Transcriptions and Translations. From Sir H. Thompson. July, 1931—May 18, 1932."

In the Chester Beatty Library are to be found transcriptions of the published pages 25, 26, 30, 34–40, 51, and 54 of the Kephalaia and of pages 8, 11, 12, 27–30, 44, 60, 69, 76, 78, 79, 82–84, 91, and 93 of the Homilies, as well as two pages of the Kephalaia published only in the initial essay by Schmidt and Polotsky, pages 375–76.[2] Also to be found are five still unpublished pages of the Kephalaia: pages 343, 344, 353, 354, and 366.

In the preface to A Coptic Dictionary (1939), W. E. Crum referred to "copies of the unpublished portions [of the Manichaica] kindly sent by Dr. Polotsky and Mr. Allberry" that he was able to include "only since reaching the letter P." Among the "Abbreviations" are hence "Mani 1 = copies of Chester Beatty's unpublished Manichaean papyri by H. J. Polotsky and H. Thompson" and "Mani 2 = copies of similar papyri at Berlin by Polotsky." This reference to unpublished material would not include, at first glance, what had been published by 1939, which consisted (according to the "Abbreviations," of the Dublin Homilies) of Part 2 of the Dublin Psalms, and the Berlin Kephalaia, presumably only fascicles 1–8, since they were published in 1935–1937; the first volume was published in 1940 with the appearance of fascicles 9–10. Thus, it is conceivable that some Berlin materials that Crum cites as unpublished are among those that have been subsequently published, whereas Dublin material cited as unpublished would still be unpublished, unless it was so listed in fascicles of Crum's Dictionary that appeared before Allberry published in 1938. Though the materials identified in the Dublin Archives include no unpublished Dublin material, there are in the Oxford Archives unidentified Dublin transcripts, though one (II, 30, 1) has the note "precedes Allberry p. 1," which must mean it comes from the unpublished first part of the Psalms codex. Two psalms published in English translation by Søren Giversen as derived from the unpublished first part of the Psalms are also present in the Crum Archives (see below).

2. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten," 45, for the German translation and page 87 for the Coptic text from codex page 375; page 42 for the German translation and page 82 for the Coptic text of codex page 376. Schmidt and Polotsky did not give the page numeration in the codex.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:44 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 5 —

The Effects of World War II

This remarkable story of the discovery, acquisition, and initial conservation and publication of the Manichaica of Medinet Madi has as its sequel an equally remarkable story of the Manichaean codices in the aftermath of World War II.

In a guidebook, Joachim Selim Karig, acting director of the Ägyptisches Museum in Charlottenburg, West Berlin, until 1989, described precautions taken in wartime as follows:[1]

Rudolf Anthes, the successor in office to Heinrich Schäfter from 1935 on, suffered a similar fate as well. [Similar to that of his predecessor's pupils: "Both were obliged, since they were not pleasing to the ruling powers, to give up their careers and later even their homeland."] Recognition was denied to him, for he had never hidden the fact when his personal political opinion stood in opposition to his superiors. He was not named director, though he had to bear the work and responsibility of the leader of the collection. Also the sad task rested on him of protecting the valuable objects of the collection from destruction by

Auch Rudolf Anthes, der Amtsnachfolger von Heinrich Schäfer seit 1935, erlitt ein ähnliches Schicksal. [Similar to that of his predecessor's pupils: "Beide mussten, da sie den herrschenden Machthabern nicht genehm waren, ihre Laufbahn, später sogar ihre Heimat verlassen."] Ihm, der nie ein Hehl daraus machte, wenn seine persönliche politische Meinung im Gegensatz zu seiner Obrigkeit stand, wurde die Anerkennung versagt. Er wurde nicht zum Direktor ernannt, obwohl er die Arbeit und Verantwortung des Sammlungsleiters zu tragen hatte. Ihm oblag auch die

1. Karig, Ägyptisches Museum Berlin, 73–74.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

war and bombing raids, of packing them up and carrying them to various places—an activity that he executed with the greatest conscientiousness in spite of all the impediments of the time.

traurige Aufgabe, die wertvollen Sammlungsgüter vor der Vernichtung durch Krieg und Bombenangriffe zu schützen, sie zu verpacken und an verschiedene Stellen abzutransportieren—eine Tätigkeit, die er mit der grössten Gewissenhaftigkeit, allen Behinderungen der Zeit zum Trotz, ausführte.

Jürgen Settgast, director of the Ägyptisches Museum in West Berlin, described the wartime and postwar period as follows:[2]

Catastrophe

Already soon after the Second World War broke out, steps began to be taken also in the Egyptian Museum to put in safekeeping the objects of the collection. Storage places which one thought could offer them better protection than the museum in the center of Berlin had to be located and made ready to receive them. But statues and pieces of architecture that weighed tons remained at their place in the museum and were covered with protective walls.

The most valuable works of art were brought to the concrete bunker [removed after the war] in the Zoo. Many outstanding exhibition pieces wandered into the deep cellar of the Neue Münze; others remained on the Museum Island where they could find protection in the basements of the museums.

Katastrophe

Schon bald nach Ausbruch des Zweiten Weltkrieges begannen auch im Ägyptischen Museum Massnahmen zur Sicherung des Sammlungsbestandes. Auslagerungsplätze, von denen man glaubte, dass sie besseren Schutz als das Museum im Berliner Zentrum bieten könnten, mussten gefunden und aufnahmebereit hergerichtet werden. Tonnenschwere Statuen und Architekturteile aber verblieben im Museum an Ort und Stelle und wurden mit Schutzmauern verkleidet.

Die wertvollsten Kunstwerke wurden in den Betonbunker [removed after the war] am Zoo gebracht. Viele hervorragende Ausstellungsstücke wanderten in den Tiefkeller der Neuen Münze, andere verblieben auf der Museumsinsel, konnten Schutz in den Kellern der Museen finden. Nahezu alle Objekte

2. Settgast, Ägyptisches Museum Berlin, 76. The hardback booklet published by the Ägyptisches Museum der Staatlichen Museen Preussicher Kulturbesitz, West Berlin, summarizes this report with more or less detail in three languages: Kniese and Robbel, Ägyptisches Museum Berlin, 8 (German); Fay, Egyptian Museum Berlin, 7–8 (English); and Alte, Musée Égyptien Berlin, 8 (French).

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Almost all the objects of these three storage places survived the war intact, were transported into the Soviet Union in 1945–1946, and then returned to Berlin in 1958. These objects comprise today the core of the Egyptian Museum in the eastern part of Berlin.

Immediately after the end of the war the objects stored in the bunker of Friedrichshain became the victims of a large fire. However, the Egyptian Museum suffered its most serious losses in the total destruction of the depots of art objects in the castle Sophienhof in the region of Mecklenburg, which was heavily fought over in April 1945. Here almost 100 crates of small works of art, well over 500 stone objects, and the bulk of the collection of wooden coffins and mummy coverings were destroyed. The Berlin Egyptian Museum is still today marked by this catastrophe. What was stored in a mine near Grabsleben west of the Elbe fell into the hands of British troops in April 1945. They gave the 34 crates with objects from the reserves emergency asylum in Celle. Incomparably more important was what was given over to the American troops that pushed forward into Thüringen: ninety-seven crates, among them the one with the green head and another with the bust of Nofretete. That the best of the Berlin collections was rescued for us is also thanks to unknown railroad workers, who simply ignored Goebbel's dieser drei Auslagerungsstätten haben den Krieg heil überdauert, sind 1945/46 in die Sowjetunion transportiert worden und kehrten 1958 nach Berlin zurück. Diese Stücke sind heute Kern des Ägyptischen Museums im Ostteil Berlins.

Die im Bunker Friedrichshain ausgelagerten Objekte wurden unmittelbar nach Kriegsende Opfer eines Grossfeuers. Die schwersten Verluste aber erlitt das Ägyptische Museum durch die totale Vernichtung des Kunstgutlagers in Schloss Sophienhof im Mecklenburgischen, das im April 1945 heftig umkämpft war. Hier wurden fast 100 Kisten mit Kleinkunst, weit über 500 Steinwerke und der grösste Teil der Sammlung von Holzsärgen und Mumienhüllen vernichtet. Von dieser Katastrophe ist das Berliner Ägyptische Museum noch heute gezeichnet. Was in einem Bergwerk bei Grabsleben westlich der Elbe ausgelagert war, fiel britischen Truppen im April 1945 in die Hände. Diese liessen die 34 Kisten mit Magazinbeständen in Celle Notasyl finden. Ungleich wichtiger war, was den bis nach Thüringen hinein vorgestossenen amerikanischen Truppen übergeben wurde: 97 Kisten, darunter die mit dem Grünen Kopf und eine andere mit der Büste der Nofretete. Dass das Spitzenstück der Berliner Sammlungen uns erhalten blieb, verdanken wir auch unbekannten Eisenbahnern, die den Goebbels Befehl, die Nofretete aber Ostern 1945 wieder nach

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

order to take Nofretete back to Berlin at Easter 1945. Instead, the Americans transferred the queen to Wiesbaden, where she resided for ten years before returning home to Berlin on June 23, 1956.

Berlin zu schaffen, einfach ignorierten. Statt dessen überführten die Amerikaner die Königin nach Wiesbaden, wo sie zehn Jahre residierte, bevor sie am 23. Juni 1956 nach Berlin heimkehrte.

Karig described the beginnings of the new Egyptian Museum just across the street from the castle in Charlottenburg:[3]

New Beginning

One hundred and thirty-one wooden crates in the ballroom of the former troop casino, which with its emergency roof above the burnt-out and naked walls did not look at all festive any longer—that was the heritage that one had to use. A director, a secretary, and a conservator was the staff that from February 1, 1962, on, was supposed to produce from this an Egyptian Museum. Just the sifting and identifying of the objects of the collection already produced great difficulties. All the files about them, the Inventory Books and other records were in East Berlin, unavailable for our use, whereas the inventory numbers on the pieces themselves were often illegibly rubbed off, destroyed. Much was not published, but even if it was—also a specialized library had first to be built up out of nothing.

Nonetheless, a suitable house had already been found, which seemed to be remarkably suited to house in its relatively small rooms a collection containing many pieces of small format as a result of

Neubegin

Einhundertundeinunddreissig Holzkisten im Festsaal des ehemaligen Landwehrkasinos, der mit seinem Notdach über den ausgebrannten and nackten Wänden keineswegs mehr festlich wirkte—das war das Erbe, das es zu nutzen galt; ein Direktor, eine Sekretärin und ein Restaurator die Mannschaft, die vom 1. Februar 1962 an hieraus ein Ägyptisches Museum schaffen sollte. Allein schon die Sichtung und Identifizierung der Sammlungsbestände brachte grosse Schwierigkeiten. Alle Akten hierüber, Inventarbücher und sonstigen Unterlagen waren in Ost-Berlin für uns nicht erreichbar, die Inventar-Nummern auf den Stücken selbst aber oftmals unleserlich abgerieben, zerstört. Vieles ist nicht publiziert worden, aber selbst wenn—auch eine Fachbibliothek musste erst aus dem Nichts aufgebaut werden.

Immerhin, ein passendes Haus war schon gefunden, das vorzüglich geeignet zu sein schien, in seinen relativ kleinen Räumen

3. Karig, Ägpytisches Museum Beriln, 78.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the storage situation. The fact that the departure of the police from the eastern building constructed by Stüber was delayed by a further number of years was more nearly useful for the cause, since one could devote one's attention after all to the objects (now with the larger staff of colleagues), could restore them, and could also go at making the completely unstudied Papyrus Collection accessible.

eine Sammlung aufzunehmen, die, bedingt durch die Auslagerung, viele kleinformatige Stücke besitzt. Dass sich der Auszug der Polizei aus dem östlichen Stüberbau noch um Jahre verzögerte, war eher der Sache nach dienlich, konnte man sich doch, jetzt mit vergrössertem Mitarbeiterstab, den Denkmälern widmen und sie restaurieren und auch schon an die Erschliessung der noch gänzlich unbearbeiteten Papyrussammlung gehen.

In an earlier guidebook, Karl-Theodor Zauzich had described the situation of the papyrus collection as follows:[4]

In the Second World War the contents of the Papyrus Collection as well as of the Egyptian Museum had been stored in different parts of Germany to protect them from air raids. After the end of the war they remained in the relevant occupation zones, and, after some detours, were turned over to the papyrus collection of the Staatliche Museen in Berlin ([the former] DDR) and to the Ägyptisches Museum Preussischer Kulturbesitz. By the accident of the earlier storage, the papyri that reached West Berlin were almost exclusively those that had been worked on neither in terms of restoration nor in terms of scholarship, and still had no inventory numbers. By the very nature of the case, it was a matter of the papyrus leaves that were outwardly less appealing and especially of the

Im 2. Weltkrieg hat man die Bestände der Papyrussammlung sowie die des Ägyptischen Museums zu ihrem Schutz vor Bombenangriffen in verschiedene Teile Deutschlands ausgelagert. Nach Kriegsende verblieben sie in den jeweiligen Besatzungszonen und wurden nach einigen Umwegen der Papyrussammlung der Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin (DDR) und dem Ägyptischen Museum Preussischer Kulturbesitz übergeben. Durch die Zufälligkeit der seinerzeitigen Auslagerung sind nach West-Berlin fast ausschliesslich jene Papyri gelangt, die weder restauratorisch noch wissenschaftlich bearbeitet waren und auch noch keine Inventarnummern hatten. Das waren naturgemäss die äusserlich weniger ansprechenden und vor allem die stärker fragmentierten

4. Zauzich, Kunst der Welt in den Berliner Museen, 11:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

more fragmentary leaves, which, however, precisely because of their long neglect, are especially interesting from a scholarly point of view.

Papyrusblätter, die allerdings gerade wegen ihrer langen Vernachlässigung wissenschaftlich besonders interessant sind.

The guidebook of the Museum Island museums in Berlin portrays as follows the situation during and after the war:[5]

[p. 7] Fascism and war had also brought the State Museums to the edge of complete destruction. The first and most important task in 1945 was hence to save from the ruins what had survived Fascistic barbarism and war. Here began the inestimable help of the Soviet Union, which carried the works of art to the museums of Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, and other cities, cared for them there, and gave them over to our people, when suitable prerequisites for caring for them had been created.

[p. 22] Then at the beginning of the Fascistic predatory war in 1939, all museums were closed. It lasted 10 years until an exhibit could again take place on the Berlin Museum Island.

A large part of the holdings were packed and put in storage outside [the museums], in basements, in crypts of banks, in the large bunkers at the Zoo and in Friedrichshain, in warehouses and mines. Numerous works of art and valuable books were ruined in these storage places during the war.

[p. 7] Faschismus und Krieg hatten auch die Staatlichen Museen an den Rand der völligen Vernichtung gebracht. Die erste und wichtigste Aufgabe war deshalb 1945, das aus den Trümmern zu bergen, was faschistische Barbarei und Krieg überstanden hatte. Hier setzte die unschätzbare Hilfe der Sowjetunion ein, die die Kunstwerke in die Museen Moskaus, Leningrads, Kiews und anderer Städte überführte, sie dort pflegte und unserem Volk übergab, als entsprechende Voraussetzungen für ihre Unterbringung geschaffen waren.

[p. 22] Bei Beginn des faschistischen Raubkrieges 1939 wurden dann alle Museen geschlossen, es dauerte 10 Jahre, ehe wieder eine Ausstellung auf der Berliner Museumsinsel stattfinden konnte.

Ein grosser Teil der Bestände wurde verpackt und ausgelagert, in Keller, Tresore von Banken, in die grossen Bunker am Zoo und im Friedrichshain, in Gutshäuser und Bergwerke. Zahlreiches Kunstgut und wertvolle Bücher gingen in diesen Auslagerungsorten während des Krieges zugrunde.

5. Schätze der Weltkultur (Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR: Staatliche Museen zu Beriln, and Berlin-Information, 2. überarbeitete Auflage, 1981), "Vorwort," 7; and Hühns, "Zur Geschichte," 22, 23, 25.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The Museum Island was destroyed on February 3, 1945, by a massive attack. This barbaric air attack lies on the same level as the destroying of Dresden ten days later.

Fascism and war had destroyed a locale of world culture

To the Soviet troops that in May 1945 freed Berlin, a terrifying picture presented itself. All the buildings of the Museum Island were destroyed, only a few rooms in the basement floors were usable, but they too were without windows and [p. 23] endangered by water and cold, since all the houses' roofs were missing. Given the high degree of destruction in Berlin, it was not possible to find room for the rescued works of art, especially those from the places of storage outside, where they could be protected from further disintegration and theft. For the fact that we today can again admire these unique treasures of culture we are indebted to the Soviet soldiers, scholars, and restorers. They took to heart, as in the case of the Dresden paintings, also the Berlin art treasures. They were put in safekeeping and brought into the Soviet Union, where they were cared for and conserved in the museums in Leningrad, Moscow, and Kiev, until the possibility existed again in Berlin to receive the collections and care for and exhibit them in a professional way.

The holdings of the State Museums that were stored in the occupation zones of the Western allies were brought together by

Die Museumsinsel wurde am 3. Februar 1945 durch einen Grossangriff zerstört. Dieser barbarische Luftangriff liegt mit der Zerstörung Dresdens, 10 Tage später, auf einer Linie.

Faschismus und Krieg hatten eine Stätte der Weltkultur vernichtet.

Den sowjetischen Truppen, die im Mai 1945 Berlin befreiten, bot sich ein erschreckendes Bild. Alle Gebäude der Museumsinsel waren zerstört, nur in den Sockelgeschossen waren einige Räume brauchbar, aber auch sie ohne Fenster und [p. 23] von Wasser und Kälte gefährdet, da allen Häusern die Dächer fehlten. Bei dem hohen Grad von Zerstörung in Berlin gab es keine Möglichkeit, für die geretteten Kunstwerke, vor allem aus den Auslagerungstätten, Raum zu finden, in denen sie vor weiterem Verfall und vor Diebstahl geschützt werden konnten. Dass wir heute diese einzigartigen Schätze der Kultur wieder bewundern können, verdanken wir den sowjetischen Soldaten, Wissenschaftlern und Restauratoren. Sie nahmen sich, wie der Dresdner Gemälde, auch der Berliner Kunstschätze an. Sie wurden sichergestellt und in die Sowjetunion gebracht, wo sie in den Museen in Leningrad, Moskau und Kiew gepflegt und konserviert wurden, bis in Berlin wieder die Möglichkeit bestand, die Sammlungen aufzunehmen, sachkundig zu betreuen und auszustellen.

Die in den Besatzungszonen der westlichen Alliierten untergebrachten Bestände der Staatlichen Museen wurden von den Besatzungstruppen zunächst in Wiesbaden und Celle

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the occupation troops at first in Wiesbaden and Celle, and later taken to West Berlin, where they until today are denied to the State Museums as their owner . . .

[p. 25] In 1958 the Soviet Union gave over to the [former] DDR the rest of the pieces from the collections of the museums that had been put in safe keeping in 1945. In several hundred railroad cars over a million museum objects arrived in Berlin, carefully folded in silk paper, wrapped in waxed paper and in upholstered boxes, along with the documentation that belonged with them. In the State Museums these treasures were then given back to the owners. Among them, holdings of the gallery of paintings and of the collection of sculptures, of the cabinet of etchings, the Pergamon frieze and many unique works, which since then are deposited and exhibited on the Museum Island. Tens of thousands of visitors saw at that time the exhibition "Treasures of World Culture Saved by the Soviet Union." A friendly, decades-long collaboration with the museums in Moscow and Leningrad dates from this time, to which we are indebted for many interesting exhibits and many a stimulus for our work.

zusammengeführt und später nach Westberlin gebracht, wo sie bis heute den Staatlichen Museen als ihrem Eigentümer vorenthalten werden . . .

[p. 25] 1958 übergab die Sowjetunion die übrigen 1945 sichergestellten Stücke aus den Sammlungen der Museen an die DDR. In mehreren hundert Eisenbahnwagen trafen über eine Million Museumsexponate in Berlin ein; sorgsam in Seidenpapier gehüllt, in Wachstuch eingeschlagen und in gepolsterten Kisten, zusammen mit der dazugehörigen Dokumentation. In den Staatlichen Museen wurden diese Schätze dann den Eigentümern zurückgegeben. Unter ihnen Bestände der Gemäldegalerie und der Skulpturensammlung, des Kupferstichkabinetts, der Fries von Pergamon und viele einmalige Werke, die seitdem auf der Museumsinsel deponiert und ausgestellt werden. Zehntausende von Besuchern haben damals die Ausstellung "Schätze der Weltkultur von der Sowjetunion gerettet" gesehen. Von dieser Zeit an datiert nun eine schon Jahrzehnte währende freundschaftliche Zusammenarbeit mit den Museen in Moskau und Leningrad, denen wir viele interessante Ausstellungen und manche Anregungen für unsere Arbeit verdanken.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

In a small guidebook of the Ägyptisches Museum of Berlin, Wolfgang Müller has provided, as follows, more specific information about the papyrus collection:[6]

At the end of the war in 1945, the New Museum was a ruin. Parts of the collection stored outside and taken over by the West's occupation troops are today unlawfully in (West) Berlin and have not yet been given back to their original place of storage on the Museum Island. Many works of art saved in destroyed Berlin were taken for safekeeping to the Soviet Union. Already in 1953, after years of rebuilding, the first Egyptian exhibit could be opened on the Museum Island. After the return of the art holdings preserved in the Soviet Union, the Egyptian Museum had been showing since 1959 in the Bode Museum a large number of works of art of the highest quality, from the early period down to the Hellenistic age, papyrus manuscripts, selected finds from daily life, and mummies. This chronologically arranged exhibit was enlarged in 1964 with new rooms, and since 1973 has been basically rearranged.

Bei Kriegsende 1945 war das Neue Museum eine Ruine. Ausgelagerte and von den westlichen Besatzungstruppen übernommene Sammlungsteile befinden sich heute widerrechtlich in Berlin [West] und sind noch nicht an ihren ursprünglichen Aufbewahrungsort auf der Museumsinsel zurückgegeben worden. Viele im zerstörten Berlin gerettete Kunstwerke wurden zur Sicherung in die Sowjetunion überführt. Nach Jahren des Aufbaus konnte bereits 1953 auf der Museumsinsel die erste ägyptische Ausstellung eröffnet werden. Nach Übergabe des in der Sowjetunion bewahrten Kunstbesitzes zeigt das Ägyptische Museum seit 1959 im Bode-Museum eine grosse Zahl von Kunstwerken ersten Ranges von der Frühzeit bis zum Hellenismus, Papyrushandschriften, ausgewählte Funde aus dem täglichen Leben und Mumien. Diese chronologisch aufgebaute Ausstellung wurde 1964 durch neue Räume erweitert und seit 1973 grundlegend umgestaltet.

In 1954 Rolf Ibscher narrated, as follows, the course of events during the war, relative to the Manichaean codices:[7]

6. Müller, "Einleitung," 6.
7. Ibscher, Rolf. "Wiederaufnahme," 3.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

After the passing of my father on May 26, 1943, I took the Manichaean papyrus books for reasons of security into the repository, safe from bombs, that had received the papyri of the Berlin Museums. But after July 20, 1944, this place too did not seem to me safe enough, especially since the remainder of the not yet conserved Mani books of Sir Chester Beatty was in Berlin, and I removed them, together with a Berlin manuscript, to Bavaria, into the house of my father-in-law in the country. Thence, after the war, the parts belonging to Chester Beatty returned to London.

The Berlin manuscript remained in Bavaria.

Nach dem am 26. Mai 1943 erfolgten Ableben meines Vaters brachte ich die Mani-chäischen Papyrusbücher aus Sicherheitsgründen in das bombensichere Verliess, das die Papyri der Berliner Museen aufgenommen hatte. Aber nach dem 20. Juli 1944 erschien mir auch dieser Platz nicht mehr sicker genug, besonders, da ja der Rest der noch nicht aufgearbeiteten Manibücher von Sir Chester Beatty in Berlin war, und ich entführte diese zusammen mit einer Berliner Handschrift nach Bayern in das Haus meines Schwiegervaters auf dem Lande. Dort kehrten nach Kriegsende die Teile des Chester Beatty-Besitzes nach London zurück.

Die Berliner Handschrift blieb in Bayern.

Alexander Böhlig has summarized what happened to the Manichaean codices as follows:[8]

The war brought the thriving editorial activity to an abrupt end. Besides, the air attacks brought with them an unusual endangering of the manuscript material. As a result, one went at moving them outside. The glassed pieces of the Chester Beatty collection were already by and large in London. The Berlin collection was, to the extent it was glassed, brought into one of the anti-aircraft towers at the Zoo train station, together with the not-yet-restored Mani manuscripts. In fact, at that time there were in the Berlin Papyrus Collection the not yet restored pieces from both the English and

Der Krieg machte der regen Editionstätigkeit ein jähes Ende. Die Luftangriffe brachten ausserdem eine ausserordentliche Gefährdung für das Handschriftenmaterial mit sich. Infolgedessen machte man sich an die Auslagerung. Die verglasten Stücke der Chester-Beatty-Sammlung waren bereits im wesentlichen in London. Die Berliner Sammlung wurde, soweit sie verglast war, in einen der Flaktürme am Bahnhof Zoo gebracht, zusammen mit den noch nicht restaurierten Mani-Handschriften; es befanden sich damals nämlich die noch nicht restaurierten Stücke

8. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 180–81.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the German holdings. Rolf Ibscher had already in 1940 taken the place of his father, who then died in 1943. Concern for the safekeeping of the manuscripts moved him, with the approval of General Director Kümmel, in November 1944 to bring the remainder of Sir Chester Beatty's Codices A and C (the Psalms and the Kephalaia), as well as a further manuscript, to Schondorf on the Ammers Lake in Upper Bavaria, into the house of his father-in-law. There Sir Chester Beatty had the parts of the Codices A and C picked up in the year 1946. The Manichaean texts that had been brought into the USSR, in connection with the action of the Soviet armed forces to make things secure, were given back to Berlin in the year 1958.

sowohl aus englischem wie aus deutschem Besitz in der Berliner Papyrussammlung. Die Sorge um die Sicherung der Handschriften bewog Dr. Rolf Ibscher, der schon 1940 an die Stelle seines dann 1943 verstorbenen Vaters getreten war, mit Genehmigung von Generaldirektor Kümmel im November 1944 die Sir Chester Beatty gehörigen Reste der Codices A und C (Psalmbuch und Kephalaia) sowie eine weitere Handschrift nach Schondorf am Ammersee in Oberbayern in das Haus seines Schwiegervaters zu bringen. Dort liess Sir Chester Beatty die Teile der Codices A und C im Jahre 1946 abholen. Die bei der Sicherstellungsaktion der sowjetischen Streitkräfte in die UdSSR geschafften manichäischen Texte wurden im Jahre 1958 nach Berlin zurückgegeben.

Rolf Ibscher had reported in 1955 about the fate of Sir Chester Beatty's codices:[9]

which on my own responsibility I had brought out of the danger zone of Berlin at the end of 1944 for the final phase of the war together with a Berlin manuscript (Codex No. 15998 [actually Sir Chester Beatty's Synaxeis Codex B] on the shrewd advise of my father-in-law, the publisher Wolf Henry Doering, into his secure house on the quiet Ammer Lake in Schondorf, a good hour from Munich.

die ich Ende 1944 auf den klugen Rat meines Schwiegervaters, des Verlegers Wolf Henry Doering, zusammen mit einer Berliner Handschrift (Codex Nr. 15998 [actually Sir Chester Beatty's Synaxeis Codex B]) auf eigene Verantwortung aus der Gefahrenzone Berlins für die Endphase des Krieges in sein sicheres Haus am stillen Ammersee in Schondorf, eine gute Stunde von München entfernt, gebracht hatte.

9. Ibscher, Rolf, "Das Konservierungswerk," 3.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Ibscher's phrase, "on my own responsibility," presents a different emphasis from Böhlig's phrase, "with the approval of General Director Kümmel." In any case, Kümmel would have difficulty retaining responsibility for a codex of the Berlin Papyrus Collection that was far away in Bavaria. If Kümmel had been informed of the plan to remove the codices of Sir Chester Beatty, he could well have taken the position that these materials were not formally under his control, hence he would not like to bear the responsibility for them, either in war-torn Berlin or elsewhere, and Ibscher could assume that responsibility and could act according to his own discretion. But it is hard to see how Kümmel could have formally approved of hiding Berlin Museum and Papyrus Collection holdings quite unofficially in Schondorf and at the invitation of a person neither on the museum staff nor otherwise officially involved in the safekeeping of the Museum's holdings.

Böhlig has similarly interpreted this rescue operation:[10]

Rolf Ibscher had the authorization from General Director Kümmel to get the Dublin material from the anti-aircraft tower and take it to Bavaria. He did this in the company of the Museum worker P. Seidel, who has since died. In the process the idea came to him that it would perhaps be useful, in case worst came to worst, also to take along one of the Berlin codices. This decision was, as far as I know, spontaneous. That it was worth it, is shown by the success. These things remained completely preserved, in contrast to what	Rolf Ibscher hatte von Generaldirektor Kümmel die Genehmigung, die Dubliner Materialien aus dem Flakturm zu holen und nach Bayern zu bringen. Er tat das in Begleitung des inzwischen verstorbenen Museumsarbeiters P. Seidel. Dabei kam ihm der Gedanke, es wäre vielleicht nützlich für den Notfall, auch einen der Berliner Codices mitzunehmen. Dieser Entschluss war meines Wissens spontan. Dass es sich gelohnt hat, zeigt der Erfolg. Diese Dinge blieben vollständig erhalten im

10. Böhlig, in a letter of February 10, 1986. For his concluding comment he refers to Søren Giversen's paper, "The Unedited Chester Beatty Mani Texts," 371, where Giversen listed the following extant material as belonging to the Chester Beatty Library: "The whole CB collection consists of somewhat 1040 pages of which only 334 have been published so far. I said somewhat 1040 pages—the exact number depends on how some very fragmented pages or remnants of pages are counted. These 1040 pages are: A) Psalmbook 546 pages, B) Unidentified codex 20 pages, C) 'Kephalaia' 358 pages, D) Homilies 98 pages, E) Addenda et Varia 20 pages." This makes a total of 1048 pages, of which he lists 334 as published, leaving 714 yet to be published.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the Soviets had "saved." Whether something was then confused when turned over to the emissaries of Chester Beatty, so that in the end result a Berlin part came to

Gegensatz zu dem, was die Sowjets "gerettet" haben. Ob dann bei der übergabe an die Abgesandten von Chester Beatty etwas verwechselt worden ist, so dass im Endeffekt

Rolf Ibscher described to Sir Chester Beatty the rescue operation in his broken English as follows:[11]

> The papyri were removed according to my arrangement from the bomb proof shelter (Zoo Bunker) in 1944 by my assistant at the Museum, Mr. Seidel, but Codex B [Synaxeis], sorry to say, seems to have been left behind. The reason being that the papyri had to be removed secretly in a frantic hurry, thus you can imagine how glad I was, when Mr. Seidel got past the SS-Guards with the invaluable little wooden box.
>
> This wooden box contained one Berlin manuscript [actually Sir Chester Beatty's Codex B, the Synaxeis] (for which I had specially asked Mr. Seidel) to make certain, that at l[e]ast part of the Berlin collection also was saved, in addition those papyri which reached you in London in 1947 after Dr. Böhlig had separated them at Schondorf.
>
> Thus Codex B [actually the Berlin Codex P^{15998}, the Letters], together with 3 Berlin manuscripts [P^{15996}, P^{15997}, P^{15999}] and all other glazed Berlin Manichaean Papyri of the Museum [P^{15995} and leaves of P^{15996}, P^{15997}, P^{15998}] were taken to Russia.

On November 1, 1960, I. E. S. Edwards of the British Museum's Department of Egyptian Antiquities wrote to Rudolf Anthes, then in Philadelphia, who had been assistant keeper of the Egyptian Department of the Berlin Museums in 1939, inquiring about the whereabouts of Beatty's papyri:

> I should like to know in particular whether there were many pages or few, and also whether Hugo Ibscher would have worked on them in the Museum or at home.

On November 9, 1960, Edwards wrote to R. J. Hayes, then head of the Chester Beatty Library:

> I have had a reply from Anthes who confirms what Böhlig says about Rolf Ibscher taking the Chester Beatty material to

11. Rolf Ibscher in a letter of October 6, 1955, to Sir Chester Beatty.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> Schondorf when the Flakturm was bombed (p. 5 [of the transcript of Böhlig's paper]).

In the archives of the Chester Beatty Library there is a black loose-leaf folder titled "Papyrus. Biblical Manichaean Hieratic. Greek etc. General Catalogue." In the section entitled "Manichaean Pap." there is a note dated May 1940:

> Mr. Allberry said that Dr. Ibscher had the remainder of Mr. Beatty's papyrus at his house in the country, at Klein Machnow (see letter from Allberry).

Böhlig has subsequently reported similarly concerning half-conserved Kephalaia material belonging to Berlin:[12]

Of the material in Berlin only a very small part has always remained in Berlin. It was the last 20 leaves of the Berlin Kephalaia book. They were conserved by Rolf Ibscher in the years 1952 and 1953.	Von dem in Berlin befindlichen Material war nur der kleinste Teil immer in Berlin geblieben; es waren die letzten 20 Blätter des Berliner Kephalaiabuches; sie wurden von Rolf Ibscher in den Jahren 1952 and 1953 konserviert.

Rolf Ibscher then reported similarly about the half-conserved remainder of the Berlin Kephalaia:[13]

The remains of the Berlin Kephalaia had escaped destruction by being stored in my house after 1945. The degree of difficulty in conserving them, which I overcame between 1951 and 1955, was worse than that which the Chester Beatty papyri displayed.	Der Schwierigkeitsgrad der Konservierung für die Reste der Berliner Kephalaia, die der Vernichtung durch die Aufbewahrung in meinem Haus nach 1945 entgangen waren und die ich zwischen 1951 und 1955 bewältigte, war schlimmer als ihn die Chester Beatty Papyri aufwiesen.

It would seem probable that what was stored in his house after 1945 had already been stored in his house during the war, a conjecture confirmed by Böhlig:[14]

12. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 182.
13. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 52.
14. Böhlig, in a letter of February 10, 1986, to the author.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

If half-conserved leaves of the Berlin Kephalaia, the material belonging to Sir Chester Beatty, and perhaps other book blocks or half-conserved leaves had been taken to the Ibscher home to be worked on there, it is unclear what of this material Rolf Ibscher took to the Zoo Bunker after his father's death of on May 26, 1943. At least some material remained in the Ibscher home throughout the war (cf. Böhlig's comment, "only a very small part," "the last 20 leaves of the Berlin Kephalaia book"). P[15999], referred to pejoratively as the wig, was apparently classified by itself, in that it was put on display as hopeless rather than as classified with the other Manichaean codices to be conserved. Thus it may well not have been in the Ibscher home for conservation. If Hugo Ibscher still worked some days in the museum, some unconserved or half-conserved material may have been still there for him to work on. Thus, it is indeterminate just what material stayed in Berlin throughout the war and postwar periods (or what was taken from the

Why did Rolf Ibscher also have material at home? He, like his father, always had material at home, since his father at his sixtieth birthday had received the right to work at home three days a week. When the papyri came into the Zoo bunker, the material on which he was working naturally remained in Ibscher's residence. That bombs would fall in the region of his residence—Kleinmachnow is incidentally not part of Berlin, but rather belongs to the district of Potsdam—was not exactly probable and in fact did not happen.

Warum Rolf Ibscher auch zuhause Material hatte? Er hatte wie sein Vater immer Material zuhause, weil sein Vater bei seinem 60. Geburtstag das Recht erhalten hatte, 3 Tage der Woche zuhause zu arbeiten. Als die Papyri in den Zoobunker kamen, blieb natürlich das Material in Ibschers Wohnung, an dem er arbeitete. Dass in die Gegend seiner Wohnung (Kleinmachnow ist übrigens kein Teil von Berlin, sondern gehört zum Bezirk Potsdam) Bomben fallen würden, war nicht gerade wahrscheinlich und ist ja auch nicht geschehen.

Ibscher home in Kleinmachnow to Schondorf on the Ammer Lake), what material went to the Zoo bunker and from there to Schondorf (no doubt via the Ibscher home in Kleinmachnow), and what material went to the Zoo bunker and from there to Leningrad (or at least in the direction of Leningrad) but did not return to Berlin in 1958. The major losses were the unconserved book blocks of P[15997], P[15998], and P[15999].

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

One can only postulate that all the conserved leaves of P15997 and P15998 and all the half-conserved leaves of P15996 and P15998 are all accounted for; four conserved leaves of P15996 do seem to be missing (see below).

Michel Tardieu describes the loss of the bulk of P15997 and P15998 as "detruit ou perdu durant la seconde guerre mondiale" ["destroyed or lost during the second world war."][15] Apparently, there was no loss during the war but only after the war.

Rolf Ibscher described what happened to the material taken to Leningrad:[16]

On August 29, 1960, Otto Firchow, director of the Egyptian Museum and Papyrus Collection in East Berlin, responded as follows to an inquiry about Beatty's codices from I. E. S. Edwards of the British Museum's Department of Egyptian Antiquities (according to the English translation preserved in the Chester Beatty Library archives):

> The papyri which Sir Chester Beatty sent to Dr. Ibscher shortly before the war were taken by the Russians to Leningrad together with the Berlin collection of papyri. I am however glad to be able to tell you that they were among those which came back safely. Only I and my wife, who has hitherto been Conservator of Papyri in the Museum, knew about their existence. To return them at the present moment would probably require considerable diplomatic intervention on the part of the British Foreign Office with the East German Government.
>
> I myself have been compelled to surrender during the past few days under political and personal pressure the Direction of the Berlin Musuem, Egyptian Department, and to flee to West Berlin. I have used this opportunity to take the Mani Papyri with me. In the next few days I will hand them over to the British Military Authorities. I consider that in this way this valuable material will eventually reach your hands.

Three Berlin codices [the unconserved book blocks of P15997, P15998, and P15999] and Codex B of Sir Chester Beatty [which in fact did not go into "exile"] have not reemerged thus far after the return of the Berlin papyrus col-	Drei Berliner Codices [the unconserved book blocks of P15997, P15998, and P15999] und Codex B von Sir Chester Beatty [which in fact did not go into "exile"] tauchten bisher nach Rückführung der Berliner Papyrussammlung aus dem Exil

15. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6.
16. Rolf Ibscher, "Mani und kein Ende," 220.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

lection from exile. In the case of such extensive objects something can always be overlooked and still be peacefully slumbering somewhere, or these very brittle codices crumbled into dust when transported, before they could be registered into the very conscientious protection with the very exactly executed salvage lists. Hence there are certainly hopes, and miracles are always taking place at all times, if one believes in them. I spoke about this with Professors Guber and Diakonov in 1954 in Cambridge and later also with Prof. Struve in Moscow in 1960.

noch nicht wieder auf. Bei so umfänglichen Objekten kann immer etwas übersehen werden und noch friedlich irgendwo schlummern, oder diese sehr mürben Codices sind beim Abtransport zerstäubt, bevor sie noch in die sehr gewissenhafte Obhut mit den sehr genau geführten Bergungslisten eingetragen werden konnten. Es bestehen also noch durchaus Hoffnungen, und Wunder geschehen immer zu allen Zeiten, wenn man an sie glaubt. Ich sprach darüber mit den Professoren Guber und Diakonov 1954 in Cambridge und später auch mit Prof. Struve in Moskau, 1960.

In September 1960 Edwards reported this to Beatty:

> Clearly Dr. Firchow found himself in an awkward position. I am sure that he will not part with the papyri unless he is satisfied that the military authorities will convey them safely, but there is always the risk that they will not agree to help. On the whole I should feel happier if he had left them in the Museum and I could have started negotiations with the Foreign Office. I am writing to him to ask him to let me know how matters stand at present and I shall also ask him to hold his hand unless he is absolutely sure that the military authorities can be trusted to deliver them safely. If he runs into difficulties I shall suggest that he takes them to Professor Grapow an old friend of mine in the Berlin Acadamy. We can then review the courses open to us.

The same day Edwards also wrote to R. J. Hayes, honorary director of the Chester Beatty Library:

> I have written to Sir Chester to let him know that the missing portion of his Mani codex has been traced in the Berlin Museum . . .
>
> As you will see events have taken a rather disconcerting turn and I shall write immediately to Firchow and urge him

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> to exercise the greatest care. Personally, I mistrust military authorities. However, it is quite clear that he cannot now return the papyri to the Museum and, if he runs into difficulties, I think his best course will be to deposit them with Grapow in the Berlin Academy. If there were any alternative I should not have chosen him, although I have known him for twenty-five years and I saw him last month in Moscow, but it is rather a case of faute de mieux [lack of better].

The Berlin Academy was in the Soviet sector, where Firchow probably would not have wanted to return to visit Grapow. Nor would Grapow have felt comfortable going to West Berlin to bring back to the Academy or to the Museum (also in East Berlin) what Firchow had secretly carried to West Berlin. There was a customs check between sectors, even if the wall became official only on August 13, 1961.

On September 15, 1960, Hayes replied to Edwards:

> It is great news about the Mani Papyri. I hope they will come through safely, but I would feel they were safer in British than in any German hands. Do you think I should ask a man I know in M. I. 5 to hold a watching brief? . . .
>
> Is the Russian returned material between glass or an unopened roll?

On September 20, 1960, Edwards replied to Hayes:

> I do not know whether the Russian returned material is between glass or if it is still in a pack. I saw Ibscher senior working on one pack when I was in Berlin in 1934, but I think that one belonged to the Berlin Museum. It was a large pack and must have contained at least 100 sheets. I cannot imagine that Firchow has removed as much glass as that from the Museum. My guess is therefore that it is still unglazed, but I may be wrong . . .
>
> The part remaining in Berlin is an unknown quantity, except to Firchow.
>
> Perhaps it would be better to leave an approach to your friend in M. I. 5 until we know exactly what we can ask him to do.

On September 26, 1960, Edwards wrote again to Hayes:

> I am delighted to be able to tell you that I have heard from Firchow that he has handed what he describes as "das Paket mit den Mani-Papyri" ["the packet with the Mani papyri"] to the British consul in Berlin.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> I am getting in touch with him and I hope we shall have the papyri safely here very soon. [An appended hand-written note: "The Bag Room at the F{oreign}.O{ffice}. reports that nothing has yet arrived."] Since he refers to a packet it seems to me unlikely that the papyri are already between glass.

On October 21, 1960, Edwards wrote again to Hayes:

> I heard yesterday that the Berlin Mani package will be arriving at London Airport next Sunday. I shall go and meet the bearer myself and I hope to be able to write on Monday saying that it has arrived safely.

On October 26, 1960, Edwards wrote to Beatty with a copy to Hayes:

> I am writing to let you know the result of our quest for the Mani papyri in Berlin.
>
> The operation, which I now realise is only the first round, did not turn out to be much of a success, I am sorry to say. Our Consul-General in Berlin and the Foreign Office were most helpful. The package was brought by a member of the diplomatic staff and I took delivery at London Airport last Sunday. By previous arrangement with the Customs it was opened at the Museum on Monday.
>
> Up to that point everything seemed to be running our way, but alas, on opening the package we found it contained only blank leaves of papyrus and a few inscribed fragments. It was most disappointing. [Papyrus Conservator Stanley] Baker will deal with the pages, but they will not yield very much, I fear.
>
> My guess is that we have received no more than the outermost leaves which Dr. Ibscher probably abstracted from the main body of the codex. The latter is, I suspect, still in Berlin and was overlooked by our friend, Dr. Firchow. I have written to him at the refugee camp in Hamburg, where he is now domiciled, and have told him my suspicions. Perhaps he will be able to suggest an explanation.
>
> For the present I feel the only course is to lie low and see who is appointed to the Berlin Museum as Dr. Firchow's successor. Obviously we do not want to do anything to embarrass either Dr. Firchow or the Consul-General. If the new Keeper of the Berlin Museum is someone whom I know and feel I can trust I can take up the problem anew without reference to the first attempt. I shall, however, have a better idea of what can be done when I have heard from Dr. Firchow whether he has left my letters in the files of the Museum.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> It is very sad that a quest which looked so promising should have suffered such an anticlimax, but I have not lost hope that we shall succeed in the end. However, I wish I could report that we had done so already.

On October 28, 1960, Firchow wrote Edwards; a translation of this letter is in the archives of the Chester Beatty Library:

> I received your letter with real dismay. I am so sorry that the important papyri have not reached you, but only material of relatively little value. Unfortunately, I did not know anything about the circumstances in which Sir Chester Beatty handed over the papyri to Dr. Hugo Ibscher, and in consequence, I supposed that they consisted only of those which my wife and I found in the packet. We alone have examined the packet—very hastily—since it was packed by Dr. Ibscher. Under the prevailing conditions we were unable to make a thorough examination of such fragmentary material; I did however recognize that it consisted of Mani fragments and I believed that I had found confirmation of this identification in your letter. We last saw the papyri in the office of the British Council General, Mr. Weymes. I can only remember one hieratic fragment.
>
> I agree that the material was not substantial and I hoped that the most important part had already been mounted by Ibscher before the war and had been sent back to Sir Chester Beatty. You are certainly right in supposing that the packet contained only odds and ends. But I am certain that the main body (of the papyri) is not in Berlin.
>
> In my opinion the papyri ought to be found with Dr. Rolf Ibscher probably already mounted and glazed. Dr. Hugo Ibscher used to carry out this kind of work in his own home. If I were still in Berlin, or if I had known about the matter a few months ago, I could have offered you my help. I should suggest that you get in touch with Rolf Ibscher, who has no connection with the Berlin Museum. Let me say again that the papyri cannot be in the Berlin Museum but must have been in Hugo Ibscher's private possession.
>
> While writing this letter my wife has told me that she actually remembered Dr. Ibscher speaking to her once about material belonging to Sir Chester Beatty which he had in his possession.
>
> It would certainly be better not to mention your personal correspondence with me. I have kept your letter among my personal papers. I sincerely hope that the affair will soon be satisfactorily settled. Please keep me in touch with developments.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Edwards wrote on November 1, 1960, to Hayes and Beatty in support of Rolf Ibscher's ignorance in the matter. To Hayes he wrote:

> I cannot myself think that Rolf Ibscher could have known anything about these papyri. He was working for Sir Chester Beatty for about four years and he would surely have told one of us if he had known of their existence. I feel we should regard him as a last resource.

To Beatty he wrote:

> Personally I do not think Rolf Ibscher would have kept quiet about these papyri if they had been in his possession when he was working for you. So, for the present anyhow, I do not intend to follow Firchow's advice to write to Rolf Ibscher. Instead I am writing to-day to Dr. Rudolf Anthes in Philadelphia and to Dr. [Günther] Roeder in Hildesheim to ask them if they can tell me anything helpful. Dr. Roeder was the Keeper of the Egyptian Department in the Berlin Museum when the war broke out and Dr. Anthes was Assistant Keeper. They are both good friends of mine and I am sure they will tell me all they know. I shall write again when I have heard from them.
>
> What I find so perplexing at present is to understand why Hugo Ibscher should have put the odds and ends in a packet in the Berlin Museum and have kept the main body of the papyri in his home. I should have thought that he would have taken all of them to the Museum when the war broke out.
>
> One difficulty, of course, is that we do not know exactly what we are looking for. Until the pages had been mounted no one could know anything about the contents. Another problem is the bulk of the missing material; was it large or small?

In the letter to Roeder the same day he explained:

> Some weeks ago Sir Chester Beatty happened to tell me that he had sent some of his Mani codex before the war to Dr. Hugo Ibscher in Berlin for mounting between glass. I told him that I knew that the Berlin papyri were back in the Museum and I promised to write to Dr. Firchow and ask whether the portions of Mani in question had come to light. The result of the inquiry was not satisfactory and Dr. Firchow has, he tells me, now left the Museum and Berlin.
>
> I wonder whether you have any recollection of having seen these papyri at any stage either in Dr. Ibscher's possession or in the Museum. It is possible that Dr. Ibscher had them in his home and if so the only one who could help would be Rolf

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> Ibscher. If possible, however, I do not want Rolf Ibscher to be involved in this matter because he and Sir Chester Beatty have had some differences over the mounting of the Mani papyri which were not sent to Dr. Hugo Ibscher.
>
> I realize that Dr. Ibscher probably received these papyri in the days when you were still at Hildesheim, but perhaps he told you something about them at the beginning of the war which would help now in recovering them.

In the letter to Anthes the same day he explained:

> Some time before the war Sir Chester Beatty sent to the Berlin Museum some of his Mani papyri for Dr. Hugo Ibscher to disentangle and to mount. In an attempt to trace these papyri I wrote to Firchow who was most helpful and sent me what he could find in Berlin, but it amounted to no more than a few blank pages and some fragments.
>
> As you know, Firchow has left the Museum and gone to Western Germany so he can do no more. However he says that he is certain that there are no more of Sir Chester's Mani papyri in the Museum.
>
> This is my question. Do you remember anything about these papyri? I should like to know in particular whether there were many pages or a few, and also whether Hugo Ibscher would have worked on them in the Museum or at home.
>
> I must mention that I think it would perhaps be a disservice to Firchow to let his part in this matter be known; I am sure you will regard it as confidential. I must also add that—at least at present—I do not want Rolf Ibscher to know that I am trying to trace these documents. He has been rather troublesome to Sir Chester Beatty and I am not very sure that I can count on his good will.

On November 9, 1960, Edwards again wrote Hayes his confidence in Rolf Ibscher:

> However, it does not seem likely that Rolf Ibscher would be working consciously on Chester Beatty material, even in Berlin, without obtaining Sir Chester's consent.
>
> I have a reply from Anthes who confirms what Böhlig says about Rolf Ibscher taking the Chester Beatty material to Schondorf when the Flakturm was bombed (p. 5 [of the typescript of Böhlig's Moscow speech]).

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On November 14, 1960, Hayes wrote Edwards:

> I also enclose another page of typescript (keep it also) that seems to me to be of great significance. There are so many mistakes in spelling in the German that I think it must be something Miss McGilligan typed from a manuscript note by Ibscher. I found it with the 13 leaves of Codex B [Synaxeis]. The words "Hauptmasse mit ca. 200 Blättern in Russland" ["the main mass with about 200 leaves in Russia"] seem to be just what we are seeking.

In 1957 and again in 1960, in the paper circulating among the English, Böhlig had identified the book block in Schondorf as the Synaxeis belonging to Beatty, but the English did not locate this identification. Thus, the search for the missing codex was gradually given up. I drew the attention of the staff of the Chester Beatty Library to this situation in 1985 and again in 1988.

Böhlig has provided further details about the material during and after the war:[17]

They were stored splendidly and securely in the anti-aircraft tower at the Zoo train station and, just before the division of Berlin went into effect, were taken by the Soviets quickly from the Zoo (English Sector!) to Friedrichsfelde Castle in the Russian part and were then put in storage in the USSR. And in this process not only papyri, but also other things got lost. Hence Warsaw too has its Mani leaves—someone found along the railroad tracks glassed papyrus leaves that had fallen out from the transport into the USSR.	Sie waren im Flakturm am Bahnhof Zoo glänzend und sicher aufbewahrt und wurden ganz kurz vor Inkrafttreten der Teilung Berlins von den Sowjets schnell vom Zoo (englischer Sektor!) ins Schloss Friedrichsfelde im russischen Teil gebracht und dann in die UdSSR ausgelagert. Und dabei sind nicht nur Papyri, sondern auch andere Dinge verlorengegangen. Daher hat auch Warschau seine Mani-Blätter (man hat an der Bahnstrecke verglaste Papyrusblätter gefunden, die aus dem Transport in die UdSSR herausgefallen waren).

Friedrichsfelde Schloss is a small castle, privately owned until 1945. Dr. sc. Wolfgang Müller, director emeritus of the Egyptian Museum and of the Papyrus Collection in East Berlin, has reported

17. Böhlig in a letter of February 5, 1986.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

that Rolf Ibscher told him that a few papyri were found near the castle and returned to the Papyrus Collection. Ibscher's report to Müller is the basis for the assumption that the crates were temporarily housed there.

The castle has subsequently been heavily restored, with a new roof and new inner construction throughout. But what necessitated the rebuilding seems not to have been war damage, but rather a general process of deterioration and in 1948–1949 reuse of the building as an adult education center for Berlin city government functionaries (according to Lothar Berfelde, see below). The castle's current guidebooklet reports on the restoration in the preface but without making clear the castle's condition in 1945:[18]

Immeasurable are the losses in monuments of history and culture in our city that were caused by the Second World War launched by German Fascism. Many valuable historical buildings were lost beyond recovery or were severely damaged. Other witnesses to our cultural heritage among buildings that were not directly affected by the war showed clear signs of deterioration due to long neglect under the domination of capitalism. From the very beginning it required the greatest exertions of our workers-and-peasant power to restore the substance of monuments thus destroyed. In spite of magnificent achievements of restoration and reconstruction in the center of our capital city, maintenance and restoration projects in the care of monuments must also be effectively carried out, in connection with the augmentation of measures for the reconstruction and modernization of the

Unermesslich sind die Verluste an Denkmalen der Geschichte und Kultur in unserer Stadt, die durch den vom deutschen Faschismus ausgelösten zweiten Weltkrieg verursacht wurden. Viele wertvolle historische Bauten gingen unwiederbringlich verloren oder wurden stark beschädigt. Andere nicht unmittelbar vom Krieg betroffene Zeugnisse unseres baulichen Kulturerbes zeigten durch lange Vernachlässigung unter der Herrschaft des Kapitalismus deutliche Spuren des Verfalls. Es bedurfte von Beginn an grosser Anstrengungen unserer Arbeiter- und Bauern-Macht zur Wiederherstellung der auf diese Weise zerstörten Denkmalsubstanz. Trotz grossartiger Restaurierungs- und Rekonstrucktionsleistungen im Zentrum unserer Hauptstadt müssen im Zusammenhang mit der Erhöhung der Baumassnahmen für die Rekonstruktion und die

18. Dathe, Schunchardt et al., "Vorwort."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

substance of old buildings, as was called for by the Tenth Party Congress of the Socialistic Union Party of Germany.

The completion of the Berlin Friedrichsfelde Castle is a worthy contribution to this, in demonstrating the continuous culture politics of our socialist state, directed toward the care of the cultural heritage and toward actively rendering it accessible. Thanks to the magnanimous support of the party of the working class and of the government of the German Democratic Republic, with its politics directed toward the well-being of the people, our capital city has become richer by an appealing tourist attraction, on the eve of the elections to the Volkskammer of the German Democratic Republic and of the Assembly of the city government of Berlin.

The extent of the restoration activities, as well as of measures to refinish and refurbish the interiors, was considerable. The difficult tasks in the care of monuments could only be undertaken in stages. The results attained, however, justify this special course, and will certainly instigate further initiatives for the maintenance of monuments and for making them accessible to society.

Modernisierung der Altbausubstanz, die der X. Parteitag der SED fordert, auch die denkmalpflegerischen Erhaltungs- und Wiederherstellungsarbeiten wirksam fortgesetzt werden.

Die Fertigstellung des Schlosses Berlin-Friedrichsfelde ist dazu ein würdiger Beitrag, der die kontinuierliche, auf die Pflege und lebendige Erschliessung des kulturellen Erbes gerichtete Kulturpolitik unseres sozialistischen Staates beweist. Dank der grosszügigen Unterstützung der Partei der Arbeiterklasse und der Regierung der Deutschen Demokratischen Republik mit ihrer auf das Wohl des Volkes gerichteten Politik ist unsere Hauptstadt am Vorabend der Wahlen zur Volkskammer der DDR und der Stadtverordnetenversammlung von Berlin um eine attraktive Sehenswürdigkeit reicher geworden.

Der Umfang der Wiederherstellungsarbeiten sowie der Ausgestaltungs- und Ausstattungsaufgaben für die Innenräume war beträchtlich. Nur schrittweise konnten die schwierigen denkmalpflegerischen Aufgaben in Angriff genommen werden. Die erreichten Ergebnisse jedoch rechtfertigen diesen besonderen Weg und werden sicher weitere Initiativen zur Erhaltung und gesellschaftlichen Erschliessung von Denkmalen auslösen.

In the introduction of the guide, the details of the cause of the damage to the building become more specific:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Meanwhile it was possible to restore the castle as an important part of this significant ensemble of monuments of building and gardening art. Due to the deficient care of buildings before and during the Second World War, the Friedrichsfelde Castle had suffered severe damages. Nonetheless, ever-increasing deteriorations, whose cause was not known back then, were even more grave. Whereas the original five-part building had only field stone foundations, the side parts added in 1719 were in addition erected on wooden piles. As a result of the lowering of the water table after the construction of a waterworks directly in the neighborhood of the park at the beginning of our century, the wooden parts, no longer resting in the area of the ground water, gradually rotted and increasingly led to considerable settlings of the building and severe cracking.

The restoration, as part of the maintenance of monuments, began with comprehensive measures to eliminate the dangers and secure the building, and thus began the new history of the Castle. The main interest was at first directed to the retaining or restoring of the exterior.

Als wichtiger Bestandteil dieses bedeutenden Denkmalensembles der Bau- und Gartenkunst konnte das Schloss inzwischen wiederhergestellt werden. Durch mangelnde Baupflege vor und während des zweiten Weltkrieges hatte das Friedrichsfelder Schloss beträchtliche Schäden erlitten. Schwerwiegender waren jedoch fortschreitende Zerstörungen, deren Ursache damals noch nicht bekannt war. Während der fünfachsige Ursprungsbau lediglich Feldsteinfundamente besass, waren die 1719 angefügten Seitenteile ausserdem noch auf Holzpfählen errichtet. Infolge der Grundwasserabsenkung nach dem Bau eines Wasserwerkes in unmittelbarer Nähe des Parkes zu Beginn unseres Jahrhunderts verrotteten die nicht mehr im Grundwasserbereich liegenden Holzteile allmählich und führten zunehmend zu erheblichen Bausetzungen und starker Rissbildung.

Mit umfassenden Massnahmen zur Gefahrenbeseitigung und Sicherung des Gebäudes begann die denkmalpflegerische Wiederherstellung und damit die neuere Geschichte des Schlosses. Das Hauptinteresse galt zunächst der Erhaltung bzw. Wiederherstellung des Aussenbaus.

In the description of the Historical Staircase:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The main staircase was restored in its early classicistic room arrangement. Whereas the reconstruction of the ceiling paintings had to be executed largely on the basis of fotos, there stood at our disposal in addition to the illusionistic wall paintings, in varying degrees of conservation, a part of the original wallpaper removed in 1947, as well as segments of wall paintings that had remained partially intact on the ground floor.

Das Haupttreppenhaus wurde in seiner frühklassizistischen Raumgestaltung wiederhergestellt. Während die Rekonstruktion der Deckenmalereien im wesentlichen nach Fotos ausgeführt werden musste, standen für die illusionistischen Wandmalereien zusätzlich ein Teil der 1947 entfernten originalen Leinwandbespannungen in unterschiedlicher Erhaltungsqualität sowie Befunde von partiell erhalten gebliebenen Wandmalereien im Erdgeschoss zur Verfügung.

Regarding the Garden Room:

In 1947 there were pieces of the interior decoration dating back to the Biedermeier period still intact. However, at the commencement of the comprehensive restoration of the castle there were no longer any historical decorative elements or objects of interior decorating.

1947 waren noch Ausstattungsstücke der Biedermeierzeit vorhanden. Zu Beginn der umfassenden Wiederherstellung des Schlosses gab es jedoch keine historischen Dekorationselemente oder Ausstattungsgegenstände mehr.

In the section titled "Dates on the History of the Castle" one reads:

1945 [actually 1948, according to Lothar Berfelde (see below)]: The Castle and park were taken over by the city government of Berlin.

1948–49: The castle was renovated into a home for school purposes.

August 27, 1954: The city government decided to develop a Zoo in Friedrichsfelde.

July 2, 1955: The opening of the Berlin Zoo.

1945 [actually 1948, according to Lothar Berfelde (see below)]: Übernahme vom Schloss and Park durch den Magistrat von Berlin.

1948–49: Ausbau des Schlosses zu einem Schulungsheim.

27.8.1954: Magistratsbeschluss zum Ausbau eines Tierparkes in Friedrichsfelde.

2.7.1955: Eröffnung des Tierparks Berlin.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

1966: The commencement of the first work to secure and restore the heavily destroyed castle.	1966: Beginn von ersten Sicherungs-arbeiten zur Wiederherstellung des stark zerstörten Schlosses.
Until 1971: The securing of the foundations.	bis 1971: Unterfangung der Fundamente.
1973: The erection of a new roof of steel construction with large triangular gables.	1973: Aufbringen eines neuen Mansardendaches (Stahlkon-struktion) mit grossen Dreieckgiebeln.

The guide of the conducted tour on March 9, 1986, explained that a Soviet command post ("Kommandantur") was housed in the castle in 1945, and that a distant relative of the former owner of the castle was afterwards permitted to use three rooms for a private museum for a few years.

Lothar Berfelde has moved his Gründerzeit-Museum to Mahlsdorf near Berlin in another building he restored. It has been put under governmental protection as a "collection," since private "museums" are not legal. He reported on April 18, 1986, that a Soviet command post occupied the castle from the spring of 1945 to the spring of 1946. Then when the castle was vacated, he was able to block a proposal to raze it, and was permitted to occupy part of it with the beginnings of his Museum for a couple of years. During the year that it was used as a command post he was aware of libraries being stored there until they could be transported to the Soviet Union, but he had no specific information about holdings of the state museums being stored there.

Thus, one may suppose that the museum objects were brought to the Friedrichsfelde Castle when it was a Soviet command post. At that time the building was apparently run down, but the dismantling of the interior would seem to have taken place beginning 1947, no doubt especially in 1948–1949 when the building was adapted into a school for city employees; the roof was first removed when the restoration was undertaken and a new roof installed in 1973. Thus, the building was sufficiently intact in 1945–1946 to have served as a temporary repository for crates moved from the Zoo bunker to await shipment to Leningrad, before the education center was installed. For 1947 seems to mark the date of the dismantling of interior architecture and the removal of antique furniture for this new purpose, and 1966 the beginning of the restoration that involved strengthening the foundations, replacing the roof, and completely redoing and refurbishing the interior. The building could presumably have housed the museum objects in 1945 without undue risk.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Joachim Karig has reported that the retreating German army had removed all railroad tracks east of Berlin and had cut all the ties in 1944–1945. During 1945 and 1946, this action no doubt made rail transportation of museum objects from Berlin to Leningrad bumpy, congested, and insecure. When whole factories and other movable objects moved east, works of art (which required several hundred railroad cars for the return to Berlin in 1958) might have had a lower priority. Karig recalled, e.g., a report that a quantity of grand pianos were seen beside the railroad tracks, exposed to the elements, apparently having been temporarily unloaded to provide boxcars for higher-priority transports to the east, or awaiting their turn for shipment east.

Berfelde reported further, from a childhood friend who worked for the German railroads, that the German railroad crews continued to operate the trains even after the end of the war. These crews were aboard German trains as far as the eastern border of Poland, where the Soviet railroads, with different gauges, began. Crossing Poland, trains laden with German items were at times stopped by train robbers. In a robbery, freight cars would be separated from the engine, in which the German crew was told to proceed down the tracks, leaving the freight cars unguarded in the countryside. There the freight cars would be looted before the authorities could be notified and police or soldiers sent to stop the looting. The one reporting this story attributed the practice of robbery to Poles resentful of the Soviet Union for not returning, at the end of the war, land the Soviets had occupied since 1939, when the Germans had invaded Poland. No doubt avarice also accounted for a Polish desire to share in the war booty.

Alexander Böhlig has reported:[19]

As a result of a rumor that papyri had been found on the rail line, the rail line was combed with success at the instigation of Prof. von Manteuffel.	Auf ein Gerücht hin, dass an der Bahnlinie Papyri gefunden worden seien, wurde auf Veranlassung von Professor von Manteuffel die Bahnlinie mit Erfolg abgesucht.

19. Böhlig, in a letter of February 10, 1986.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Böhlig has further clarified his initial comment:[20]

Professor von Manteuffel, responsible for papyrology before and after the war, was known to me personally. I went on a walk with him in London after the International Papyrologists' Congress in Oxford in 1937. I do not know whether he had a chair for ancient history or for classical philology in Warsaw; for papyrology alone there are hardly professorships. He was always a Pole with a well-formed national consciousness.

Der vor und nach dem Krieg für Papyrologie zuständige Professor von Manteuffel ist mir persönlich bekannt gewesen. Ich bin mit ihm im Anschluss an den internationalen Papyrologenkongress in Oxford 1937 in London spazierengegangen. Ob er etwa einen Lehrstuhl für Alte Geschichte oder Klassische Philologie in Warschau innehatte, weiss ich nicht; für Papyrologie allein gibt es ja kaum Professuren. Er ist immer ein ausgesprochen nationalbewusster Pole gewesen.

On July 12, 1986, Wincenty Myszor sent a report of his inquiries into what took place as follows:

The Manichaean manuscripts that are now in Warsaw cropped up shortly after the last war under circumstances that have not been fully clarified. There is always talk of a place Brodnica, near Torun [Thorn]. I have thus far received no answer to my letter of April 21, 1986, to the regional museum in Brodnica. There are also no documents in the archive of the Warsaw University and in the National Museum. The plates are thought to have been first in a private collection, then in some way [sold? acquired?] to have reached Prof. J. Manteuffel, the leader of the Institute for Papyrology of Warsaw University, and a part of the manuscripts turned over to Die manichäischen Handschriften, die sich jetzt in Warschau befinden, sind kurz nach dem letzten Krieg unter nicht ganz aufgeklärten Umständen aufgetaucht. Es wird immer über einen Ort Brodnica, bei Torun [Thorn], gesprochen. Auf meinen Brief an das Regional-Museum in Brodnica von 21. April 1986 habe ich bis heute keine Antwort bekommen. Es gibt auch keine Dokumente im Archiv der Warschauer Universität und im National-Museum. Die Platten sollen sich zuerst in einer Privatsammlung befunden haben, dann in irgendeiner Weise [gekauft? bekommen?] zu Prof. J. Manteuffel, dem Leiter des Instituts für Papyrologie der

20. Böhlig, in a letter of March 7, 1986.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the National Museum on deposit. There are also rumors according to which the plates in the National Museum came directly from Brodnica to Warsaw, to Prof. Michalowski. Prof. J. Manteuffel and Prof. K. Michalowski wanted to give the leaves back to Berlin. But they did not succeed in that. In the sixties the issue almost reached the Ministry. In any case there are still many questions that probably can no longer be answered. Thus one cannot say why the manuscripts are today preserved at two places. There is the view that this has to do with an exhibition in the National Museum. But there are in the National Museum also other manuscripts from the Berlin collection that Dr. Poethke from Berlin has once already seen. These manuscripts could have come to the Museum from a private collection.

Warschauer Universität gelangt und ein Teil der Handschriften dem National-Museum als Depot übergeben worden sein. Es gibt auch Gerüchte, nach denen die Platten im National-Museum direkt aus Brodnica nach Warschau, zu Prof. Michalowski gekommen seien. Prof. J. Manteuffel und Prof. K. Michalowski wollten die Blätter nach Berlin zurückgeben. Das ist ihnen nicht gelungen. In den 60er Jahren wäre diese Sache fast im Ministerium gelandet. Jedenfalls gibt es noch viele Fragen, die wahrscheinlich schon nicht mehr beantwortet werden können. So kann man nicht beantworten, warum die Handschriften heute an zwei Stellen aufbewahrt sind. Es gibt die Ansicht, dass dieses mit einer Ausstellung im National-Museum zusammenhinge. Es gibt aber im National-Museum auch andere Handschriften aus der Berliner Sammlung, die Dr. Poethke aus Berlin schon einmal gesehen hat. Diese Handschriften könnten direkt von einem Privatbesitz zum Museum gekommen sein.

Since there is no list of how many leaves Hugo Ibscher had actually conserved from Berlin's part of the Manichaean codices of Medinet Madi, it is unclear whether those in Warsaw are actually the only leaves not included in the return with other German museum holdings to East Berlin in 1958. No book blocks were returned, and hence, if in fact they had been included in those left in the zoo concrete bunker and taken to the Friedrichsfelde Castle and from there to Leningrad, they would be the only clear instance of material still completely missing.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Once the material was back in East Berlin, plans were initiated to resume its publication. Böhlig has reported on the steps leading to his being reassigned after the war to publish the Manichaean material, while he was still in East Germany.[21] He moved in 1963 to Munich and then to Tübingen, where he lived until his death in 1996:

In the year 1959 I then submitted to the German Academy of Sciences in Berlin a memorandum in which I pointed out how urgently the resumption of the editing of the Manichaean texts is. The Academy responded positively to this initiative and entrusted the undertaking to the Institut für griechisch-römische Altertumskunde, in order that its working group "Kommission für spätantike Religionsgeschichte" could assume responsibility for the continuation of the edition. At the session of the commission on May 13, 1960, this task was entrusted to me.

Im Jahre 1959 reichte ich daraufhin der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin eine Denkschrift ein, in der ich darauf hinwies, wie dringlich die Wiederaufnahme der Editionsarbeit an den manichäischen Texten sei. Die Akademie nahm zu dieser Anregung positiv Stellung and übergab das Unternehmen an das Institut für griechisch-römische Altertumskunde, damit dessen Arbeitsgruppe Kommission für spätantike Religionsgeschichte die Weiterführung der Edition in ihren Aufgabenbereich aufnehmen sollte. In der Kommissionssitzung vom 13. Mai 1960 wurde diese Aufgabe mir übertragen.

21. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 181.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:47 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Part Two

The Conservation by Rolf Ibscher

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 6 —

The Conservation of the Material in the State Museums of the Former East Berlin

The post-war activity has until recently consisted almost exclusively of Rolf Ibscher's conservation work. Ibscher made every effort to present himself in unbroken continuity with his father, and thus to build a career on his father's reputation. As he phrased it typically, "die Kunde von der Wunderleistung der konservatorischen Rettung durch meinen Vater" ["the report of the miraculous performance of the conservation rescue by my father"].[1] But it is rather clear that Rolf Ibscher began with fuzzy information and lack of experience. The former is indicated by his summary of the material cited above from 1954 and his revised summary in 1955:[2]

At the beginning of the 1930s the codices were purchased: three bundles and a vestige came to London into the possession of Sir Chester Beatty (Psalms, Codex B, Codex C, and the Homilies), and four bundles and a vestige to Berlin into the possession of the state museums (Kephalaia, Codex 15995, Codex 15998, Codex 15999, and 31 leaves of Codex

Anfang der dreissiger Jahre kamen durch Ankauf die Codices mit drei Konvoluten und einem Rest nach London in den Besitz von Sir Chester Beatty (Psalmbuch, Codex B, Codex C und die Homilien) und mit vier Konvoluten und einem Rest nach Berlin in den Besitz der Staatlichen Museen (Kephalaia, Codex Nr. 15995, Codex Nr. 15998, Codex Nr. 15999 und 31

1. Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 1.
2. Ibid.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

15997). The remainder of a quire acquired for Vienna by Grohmann could be added to the Kephalaia, Berlin's main text alongside of Codex 15998, containing the corpus of Letters and now in Schondorf in Upper Bavaria on Ammer Lake. It [the remainder in Vienna] comprises pp. 311–30.

Blätter des Codex Nr. 15997). Der durch Grohmann für Wien erworbene Lagenrest konnte der Kephalaia, Berlins Hauptschrift neben Codex Nr. 15998, das Briefcorpus enthaltend und jetzt in Schondorf/Obb in Oberbayern am Ammersee liegend, zugeführt werden. Er umfasst die Seiten 311–30.

Here the information available in Schmidt and Polotsky's published report is identified confusedly with the information in the Inventarbuch of the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR. The Berlin holdings themselves, except for some partially conserved leaves of P^{15996} and P^{15998} in the Ibscher home, were in Leningrad, inaccessible to Ibscher. One need merely enumerate the needed corrections of this summary, along with those itemized in the preceding chapter, to assess the fuzziness of the information with which Rolf Ibscher began: P^{15995} consists only of 31 leaves (which are not P^{15997}) and hence are not a bundle but only a vestige; P^{15996} should be listed as the inventory number of the Kephalaia; P^{15997} consists not merely of 31 leaves, hence it was not acquired as a vestige but was a complete codex, from which only some eight or nine leaves seem to have been removed by Hugo Ibscher before the war; Codex 15998 was among the material taken east rather than to Schondorf; P^{15999}, the other half of the London Homilies and hence to be designated a vestige, also went east. What was in Schondorf was actually Sir Chester Beatty's Codex B, the Synaxeis.

Hence, it is not surprising that material left half conserved and hence inadequately labeled by Hugo Ibscher in his home, should have been variously and unreliably identified by Rolf Ibscher.

Rolf Ibscher's inexperience becomes clear from a passing remark of 1954: "here in London I began with this work that my father had designated as the most difficult task of his life as a conservator, a life rich in difficult tasks. It was a task that I could entrust to myself since one expected it of me, although never before had I separated a leaf as a test under the supervision of my father. It was a risk, but a successful one."[3]

3. Ibscher, Rolf, "Wiederaufnahme," 11: ". . . hier in London begann ich mit dieser

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

That is to say, Sir Chester Beatty, no doubt grateful to Rolf Ibscher for having rescued his codices from the ruin of the war, quite unaware that Ibscher was still withholding one in Schondorf, and in response to Rolf Ibscher's appeals, engaged the son on the assumption he was, in the craft tradition of Europe, the father's only understudy and hence his qualified successor, whereas the son had in fact had no experience in the conservation of the Manichaean codices. Under permissive supervision at the British Museum, he inductively learned his trade. Rather jeopardize the codices than his own future!

On his return trip from London, Rolf Ibscher began conservation on the Synaxeis codex in Schondorf (see below), and in Berlin began to work at completing the conservation work of his father, on what had been in his home throughout the war.

In 1954 Rolf Ibscher himself had referred as follows to the beginnings of his conservation work on this material:[4]

Between my first [Oct–Dec 1951] and second [June–Oct 1952] London trips I succeeded in saving in Berlin the remainder of the Berlin Kephalaia manuscript. So some 20 leaves and leaf fragments came from it. The state of preservation of this outside pad of the codex was even more desolate than that of the remaining pads of the Psalms book I had worked on previously in London. I can understand that my father deferred again and again the separating off of these leaves and considered the possibility of giving up this part of the manuscript as unconservable. The leaves and fragments of leaves have meanwhile been impregnated and are awaiting the collaboration of the scholarly colleague,

Zwischen meiner ersten x–xii 51 [Oct–Dec 1951] und zweiten vi–x 52 [June–Oct 1952] Londoner Reise gelang es mir in Berlin den Rest der Berliner Kephalaiahandschrift zu retten. Es kamen dabei einige 20 Blätter und Blattfragmente heraus. Der Erhaltungszustand dieser Aussenlage des Codex war noch desolater als derjenige der Restlagen des zuvor von mir in London bearbeiteten Psalmenbuchs und ich kann verstehen, dass mein Vater immer wieder die Ablösung dieser Blätter hinausgeschoben und die Möglichkeit in Aussicht gestellt hatte, diesen Teil der Handschrift als unkonservierbar aufzugeben. Die Blätter und Blattfragmente

Arbeit, die mein Vater als die schwierigste Aufgabe seines an schweren Aufgaben reichen Konservatorenlebens bezeichnet hatte. Es war eine Aufgabe, die ich mir zutraute, weil man sie von mir erwartete, obgleich ich niemals je zuvor ein Blatt als Probe unter der Leitung meines Vaters abgelöst hatte. Es war ein Risiko, aber es gelang."

4. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 10–11.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

since from the material alone the arrangement and sequence of the leaves and fragments cannot [p. 11] be guaranteed with certainty.

sind inzwischen imprägniert und harren der Mithilfe des wissenschaftlichen Bearbeiters, da vom Material allein aus mit Sicherheit die Einordnung und Anordnung der Blätter und Fragmente nicht garan- [p. 11] tiert werden kann.

In his report in 1955, Rolf Ibscher summarized his work as follows: "Following the experimental separation of a few leaves of the Schondorf manuscript from Berlin, I attempted on my return home to Berlin in the winter months [of 1952] to separate and impregnate a residue of very fragmented leaves of the Kephalaia, which my father had also designated as 'inoperable.' These leaves should be definitively glassed this winter, at the beginning of 1956."[5]

Rolf Ibscher did in fact develop his own conservation techniques, which he considered vastly superior to those of his father.[6]

In September I could . . . see in the beautiful library of Sir Chester Beatty in Dublin the leaves of the Homilies and of the Psalms conserved by my father and reassure myself as to whether his method of impregnating them had proven itself over a period of 15 or 20 years. Nevertheless I have now decided to follow a proposal of Dr. Plenderleith of the laboratory of the British Museum and use a fixative recommended by him to strengthen the brittle papyrus weave.

Im September konnte ich . . . in der schönen Bibliothek Sir Chester Beatty's in Dublin die von meinem Vater konservierten Blätter der Homilien und des Psalmenbuches sehen und mich vergewissern, ob seine Imprägnierungsmethode über fast 15 bis 20 Jahre hin sich bewährt hatte. Dennoch habe ich mich jetzt entschlossen, dabei einem Vorschlag von Dr. Plenderleith vom Laboratorium des Britischen Museums zu folgen und ein von ihm empfohlenes Fixativ zur Festigung der mürben Papyrusgewebe zu benutzen.

5. Rolf Ibscher, "Das Konservierugswerk," 5: "Der probeweisen Ablösung von einigen Blättern der Schondorfer Handschrift aus Berlin folgte dann bei meiner Heimkehr nach Berlin in den Wintermonaten [of 1952] der Versuch, einen Restbestand sehr fragmentarisierter Blätter der Kephalaia abzulösen und zu imprägnieren, den mein Vater auch als "unauflösbar" bezeichnet hatte. Diese Blätter sollen im Winter Anfang 1956 definitiv verglast werden."

6. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 7–10.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The conservation thus moves in completely new paths. I have been able to develop a new procedure for separating the leaves, which permits one to separate intact also such leaves as dissolved into their component parts according to the method used by my father. On August 22, 1936, he suspended work on Codex C after he had been able to separate 47 leaves, and wrote in this regard: "The papyrus dissolves completely into its component parts in separating the individual leaves, and was held together only in the whole mass. Further investigation of the book block showed that already in antiquity the book had been very damaged. After one place that readily separated there followed at first 2 blank leaves and then very faded text of another hand, so that it appeared as if here another work began. Of course I think I have seen at one place a chapter title. In any case it was hardly worth working on the block after the empty leaves, since the writing will be able to be figured out only in a few places."—This turned out in the course of the work in 1952 and in this summer to be an error. I obtained 136 usable and in part very beautiful leaves. The few leaves with very faded handwriting can no doubt be made visible given the state of our modern photography. The Berlin manuscript in Schondorf displays the same deficiencies. But I hope that Pater Dolt of the Palimpsest Institute in the Cloister Beuron will help me to develop a

Die Konservierung geht damit völlig neue Wege. Ich habe ein neues Verfahren zur Ablösung der Blätter entwickeln können, das auch solche Blätter im Zusammenhang ablösen lässt, die nach der von meinem Vater geübten Methode sich in ihre Bestandteile auflösten. Am 22. August 1936 stellte er die Arbeit am Codex C ein, nachdem er 47 Blätter abheben konnte, und schreibt dazu: "Der Papyrus löste sich beim Abheben der einzelnen Blätter vollständig in seine Bestandteile auf und wurde nur in der ganzen Masse zusammengehalten. Bei weiterer Untersuchung des Buchblockes ergab sich, dass das Buch bereits im Altertum sehr zerstört war. An einer Stelle, die sich leicht löste, folgten zunächst 2 leere Blätter und dann sehr verblasster Text von anderer Hand, sodass es den Anschein hat, als wenn hier ein andres Werk begann. Allerdings glaube ich an einer Stelle eine Kapitelüberschrift gesehen zu haben. Jedenfalls lohnt es sich kaum, den Block von den leeren Blättern an zu bearbeiten, da die Schrift nur an wenigen Stellen zu entziffern sein wird."—Das stellte sich im Verlauf der Arbeit 1952 und in diesem Sommer als ein Irrtum heraus. Ich gewann 136 brauchbare und zum Teil sehr schöne Blätter. Die wenigen Blätter mit sehr verblasster Handschrift dürften beim Stande unserer modernen Photographie sichtbar gemacht werden können. Gleiche Mängel weist die Berliner Handschrift in Schondorf auf. Ich hoffe aber, dass Pater Dolt vom Palimpzest-Institut an Kloster Beuron mir helfen wird, ein brauchbares fotographisches usable photographical procedure to balance out this deficiency.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

My procedure for separating the individual leaves from the book blocks is characterized as the adjustable sloping plane. The leaf is compelled to draw itself off as it were by its own weight, over a very smooth parchment paper, that presents no resistance to the papyrus fiber, laid above on the book block. With tweezers and a thin scalpel only a bit of supplemental help is provided in pushing the leaf in front of them over the slanting plane and carefully separating the fibers ruined by pressure and salt crystals. I would like to name this procedure "the extremely freewheeling method."

My father, on the other hand, lifted off the individual leaf without such a slanted support. He lifted the individual fragments separated from each other onto a paper support lying next to the book block and attempted to advance the leaf with extreme carefulness in its entirety from the book block off onto this support. This procedure presupposed an incredibly sure hand and an equally unimaginable gift of recollection, to transfer the fragmentary splinters with absolute certainty into the right arrangement. The individual fragment would have to come immediately with certainty into its right place, since every grasping with the tweezers in the case of especially rotted leaves immediately led such small fragments to break down into dust. I would like to name this procedure

Verfahren zu entwickeln, um diesen Nachteil auszugleichen.

Mein Verfahren, die einzelnen Blätter von den Buchblöcken abzuheben, wird durch die verstellbare schiefe Ebene gekenn-zeichnet. Das Blatt wird genötigt, sich gleichsam durch sein eigenes Gewicht über ein sehr glattes, der Papyrusfaser gar keinen Widerstand entgegensetzendes Pergaminpapier, das auf den Buchblock oben aufgelegt wird, abzuziehen. Mit Pinzette und dünnen Skalpells wird lediglich nachgeholfen, das Blatt vor ihnen her über die schiefe Ebene zu schieben und die durch Pressung und Salzkristalle verbackenen Fasern vorsichtig zu trennen. Ich möchte dieses Verfahren "the extremely freewheeling method" bezeichnen.

Mein Vater hob dagegen das einzelne Blatt ohne solche schräge Unterlage ab. Er hob die einzelnen Fragmente getrennt auf eine neben dem Buchblock liegende Papierunterlage und versuchte, mit äusserster Behutsamkeit das Blatt in seiner Gesamtheit vom Buchblock weg auf diese Unterlage zu befördern. Dieses Verfahren setzte eine unvorstellbar ruhige Hand voraus und eine ebenso unvorstellbare Gabe des Erinnerungsvermögens, die Fragmentsplitter mit absoluter Sicherheit in der richtigen Anordnung zu übertragen. Das einzelne Fragment musste sofort sicher an seinen richtigen Platz kommen, da jedes Anpacken mit den Pinzetten bei besonders vermorschten Blättern sofort dazu führte solche kleinen Fragmente zu Staub zerbröckeln zu lassen. Ich möchte dieses Verfahren "the very delicately compelling method" nennen.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

"the very delicately compelling method."

To the new method of separating leaves and the handling of the separated leaves with a new fixative, in order to impede or eliminate the inner decomposition of the very degenerated material, will be associated the new glassing of the impregnated leaves, in that, instead of simple glass, now plexiglass will be used. To be sure it is very expensive, but it does not break and is very light and permits one to photograph the individual leaf even through the glass with infrared or ultraviolet light in order to entice out the faded writing. The electric effect can unfortunately thus far be eliminated only for a brief time by means of a special substance, so that laying the leaf between the glass panes is not difficult. The magnetic effect proves to be very unpleasant and dangerous when one is compelled to take the leaf out of the glasses again. Equally disagreeable is the fact that plexiglass, in distinction from simple glass, is very sensitive and gets abrasions or scratches immediately with careless handling. And it is a risk, how plexiglass in the course of decades reacts to climatic conditions and whether it darkens or not.

Whether the disadvantages or advantages in using plexiglass over conserving the leaves between simple glass panes will dominate will become clear after a few years, when it becomes necessary to reconserve the leaves again. And this necessity will emerge, even if the

Der neuen Ablösungsmethode und Behandlung der abgelösten Blätter mit einem neuen Fixativ, um den inneren Zerfall des sehr angegriffenen Materials aufzuhalten bzw. zu beseitigen, wird sich die neuartige Unterbringung der imprägnierten Blätter gesellen, indem anstelle des einfachen Glases jetzt das Perspexglas treten wird, das zwar sehr teuer, aber unzerbrechlich und sehr leicht ist und gestattet, das einzelne Blatt auch durch das Glas hindurch mit infrarotem oder ultraviolettem Licht zwecks Hervorzauberung der verblassten Schrift zu fotografieren. Der elektrische Effekt geht leider bisher nur für kurze Zeit durch ein Spezialmittel zu entfernen, sodass das Zwischenlegen zwischen die Glasscheiben keine Mühe verursacht. Sehr unangenehm und gefährlich erweist sich die magnetische Wirkung, wenn man genötigt ist, das Blatt noch einmal aus den Gläsern herauszunehmen. Ebenfalls unangenehm ist es, dass Perspexglas im Gegensatz zu einfachem Glas sehr empfindlich ist und Schrammen oder Kratzer sofort bei unpfleglicher Behandlung erhält. Und ein Risiko ist es, wie sich Perspexglas im Laufe von Jahrzehnten verhält gegen Witterungseinflüsse und ob es blind wird oder nicht.

Ob die Nachteile oder Vorteile bei der Benutzung von Perspexglas gegenüber der Unterbringung der Blätter zwischen einfachem Glas dominieren werden, wird sich nach einigen Jahren herausstellen, wenn die Notwendigkeit sich ergibt, die Blätter aufs neue umzuglasen. Und rescued leaves are stored carefully and with constant temperature and protected from climatic influences, since the papyrus material between the glasses begins to work in the course of time, in spite of the impregnation, which only serves to strengthen the rotted papyrus substance and slow down further decomposition, just as did the earlier treatment of the leaves, the dusting with zapon lacquer applied by my father.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Subterranean water and inundation water has in the course of the centuries soaked through the book block. The salt residue cannot be soaked out in conservation by means of baths. Every additional dampness would inescapably dissolve the papyrus substance between the papyrus fibers into a sticky soupy mess. But the infiltration with salty elements, this enrichment of the papyrus substance with ingredients containing salt, produces in the course of time, and especially with changes of temperature, a blue-like film on the glass panes, because of which seeing through the glass is disturbed and the traces of writing, often only weakly distinguishable from the very darkened papyrus material, is hardly still perceptible. In such a case the only thing that helps is to take the leaves out of the glasses and, after cleaning the glasses of this blue-like film to reglass them.

For this reason too there emerges for photography here a special task, not only for reasons of security, as the most recent sad

diese Notwendigkeit wird sich ergeben, auch wenn die geretteten Blätter sorgsam und bei gleichmässiger Temperatur und geschützt vor Witterungseinflüssen aufbewahrt werden, weil trotz der Imprägnierung, die ja nur der Festigung der morschen Papyrussubstanz dient und den weiteren Zerfallsprozess aufhalten soll, ebenso wie die frühere Behandlung der Blätter durch die von meinem Vater angewandte Bestäubung mit Zaponlack, das Papyrusmaterial zwischen den Gläsern im Laufe der Zeit zu arbeiten beginnt.

Grund- und Überschwemmungswasser hat im Laufe der Jahrhunderte die Buchblöcke durchtränkt. Die salzigen Rückstände können bei der Konservierung nicht durch Bäder ausgelaugt werden. Jede zusätzliche Feuchtigkeit würde die Papyrussubstanz zwischen den Papyrusfasern unweigerlich sofort in eine schmierige breiige Masse auflösen. Aber das Infiltrat von salzhaltigen Elementen, diese Anreicherung der Papyrussubstanz mit salzhaltigen Ingredienzien bewirkt im Laufe der Zeit und ganz besonders bei Temperaturschwankungen einen bläulichen Niederschlag auf den Glasscheiben, wodurch die Sicht durch das Glas getrübt wird und die oft sich nur schwach vom stark gebräunten Papyrusmaterial abhebenden Schriftspuren kaum noch wahrnehmbar werden. In solchem Fall hilft da das Eine, die Blätter aus den Gläsern herauszunehmen und sie nach Reinigung der Gläser von diesem bläulichen Scheibenbelag von neuem zu verglasen.

Aus diesem Grunde erwächst auch der Fotographie hier eine besondere Aufgabe, nicht nur aus Sicherheitsgründen, wie die jüngste traurige Vergangenheit es gelehrt hat,

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

past has taught us, and as an indispensable supplement and help for the reader. One should, preferably immediately after conservation, or, if that is not possible, very soon after the definitive glassing, photograph each individual leaf without imperfection before any impediment to legibility can emerge. I concede that no photography, no matter how perfect it may be technically, even if it exceeds the most demanding requirements, can replace the unimpeded work on the direct original, but at some time the time will arrive that in future times, even if we leave catastrophes completely out of view, a repeated reglassing of the Manichaean papyri will simply no longer be possible, since this most sensitive of all papyrus materials that have emerged will no longer permit such a procedure of reglassing even with the most careful handling.

Hence the problem of the best possible photographic recording of each of these precious leaves must be solved now, as an aid for the reader, the interpreter, and precisely as a prophylactic means that can endure over the centuries.

und als unentbehrliches Ergänzungs- und Hilfsmittel für den Leser, dass es hier gelingt, sofort nach der Konservierung am besten oder wenn das noch nicht möglich werden sollte, sehr bald nach der definitiven Verglasung, jedes einzelne Blatt einwandfrei im Bild aufzunehmen, bevor irgendwelche Sichtbehinderungen auftreten. Ich gebe zu, dass keine Fotographie, und mag sie technisch noch so einwandfrei sein, mag sie anspruchsvollste Forderungen überbieten, die einwandfreie Arbeit am direkten Original ersetzen kann, aber einmal wird der Zeitpunkt eintreten, dass in künftigen Zeiten, wenn wir Katastrophen dabei völlig ausser Acht lassen, eine mehrmalige Umglasung der Manichäischen Papyri einfach nicht mehr möglich sein wird, da dieses empfindlichste aller bisher aufgetretenen Papyrusmaterial die Prozedur des Umglasens bei sorgsamster Handhabung nicht mehr zulassen wird.

Daher muss das Problem der bestmöglichen fotographischen Bestandaufnahme jedes einzelnen dieser kostbaren Blätter jetzt gelöst werden als Hilfsmittel für den Leser, den Interpreten und eben als prophylaktisches Mittel, das die Jahrhunderte überdauern kann.

In 1960 Böhlig then reported as follows on Rolf Ibscher's work on this material:[7]

7. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 182.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

. . . the last 20 leaves of the Berlin Kephalaia book . . . were conserved by Rolf Ibscher in the years 1952 and 1953. The urgently needed reglassing of all the pieces that had been glassed by Hugo Ibscher and returned to Berlin in 1958 was undertaken by Rolf Ibscher beginning in June of this year (1960), along with the conservation of a few half-conserved leaves that Ibscher Sr. had at first put to one side as too difficult, doubtlessly correctly, for it has to do usually with double or triple leaves.

. . . die letzten 20 Blätter des Berliner Kephalaiabuches . . . wurden von Rolf Ibscher in den Jahren 1952 und 1953 konserviert. Die dringend notwendige Umglasung aller von Hugo Ibscher verglasten und 1958 nach Berlin zurückgekehrten Stücke hat Rolf Ibscher seit Juni dieses Jahres (1960) in Angriff genommen, ebenso die Konservierung einiger halbkonservierter Blätter, die Ibscher sen. zunächst—sicher mit Recht, handelt es sich doch dabei meist um Zwillings- oder Drillingsblätter—als zu schwierig beiseite gelegt hatte.

Rolf Ibscher reported as follows in 1964–1965 on the final conservation of this material and on the reglassing of the material returned from Leningrad:[8]

[p. 52] The remains of the Berlin Kephalaia had escaped destruction by being stored in my house after 1945. The degree of difficulty in conserving them, which I overcame between 1951 and 1955, was worse than that which the Chester Beatty papyri displayed. Unfortunately a marvellous leaf, after being separated [from the book block], was lost, completely atomized. I had to sneeze, but could not turn away with lightening speed—and all had disappeared without a trace.

[p. 62] One has to do here with the reglassing of the Kephalaia. More than half has been accomplished . . . [p. 63] After the

[p. 52] Der Schwierigkeitsgrad der Konservierung für die Reste der Berliner Kephalaia, die der Vernichtung durch die Aufbewahrung in meinem Hause nach 1945 entgangen waren und die ich zwischen 1951 und 1955 bewaltigte, war schlimmer als ihn die Chester Beatty-Papyri aufwiesen. Leider ging mir ein wundervolles Blatt nach seiner Ablösung restlos atomisiert verloren. Ich musste niesen, konnte mich nicht blitzschnell abwenden—und alles war spurlos verschwunden.—

[p. 62] Es geht da um die Umglasung der Kephalaia. Sie ist über die Hälfte gediehen . . . [p. 63] Nach den Kephalaia

8. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 52, 62, 63.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Kephalaia, groups of the codices Nr. 15[9]95, 15[9]97 and 15[9]98 still must be reglassed, along with a sizable number of leaves separated last, quite provisionally, by my father, with an entry on the paper cover that protected them which really creates puzzles: "from the codex B," i.e. then Chester Beatty [Synaxeis] or ?—and with the addition put in parentheses "Letters," i.e. then again Codex Nr. 15[9]98. What is one to make of that? But there is also among these leaves one with the number 361. To what does this belong?

müssen noch Gruppen der Codices Nr. 15[9]95, 15[9]97 und 15[9]98 umgeglast werden, sowie eine stattliche Anzahl zuletzt ganz provisorisch von meinem Vater abgelöster Blätter mit einer wahrlich Rätsel schaffenden Eintragung auf der sie bergenden Papierhülle: "aus dem Codex B", d.h. also Chester Beatty oder ? und mit dem in Klammern gesetzten Zusatz "Briefe", d.h. dann wieder Codex Nr. 15[9]98. Was soll das? Aber auch unter diesen Blättern ist eines mit der Nummer 361. Wozu gehört dieses?

Ibscher's situation with regard to the material in East Berlin was rendered all the more serious by the departure for Tübingen in 1963 of Alexander Böhlig, the scholar commissioned to edit the material; Böhlig hence terminated his involvement:[9]

[p. 54] And even Alexander Böhlig suddenly bailed out, when the resolution [of the twenty-fifth International Congress of Orientalists in Moscow in August 1960 favoring the publication of the Manichaica], with its confidently sounding tone, remained unnoted on all sides, and turned to a new illustrious task, possibly more suited to him.

Und gar Alexander Böhlig sprang plötzlich ab, als die Resolution [of the twenty-fifth International Congress of Orientalists in Moscow in August 1960 favoring the publication of the Manichaica] mit ihrem zuversichtlich stimmenden Klange allenthalben unbeachtet blieb und wandte sich einer neuen möglicherweise ihm mehr gemässen illustren Aufgabe zu.

In Rolf Ibscher's last article of 1965 he described his reconservation experience:[10]

10. Ibscher, "Mani und kein Ende," 221–22.

9. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 54.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The difficulties that emerge in reglassing vary, just as in separating off individual leaves from the book blocks. But here no "inclined plane" helps, my method for simplifying the separating of leaves, over against the procedure used by my father, this discovery of mine in the last moment before failure, thanks to desperation and the grace of the moment, or of luck. What would a restorer be when confronted with the unusual, the unique object, in the right moment, en kairo, without the igniting spark of genius! To sense this magical impulse in all creative realms and vocations would be worth a carefully interpretive investigation!

But the inflexible glass required extreme care in disengaging the leaves from the panes, which split the papyrus layers that lie at right angles to each other. The fixing down of the fragment parts also naturally called for great effort after reglassing. The slightest unevenness in the glass causes bad slippage when taping the edges, and often the glass plates must be reopened two or three times, even in the case of the old smooth glasses that my father had tested. Even in my father's time that happened often enough. Then if the material lies for a while, it settles down on its own.

Probably, after this first basic total reglassing, one has the assurance that now, with correct, consistently climatized storing of the restored discovery, no new

Die Schwierigkeiten, die sich bei einer Umglasung ergeben, variieren, genau wie beim Ablösen der einzelnen Blätter von den Buchblöcken. Hier hilft aber keine "Schiefe Ebene," meine Erleichterungsmethode des Ablösens, gegenüber dem von meinem Vater geübten Verfahren, diese meine Erfindung in letzter Minute vor dem Scheitern aus Verzweiflung und Gnade des Augenblicks oder Glücks. Was wäre ein Restaurator vor dem seltenen einmaligen Objekt im rechten Augenblick en kairo ohne den zündenden Funken des Genius. Diesem magischen Impuls in allen schöpferischen Bereichen und Berufen nachzuspüren wäre schon wert einer vorsichtig deutenden Untersuchung!

Das unflexible Glas aber verlangt äusserste Vorsicht beim Ablösen der Blätter von den mitunter die kreuzweisen Papyruslagen spaltenden Scheiben. Grosse Mühe bereitet natürlich auch nach dem Umglasen das Festigen von Fragmentteilen. Die geringste Unebenheit im Glas verursacht böses Verrutschen beim Rändeln, und oft müssen selbst bei den alten planen Gläsern, die mein Vater erprobt hatte, die Glasplatten zwei- und dreimal nochmals geöffnet werden. Auch zu meines Vaters Zeit kam das oft genug vor. Liegt das Material dann erst eine Weile, so beruhigt es sich ganz von selbst.

Wahrscheinlich wird nach dieser ersten grundlegenden totalen Umglasung die Gewähr bestehen, dass nun bei richtiger, konsequent wohltemperierter Lagerung des restaurierten Fundes keine neuen

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

condensations will occur between the glass panes.

[p. 222] The Berlin part of the discovery, with the exception of the codex that is in West Berlin, has been for some time undergoing reglassing, and, if no new illness puts me out of action, should be completed by the fall of 1966. A remainder of provisionally rescued material that my father had separated off last and that is still in the first stage of conservation should then follow. Dr. Dr. Nagel of the Institut für Byzantinistik in Halle, successor to Böhlig, has taken over the still unread leaves energetically and with devoted care and love. Also this deserves to be mentioned, that the important problem of the photographability is in the process of being well solved thanks to his tireless activity.

Kondensationen zwischen den Gläsern auftreten werden.

[p. 222] Der Berliner Fundanteil, mit Ausnahme des in Westdeutschland befindlichen Codex, wird seit geraumer Zeit umgeglast und dürfte, wenn keine neue Erkrankung mich ausser Gefecht setzt, bis Herbst 1966 abgeschlossen sein. Ein Rest provisorisch gesicherten Materials, das mein Vater zuletzt ablöste und das sich noch im ersten Stadium der Konservierung befindet, soll dann folgen. Der noch ungelesenen Blätter nimmt sich Dr. D. Nagel vom Institut für Byzantinistik in Halle in Nachfolge von Böhlig tatkräftig, mit hingebender Umsicht und Liebe an. Auch das verdient genannt zu werden, dass das wichtige Problem der Fotografierbarkeit dank seiner unermüdlichen Tatkraft auf dem besten Wege ist gelöst zu werden.

Wolfgang Müller's obituary for Rolf Ibscher reported his death on February 5, 1967, with the following relevant information:[11]

Chosen by the world-renowned "papyrus doctor," Hugo Ibscher, to be his successor, the graduate of the humanistic gymnasium in Berlin-Charlottenburg in 1928 began the study of classical philology at the University of Berlin, which he completed in 1938, after an interruption and temporary activity as assistant restorer in the Papyrus Collection, with graduation in Munich. Again apprentice years followed, in which Rolf

Vom weltbekannten "Papyrusdoktor" Hugo Ibscher zu seinem Nachfolger bestimmt, begann der Abiturient des humanistischen Gymnasiums in Berlin-Charlottenburg 1928 das Studium der klassischen Philologie an der Universität zu Berlin, das er nach Unterbrechung und zeitweiliger Tätigkeit als Hilfsrestaurator in der Papyrus-Sammlung 1938 in München mit der Promotion abschloss. Wieder folgten

11. Müller, "In memoriam Rolf Ibsicher," 207.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Ibscher, under the critical eyes of his father, gained the technical assurance of all stages of the work, until he accredited himself more and more after the Second World War with significant achievements of his own, as a conservator of international stature in his own right. Thus he succeeded largely in completing the conservation of the famous Coptic papyrus codices with Manichaean texts in Berlin and Dublin, whose restoration had been interrupted by the death of his father in 1943 . . .

Lehrjahre, in denen Rolf Ibscher unter den kritischen Augen des Vaters die technische Sicherheit aller Arbeitsgänge erwarb, bis er sich in zunehmendem Masse nach dem zweiten Weltkriege mit bedeutenden eigenen Leistungen als selbständiger Konservator von internationalem Rang erwies. So gelang es ihm, die Konservierung der berühmten koptischen Papyruscodices mit manichäischen Texten in Berlin und Dublin, deren Wiederherstellung durch den Tod des Vaters 1943 unterbrochen war, weitgehend zu vollenden . . .

Otto Werner Luke, Rolf Ibscher's assistant, completed the reconservation of the Kephalaia after Ibscher's death:[12]

He could not complete the work by the time of his death, so that the continuation was entrusted to me. [p. 152] Ca. 70 leaves still had to be freed of the milky film and reconserved.

The difficult technical procedure should be briefly described. The individual papyrus leaves lie, as has been already mentioned, between glass panes that a strip on the edges holds together. This has first to be cut open on three sides, in order to lift up one of the glass panes. Here it became clear that the fine papyrus material in many cases, as a result of the early handling with laquer, was so firmly stuck to the glass panes that it could be separated off only with the greatest care with a spatula.

Er konnte die Arbeit bis zu seinem Tode nicht vollenden, so dass mir die Weiterführung anvertraut wurde. Es mussten [p. 152] noch ca. 70 Blätter von der milchigen Eintrübung befreit und umgebettet werden.

Der schwierige technische Vorgang soll in Kürze dargestellt werden. Die einzelnen Papyrusblätter liegen, wie erwähnt, zwischen Glasplatten, die ein Randstreifen zusammenhält. Dieser muss zunächst an drei Seiten aufgeschnitten werden, um eine der Glasplatten anheben zu können. Dabei stellte es sich heraus, dass das feine Papyrusmaterial in vielen Fällen infolge der früheren Behandlung mit Lack an den Gläsern so fest haftete, dass es nur

12. Luke, "Die Umkonservierung," 151–52.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

This had to be done with full concentration, since the papyrus came loose only centimeter by centimeter and the work on one side often called for hours of work. Any careless movement of the hand endangered the object, since the papyrus fiber is so fine that it can be rubbed into powder without difficulty.

The papyrus loosened from a glass plate was, in order to prevent new sticking, covered with parchment paper and a pane of glass. In this way it was possible to turn the leaf on this firm foundation and to work on the second side in the same way. Finally the papyrus, now lying between parchment paper, was taken from the glass plates, which were to undergo a basic cleansing. The papyrus preserved between the parchment paper, by reversing the work procedure, again comes between the glass plates, that then were attached anew. The strips used here then received, to make them hold better, a stroke of color and lacquer.

The papyrus itself is held only by means of the pressure of the glass panes. No adhesive may come into contact with the fine papyrus material. Whereas an individual complete papyrus leaf is held in its position well by the pressure, the holding in place of fragments is especially difficult, since with the slightest unevenness in the glass and any shaking, it can slide and be destroyed. For this reason, the completed plates unter grösster Vorsicht mit einem Spachtel abzuheben war. Dies musste mit aller Konzentration geschehen, da der Papyrus nur zentimeterweise sich löste und die Arbeit an einer Seite oft Stunden in Anspruch nahm. Jede unvorsichtige Handbewegung gefährdete das Objekt, da die Papyrusfaser so fein ist, dass sie sich ohne Schwierigkeit zu Pulver verreiben lässt.

Der von einer Glasplatte gelöste Papyrus wurde, um erneutes Ankleben zu verhüten, mit Pergaminpapier und einer Glasscheibe bedeckt. Damit war es möglich, das Blatt auf dieser festen Unterlage zu wenden und die zweite Seite auf gleiche Weise zu bearbeiten. Schliesslich wurde der Papyrus, jetzt zwischen Pergaminpapier liegend, von den Glasplatten genommen, die einer gründlichen Reinigung zu unterziehen waren. Der zwischen dem Pergaminpapier aufbewahrte Papyrus gelangte durch Umkehrung des Arbeitsvorganges wieder zwischen die Glasplatten, die dann neu verklebt wurden. Die hierbei verwendeten Streifen erhielten anschliessend zur besseren Haltbarkeit einen Farb- und Lackanstrich.

Der Papyrus selbst wird nur durch den Druck der Glasplatten gehalten, irgendwelche Klebstoffe dürfen mit dem feinen Papyrusmaterial nicht in Berührung kommen. Während ein einzelnes vollständiges Papyrusblatt durch den Druck gut in seiner Lage gehalten wird, gestaltet sich die Festlegung von Fragmenten besonders schwierig, da sie durch die geringsten Unebenheiten im Glas

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

are stored in boxes horizontally. Thus the reconservation of the Kephalaia codex is completed, which is to be hoped will prevent a new cloudiness on the papyrus material.

und durch Erschütterungen verrutschen und zerstört werden können. Aus diesem Grunde werden die fertigen Platten horizontal in Kästen aufbewahrt. Damit ist die Umkonservierung des Kephalaia-Kodex abgeschlossen, die hoffentlich eine Neueintrübung des Papyrusmaterials verhindern wird.

Plans for Peter Nagel to complete the editing of the Kephalaia were not realized, and Rolf Ibscher died without a scholar as colleague to guide him.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:52 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 7 —

The Conservation of the Material in Schondorf/Göttingen/West Berlin

In 1954 Rolf Ibscher described as follows his work on the codex then in Schondorf:[1]

[p. 6] On the trip home [from London in December 1951], prevented by fog from continuing the flight, I began in Schondorf on Ammer Lake with the work of separating the leaves of the Berlin manuscript that contains the letters of Mani. This work I continued in May 1952 before flying on to Berlin, and did about 20 leaves . . .

[p. 10] In October and November 1952, on the trip home from London, I continued my work on the Berlin manuscript in Bavaria, and could remove 20 more leaves. Hence, together with the leaves separated there in the spring, there are now in all 40 legible leaves, which I impregnated in the fall of 1953.

[p. 6] Auf der Heimreise [from London in December 1951], durch Nebel am Weiterflug behindert begann ich in Schondorf am Ammersee mit der Blätterablösungsarbeit der Berliner Handschrift, die die Briefe Manis enthält. Diese Arbeit setzte ich im Mai 1952 vor dem Weiterflug nach London fort und schaffte rund 20 Blatt . . .

[p. 10] Im Oktober und November 1952 setzte ich auf der Rückreise von London meine Arbeit an der Berliner Handschrift in Bayern fort und konnte weitere 20 Blätter abheben. Zusammen mit den im Frühjahr dort abgelösten Blättern liegen jetzt also insgesamt dort 40 lesbare Blätter vor, die ich im Herbst 1953 imprägnierte.

1. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 6, 10.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

In 1955 Rolf Ibscher gave a much fuller report on his work up to that time:[2]

[p.3] At Christmastime 1951, returning from London and delayed at the airport by fog that lasted for days, I could inform myself there right away thoroughly about the condition of the Berlin manuscript, which I had not seen since 1944. I used the time to separate a few leaves by way of experiment, after my hands had become unusually sensitive in their touch for beginning a new manuscript through the work in London that had gone on for weeks . . .

[p. 5] Since the Schondorf manuscript certainly must be photographed, in hopes that the faded traces of writing may possibly stand out better from the dark papyrus background, one must either use plexiglass also in Germany for our Mani leaves, or distance oneself from definitive glassing until the photography problem that has been initiated has been solved. But I must here too insist that finally this intermediate task reach a conclusion, since it is now time, in the case of the leaves that I separated in 1952 and 1953 and in part already impregnated, that they [p. 6] can be sealed off hermetically from atmospheric influences. The problem could have been solved if the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft, which took over the financial supervision of the Schondorf manuscript, had followed my recommendations . . .

[p. 3] In den Weihnachtstagen 1951, von London kommend und durch tagelang anhaltenden Nebel am Heimflug verhindert, konnte ich mich dort gleich über den Erhaltungszustand der Berliner Handschrift eingehend informieren, die ich seit 1944 nicht mehr gesehen hatte, und nutzte die Zeit, einige Blätter probeweise abzulösen, nachdem die Hände durch die wochenlange Arbeit in London für den Beginn an einer neuen Handschrift ausserordentlich fühlfähig geworden waren . . .

[p. 5] Da die Schondorfer Handschrift unbedingt fotografiert werden muss, in der Hoffnung, dass die verblassten Schriftzüge eventuell besser aus dem dunklen Papyrushintergrund hervortreten, so müsste man entweder auch Plexiglas in Deutschland für unsere Maniblätter verwenden oder solange vom definitiven Verglasen Abstand nehmen, bis das in Angriff genommene fotografische Problem gelöst worden ist. Aber ich muss auch hier darauf dringen, dass endlich diese Zwischenaufgabe zum Abschluss gelangt, da es nun für die Blätter, die ich 1952 und 1953 ablöste und zum Teil schon imprägnierte, Zeit wird, dass sie hermetisch gegen atmosphärische Einflüsse abgeschlossen werden [p. 6] können. Das Problem hätte gelöst sein können, wenn man seitens der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft, die finanzielle Betreuung der Schondorfer Handschrift übernahm, meine Ratschläge befolgt hätte . . .

2. Rolf Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 3, 5, 7–11.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Since in those days, after the currency reform and the establishing of two governmental systems in Germany, the financing of such a massive work, extending over years across zone frontiers, would have to strike upon insurpassable difficulties from Berlin, especially since in Berlin one had serious reservations about the task of the Manichaean conservation, I was most deeply grateful that a personal acquaintance with a person of broad connections, whom I had often seen in Berlin in the house of his son-in-law, Prof. Schellenberg, and who would have been glad to transplant me to West Germany, brought to the Mani undertaking insightful aid. It was Professor Geiler, formerly the minister president of Hesse after the collapse, and rector of Heidelberg University and temporary president of the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft. His point of departure was the correct insight that this work should not be in arrears behind the work called to life by Sir Chester Beatty in London. When I came from London shortly before Christmas in 1951, he invited me to him in Heidelberg and promised me to mediate the help of the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft. A clear-headed spirit seemed to radiate over the Mani enterprise that was getting moving also on German soil. Overjoyed, I travelled to Berlin. Since the president of the German Academy of Sciences in Berlin, Professor Stroux, recognized the same necessity not to

Da in jenen Tagen nach der Währungsreform und der Etablierung zweier Regierungssysteme in Deutschland die Finanzierung einer solchen umfangreichen über Jahre sich erstreckenden Arbeit über Zonengrenzen hinweg von Berlin aus auf unüberbrückbare Schwierigkeiten stossen musste, zumal man in Berlin der Manichäischen Konservierungsaufgabe noch reichlich fremd gegenüberstand, war ich zutiefst dankbar, dass eine persönliche Bekanntschaft mit einem Manne von weitreichenden Beziehungen, den ich im Hause seines Schwiegersohnes, Prof. Schellenberg, in Berlin des öfteren gesehen hatte und der mich gern nach Westdeutschland verpflanzt hätte, dem Maniunternehmen eine [ein]sichtige Hilfe zuführte. Es war Professor Geiler, der frühere Ministerpräsident von Hessen nach dem Zusammenbruch und Rektor der Heidelberger Universität und zeitweilige Präsident der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft. Er ging von der richtigen Erkenntnis aus, dass diese Arbeit nicht im Rückstand hinter der von Sir Chester Beatty ins Leben gerufenen Arbeit in London bleiben dürfte. Als ich von London kurz vor Weihnachten 1951 kam, lud er mich zu sich nach Heidelberg und versprach mir, die Hilfe der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft zu vermitteln. Ein lichter Geist schien über dem nun auch auf deutschem Boden in Gang kommenden Maniunternehmen zu erstrahlen. Beglückt fuhr ich nach Berlin. Da der Präsident der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, Herr Professor Stroux, die gleiche Notwendigkeit erkannte, die leave to its own fate the Berlin manuscript and, in view of the creeping inner disintegration, not to let the rescue become illusory, I laid hold thankfully of the help that was actually coming forward, but which could become effective first in the fall of 1953, just at the moment when special difficulties blocked for me the way from Schondorf to London.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 7] But for the work in Bavaria a temporary contract was created, as it had been arranged for my stays in England on the part of Sir Chester Beatty. But it must be decidedly brought to expression that the material reimbursement of this exceptional work by Sir Chester Beatty shows that he had a much greater esteem for the performance of the conservator.

In order not to let the time until this help came into force go by unused, I had to finance the work in Schondorf on the Berlin Mani manuscript in 1952 by my own means. In union with the generous help by my nearest relatives, the publisher Wolf H. Döring and my brother-in-law, the co-publisher Ernst Günther Vockrodt, who immediately introduced first steps for solving the photographical problem by means of Perutz and later Agfa-Leverkusen and Prof. Hellwich of Darmstadt, and himself undertook experiments, it succeeded that prior to my second trip to London and immediately thereafter for weeks on end I found free asylum in Schondorf and could work undisturbed.

Berliner Handschrift nicht sich selbst zu überlassen und bei dem inneren schleichenden Verfall die Rettung nicht illusorisch werden zu lassen, griff ich die tatsächlich erfolgende Hilfe, die aber erst im Herbst 1953 wirksam werden konnte, dankbar auf, just in dem Moment, als besondere Schwierigkeiten mir den Weg von Schondorf aus nach London blockierten.

[p. 7] Für die Arbeit in Bayern aber wurde ein temporäres Vertragsverhältnis geschaffen, wie es für meine Aufenthalte in England seitens Sir Chester Beatty eingerichtet wurde. Es muss aber entschieden zum Ausdruck gebracht werden, dass die materielle Vergütung dieser aussergewöhnlichen Arbeit durch Sir Chester Beatty zeigt, dass er eine weitaus grössere Hochachtung vor der Leistung des Konservators hat.

Um die Zeit aber bis zum Inkrafttreten dieser Hilfe nicht ungenutzt verstreichen zu lassen, musste ich die Arbeit in Schondorf an der Berliner Manihandschrift 1952 noch aus eigenen Mitteln finanzieren. Im Verein mit der grosszügigen Hilfe durch meine nächsten Verwandten, den Verleger Wolf H. Döring und meinen Schwager, den Mitverleger Ernst Günther Vockrodt, der sofort erste Schritte für die Lösung des fotografischen Problems über Perutz und später über Agfa-Leverkusen und Prof. Hellwich-Darmstadt einleitete und selbst Versuche anstellte, gelang es, dass ich vor meiner zweiten Reise nach London und unmittelbar danach wochenlang ein gastfreies Asyl in Schondorf fand und ungestört arbeiten konnte.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

By this time 84 leaves of the Schondorf Mani manuscript, which contain, at least in large parts of the outer strata, the corpus of letters of Mani to his heads of congregations, have now been detached and provisionally laid between protective paper and glass. The first 6 leaves, which my father before the war had loosened as an experiment, were identified by C. Schmidt as letters of Mani. An examination of the leaves that I disengaged in 1952 was carried out by Böhlig, who came to the same result. The kernel or inner strata of the manuscript seem however parts of a still unknown manuscript. And it will have to do here with the same case as with the Chester Beatty manuscript, Codex C.

In this manuscript too I will proceed according to the proven London method of working: It has in view that all leaves are loosened with one effort, but that, in between, the work on the individual leaves takes place. That means that for each individual leaf there must repeatedly be undertaken a sort of reading to correct the fibers. Especially [p.8] the texts must be searched again and again for remaining splinters of fibers and small chips of papyrus, and entangled fibers straightened out.

After these proceedures, the impregnating of the leaves can then be begun. It will be, and remain, the same proven procedure of my father, as I applied already in Berlin and on a series of Schondorf leaves. It has to do with Bisher liegen nunmehr 84 Blätter der Schondorfer Manihandschrift, die zumindest in weiten Partien der Aussenlagen das Briefcorpus Manis an seine Gemeindeoberhäupter enthält, abgelöst und provisorisch zwischen Schutzpapier und Glas gelegt, vor. Die ersten 6 Blätter, die mein Vater vor dem Kriege probeweise abgelöst hatte, waren von C. Schmidt als Briefe Manis identifiziert worden. Eine Überprüfung der Blätter, die ich 1952 ablöste, erfolgte durch Böhlig, der zu gleichem Resultat kam. Der Kern oder Innenlagen der Handschrift scheinen aber Teile einer noch unbekannten Handschrift zu sein. Und es wird hier ein gleicher Fall vorliegen wie bei der Chester Beatty Handschrift, Codex C.

Auch bei dieser Handschrift werde ich nach dem bewährten Londoner Arbeitsprinzip vorgehen: Es sieht vor, dass alle Blätter in einem Zuge abgelöst werden; dass zwischendurch aber die Arbeit an den einzelnen Blättern erfolgt. Das heisst, wiederholt muss bei jedem einzelnen Blatt eine Art Faserkorrekturlesung vorgenommen werden. Speziell [p. 8] die Texte müssen immer erneut nach restlichen Fasersplittern und kleinen Papyrusabsprengseln abgesucht und verworrene Fasern gestreckt werden.

Nach diesen Arbeitsvorgängen kann dann mit dem Imprägnieren der Blätter begonnen werden. Es wird das gleiche bewährte Verfahren meines Vaters sein und bleiben, wie ich es schon in Berlin und an einer Reihe Schondorfer Blätter anwandte. Es handelt sich um das Besprühen

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

spraying the leaves with a weak solution of zapon lacquer.

The London fixative, recommended by Dr. Plenderleith, did not pan out, since it made the papyrus too dark. It effected exactly what in London was said of the use of zapon lacquer, but does not correspond to the facts. For all the leaves handled in this way by my father more than 20 years ago show no darkening, whereas the new fixative indeed consolidates excellently, but develops traits of tanning and darkening the papyrus.

Furthermore it is my wish and will that the photographic problem be solved before the definitive glassing, since photographing through glass, except for plexiglas, is a dubious thing.

Now if all attempts fail, then I hope that the Beuron Palimpsest Institute knows a solution. Since my brother-in-law as a specialist in photography is very interested in this problem, and knows all previous results of the attempts at Perutz and Agfa-Leverkusen, it will be necessary that as soon as possible he goes with me to Beuron, so that, through his professional information, unnecessary attempts are avoided.

Also, in the section of work before the definitive glassing, there belongs the exact determination of the individual quires in the manuscripts. It reassures me to read in the introductions to the [p. 9] individual editions, especially to the "Manichaean Homilies," what efforts and how much time this der Blätter mit einer schwachen Lösung von Zaponlack.

Das Londoner Fixativ, von Dr. Plenderleith empfohlen, hat sich nicht bewährt, indem es den Papyrus zu sehr dunkel machte. Es hat genau das bewirkt, was in London der Verwendung von Zaponlack nachgesagt wurde, aber nicht den Tatsachen entspricht; denn alle vor über 20 Jahren in dieser Weise von meinem Vater behandelten Blätter zeigen keine Nachdunklung, indessen das neue Fixativ zwar ausgezeichnet festigende, aber zu stark gerbende und den Papyrus dunkel färbende Eigenschaften entwickelt.

Ferner ist es mein Wunsch und Wille, dass das fotografische Problem vor dem definitiven Verglasen gelöst wird, da das Fotografieren durch Glas, ausgenommen bei Plexiglas oder Perspexglas, ein missliches Ding ist.

Sollten alle Versuche jetzt scheitern, so hoffe ich, dass das Beuroner Palimpzest-Institut vielleicht eine Hilfe kennt. Da mein Schwager als Fotofachmann an der Lösung dieses Problems sehr interessiert ist und alle bisherigen Resultate der Versuche bei Perutz und Agfa-Leverkusen kennt, wird es nötig sein, dass er mit mir, sobald als möglich, nach Beuron geht, um dort durch seine fachmännischen Informationen zu verhindern, dass unnötige Versuchsreihen angestellt werden.

Ebenfalls in den Arbeitsabschnitt vor dem definitiven Verglasen gehört die exakte Feststellung der einzelnen Buchlagen in den Handschriften. Es beruhigt mich, in den Einleitungen zu den [p. 9] einzelnen Editionen, speziell den "Manichäischen Homilien," zu lesen, welche Mühen und welche Zeit meinem Vater diese Ordnung der Blätter arranging of the leaves has cost my father. For it becomes apparent that, as a result of the mixing up by the dealers, and especially also by the owners of this small Manichaean library, losses within the seequence of leaves have taken place. But since the fibers, often due to the high degree of loss and decay of key fibers decisive for determining by the eye, often do not provide an irreproachable guide, the identification of double leaves that belong together, out of which the quires consis, is made very difficult and often is put in question.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

All such newly emerging problems, within a work procedure that is new for me, must hold me up and bring delays in estimates of time unexpectedly and unavoidably. One must accept them, and only be glad that my new technique for separating leaves . . . shortens amazingly this difficult and very awkward procedure, while at the same time providing a more certain guarantee of being able to lift off leaves in a whole piece that previously could not be removed at all, or survived this new birth only in fragments. All other techniques cannot be speeded up on tempo. They need their time.

It would be a further important help if also, before the final putting under glass, the person working on the text stood by my side, in the same way that this immeasurable help stood by my father already at the beginning of the conservation task by gekostet hat. Denn es zeigt sich, dass infolge der Vertauschungen durch die Händler und besonders auch durch den Eigentümer dieser manichäischen Handbibliothek innerhalb der Blätterfolge Verluste eingetreten sind. Dadurch aber, dass die Fasern oft bei dem hochgradigen Ausfall und Verfall entscheidender Leitfasern für die Bestimmung durch das Auge oft keine einwandfreie Handhabe bieten, wird die Identifizierung zusammengehöriger Doppelblätter, aus denen die Buchlagen bestehen, sehr erschwert und oft in Frage gestellt.

Alle solche innerhalb eines für mich neuartigen Arbeitsprozesses neu auftretenden Probleme halten auf und bringen Zeittermine für veranschlagte Teilabschnitte unvermutet und unvermeidbar ins Gleiten. Man muss sie hinnehmen, und kann nur froh sein, dass meine neuartige Ablösetechnik . . . gerade diesen schwierigen und sehr heiklen Vorgang erstaunlich verkürzt und zugleich relativ doch eine sicherere Gewähr bietet, auch Blätter in einem Stück abzuheben, die früher garnicht ablösbar waren oder nur fragmentarisiert diese Neugeburt überstanden. Alle anderen Vorgänge können nicht im Tempo beschleunigt werden. Sie brauchen ihre Zeit.

Eine weitere wichtige Hilfe wäre es, wenn gleichfalls vor dem definitiven Verglasen mir in gleicher Weise der Textbearbeiter zur Seite stande, wie diese unschätzbare Hilfe meinem Vater schon zu Beginn der Konservierungsaufgabe durch

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Schmidt and Polotsky, and later by Schmidt, Allberry and Böhlig.

This collaboration achieved, that really every fragment is proven by the text as to its correct placement and that overlooked fiber inexactitudes, which could seriously distort the text, are eliminated with the highest possible probability.

Unfortuanteley these legitimate wishes, which after all had as their goal the reestablishment of the really proven method of teamwork during the lifetime [p. 10] of my Father, led to incomprehensible tensions with the Deutsche Forshungsgemeinschaft.

The hope that with the departure of the curator of the Mani undertaking, Prof. Scheel, and under the new Curator, Prof. Hengstenberg, who is an expert aware of the goal, is not yet really fulfilled, since also over against this area of research he stands too unfamiliar and new.

After a fully absurd and unnecessary time-consuming episode which finally, in addition, ended quite unpleasantly, since, on bad advice, instead of Prof. Böhlig, as proven editor for 9 years from 1934 to 1943, one entrusted an absolute beginner [Rudnitzki] with the deciphering and reading of these difficult texts, who, in a grotesque way, also still had to give an evaluation, upon which the further financing of the work was to be made dependent, where of course nothing came of it other than an invalid false judgment, since he thus far had no experi-

Schmidt-Polotsky und später durch Schmidt, Allberry und Böhlig dauernd zur Verfügung gestanden hat.

Diese Zusammenarbeit gewährleistet, dass wirklich ein jedes Fragment auch vom Text überprüft auf seine richtige Anordnung am richtigen Platz untergebracht werden kann und dass übersehene Faserungenauigkeiten, die das Textbild empfindlich entstellen können, mit grösstmöglicher Wahr-scheinlichkeit ausgeschaltet werden.

Leider führten diese berechtigten Wünsche, die doch nur die Neuetablierung der wirklich bewährten Arbeitsteammethode zu Lebzeiten [p. 10] meines Vaters zum Ziel hatten, zu unbegreiflichen Spannungen mit der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft.

Die Hoffnung, dass mit dem Ausscheiden des Kurators des Maniunternehmens, Professor Scheel, unter dem neuen Kurator, Professor Hengstenberg, ein zielbewusster Fachmann mir zur Seite träte, will sich bisher nicht recht erfüllen, da auch er diesem Arbeitsbereich zu fremd und neu gegenübersteht.

Nach einer völlig absurden und unnötigen, Zeit vergeudenden und schliesslich obendrein noch unerquicklich verlaufenden Episode, weil man schlecht beraten anstelle von Professor Böhlig, als bewährtem Editor über 9 Jahre von 1934 bis 1943, einen absoluten Anfänger [Rudnitzki] mit dem Entziffern und Lesen dieser schwierigen Texte betraute, der grotesker Weise auch noch ein Werturteil zu fällen hatte, wovon die weitere Arbeitsfinanzierung abhängig gemacht werden sollte, wobei natürlich nichts dabei herauskam als ein unmassgebliches Fehlurteil, da er noch keine Erfahrung mit Papyrusoriginalen hatte

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

ence with papyrus originals and stood there completely helpless and unprepared. After checking with Böhlig and the Vice-President of the German Academy of Sciences in Berlin, Prof. Steinitz, I now received the agreement that Böhlig could be put immediately at my side at Berlin's expense. I made this information known without delay to the German Forschungsgemeinschaft, so that it can hence make contact with the German Academy of Sciences in Berlin to the extent it was really serious with the view that this undertaking advance "promptly and continually," which last year it had called for precisely regarding my period of work in Bavaria.

The German Academy of Sciences has taken this desire into account in that they arranged my employment so that I was to devote myself completely to working up this scattered discovery.

The German Academy of Sciences, the work on the text, at first deferred for lack of funds [p. 11] could now, as is desirable, take place at the same time, which provided a firm assurance that the work of conservation could, not only one-sidedly on the more technical side, reach completion in the foreseeable future.

Now it will become clear whether the bright spirit of Prof. Geiler, under whom the great work was initiated, will hopefully give its renewed blessing to the task.

A rejection would be incomprehensible; it would find the und gänzlich hilflos und unvorbereitet dastand, habe ich nach Rücksprache mit Böhlig und dem Vizepräsidenten der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, Professor Steinitz, nun die Zusage erhalten, dass Böhlig sofort mir auf Kosten Berlins zur Seite gestellt werden kann; ich gab diese Mitteilung unverzüglich der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft bekannt, damit sie deswegen mit der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin Fühlung nehmen kann, sofern es ihr wirklich ernst damit ist, dass dies Unternehmen "zügig und kontinuierlich" vorankommt, was sie im vorigen Jahr gerade hinsichtlich meiner Arbeitsaufenthalte in Bayern gefordert hatte.

Die Deutsche Akademie der Wissenschaften hat diesem Wunsch Rechnung getragen, indem sie mein Arbeitsverhältnis so regelte, dass ich weitgehend mich der Aufarbeitung dieses verstreut liegenden Fundes ausschliesslich widmen sollte.

Durch das Angebot der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften würde die von der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft aus Geldmangel vorerst [p. 11] zurückgestellte Textbearbeitung, nunmehr, wie es wünschenswert ist, gleichzeitig erfolgen können, was eine sichere Gewähr gäbe, das das Konservierungswerk nicht nur einseitig nach der mehr technischen Seite hin zur Vollendung in absehbarer Zeit gelangen könnte.

Es wird sich jetzt zeigen, ob der lichte Geist Prof. Geilers, unter dem das grosse Werk eingeleitet wurde,

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

disapproval of all scholars who again take inner satisfaction at the progress and success, and would bring a storm of resentment.

But the work in Schondorf had develooped well in terms of work, especially since it is possible from this year on, thanks to the agreement of the German Academy of Sciences of Berlin, for me to work in Schondorf for longer periods of time. Such work on material this obstinate requires very extended work periods, especially what the eye has to perform, is dependent very much also on good weather, since artificial light overworks the eyes too much, and not least of all from the absolute reliability and relaxation of the hands.

But after the conclusion of the conservation of Sir Chester Beatty's Manichaica, the main effort will automatically go to the Schondorf manuscript, to the extent that a surprising return to London or Dublin of the three Berlin codices that wandered to Russia and of Codex B from the possession of Sir Chester Beatty not create a new turning point.

hoffnungsvoll erneut der Aufgabe seinen Segen spenden wird.

Eine Zurückweisung wäre unverständlich und würde die Missbilligung aller Wissenschaftler finden, die an dem Fortgang und Gelingen nun wieder innigen Anteil nehmen, und müsste einen Sturm der Entrüstung heraufbeschwören.

Die Arbeit in Schondorf aber hat sich arbeitsmässig gut eingespielt, besonders, nachdem es mir nun seit diesem Jahr auch möglich ist, dank dem Entgegenkommen der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin in längeren Zeitabschnitten in Schondorf zu arbeiten. Eine solche Arbeit an derartig aufsässigem Material bedarf durchaus ausgedehnterer Arbeitsfolgen, zumal sie auch, besonders was das Auge dabei zu leisten hat, sehr von der Gunst des Wetters abhängig ist, da künstliches Licht zu sehr die Augen überanstrengt, und nicht zuletzt von der absoluten Sicherheit und Ruhe der Hände.

Nach dem Abschluss der Konservierung der Sir Chester Beatty Manichaika aber wird automatisch der Hauptakzent auf die Schondorfer Handschrift übergehen, sofern nicht eine überraschende Rückkehr der drei nach Russland gewanderten Berliner Codices und von Codex B aus dem Besitze von Sir Chester Beatty nach London oder Dublin eine neue Wende schafft.

The current status of papyrus conservation theory indicates a reversal of Rolf Ibscher's conservation theory:[3] [4]

3. Fackelmann, Resaurierung, 60–61.
4. Ibid., 21, 60–61.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 21] Zapon lacquer polishing:
Zapon is a self-polishing protection for the surface. Originally used for the protection of the top surface of metals, it was used in modified form for the conservation of library material—with the use of saltpeter acid, nitrated cellulose was dissolved in amyl acetate and carbonated hydrogen and mixed with a softening mixture of oil and camphor. coatings on paper as well as papyrus showed devastating results: Yellowing, splits, brittleness of the material, along side of the danger of fire that existed for objects treated in such a way, were the negative effects . . .
Glassing:
All too eager glassing and supplemental closing off from air of the glass plates with sealing lacquer led to the emergence of a small climate inside the plates that favors the microscopic organisms.

Result: Strong decomposition of the cellulose in the papyrus—rapid degeneration—film on the glass plates.

[p. 60] 2. Glassing with the Elimination of Air:
Hundreds of papyri were mounted without padding, presumbably for their better [p. 61] protection, between two glass panes, which were pasted with strips of paper and finally sealed with zapon lacquer. Yet this intentional protection from the outside world had terrible consequences: Because of the lack of the interchange of air there emerged within the glass plates a miniature climate, which was ad-

[p. 21] Zaponlackuberzuge:
Zapon ist ein selbstglättender Oberflächenschutz. Ursprünglich für den Oberflächenschutz von Metallen verwendet, wurde er in abgewandelter Form zur Konservierung von Bibliotheksgut benützt—mit Salpetersäure nitrerte Cellulose wurde in Amylacetat und Kohlenwasserstoff gelöst und mit einem Weichmachergemisch von Öl und Kampfer versetzt. Uberzüge auf Papier sowie Papyrus zeigten niederschmetternde Ergebnisse: Vergilben, Risse, Verspröden des Materials waren neben der Feuergefahr, die für solchermassen behandelte Objekte bestand, die negativen Auswirkungen . . .
Verglasen:
Allzu bereitwilliges Verglasen und zusätzliches luftdichtes Verschliessen der Glasplatten mit Siegellack führte zum Entstehen eines die Mikroorganismen begüstigenden Kleinklimas innerhalb der Platten.

Folge: starker Abbau der Cellulose im Papyrus—rascher Verfalls Beschlag auf der Glasplatte.

[p. 60] 2. Verglasung unter Luftabschluss:
Hunderte Papyri wurden zum vermeintlich bes- [p. 61] seren Schutz ohne Einlage zwischen zwei Glasplatten montiert, welche mit Papierstreifen umklebt und letztlich mit Zaponlack versiegelt wurden. Dieser beabsichtigte Schutz vor der Aussenwelt hatte jedoch erschreckende Folgen: durch den fehlenden Luftaustausch entstand innerhalb der Glasplatten ein Kleinklima, das dem Wachstum von Pilzen förderlich war.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

vantageous to the growth of fungus. The cellulose molecules gave up their necessary water constitution onto the glass plates pressed on it (according to the principle of osmotic pressure), as a result of which the degeneration of the cellulose proceeded more rapidly. Access to air and the circulation of air are a necessity for the existence of organic materials.

Die Cellulosemoleküle gaben ihr notwendiges Konstitutionswasser an die angepressten Glasplatten (nach dem Prinzip des osmotischen Druckes) ab, wodurch der Abbau der Cellulose rascher vor sich ging. Luftzufuhr und Luftzirkulation sind eine Notwendigkeit für den Bestand organischer Materialien.

In 1960/68, Böhlig summarized efforts to conserve and copy the codex after it had been moved from Schondorf to Göttingen:[5]

The manuscript that had come to West Germany and remained there after the war is at present in Göttingen and is cared for by the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft . . . I was able to see the manuscript in Göttingen through the cooperation of the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft in the year 1957.

Rolf Ibscher repeatedly undertook conservation work on the codex in Göttingen, funded by the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft; C. Colpe prepared the transcriptions. But at present the work has come to a halt and urgently needs to be carried forward.

Die nach Westdeutschland gekommene und nach dem Kriege dort verbliebene Handschrift befindet sich gegenwärtig in Göttingen und wird von der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft betreut . . . Die Handschrift in Göttingen konnte ich durch Entgegenkommen der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft im Jahre 1957 besichtigen.

An dem in Göttingen befindlichen Codex wurden auf Kosten der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft mehrfach von Rolf Ibscher Konservierungsarbeiten vorgenommen und von C. Colpe Abschriften angefertigt; die Arbeit ist aber gegenwärtig ins Stocken gekommen und bedarf dringend der Weiterführung.

In 1965 Rolf Ibscher described as follows the work on this codex:[6]

5. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 181–82.
6. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 54, 58–61.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 54] Charles Allberry, the great hope in the younger generation, fell as a victim of the anti-aircraft defense over Berlin. Rudnitzki quickly turned out to be not up to the job on the Berlin manuscript in Schondorf, and endangered the help that had been attained, precisely thanks to Prof. Geiler, from the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft in Bad Godesberg. In his place entered Carsten Colpe in Göttingen. Colpe's joy to collaborate, at first unbounded, burned out in a rapid straw fire. From him too there resulted an endangering that still continues to persist.

[p. 58] The situation is no different [than the discouraging report about the Dublin Manichaica] with the codex in Göttingen. Carsten Colpe, who worked for a time on the leaves that had been won up until then, brought into play in Munich at the International Orientalists' Congress [1957] the thesis that the manuscript does not belong to Berlin at all but is identical with the 13 leaves of Codex B in Dublin (or again now in London, since all the Mani material was shipped back to the British Museum by Sir Chester Beatty, without the Museum's being able to administer it). Böhlig, on the other hand, maintained that, in view of the shared titles on the pages (Synaxis), the 31 leaves of the Berlin codex Nr. 15[9]95 belong together with [p. 59] the Göttingen codex, whereas he had earlier held it to be codex Nr. 15[9]98 (collection of Letters). Böhlig's cautious, but nonetheless quite fixed thesis

[p. 54] Charles Allberry, die grosse Nachwuchshoffnung, fiel der Flugabwehr über Berlin zum Opfer. Rudnitzki erwies sich sehr schnell nicht gewachsen der Aufgabe an der Berliner Handschrift in Schondorf und gefährdete die gerade dank Professor Geiler gewonnene Hilfe seitens der DFG Godesberg. An seine Stelle trat Carsten Colpe in Göttingen. Seine zuerst unbändige Freude am Mitwirken verflog in schnellem Strohfeuer. Auch von ihm ging Gefährdung aus und wirkt noch nachhaltend an . . .

[p. 58] Nicht anders [than the discouraging report about the Dublin Manichaica] steht es mit dem Codex in Göttingen. Carsten Colpe, der eine Zeitlang an den bisher gewonnenen Blättern arbeitete, warf in München auf dem Internationalen Orientalistenkongress [1957] die These ins Spiel, die Handschrift gehöre gar nicht Berlin, sondern sei identisch mit den 13 Blättern des Codex B in Dublin oder jetzt London wieder, da alles Manimaterial an das Britische Museum von Sir Chester Beatty zurückverlagert wurde, ohne dass das Museum darüber verfügen kann. Böhlig hingegen erklärt, die 31 Blätter des Berliner Codex Nr. 15[9]95 gehören wegen der gemeinsamen Uberschriften auf den Seiten (SYNAXIS) zusammen mit [p. 59] dem Göttinger Codex, währehd er ihn früher für Codex Nr. 15[9]98 (Briefkollektion) gehalten hatte. Böhligs vorsichtige, was that, possibly by error, my father had brought to London the 13 leaves of the Codex B of Sir Chester Beatty, once they were glassed, as the result of which a dilemma again emerges. What is then the situation with the 31 leaves in Berlin, that, after all, are identical with those of the codex in Göttingen? When these leaves of Codex B came back to London, Carl Schmidt was still alive. At that time, in all probability, Charles Allberry was very clearly informed about the shares in the find. I.e., probably three minds and six eyes were at work as a control. But anyone who knew my father knows that he was inerrant, unconfusable, infallible, yes, that he possessed a phenomenal ability of memory.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Again and again I must come back to my conclusions, which came to me simply from the familiarity with, the eyewitnessing of, the glassed Mani papyri that are in Dublin. At the time, I inferred therefrom that Sir Chester Beatty's Codex B had remained in Berlin (that is to say, before the termination of the war's activities) and had shared the fate, then still uncertain, of all the rest of the papyri in the Zoo bunker. The format of these leaves of Codex B was very different for me from that of the manuscript that at the time was still in Schondorf on the Ammer Lake. The first embraced 7 leaves, the second 6 leaves [per quire?].

Accordingly, in view of my calculations, three Berlin codi-

aber doch eben fixierte These war, mein Vater hätte möglicherweise die 13 Blätter des Codex B von Sir Chester Beatty irrtümlich einst verglast nach London gebracht, wodurch wieder ein Dilemma entsteht. Was ist dann mit den 31 Blättern in Berlin, die doch identisch sind mit denen des Codex in Göttingen? Als diese Blätter des Codex B nach London zurückkamen, lebte Carl Schmidt noch. Dann war aller Wahrscheinlichkeit nach Charles Allberry sehr klar informiert über die Fundanteile. D.h. wahrscheinlich waren drei Hirne und sechs Augen als Kontrolle am Werk. Aber wer meinen Vater kannte, weiss, dass er unbeirrbar war, unverwirrbar und unfehlbar, ja, dass er ein phänomenales Erinnerungsvermögen besass.

Immer wieder muss ich auf meine Ergebnisse zurückkommen, die sich mir einfach aus der Kenntnis, aus der Autopsie der in Dublin befindlichen verglasten Manipapyri ergaben. Ich folgerte daraus damals, dass Sir Chester Beattys Codex B in Berlin verblieben war (also vor Einstellung der Kriegshandlungen) und das damals noch ungewisse Schicksal aller übrigen im Zoobunker verbliebenen Papyri geteilt hatte. Das Format dieser Codex-B-Blätter unterschied sich mir sehr von dem der damals noch in Schondorf am Ammersee befindlichen Handschrift. Die erste umfasste 7, die zweite 6 Blätter [per quire?].

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

ces [Acts, P[15997]; Letters, P[15998]; Homilies, P[15999]]—and one codex from the possession of Sir Chester Beatty [Synaxeis, Codex B] must not have returned from their odyssey. Likewise six leaves of the Kephalaia are missing, as has now become apparent from the reglassing. I do not believe in carelessness and destruction resulting from it, since the return lists show damages correctly noted in each case. In the case of a few papyri whose glasses were cracked, someone even carried out primitive first-aid conservations. So one was very concerned not to let anything fall victim to destruction, as well as it could be achieved. I explain the six missed Kephalaia leaves as still slumbering somewhere in a drawer, [p. 60] having missing the return trip. Forgetfulness is after all something very human. One will hence still have to request an inquiry. Sir Chester Beatty said to me in the summer of 1956, when we were talking about my discovering the absence of Codex B, that after all it would be a while before all Berlin papyri had returned to Berlin. It would be easier for him then to occupy himself in Berlin with a return.

The Berlin Codex Nr. 15[9]95 that is now in Göttingen still has about 100 to 120 unseparated leaves, which become more and more brittle under the climate's influence, in spite of good storage thus far. It already gave me very great difficulties at the time of my work between Christmas 1951 until 1958 in Göttingen. This work

Nach meinen Berechnungen müssen demnach drei Berliner Codices [Acts, P15997; Letters, P15998; Homilies, P15999] und ein Codex aus dem Besitz von Sir Chester Beatty [Synaxeis, Codex B] von ihrer Odyssee nicht zurückgekehrt sein. Ebenfalls fehlen sechs Blätter der Kephalaia, wie sich jetzt bei der Umglasung ergibt. Ich glaube nicht an Fahrlässigkeit und damit verbundene Vernichtung, weil die Rückkehrlisten Beschädigungen jeweils korrekt vermerkt anzeigen. Man hat ja auch bei einigen Papyri, deren Gläser zersprungen waren, sogar primitive Notkonservierungen gemacht, war also sehr bedacht, alles so gut es eben gehen wollte, nicht der Vernichtung anheim fallen zu lassen. Die sechs fehlenden Kephalaia-Blätter erkläre ich mir damit, dass sie irgendwo noch in einem Fache schlummern [p. 60] und die Rückreise verpasst haben. Vergesslichkeit ist schliesslich etwas sehr Menschliches. Man wird also noch einmal um eine Ermittlung ersuchen müssen. Sir Chester Beatty sagte mir im Sommer 1956, als wir über meine Entdeckung des Fehlens von Codex B sprachen, dass das ja Zeit hätte, bis alle Berliner Papyri wieder nach Berlin zurückgekehrt seien. Es würde für ihn einfacher sein, dann um eine Rückgabe in Berlin sich zu bemühen.

Da der Berliner, jetzt in Göttingen befindliche Codex Nr. 15[9]95 noch ca. 100 bis 120 nicht abgelöste Blätter hat, die unter der klimatischen Einwirkung, trotz guter Lagerung bisher, immer mürber werden und schon zur Zeit meiner

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

of a provisional safeguarding, undoubtedly most important, must be carried forward, after having been interrupted for six years. For otherwise the same thing can happen that happened to my father with Codex C [Chester Beatty's Kephalaia], that it was no longer possible to save it, not even with the tricky method of the Inclined Plane . . . My desire was that one should also see to it that photography must go hand in hand with the conservation and editing. But this has ballooned into such a mania that precious time is wasted in search of some open-sesame formula for photography, to the detriment of the codex. This is something Mr. Colpe may perhaps secretly already regret, but this will not remove the original evil from the world.

The writing is often very rubbed off, since here we again have to do precisely with soot ink, with the exception of the writing in the parts of the codex "stored" inside, as in the case of Codex C. Here ultraviolet rays can hardly conjure up anything. Since there are large lacunae in the text in many of the ca. 145 leaves, [p. 61] photography can perhaps perform a certain supplemental help in the case of individual leaves, more in the sense of an "aid in collation" for the editor after a first transcription, in case he, as in the case of Charles Allberry, must carry on his work on the text in a different location, where he cannot have the original papyrus before him. Without "strong eyes,"

Bearbeitung zwischen Weihnachten 1951 bis 1958 in Göttingen sehr grosse Schwierigkeiten mir bereiteten, muss jetzt unbedingt diese vorerst wichtigste Arbeit der provisorischen Sicherung nach sechs Jahren ihrer Unterbrechung vorangebracht werden, weil sonst das eintreten kann, was meinem Vater mit Codex C [Chester Beatty's Kephalaia] passierte, dass eine Rettung nicht mehr möglich ist, auch nicht mit der überlistungsmethode der Schiefen Ebene . . . Dass mein Wunsch, man sollte auch dafür sorgen, dass Hand in Hand mit dem Konservieren und dem Edieren das Fotografieren gehen möge, sich zu einer solchen Manie jetzt ausgewachsen hat, indem kostbare Zeit mit der Suche nach einer "Sesam-öffne-dich-Fotografierformel" zu Ungunsten des Codex vergeudet wird, mag Herrn Colpe vielleicht insgeheim schon reuen, aber damit wird das Urübel nicht aus der Welt geschafft.

Da die Schrift oft sehr abgerieben ist, weil wir es hier wieder gerade mit Ausnahme der bei den Partien des ebenso wie in Codex C "eingelagerten Codex" mit Russtinte zu tun haben, wo ultraviolette Strahlen kaum etwas hervorzaubern können, und da grosse Lücken im Text bei vielen der ca. 145 Blätter bestehen, kann [p. 61] die Fotografie bei einzelnen Blättern vielleicht eine gewisse zusätzliche Hilfe leisten, mehr im Sinne einer "Repetierhilfe" nach erster Lesung für den Editor, falls er, wie im Falle von Charles Allberry, an einem anderen Ort, wo er eben den Papyrus nicht als Original vor sich sehen kann, am Text weiterarbeiten muss. Ohne die "starken Augen," wie es Carl Schmidt im ersten Akademiebericht nennt, as Carl Schmidt puts it in the first Academy report, it will not work. Also not without a tremendous ability to make combinations, and not without the often quite odd positionings of the correct angle for the light to fall, by each individual editor, and the often amazing necessity to decipher each individual leaf—for each one it is different, according to the degree of rotting—with quite specific lighting, but never by making use of artificial light, since the papyrus, as a result of very great darkening, almost already lets one perceive hardly any more writing.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

It should not lead to the situation that photography is elevated to a rigid doctrine for something, where nothing lies behind it except an excuse. With or without photography, Mr. Colpe can hardly find a stronger interest again in this quite difficult codex, after he has once learned to recognize very quickly that editorial work on such a Mani manuscript, in the area of editing, is among the most demanding.

geht es nicht; ohne ein immenses Kombinierungsvermögen auch nicht und ohne die von jedem einzelnen Editor vorzunehmenden, oft wunderlichen, Einstellungen des rechten Lichteinfallwinkels und der oft frappierenden Nötigung, das jeweilige Blatt—bei jedem ist es anders, je nach dem Grade der Verrottung unter ganz bestimmter Beleuchtung, aber niemals unter Zuhilfenahme künstlichen Lichtes, zu entziffern, da der Papyrus, infolge sehr starker Nachdunklung, fast schon nicht mehr Schrift wahrnehmen lässt.

Es darf jetzt nicht dazu führen, dass die Fotografie als eine starre Doktrin für etwas erhoben wird, wo nichts anderes dahinter steht als eine Ausflucht. Mit oder ohne Fotografie dürfte Herr Colpe kaum ein stärkeres Interesse wieder an diesem recht schwierigen Codex finden, nachdem er einst sehr schnell erkennen lernte, dass editorische Arbeit an einer solchen Manihandschrift zum Schwersten auf editorischem Gebiet gehört.

Böhlig has explained, as follows, the possibility that thirteen leaves could have been taken by mistake to London: "Various individual leaves . . . were at various times also transported by both Ibschers between England and Berlin back and forth."[7]

Böhlig also has clarified Rolf Ibscher's statement that Böhlig "had earlier held it to be codex Nr. 15[9]98 (collection of Letters)":[8]

7. Böhlig, in a letter of February 5, 1986: "Verschiedene einzelne Blätter . . . sind zu verschiedenen Zeiten von beiden Ibschers auch zwischen England und Berlin hin und her transportiert worden."

8. Böhlig, in a letter of June 1, 1986.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

When Ibscher claimed that it has to do with a German manuscript, then it of course first of all only about the historical book or the letters of Mani, since the third German manuscirpt, the so-called "wig," would have exerted no motivation for speical security . . . Since apparently statements in the first and second person occur, it could less likely be the historical book, so only the letters remained. Yet what today is completely incomprehensibile . . . is that the codices after all were apparently so inadequately characterized that even a doubt could ever arise as to their identity.

Wenn Ibscher behauptete, es handel sich um eine deutsche Handschrift, dann konnte es sich ja zunächst einmal nur um das historische Buch oder die Briefe Manis handeln, weil die 3. deutsche Handschrift, die sog. "Perücke," keinen Reiz für eine besondere Sicherstellung ausgeübt hätte . . . Da anscheinend Aussagen in der 1. und 2. Person vorkammen, konnte es weniger gut das histor-ische Buch sein; also blieben, konnte es weniger gut das historische Buch sein; also blieben nur die Briefe übrig. Was nur heute völlig unbegreiflich ist . . . , ist, dass die Codices doch offenkundig so mangelhaft gekennzeichnet waren, dass überhaupt ein Zweifel über ihre Identität entstehen konnte.

Presumably, when Böhlig went to Schondorf to sort out the book blocks to be turned over to the Allied authorities, he was simply following Ibscher's instructions to keep one in Schondorf on the assumption it was one of the Berlin codices.

In the first version of his essay on the Synaxeis in 1957 Böhlig wrote: "In the war one of the codices belonging to the Berlin holdings was stored outside, in the region of what is now the Federal Republic."[9] In the second edition of that essay in 1968, the formulation was left open, in that the codex is no longer said to belong to Berlin and yet is said to be stored along with those of Sir Chester Beatty, as if it were not itself one of them: "In the war a manuscript was stored outside in the region of what is now the Federal Republic, along with the codices belonging to Sir Chester Beatty; this text is at present in Göttingen

9. Böhlig, "Synaxis = Homilia?" 485–86, especially 485: "Im Kriege wurde einer der zum Berliner Bestand gehörigen Codices ins Gebiet der jetzigen Bundesrepublik ausgelagert." Böhlig published a revised and expanded version as "Zu den Synaxeis," 222–27, especially 222–23.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

to be conserved."[10] But a further insertion into the second edition of the essay makes it clear that Böhlig no longer assumed the codex belonged to Germany, in that he clearly identified it as the bulk of the codex of which Berlin owned only a vestige: "Thus one can assume, as C. Colpe also thinks, that the remainder of a Berlin codex discussed by C. Schmidt [P^{15995}] forms with this codex a unity of contents, but not of ownership."[11]

Here it is clear, even if cautiously and then only obliquely expressed, that Böhlig with Colpe had reached the conclusion that the codex then in Göttingen is not a codex belonging to Berlin but rather a codex belonging to Sir Chester Beatty, since from the very beginning all agreed that the Synaxeis belonged to Sir Chester Beatty (except for the 31 leaves of this codex that Carl Schmidt had purchased in Egypt for Berlin). Although the Göttingen codex had already been identified as the Synaxeis codex at the time the first edition of this essay was published, Böhlig did not in the first edition state the inescapable inference that it was hence not a codex belonging to Berlin.

10. "Im Kriege wurde zusammen mit den Sir Chester Beatty gehörigen Codices eine Handschrift in das jetzige Gebiet der Bundesrepublik ausgelagert; dieser Text befindet sich gegenwärtig in Göttingen zur Konservierung."

11. "Damit kann man annehmen, wie auch C. Colpe meint, dass der von C. Schmidt besprochene Berliner Restcodex [P^{15995}] mit diesem Codex eine inhaltliche, aber keine besitzmässige Einheit bildet."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:55 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 8 —

The Conservation of the Material in London/Dublin

Regarding the London/Dublin material, Ibscher wrote in 1955:[1]

[p. 2] Thanks to the initiative of Sir Chester Beatty, events took a turn after the war . . .

[p. 3] At the suggestion of Sir Alan H. Gardiner, Sir Harold I. Bell, and Professor Glanville, Sir Chester Beatty engaged me in 1948 to carry forward the conservation work that had been orphaned. Difficult circumstances of the time put me at a disadvantage, so that it was only in x 51 that I could reach London and begin with the conservation of the Chester Beatty papyri, which at the end of 1944, on the smart advice of my father-in-law, the publisher Wolf Henry Doering, together with a Berlin manuscript (Codex No. 15998), I on my own responsibility had brought from the danger zone of Berlin for the final phase of the war into his safe

[p. 2] Dank der Initiative von Sir Chester Beatty trat nach dem Kriege eine Wende ein . . .

[p. 3] Auf Vorschlag von Sir Alan H. Gardiner, Sir Harold I. Bell und Professor Glanville engagierte mich Sir Chester Beatty 1948 zur Fortführung der verwaisten Konservierungsarbeit. Widrige Zeitverhältnisse benachteiligten mich, sodass ich erst Oktober 1951 nach London gelangen und mit dem Konservieren der Chester Beatty Papyri beginnen konnte, die ich Ende 1944 auf den klugen Rat meines Schwiegervaters hin, des Verlegers Wolf Henry Doering, zusammen mit einer Berliner Handschrift (Codex Nr. 15998) auf eigene Verantwortung aus der Gefahrenzone Berlins für die Endphase des Krieges in sein

1. Rolf Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 2–3.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

house on the quiet Ammer Lake in Schondorf, a good hour away from Munich . . .

In London I had begun with three residual pads (not identical with quires in the sense of codicology) of the Psalms book, which my father some time before the war had put to one side, for, as he had written to Sir Chester Beatty, "the unremitting difficult work of separating the leaves was too exhausting over a period of time," and separated 49 well-preserved leaves and a few very fragmentary remains of leaves.

sicheres Haus am stillen Ammersee in Schondorf, eine gute Stunde von München entfernt, gebracht hatte . . .

In London hatte ich mit drei Restlagen (sie Sind nicht identisch mit den buchtechnischen Buchlageneinheiten) des Psalmenbuches begonnen, die mein Vater einige Zeit vor dem Kriege zurückgestellt hatte, da ihn, wie er an Sir Chester Beatty geschrieben hatte, "die unentwegte schwere Ablösearbeit zu sehr auf die Dauer anstrengte," und 49 gut erhaltene Blätter und einige sehr fragmentarische Blätterreste abgehoben.

Already in 1954 Rolf Ibscher had described the beginning of his work in London in somewhat more detail:[2]

In 1951, after three years of persistent waiting, I obtained the exit permit from East Germany and began on October 5, not without a pounding heart, the difficult work of separating the leaves from the remains of the Psalms book. It was three quires that I, shortly before Christmas, was able to bring provisionally under glass. It became 49 leaves or 98 pages of text, and, in addition to that, fragmentary leaves of probably 12 leaves.

1951, nach dreijährigem beharrlichem Warten, erlangte ich die Ausreisegenehmigung aus Ostdeutschland und begann am 5. Oktober nicht ohne einiges Herzklopfen mit der schwierigen Arbeit des Ablösens der Blätter von Resten des Psalmenbuches. Es waren drei Lagen, die ich bis kurz vor Weihnachten provisorisch zwischen Glas bringen konnte. Es sind 49 Blatt oder 98 Seiten Text geworden, dazu noch Fragmentblätter von wahrscheinlich 12 Blättern.

In 1955 Ibscher also reported on his continuing work up to 1955:[3]

2. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 6.
3. Rolf Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 4–5.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 4] In 1952 I began with Codex C, which, as my father too had already ascertained by separating 34 leaves, contains in large parts valuable Kephalaia text.

It was good luck that I did not let myself be led astray by a report of my father about the condition of the codex preservation. He had given up the work after a certain number of leaves by pointing out that each further leaf, peeled from the block of the manuscript, dissolved completely, and it seemed that one could hardly expect still useful and legible text, since practically no writing would be still recognizable.

But my new outsmarting technique, which had proven so successful on the seemingly hopelessly brittle leaves of the Psalms book, made it in fact possible for me to clear this hurdle.

It soon became clear that, after a series of leaves with very faded writing, suddenly quite visible Kephalaia text with ca. 75 leaves came to light.

It was part of the discordant accompanying music of this truly ideal task, and the false decisions that one would hope by now would belong forever to a legendary past, that in 1953 I could not continue my London work in spite of daring efforts.

But in 1954, thanks to the intervention of many good forces on the part of the German Academy of Sciences in Berlin and especially of Sir Chester Beatty, all impediments were overcome, so

[p. 4] 1952 begann ich mit Codex C, der in weiten Partien, wie auch mein Vater schon durch Abheben von 34 Blättern ermittelt hatte, wertvollen Kephalaia-Text enthält.

Es war ein dass ich mich nicht durch einen Bericht meines Vaters über den Erhaltungszustand des Codex hatte beirren lassen. Er hatte nach einer gewissen Anzahl von Blättern die Arbeit unter dem Hinweis aufgegeben, dass jedes weitere Blatt, aus dem Verbande der Handschrift geschält, sich völlig auflöste und es den Anschein hätte, kaum noch brauchbaren und lesbaren Text erwarten zu können, da so gut wie keine Schrift mehr erkennbar wäre.

Aber meine neue überlistungstechnik, die sich so gut an den hoffnungslos scheinenden mürben Psalmenbuchblättern bewahrt hatte, liess mich tatsächlich diese Hürde nehmen.

Es zeigte sich bald, dass nach einer Serie von Blättern mit Behr verblasster Schrift plötzlich guttsichtbarer Kephalaia-Text mit ca. 75 Blättern zutage kam.

Es gehörte zu der misstönenden Begleitmusik dieser wahrhaft idealen Aufgabe und den hoffentlich nunmehr für immer einer legendarischen Vergangenheit angehörenden Fehlentscheidungen, dass ich 1953 meine Londoner Arbeit trotz waghalsiger Bemühungen nicht fortsetzen konnte.

Aber 1954 waren dank dem Eingreifen vieler guter Kräfte seitens der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin und vornehmlich Sir Chester Beatty's alle

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

that I could now impregnate the Psalms codex and in July separate the last leaf of Codex C, with a deep breath and yet with some melancholy. The most beautiful work on the Mani discovery is the separating of a leaf.

Thus, however, the most difficult partial task had been completed for the papyri belonging to Sir Chester Beatty. Codex C had produced in all about 140 partially quite good leaves. They also were all impregnated in 1954.

[p.5] The definitive glassing should have taken place in this year [1955], but since thus far the special glass perspex, or, as it is called in Germany, plexiglass, had not yet arrived, one can hardly any longer hope that more than a fourth of this also ticklish work can be performed . . .

Since the writing [of the "Schondorf" codex] is relatively clear, the glassing can be justified. For this reason Sir Chester Beatty also decided for the use of plexiglass, since one can also photograph through this with infrared, if it should prove to be necessary.

Hemmnisse beseitigt, sodass ich jetzt das Psalmenbuch imprägnieren und im Judi das letzte Blatt des Codex C aufatmend und doch ein wenig melancholisch abheben konnte. Die schönste Arbeit am Manifund ist das Abheben eines Blattes.

Damit aber war die schwierigste Teilaufgabe an den Sir Chester Beatty Papyri abgeschlossen worden. Codex C hatte insgesamt rund 140 zum Teil recht gute Blätter hergegeben. Sie wurden ebenfalls 1954 imprägniert.

[p. 5] Die definitive Verglasung sollte in diesem Jahre [1955] erfolgen, da aber bisher noch nicht das Spezialglas Perspex oder, wie es in Deutschland heisst: Plexiglas eingetroffen ist, bleibt kaum zu erwarten, dass mehr als ein Viert el dieser ebenfalls heiklen Arbeit geleistet werden kann . . .

Da die Schrift [of the "Schondorf" codex] relativ deutlich ist, lässt sich das Verglasen rechtfertigen. Aus diesem Grunde entschied sich Sir Chester Beatty auch für die Verwendung von Perspexglas, da durch dieses auch mit Infrarot, wenn es sich als nötig erweisen sollte, hindurchfotografiert werden kann.

In 1954 Ibscher had given a slightly different figure for the number of leaves he had conserved from Codex C, the Kephalaia:[4] "136 leaves or 272 pages of text of partially very good condition are separated and thus available."

In 1964/65 Rolf Ibscher also presented a much more disillusioned report:[5]

4. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 11: "136 Blätter oder 272 Seiten Text von zum Teil sehr guter Verfassung liegen abgelöst damit vor."

5. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 55–57.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 55] The annoyance is and remains that the work that had advanced so energetically on the Chester Beatty part of the find has come to a complete standstill since 1956, when I was for the last time in Dublin. This is due to the death of the librarian Mr. Wilkinson and that of Mr. Merton, both of whom alone knew what still needed to be mastered. Until 1962 I had hoped [p. 56] to be able to complete the work in Dublin . . . [p. 57] The death of Mr. Wilkinson, the librarian of the Chester Beatty Library in Dublin, and just so that of Mr. Merton, led to the situation that Sir Chester Beatty, now standing under the influence of other advisors, stopped the undertaking, with the explanation that the most important part—nota bene the most important for him—the separating of the remaining leaves of the codex, had been completed,—whereby he was not stingy with praise—, but he said he had many other important projects in view and he was no longer the youngest.

[p. 55] Das Ärgernis ist und bleibt, dass die so stürmisch vorangekommene Arbeit am Chester Beatty-Fundanteil in völliges Stocken seit 1956 geraten ist, als ich das letzte Mal in Dublin gewesen war, durch den Tod des Bibliothekars Mr. Wilkinson und Mr. Merton's, die beide allein um das noch zu Bewältigende wussten. Bis 1962 hatte ich gehofft, in Dublin vollenden zu [p. 56] können . . . [p. 57] Der Tod Mr. Wllkinson's, des Bibliothekars der Chester-Beatty-Library in Dublin und ebenso der von Mr. Merton führte dazu, dass Sir Chester Beatty nun unter dem Einfluss anderer Berater stehend, das Unternehmen mit der Begründung abstoppte, der wichtigste—wohlgemerkt für ihn wichtigste—Teil, die Ablösung der restlichen Codicesblätter sei abgeschlossen,—wobei er mit Lob nicht kargte—, aber er habe noch viele andere wichtige Projekte vor und er sei nicht mehr der Jüngste.

One may recall (see above) the comment that I. E. S. Edwards made in a letter to R. J. Hayes on November 1, 1960: "I cannot myself think that Rolf Ibscher could have known anything about these papyri. He was working for Sir Chester Beatty for about four years and he would surely have told one of us if he had known of their existence. I feel we should regard him as a last resource." Edwards wrote to Günther Roeder on the same day:

> I wonder whether you have any recollection of having seen these papyri at any stage either in Dr. Ibscher's possession or in the Museum. It is possible that Dr. Ibscher had them in his home and if so the only one who could help would be Rolf

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> Ibscher. If possible, however, I do not want Rolf Ibscher to be involved in this matter because he and Sir Chester Beatty have had some differences over the mounting of the Mani papyri which were not sent to Dr. Hugo Ibscher.

On the same day Edwards wrote to Rudolf Anthes: "I must also add that—at least at present—I do not want Rolf Ibscher to know that I am trying to trace these documents. He has been rather troublesome to Sir Chester Beatty and I am not very sure that I can count on his good will."

Thus, Ibscher stood alone, a technician dependent for employment on nonexistent scholars and patrons. He had sought in vain to persuade Polotsky to resume the collaboration that had been so effective with his father, but by 1964–1965 no scholar was available:[6]

[p. 61] Walter Till wrote me on June 6, 1957: "Of course I was in the Chester Beatty collection. But there was no talk of a continuation of the publication. That is indeed a difficult chapter. When you say that one should draw on no young forces, I must agree with you, if you mean by that beginners. This is of course not for beginners. But it is also not for old people; for one must have for it good young eyes. Young forces would be quite acceptable, but not mere beginners. People with some experience, who have worked on other things. After all, one must reflect that Polotsky, Böhlig and Allberry were also young when they tried their hands at the Manichaica. If now a young person goes at it, he would have the great advantage over the three I have named that indeed three volumes lie before us published, on which he [p. 62] can train himself. This possibility is some-

[p. 61] Walter Till schrieb mir am 6. Juni 1957: "Natürlich war ich in der Chester-Beatty-Sammlung. Aber über eine Weiterführung der Publikation wurde nicht gesprochen. Das ist ja ein schwieriges Kapitel. Wenn Sie sagen, man sollte keine jungen Kräfte heranziehen, so muss ich Ihnen dann recht geben, wenn Sie darunter Anfänger verstehen. Das ist natürlich nichts für Anfänger. Es ist aber auch nichts für Alte; denn man muss gute junge Augen dazu haben. Junge Kräfte wären schon recht, aber nicht gerade Anfänger. Leute mit etwas Erfahrung, die schon andere Dinge bearbeitet haben. Schliesslich muss man bedenken, dass auch Polotsky, Böhlig and Allberry jung waren, als sie sich an den Manichaika versuchten. Wenn jetzt ein Junger Baran herangeht, hat er vor den drei genannten den grossen Vorteil, dass eben schon drei

6. Ibid., 61.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

thing the three I have named did not have. Of course there stood perhaps Carl Schmidt by their side with his great experience."

Bände publiziert vorliegen, an denen er [p. 62] sich schulen kann. Diese Möglichkeit hatten die drei Genannten nicht. Allerdings stand ihnen vielleicht Carl Schmidt mit seiner grossen Erfahrung zur Seite."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:26:58 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Inventories of Individual Codices

This series of misadventures of the Manichaean codices as a result of the war and the postwar period means that to a certain extent, the material must be, as it were, rediscovered. For the information Schmidt and Polotsky provided more than a half a century ago, incomplete though it was, provided a picture of what there was, where it was, and what was being done with it at the time, which stands in sharp contrast to the absence of any comparable published information today. The present study hence seeks to clarify such questions as of today, so that the current generation of scholars can know what can be ascertained about the present status of this important manuscript discovery.

Schmidt and Polotsky's article proceeded to discuss in a preliminary way the Manichaean codices one by one. That initial information is cited here as a point of departure. It is then supplemented first by the official entry made in the Inventarbuch by Wilhelm Schubart, director of the Ägyptisches Museum and of the Papyrussammlung, together with whatever subsequent unofficial notes were added to the entries. (The Inventarbuch is now kept in the administration offices beneath the Pergamonmuseum on the Museumsinsel of Berlin.) This is then updated from the editiones principes, to the extent the codices have been published. For each codex there is added the information that Rolf Ibscher and Alexander Böhlig provided in various articles and lectures presented over the subsequent years. Then recorded for each codex is the information found in a preliminary catalog of Coptic manuscripts in the Berlin papyrus collection, a catalog presented by Wolfgang Müller to a workshop held at the Institut für Byzantinistik of

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:04 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg on December 14 and 15, 1964.[1] Then the entry is excerpted from a more detailed catalog published by Walter Beltz in 1978.[2] Finally, this secondary literature is updated with an inventory of the actual papyri themselves.

1. Müller, "Die koptischen Handschriften der Berliner Papyrussammlung," 67–68.

2. Beltz, "Katalog der koptischen Handschriften," APF (1978) 57–119; (1980) 121–222. The Manichaean codices are catalogued on pp. 97–98.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:04 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Part Three

The Berlin Holdings

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:07 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 9 —

P15995 Synaxeis (Berlin Part)

Schmidt and Polotsky reported as follows:[1]

And with equal brevity we must report on a collection of 31 leaves brought under glass, which were acquired in the Fayyum and without doubt belong to the London Mani pieces. It also has to do with individual treatises, as the remains of titles show. We read there: ⲧⲙⲁ2ⲥ̅ⲛ̅ⲧⲉ ⲛ̅ⲥⲩⲛⲁⲍⲓⲥ, "the second σύναξις [a chapter superscription on lines 14–15 of the side with vertical fibers of the leaf labeled 18, and a running head at the top of the side with vertical fibers of the leaf labeled 17], and beside this the number ⲛⲋ̅, which indicates the 33rd treatise, or ⲧⲙⲁ2ⲱⲙⲧⲉ ⲛ̅ⲥⲩⲛⲁ2ⲓⲥ ⲙ̅ⲡⲁ2ⲱⲙ̅ⲧ̅ ⲛⲁⲟⲅⲟⲥ ⲙ̅ⲡⲉⲩⲁⲅⲅⲉⲗⲓⲟⲛ ⲉⲧⲁⲛ̅ⲥ = "The Third σύναξις of the Third λόγος of the Living Gospel" [a chapter superscription on lines 10-11 of the side with the horizontal fibers of the leaf labeled 16]. What is meant by σύναξις, "assembly,"

Und ebenso kurz müssen wir referieren über eine Sammlung von 31 unter Glas gebrachten Blättern, die im Fajum erworben sind and unbedingt zu den Londoner Manistücken gehören. Es sind ebenfalls einzelne Abhandlungen, wie die Reste der Uberschriften zeigen. Wir lesen dort: ⲧⲙⲁ2ⲥ̅ⲛ̅ⲧⲉ ⲛ̅ⲥⲩⲛⲁⲍⲓⲥ "die zweite σύναξις" [a chapter superscription on lines 14–15 of the side with vertical fibers of the leaf labeled 18, and a running head at the top of the side with vertical fibers of the leaf labeled 17], daneben die Zahl ⲛⲋ̅, die die 33. Abhandlung anzeigt, oder ⲧⲙⲁ2ⲱⲙⲧⲉ ⲛ̅ⲥⲩⲁⲛ2ⲓⲥ ⲙ̅ⲡⲁ2ⲱⲙ̅ⲧ̅ ⲛⲁⲟⲅⲟⲥ ⲙ̅ⲡⲉⲩⲁⲅⲅⲉⲗⲓⲟⲛ ⲉⲧⲁⲛ̅ⲥ = "die dritte σύναξις des dritten λόγος des lebendigen Evangeliums" [a chapter superscription on lines 10–11 of the side with the horizontal fibers of the leaf

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:07 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

still remains unclear. A hint is provided by the mention of the "Living Gospel," the well-known original work of Mani. It seems to have to do with some kind of commentary to this text, from the pen of a later Manichaean.

labeled 16]. Was unter σύναξις "Versammlung" zu verstehen ist, bleibt noch unklar. Ein Fingerzeig gibt die Erwähnung des "lebendigen Evangeliums," des bekannten Originalwerkes des Mani. Es scheint sich um eine Art von Kommentar zu diesem aus der Feder eines späteren Manichäers zu handeln.

Schmidt and Polotsky's report about the rest of the Synaxeis codex is included in their report among the codices belonging to Sir Chester Beatty (see Codex B Synaxeis below).

In their original report (see above), Schmidt and Polotsky had stated: "The antiquities dealer in the Fayyum had sold his manuscripts exclusively to Mr. Chester Beatty." The 31 leaves are an exception, for "one had removed the top and bottom layers of papyrus, which had suffered to an especial extent against the covers of the binding . . . , to give the whole a better appearance." In the spring of 1931, after Sir Chester Beatty had acquired the three codices of the Fayyum dealer, Schmidt "found such outwardly unimpressive remains, which doubtlessly belong to the papyrus books acquired by Mr. Chester Beatty in the Fayyum, and . . . acquired them for a cheap price, since the dealer already had his great reward in his pocket. I do not regret my decision, for in the conservation 31 leaves could be brought under glass in more or less fragmentary preservation." Thus, only 31 leaves of this codex belong to the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptische Abteilung of the Staatliche Museen of Berlin.

Volume 15 of the Inventarbuch of the Papyrus-Sammlung, titled on the spine "Staatl. Museen Ägyptische Abteilung P15001–16000" ("State Museums, Egyptian Section, P15001–16000"), records on facing pages both numbered 2294, each of the Manichaean manuscripts, under the numbers P15995–15999. The hand of the initial entry in black ink Wolfgang Müller has identified as that of Wilhelm Schubart, under whom he had studied, and who was his predecessor (several times removed) as director of the Papyrus-Sammlung and the Ägyptische Abteilung.[2]

2. In letters of May 7, 1957, and May 14 and 15, 1957, from Rolf Ibscher to Carsten Colpe, these entries are ascribed, apparently erroneously, to Hugo Ibscher.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:07 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

At P[15995] there is the following entry, apparently made before the identification of the leaves as deriving from the Synaxeis codex:

Coptic Papyrus Codex, 31 leaves, partially damaged. Manuscript of about the fifth century A.D. Content: Manichaean writing about theogony. Acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt, in Cairo, 1931. Gift of Mr. August Pfeffer 1933. The leaves are on the average 22 cm high, 15 cm wide.	Koptischer Papyruskodex, 31 Blätter, z. T. beschädigt. Handschrift etwa des 5. Jh. n. Chr. Inhalt: Manichäische Schrift über Theogonie. Erworben durch Herrn Prof. Carl Schmidt, in Cairo, 1931. Geschenk des Herrn August Pfeffer 1933. Die Blätter sind im Durchschnitt 22 cm hoch 15 cm breit.

To this basic entry have been added in pencil: "Schrank 5" ["cupboard 5"] and "z. Zt. Papyrus-Sammlung Regal" ["at present Papyrus Collection shelves."] A rubber stamp reading "1958 vorhanden" ["1958 present"] records the return of the material from Leningrad, after which 31 counting marks record the presence of all 31 leaves, which is also stated explicitly: "31 Blätter zurück" ["31 leaves back"]. A second line in the same hand records: "Codex in Göttingen! [Rolf] Ib[scher]." A stamp reading "1972 vorhanden" ["1972 present"] confirms that the material was present at the time of the inventory of holdings made that year by Ulrich Luft, then of the Museum staff.

The Vorwort of 1940 to the Kephalaia provides more information, though still cryptic, about the patron who made possible the Museum's acquisition of the Manichaica:

Professor Schmidt sought to gain the rest of the papyri for Germany. That was possible for him only thanks to the financial support of Director August Pfeffer, who acquired the texts and in a very generous way gave them to the State Museums in Berlin.	Den Rest der Papyri suchte Professor Schmidt für Deutschland zu gewinnen. Das wurde ihm nur möglich durch die finanzielle Unterstützung des Herrn Direktor August Pfeffer, der die Texte erwarb and in hochherziger Weise den Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin schenkte.

Alexander Böhlig has explained (during a visit to his Tübingen home on May 8, 1986) that Schmidt cultivated a circle of well-to-do patrons, to which Pfeffer must have belonged. The title director does not refer to a position with, e.g., the museum or the publishing house, but the title apparently reflects a business relationship.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:07 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The possibility that there are in Berlin more leaves of the Synaxeis than the 31 Schmidt acquired was raised by Rolf Ibscher[3] with regard to > a sizable number of leaves separated last, quite provisionally, by my father, with an entry on the paper cover that protected them which really creates puzzles: "from Codex B," i.e., then Chester Beatty [Synaxeis] or ?—and with the addition put in parentheses "Letters," i.e., then again Codex Nr. 15[9]98. What is one to make of that?

These additional leaves that puzzled Rolf Ibscher are currently in the Papyrus-Abteilung of Berlin, now classified unambiguously as belonging to P^{15998}.

Wolfgang Müller's preliminary inventory of 1964–1965 reported: "Synaxeis = sermons, 31 leaves in Berlin, the rest in Göttingen, here 145 leaf units separated, about 100–120 leaves still on the book block."[4]

Beltz catalogued the 31 leaves as follows:

I 603 P^{15995}. 31 leaves of a codex, P^{15995}, averaging 18–20 cm in height and 11–16 cm in width. There are about 26–28 lines per page. It is very poorly preserved. It is hardly legible. The codex belongs to the discoveries of Medinet Madi and was acquired by Schmidt for Berlin in 1928 [read: 1931]. The remainder of the codex is to be found for the time being in West Berlin. Since 1945, 145 new leaf units have been separated and conserved there. The remainder of the book block is not yet conserved. A. Böhlig and C. Colpe have defined the codex as "Synaxeis to the Living Gospel of Mani." On the text see Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten," Berlin 1933, and W.

I 603 P^{15995}; 31 Blätter eines Codex, P^{15995}, durchschnittliche H. 18–20 und durchschnittliche B. 11–16. Pro S. etwa 26–28 Z. Sehr schlecht erhalten. Kaum lesbar. Codex gehört zu den Funden von Medinet Mandi und wurde von Schmidt für Berlin 1928 [read: 1931] erworben. Der Rest des Codex befindet sich z. Z. in Berlin-West. Seit 1945 sind dort 145 neue Blatteinheiten abgelöst und konserviert. Der Rest des Buchblockes noch nicht konserviert. A. Böhlig und C. Colpe haben den Codex bestimmt als "Synaxeis zu dem Lebendigen Evangelium des Mani." Zum Text siehe Schmidt-Polotsky, Ein Manifund in

3. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 62.

4. Synaxeis = Predigten, 31 Bl. in Berlin, Rest in Göttingen, hier 145 Blatteinheiten abgelöst, etwa 100–120 Bl. noch auf dem Buchblock.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:07 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Müller, "Koptologische Studien in der DDR," Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Universität Halle-Wittenberg 1965, Sonderheft, pp. 67–68.

Ägypten, Berlin 1933, und W. Müller, Kopt. Studien in der DDR, WZU Halle-Wittenberg 1965, Sonderheft, S. 67–68.

Photographs of both sides of leaf 20 are on file at the Papyrus-Sammlung in Berlin. One copy of each side was donated to the Manichaean archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, which were turned over to Wolf-Peter Funk.

Gesine Schenke Robinson transcribed the thirty-one leaves in 1985–1986. Wolf-Peter Funk provided a partial draft translation in April 1988.

This codex has not been published.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:07 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 10 —

P 15996 Kephalaia, Volume One

Schmidt and Polotsky's basic report cited above noted that it was part of the Kephalaia that was first shown to Schmidt in 1930 and acquired on his return trip from Jerusalem, and that it was this codex that was then supplemented by two further piles of papyrus acquired from the same dealer in the spring of 1931. Schmidt and Polotsky added specific information about this codex as follows:[1]

[p. 18] In first place among the present papyrus books stands a work whose parts came to Berlin in individual stages and whose conservation was begun immediately by Ibscher, so that already rather large connected portions have been brought under glass. It has to do here with a work that was counted among the original writings of Mani and once bore the name Κεφάλαια in the Greek tradition.

[p. 19]. . . With regard to externals, the work must have embraced an unusually large size, in that Ibscher has already been able to identify the number ϕΙΔ = 514 on one of the leaves. For a fortunate circumstance comes to

[p. 18] Unter den vorliegenden Papyrusbüchern tritt an erste Stelle ein Werk, dessen Teile in einzelnen Etappen nach Berlin gekommen sind und dessen Konservierung sofort von Ibscher in Angriff genommen ist, so dass bereits grössere zusammenhängende Stücke unter Glas gebracht worden sind. Es handelt sich hier um ein Werk, das zu den Originalschriften des Mani gerechnet wurde und einst den Namen Κεφάλαια in der griechischen überlieferung trug.

[p. 19]. . . Was das Äussere anbetrifft, so muss das Werk einen ungemein grossen Umfang gehabt haben, wenn Ibscher bereits die Ziffer ϕΙΔ = 514 auf einem der Blätter feststellen konnte. Denn als günstiger Umstand kommt uns zur Hilfe, dass die einzel-

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 18–24. The quotations are from 18–19.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

our help, in that the individual pages were numbered and thus an arrangement of the separated parts becomes possible. In any case the work must have included in the papyrus codex more than 520 pages = 260 leaves.

nen Seiten numeriert waren und dadurch eine Anordnung der auseinandergefallenen Teile ermöglicht wird. Jedenfalls muss das Werk in dem Papyruscodex mehr als 520 Seiten = 260 Blätter umfasst haben.

Quire 21 would have consisted of pages 481–504, quire 22 of pages 505–28.

Wilhelm Schubart recorded in the Inventarbuch of the Papyrussammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum of Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR in black ink for P[15996] the following entry: "Koptischer Papyruskodex." ["Coptic Papyrus Codex."] The column regarding "Art der Erwerblung" ["Nature of the Acquisition"] reports "dsgl." ["the same"] as P[15995], i.e.: "Acquired through Prof Carl Schmidt, in Cairo, 1931. Gift of Mr. August Pfeffer 1933." An added penciled note reports "NKEFALAION." A rubber stamp "Phot." may mean the material was photographed. The original report contained a photograph of p. 33, and the publication of Volume 1 contained a photograph of p. 31 as the frontispiece. In the Papyrus-Sammlung there are on file glossy prints of p. 295 (with a black background) and of pp. 167–68 (on a white background), presumably resulting from such photography. Glossy prints of pages 259, 261, 262, 265–74, 277, 278, 281–91, 297–99 (on a white background), prepared under the supervision of Peter Nagel for his work on the codex in the 1960s, are also present. Duplicates of pages 167, 168, 282 and 295 were given to the Manichaean Archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, and from there to Wolf-Peter Funk. A purple carbon note reports "ca. 200 Blätter, Rest in Berlin, übr. in Mo[skau]." ["ca. 200 leaves, a remainder in Berlin, the rest in Moskow]." A rubber stamp reading "1958 vorhanden" ["1958 present"] records the return of the material (presumably not from Moscow but) from Leningrad, and a rubber stamp reading "1972 vorhanden" ["1972 present"] records that the material was present at the time of the inventory of holdings made that year by Ulrich Luft, then of the museum staff.

In 1940 Hugo Ibscher reported:[2]

2. Kephalaia (see following note), Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," v–xiv, especially vi–vii.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. vi] Hence the Kephalaia did not come to Berlin in one volume, but in two larger packets and five weaker layers. All of course nicely jumbled! However, after five years of hard work, we have succeeded in saving from the Kephalaia over 400 pages for scientific work and in defining with certainty and almost without a gap the sequence of the leaves.

Purchase Number	Page Range
1	1–18
2	19–310
3	331–56
4	357–76
5	377–94
6	395–414
7	421–end

[p. vii] I could identify the pages that are missing in the list, 311-30, in a quite small find which had come to the Vienna collection along with other papyri. This acquisition was in such a bad condition that the administration of the Vienna collection at first did not even want to send it to me, since the whole appeared to be only a confusion of fibers. I succeeded in gaining from it a few more pages, even though they were quite incomplete, and on one page deciphered the chapter [number] 132, by means of which then it could be established that we had to do here with remains of pp. 311–30. Also at the other places where the leaves had been ripped

[p. vi] Die Kephalaia kamen daher auch nicht in einem Volumen nach Berlin, sondern in zwei stärkeren Packen und fünf schwächeren Lagen. Alles natürlich hübsch durcheinander! Nach fünfjähriger angestrengter Arbeit ist es aber gelungen, allein von den Kephalaia über 400 Seiten für die wissenschaftliche Bearbeitung zu retten und die Reihenfolge der Blätter fast lückenlos sicher zu bestimmen. Die einzelnen Ankäufe ergeben folgende Seiten:

Ankauf	jetzt Seite
I	1–18
II	19–310
III	331–56
IV	357–76
V	377–94
VI	395–414
VII	421–Schluss

[p. vii] Die in der Aufstellung fehlenden Seiten 311-330 konnte ich in einem winzigen Funde feststellen, der mit andern Papyri in die Wiener Sammlung gekommen war. Dieser Ankauf war so schlecht erhalten, dass die Direktion der Wiener Sammlung ihn mir erst gar nicht schicken wollte, weil das Ganze nur ein Gewirr von Fasern zu sein schien. Es gelang mir, daraus noch einige, wenn auch unvollständige Seiten zu gewinnen und auf einer Seite das Kapitel 132 zu entziffern, wodurch dann festgestellt werden konnte, dass es sich hier um Reste der Seiten 311–30 handelt. Auch an den anderen Stellen, wo die Blätter mit Gewalt voneinandergerissen worden sind, sind stets die betref-

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

apart by force, the leaves in question have always been more or less destroyed. Thus between the pp. 414–21 there are only paltry remains of the missing leaves, which can hardly be identified. [Pages 415/16 and 419/20 are missing from the box listing pages 401–20. Only the bottom half of pages 417/18 is extant, and only the top half of pages 413/14 is extant. They complement each other well, and hence could be halves of the same leaf, though vertical fiber continuity is inconclusive.] Also the pages after 421 have suffered very much. By means of the circumstances of the find I was able to identify the last leaf that survives, in spite of the missing pagination, as bearing the page number 501/02. It shows the chapter [number] c = 200.

But whether the Berlin Kephalaia have come down to us complete, or whether at the end further pages will be missing, is difficult to determine. But one may conjecture that a rather large number of leaves is lost. For I was able to identify a further Kephalaia book among the Mani books in the possession of Chester Beatty. Whereas the last discernible chapter number in the Berlin Kephalaia is 200, on a page of the London Kephalaia I could clearly read the chapter [number] 333. Since a number of pages still preceded it, which I have not yet been able to conserve, one can with certainty assume that the London Kephalaia in the present condition began with chapter 300. Thus there are missing between the Berlin and fenden Blätter mehr oder weniger zerstört worden. So befinden sich zwischen den Seiten 414–21 nur noch kümmerliche Reste der fehlenden Blätter, die sich kaum werden bestimmen lassen. [Pages 415/16 and 419/20 are missing from the box listing pages 401–20. Only the bottom half of page 417/18 is extant, and only the top half of page 413/14 is extant. They complement each other well, and hence could be halves of the same leaf, though vertical-fiber continuity is inconclusive.] Auch die auf 421 folgenden Seiten haben noch sehr gelitten. Das letzte erhaltene Blatt liess sich durch die Fundumstände, trotz der fehlenden Paginierung, von mir als Träger der Seitenzahl 501/502 bestimmen. Es zeigt das Kapitel c = 200.

Ob die Berliner Kephalaia aber vollständig auf uns gekommen sind, oder ob am Schluss noch Seiten fehlen werden, wird sich nur schwer feststellen lassen. Zu vermuten ist aber, dass noch eine grössere Anzahl von Blättern verlorengegangen ist, denn ein weiteres Kephalaiabuch konnte ich unter den im Besitz von Chester Beatty befindlichen Manibüchern feststellen. Während nun die letzte, sichtbare Kapitelzahl in den Berliner Kephalaia 200 ist, konnte ich auf einer Seite der Londoner Kephalaia das Kapitel 333 deutlich lesen. Da noch eine Anzahl von Seiten vorausgehen, die ich noch nicht restaurieren konnte, kann man mit Sicherheit annehmen, dass die Londoner Kephalaia im jetzigen Zustand mit Kapitel 300 begonnen haben. Es fehlen also zwischen den Berliner the London Kephalaia roughly 100 chapters, which would call for about 240 pages or 120 leaves. But there is hardly room for a further volume between the two that are in hand, so that we must initially assume that the missing 120 leaves were lost either from the end of the Berlin or rather from the beginning of the London Kephalaia. After all, it is not impossible that each volume of the Kephalaia contained 750 pages. Given the very thin papyrus material, the book block would have measured hardly more than 3–4 cm. A tiny fragment still attached to the upper margin of the last leaf along with other uninscribed fragments, and showing vestiges of the pagination ϕΙΔ = 514, also proves to us that pages were lost in the case of the Berlin Kephalaia at the end of the extant part.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

und den Londoner Kephalaia rund 100 Kapitel, die etwa 240 Seiten oder 120 Blätter ergeben würden. Für einen weiteren Band zwischen den beiden vorhandenen ist aber kaum Platz, so dass wir vorerst annehmen müssen, dass die fehlenden 120 Blätter entweder vom Schluss der Berliner, oder vom Anfang der Londoner Kephalaia verlorengegangen sind. Immerhin ist es nicht unmöglich, dass jeder Band der Kephalaia etwa 750 Seiten umfasst hat; bei dem sehr dünnen Papyrusmaterial würde der Buchblock kaum mehr als 3-4 cm gemessen haben. Dass bei den Berliner Kephalaia am Ende des erhaltenen Teils Seiten verlorengegangen sind, beweist uns auch ein winziges Fragment, das noch auf dem oberen Rand des letzten Blattes mit anderen unbeschriebenen Fragmenten festsass and Reste der Pagina ϕΙΔ = 514 zeigte.

It is difficult to correlate the seven acquisitions Ibscher here reports with Schmidt's report to the effect that he acquired the bulk as his first purchase in 1930 and two smaller parts in the spring of 1931.

The remains of pp. 311–30 belonging to Vienna must have been sent to Berlin, conserved there by Hugo Ibscher, and then returned to Vienna. Schmidt and Polotsky had reported concerning the Vienna material that "Ibscher recently saved fragments of two leaves from this junk heap," which reference corresponds roughly to Ibscher's allusion to "a few more pages." The material currently in the Österrreichische Nationalbibliothek bears the inventory number K 11010. It consists of four glass containers, containing three leaves and a number of fragments. The leaves are identified as pp. 311–16. The leaves 313/314 and 315/316 are most nearly complete, and relate to each other in terms of fiber directions as like (in this case vertical fibers) facing like. The small remnant of a leaf assigned the numeration 311/312 has been rotated 90 degrees rather than having been glassed right side up, to judge by the alignment of its profile. The surface labeled page 312 shares roughly the profile of pp. 313 and 315, suggesting that p. 312 should be given an odd number. But it could not be p. 311, since then (in terms of fiber directions) like would not face like. For p. 313 and the page labeled p. 312, that should be an odd-numbered page, both have horizontal fibers but would not face each other. In fact, the profile of the page labeled 312 is at places closer to that of p. 315 than to that of 313. Hence, one may postulate that what is labeled as page 312, which has horizontal fibers, is actually p. 317, 321, 325, or 329, all of which one would expect to have horizontal fibers. What is labeled p. 311 would then be p. 318, 322, 326, or 330. The chapter number Ibscher detected, 132, would then fall on page 318, 322, 326, or 330. Since chapter 140 begins on p. 343, one may estimate that a chapter averages two-and-a-half pages, in which case chapter 132 would fall at about p. 323, or, among the actual options, at p. 322. Hence one may quite tentatively postulate that the leaf labeled "311/312" is pp. 321–322. One of the five fragments glassed with "311/312" is identified as "oben links v. 312" ["above left from 312,"] and it would indeed increase the similarity of profile with page 315 if so placed on page 321. The other five fragments in this glass and the some eight fragments in a fourth glass are not identified. It is perhaps more probable that the material between pages 311 and 330 that survived belonged closely together, as a single pad, rather than widely scattered through this spectrum of ten leaves. Hence, the unidentified fragments may be largely from pages 317/318 and 319/320, since the extant leaves are pp. 313/314, 315/316 and probably 321/322.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The Kephalaia began to appear in fascicles in 1935; in 1940 the first ten fascicles were published as Volume 1, containing pp. 1–244.[3]

3. Polotsky and Böhlig, Kephalaia. Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin, Band 1, herausgegeben im Auftrage der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften unter Leitung von Prof. Carl Schmidt, 1. Hälfte (Lieferung 1–10); Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 183, n. 1 states: "Die Namen der wirklichen Editoren fehlen auf dem Titelblatt aus folgendem Grund: Der Name von H. J. Polotsky sollte in der NS-Zeit im Anschluss an die Rassengesetzgebung nicht auf dem Titelblatt erscheinen; die Nennung meines Namens allein habe ich aber abgelehnt." ["The names of the real editors are missing from the title page for the following reason: The name of H. J. Polotsky was not supposed to appear on the title page in the Nazi time because of the racial legislation. But I turned down the naming of my name alone."] Böhlig reports,

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Hugo Ibscher had referred to "over 400 pages" having been conserved. It is unlikely that more was conserved during the war. For Rolf Ibscher reported in 1964–1965 that "already in 1937" his father had stopped working "regularly" on the materials,[4] and in 1955 that "during the war this minutely detailed work . . . came to a complete halt."[5] The Inventarbuch was at Rolf Ibscher's disposal while the material itself was in the east following the war.[6] It was during this time that the entry was added, perhaps by him, to the effect that there were "ca. 200 leaves." This hardly reflects a new inventory, since the material was inaccessible, but is no doubt merely an imprecise allusion to the 1940 report of "over 400 pages." Thus the exact number of leaves conserved by Hugo Ibscher is not known.

After the war Rolf Ibscher resumed the conservation work his father had not completed. He spoke in 1955 of "the attempt to separate and impregnate a residue of very fragmented leaves of the Kephalaia, which my father had designated as 'insoluable.' These leaves should be definitively glassed by this winter, at the beginning of 1956."[7] This material had been taken to the Ibscher home before or during the time of the war and thus had not been taken to Leningrad. Its presence in the home is explainable in terms of the fact that from the age of sixty, i.e., from 1934 on, Hugo Ibscher was permitted to work three days a week at home.[8] In the archive of the Chester Beatty Library there is a black loose-leaf folder entitled: "Papyrus. Biblical Manichaean Hieratic Greek etc. General Catalogue." In the section entitled "Manichaean Pap." there is a note dated May 1940 that reads: "Mr. Allberry said that Dr. Ibscher had the remainder of Mr. Beatty's papyrus at his house in the country, at Klein Machnow (see letter from Allberry)." At the death of Hugo Ibscher it was put in the concrete bunker at the Zoo.

183, that Polotsky edited Coptic pages 1–102, and that Böhlig himself edited Coptic pages 103–244. Allberry, Manichaean Psalm-Book, Part 2, "Preface," reported that fascicles 1-8 had appeared in 1935–37.

4. Ibscher, "Über den Stand," 50.

5. Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 2.

6. This is apparent from allusions to it by Rolf Ibscher in letters to Carsten Colpe of August 7, 1957, and August 14–15, 1957, and has been confirmed by Wolfgang Müller.

7. Ibscher, "Das Konservierungswerk," 5.

8. Böhlig reports this in a letter of February 10, 1986.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Böhlig's presentation of 1960/68 reported as follows concerning this material left in Berlin:[9]

> Of the material in Berlin only a very small part has always remained in Berlin. It was the last 20 leaves of the Berlin Kephalaia book. They were conserved by Rolf Ibscher in the years 1952 and '53.

Böhlig has explained this ambiguous formulation as follows:[10]

It [Böhlig's statement "last 20 leaves"] merely means that Rolf Ibscher in these years conserved the last = the only leaves that were still in Berlin, which belonged to the Kephalaia and were still there, i.e., had not been put in security (they survived the war in the Ibscher house). It was indeed 20 pieces. I did not express any opinion as to what page numbers of the book were to be assigned to these leaves, and indeed I could not, since that would have been pure speculation (when the page numbers, as in this case, were no longer preserved on the leaves). For of course I did not know which and how many leaves of the Kephalaia had come to the USSR.

Sie [Böhlig's statement "last 20 leaves"] besagt nämlich einfach, dass Rolf Ibscher in diesen Jahren die letzten = die einzigen noch in Berlin befindlichen Blätter, die zu den Kephalaia gehörten und noch vorhanden, d.h. nicht sichergestellt waren (sie überstanden den Krieg im Hause Ibscher), konserviert hat; das waren eben 20 Stück. Mit welcher Seitenzahl des Buchs diese Blätter zu belegen waren, darüber habe ich mich überhaupt nicht geäussert, konnte es auch gar nicht, da es reine Spekulation gewesen wäre (wenn die Seitenzahl, wie hier, auf den Blättern nicht mehr erhalten war); denn ich wusste ja nicht, welche und wieviele Blätter der Kephalaia in die UdSSR gekommen waren.

The reference to 20 leaves conserved by Rolf Ibscher apparently goes back to his presentation of 1954 (see above), where he referred to conserving a "remainder of some 20 leaves" that had not gone to Leningrad. He there said he conserved them in 1951 after his first trip to London. But his return from London was delayed during the Christmas holidays by a layover at Schondorf on Ammer Lake to visit his wife's family. Hence the actual date of this conservation was no doubt the beginning of 1952, which thus overlaps Böhlig's dating of

9. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 182.

10. Böhlig in a letter of February 5, 1986.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the conservation as 1952–1953. In 1964/1965 Rolf Ibscher dated this conservation "between 1951 and 1955." But in the published summary of his speech, Rolf Ibscher refers to having conserved a "remainder of the Kephalaia, ca. 25 leaves or ca. 50 pages of the text." Thus the exact number seems to have been uncertain, which is of relevance in seeking to interpret the fact that Beltz's catalogue listed the number of plates still in Berlin as 30 (see below). One of these leaves was "atomized" by Rolf Ibscher's sneeze. Since he listed 20 as extant or 25 as conserved by himself, one may assume that this now-missing leaf is not included in his figures.

Böhlig also reported on plans for the continuation of the publication:[11]

The double fascicle of the second volume, prepared by me already during the war and embracing pp. 245–92, has not yet been printed by the publisher Kohlhammer, as a result of the lack of specialized typesetters, and after the war as a result of the unclarity that prevailed as to the continuation of the project. Hence I presented the German translation, for the sake of interested persons, in ["Die Arbeit an den koptischen Manichaica,"] Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg [5 (1956) 1067–84]. This double fascicle should now be printed as the first of the second volume of the Kephalaia, and the following ones will be continually added. [Footnote 3, added when the essay was reprinted in 1968: This double fascicle has been worked over still another time by me and in the meantime has appeared in print (1966). The Institut für Byzantinistik of the University of Halle will care for the further

Die noch im Kriege von mir fertiggestellte, die Seiten 245–92 umfassende erste Doppellieferung des 2. Bandes wurde vom Verlag Kohlhammer infolge des Mangels an Spezialsetzern und nach dem Kriege infolge der Unklarheit, die über die Fortführung des Unternehmens herrschte, noch nicht gedruckt. Die deutsche Übersetzung legte ich deshalb um der Interessenten willen 1956 in der Wissenschaftlichen Zeitschrift der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg vor ["Die Arbeit an den koptischen Manichaica," 5 (1956) 1067–84]. Diese Doppellieferung soll nun als erste des 2. Bandes der Kephalaia gedruckt werden, die weiteren werden sich laufend anschliessen. [Footnote 3, added when the essay was reprinted in 1968: Diese Doppellieferung ist von mir noch einmal überarbeitet worden und inzwischen im Druck erschienen (1966); die weitere Edition wird das Institut für

11. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 182.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

editing through a co-worker [Peter Nagel]. Also an index should be added to the second volume of the Kephalaia. The collections prepared along with the editing were lost in the war and must be prepared anew. [Footnote 4: At my request Dr. Dr. P. Nagel of the Institut für Byzantinistik of the University of Halle has produced anew the index for the first volume. It is not yet clear whether it is to appear separately or only together with the index of the second volume at the conclusion of the total edition.]

Byzantinistik der Universität Halle durch einen Mitarbeiter [Peter Nagel] besorgen lassen.] Dem 2. Bande der Kephalaia sollte auch ein Index angefügt werden. Die mit der Edition angefertigten Sammlungen hierfür sind im Kriege verlorengegangen und müssen neu erstellt werden. [Footnote 4: Auf meine Anregung hin hat Herr Dr. Dr. P. Nagel vom Institut für Byzantinistik der Universität Halle den Index für den 1. Band neu erstellt. Es ist noch nicht geklärt, ob er gesondert oder erst zusammen mit dem des 2. Bandes am Ende der Gesamtausgabe erscheinen soll.]

The first two fascicles of a second volume of the Berlin Kephalaia, fascicles 11–12, were published in German translation only in 1956 (pages 245–92), and then in 1966 with Coptic text and revised German translation, but omitting page 292, which was added in 1985.[12]

The Vorwort to the 1966 edition explains the circumstances of the delay:

After it was possible to complete the first half of the Kephalaia in the year 1940, the second half, including the indices for both halves, was to follow without interruption in further double fascicles. Unfortunately however the editing work had to be interrupted as a consequence of the war and its effects. The double fascicle 11–12 that is here presented was basically

Nachdem die 1. Hälfte der "Kephalaia" im Jahre 1940 abgeschlossen werden konnte, sollte die 2. Hälfte einschliesslich der Indices für beide Teile in weiteren Doppellieferungen laufend folgen. Leider musste die Editionsarbeit aber dann infolge des Krieges und seiner Auswirkungen unterbrochen werden. Die jetzt vorliegende Doppellieferung 11/12 war im

12. Böhlig, "Aus den Manichaischen," 1067–84; Kephalaia, 244–91; Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 183, reported inexactly that the double fascicle contained Coptic pages 245–92. In fact, the last page could not be included for technical reasons within the limits of the double fascicle. Hence Coptic pp. 290, 29–292, and 32 were published with an extensive interpretation by Böhlig, "Ja und Amen," 59–70.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

completed in the year 1943, transcriptions of further pages were complete and the indices were supplemented as we went along. Yet the publisher W. Kohlhammer found himself unable, due to the lack of specialized typesetters, to undertake the printing of the double fascicle still during the war. The transcriptions of further pages and the indices became a victim of the air attacks. Finally it was especially the displacement of the papyri, which returned to Berlin only in 1958 and were accessible again in 1960, that made a continuous publication of the edition impossible . . .

Dr. Nagel will also continue the edition in the future.

wesentlichen im Jahre 1943 fertiggestellt, Abschriften weiterer Seiten waren angefertigt und die Indices laufend ergänzt warden. Doch der Verlag W. Kohlhammer sah sich aus Mangel an Spezialsetzern ausserstande, den Druck der Doppellieferung noch während des Krieges vorzunehmen. Die Abschriften weiterer Seiten und die Indices wurden ein Opfer der Fliegerangriffe. Schliesslich machte vor allem die Verlagerung der Papyri, die erst 1958 nach Berlin zurückkehrten und 1960 wieder zugänglich waren, ein kontinuierliches Weitererscheinen der Edition unmöglich . . .

Herr Dr. Nagel wird auch die Edition in Zukunft fortsetzen.

Wolfgang Müller had already reported in 1964 "dass die Kephalaia P. 15[9]96 vollständig erhalten sind und jetzt nach erfolgter Umkonservierung von P. Nagel/Halle weiter ediert werden" ["that the Kephalaia P. 15[9]96 are completely extant and now, after their successful reconservation, are being further edited by P. Nagel of Halle."] Similarly Rolf Ibscher reported in 1965/66 that the Kephalaia "jetzt erneut nach dem Tode Schmidts und Weggang Böhligs in Halle durch Dr. Dr. Nagel kollationiert und weiter ediert wurden und werden" ["now will be collated and further edited anew after the death of Schmidt and the departure of Böhlig in Halle by Dr. Dr. Nagel."][13]

In August 1985 Nagel confirmed that he had formally submitted his withdrawal, so as not to block the Material from being reassigned. Thus the editing of the material has reverted to the supervision of its repository, the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin, rather than being still under the care of the Institute that Nagel himself has directed.

Beltz's catalogue reported as follows on this codex:

13. Ibscher, "Mani und kein Ende," 219.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

I 605 P15996. Codex from the Mani find, P15996 contains the Manichaean Kephalaia. The whole codex is glassed. In Berlin are pp. 1–446, 455–56. Pp. 447–54 are at present in Warsaw. Furthermore there are 30 more plates with fragments of various sizes of the same codex in Berlin. On the nature of the codex see the introduction to the edition: Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin, Vol. I, Kephalaia. First half prepared by H. J. Polotsky and A. Böhlig (pp. 1–243); second half prepared by A. Böhlig (pp. 244–91). Stuttgart, 1940; 1966.

I 605 P15996; Codex aus dem Manifund, enthält P15996 die manichäischen Kephalaia. Der ganze, Codex ist verglast. In Berlin befinden sich die S. 1–446, 455–56. Die Seiten 447–454 befinden sich z. Z. in Warschau. Ferner sind noch 30 Platten mit Fragmenten unterschiedlicher Grösse vom selben Codex in Berlin. Zur Beschaffenheit des Codex siehe die Einleitung zu der Edition: Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin, Bd. I, Kephalaia. 1. Hälfte bearbeitet von H. J. Polotsky u. A. Böhlig (S. 1–243); 2. Hälfte bearbeitet von A. Böhlig (S. 244–291). Stuttgart 1940; 1966.

Günter Poethke, Custos of the Greek manuscripts in the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum, visited Warsaw in September and October of 1971 and saw there four leaves of the Mani material. On February 23, 1972, he submitted a report preserved in the archives of the Ägyptisches Museum to the effect that in the Kathedra Papirologii of the University of Warsaw four Manichaean leaves were present, for which he listed the numbers 451/2, 453/4, 447/8, 499/500. Beltz saw the leaves on June 2, 1976, and identified them for the first time as belonging to P15996. Subsequently, two additional leaves of the Manichaica have been located at the university.[14]

Wincenty Myszor reported as follows on the materials at the Warsaw University, on July 12, 1986:

There are here 6 glassed leaves. Of these, 5 plates are 36 cm high and 23.5 broad, and 1 plate is 24.5 cm high and 18.5 cm broad. This last plate also has a different glassing. It is smaller and is supplied with dark red adhesive ribbon. The 5 plates have the pp. 447/448;

Hier befinden sich 6 verglaste Blätter. Davon sind 5 Platten 36 cm hoch und 23,5 cm breit und 1 Platte ist 24,5 cm hoch und 18,5 cm breit. Diese letzte Platte hat auch eine andere Verglasung. Sie ist kleiner und mit dunkelrotem Klebeband versehen. Die 5 Platten

14. According to a letter dated December 23, 1985, from Wlodzimierz Godlewski.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

449/450; 451/452; 453/454 and 499/500.The plates 447/448 and 449/450 have P15996; the plate 499/500 has P14997. Also the smaller sixth plate has P15997. The other two plates are without P. On June 2, 1976, W. Beltz opened the glass of the leaf 453/454, as is indicated by a piece of paper pasted at the cracked place (with a signature). The 5 leaves seem to belong to the same codex. The state of preservation of the leaves is very bad. The worst is however the sixth leaf with the other glassing. This leaf with P15997 (the last digit is not quite clear; it can also be 96!) belongs very certainly to different codex from the plate 499/500 with a quite clear P15997, and hence different from the other 5 leaves.

haben die Seiten 447/448; 449/450; 451/452; 453/454 und 499/500. Die Platten 447/448 und 449/450 haben P15996; die Platte 499/500 hat P15997. Auch die kleinere sechste Platte hat P15997. Die anderen beiden Platten sind ohne P. Die Verglasung des Blattes 453/454 hat W. Beltz am 2. Juni 1976 geöffnet, wie ein aufgeklebtes Papier (mit Unterschrift) an der angebrochenen Stelle zeigt. Die 5 Blätter scheinen zu demselben Kodex zu gehören. Der Erhaltungsgrad der Blätter ist sehr schlecht: Am schlechtesten aber ist das sechste Blatt mit der anderen Verglasung. Dieses Blatt mit P15997 (die letzte Ziffer ist nicht ganz deutlich; kann es auch 96 sein!) gehört ganz bestimmt zu einem anderen Kodex als die Platte 499/500 mit ganz deutlichem P15997, also als die anderen 5 Blätter.

This would indicate that Poethke's report of the labeling 499/500 being in Warsaw and Beltz's report of 449/450 being in Berlin are not conflicting reports about the labeling of the same plate, as has been previously assumed, but are both accurate reports about different plates. The fact that the plate labeled 499/500 is listed as P15997 rather than as P15996 must be regarded as an error in labeling. For Myszor's conclusion that it is from the same codex as the 4 leaves with pages 447–54, the identity in the size of the glass frame with that of the 4 leaves, and the pagination reaching such a high figure as 500, all point toward the Kephalaia, and not toward the Acts. For in the case of the Acts, no page numbers have been assigned to its few conserved leaves, and the plates are much smaller.

On September 11, 1986, Wolf-Peter Funk examined the five plates, and on November 15, 1986, he wrote a report that brings further clarity to the situation. "Apart from the mystery of the one glass frame of smaller size, there can be no doubt about the assignment of the leaves to codices: the five glasses clearly belong to P[15996] because they actually contain portions of Kephalaia text." Concerning the individual leaves, he reports:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> 447/448: "Leaf in extremely bad condition, on both sides only small parts of papyrus surface extant . . ." P. 447(with vertical fibres): A label, apparently old, reads 447. Though nothing was transcribed, regular lines, but no chapter heading, could be detected throughout. P. 448, (with horizontal fibres): "'Readability' only slightly better than P. 447." Each of the letters of the pagination of P. 447 is uncertain. Only up to four letters on a line were transcribed from lines 1–4. "No chapter heading visible (but not entirely excluded)."
>
> 449/450: "Leaf in extremely bad condition, on both sides only small parts of papyrus surface extant." P. 449 (with horizontal fibres): Nothing was transcribed. No chapter heading is visible. P. 450 (with vertical fibres): A recent label reads "449/450 P[15996]." In the top left-hand corner of the page is the pagination 450, though the first letter is uncertain. There are 29 or 30 lines, the last seven of which are part of a new chapter, vestiges of whose heading follow upon line 19. The chapter number is legible only as ..5. Only a few letters were transcribed.
>
> 451/452: P. 451 (with vertical fibers): The page number 451 is legible in the upper right-hand corner, as is much of the running title. Twenty-one lines are visible, but no chapter heading. P. 452 (with horizontal fibers): A label reads 451/452. The page number 452 and the complete running title are legible. After line 26 there is the chapter number 1.6; the title follows on the next three lines, followed by the first two lines of the chapter, all only partly legible.
>
> 453/454: There is a label, apparently old, reading "453/454." A "large paper strip across broken glasses on both sides" reads: "Schutzverklebung 2. Juni 1976 / Beltz," ". . . durch WALTER BELTZ Berlin." ["Protective pasting June 2, 1976, Beltz," ". . . by Walter Beltz Berlin."] "Both pages make difficult reading except upper part of recto. Apparently no chapter headings." P. 453 (with horizontal fibers): The running title and the central segment of lines 1–4 were transcribed. P. 454 (with vertical fibers): The uncertain letters of pagination 45. as well as the running title and a couple of words from each of the first two lines were transcribed.
>
> 499/500: The leaf is thus labeled. P. 499 (with vertical fibers): A few words of lines 2–3 were transcribed. Then after line 3 there is what looks like a chapter number reading 2 . . . , where what is taken to be perhaps the second digit looks like a small raised lambda). Two lines

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms > of title follow, of which only a word on each was transcribed. P. 500 (with horizontal fibers): Very occasional letters or words were transcribed. After what may be line 12, 13, or 14, there is a straight clear line drawn horizontally under the line of text, after which there follow lines with only scattered letters legible.

From this wealth of previously unavailable scattered detail there emerges a problem, which Funk analyzes as follows:

> To me, another problem of a different nature arose when I compared what I think I read in Warsaw on the fifth leaf, with Ibscher's statement about the last surviving leaf of Kephalaia (Volume One) containing pp. 501/02 and showing the chapter number c = 200. If I am not mistaken, the leaf identified as pp. 499/500 contains a chapter heading whose top number is extant (but not the right- or left-hand side numbers): the first figure in this number is clearly S, but apparently followed by other figures (illegible to me), which means that the number must be higher than 200. If this is correct, the partly destroyed chapter numbers on pp. 450 and 452 could be restored as [19]5 and 1[9]6, respectively (which would be in accordance with the average length of chapters in the first 12 quires of the codex). Otherwise they would have to be 185 and 186, assuming that the length of chapters considerably increases after p. 292. This latter question can probably be decided after examining the preceding pages at Berlin.
>
> P. 389 bears the chapter number 156, p. 395 the chapter number 158, p. 397 the chapter number 159, and p. 429 the chapter number 172. Hence it would seem more likely that p. 450 would bear the chapter number [18]5 and p. 452 the chapter number 1[8]6.

These considerations have led Funk to put a question mark beside the numeration 499/500, with which the leaf is labeled. For if Ibscher were correct in detecting on the leaf 501/502 the chapter numeration 200, a chapter numeration beyond 200 could not occur on the leaf 499/500 but of necessity would be a leaf paginated in the 500s.

One may also wonder if the discrepancy may not be due to some error in Ibscher's way of ascertaining that the pagination of the last leaf that survives is 501/502. For he concedes that no pagination is extant; his reasoning is based on unspecified "circumstances of the find." It is not clear how such matters would establish the precise pagination. In any case, the leaf to which Ibscher referred, if other than the Warsaw leaf labeled 499/500 with a chapter number 2[00], has not been located.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

An inventory was carried out in 1985–1986 of the Manichaean material stored in the Magazin of the Papyrussammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum in the basement of the Pergamonmuseum on the Museumsinsel. There one finds 21 cardboard boxes, each containing slots for ten glassed leaves, labeled "Kephalaia Seite 1–20" ["Kephalaia page 1–20"], etc., through pp. 421–40, which must represent the last complete set of ten leaves that Hugo Ibscher conserved.

A card in the box labeled "Seite 21–40" ["page 21–40"] reports: "Blatt 35/36 fehlt" ["leaf 35/36 is missing"]. Pages 35–36 are in fact missing, though the leaf was published in Kephalaia, volume one. A card in the box labeled "Seite 61–80" ["page 61–80"] reads: "61/62 fehlt" ["61/62 is missing"]. Pages 61–62 are in fact missing, though the leaf was published in Kephalaia, volume one.

The leaf 217/18 was on display in 1986 in the papyrus gallery of the Egyptian section of the Bode Museum (upstairs, on the left) in Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR. The leaves 291/92, 293/94, 295/96, 297/98, and 299/300 were in 1986 in the Lesesaal of the Egyptian Museum in the basement of the Pergamon Museum, but may well have been returned to the Magazin.

One box is labeled "Seite 301–340," ["page 301–40"] with the comment "311–330 in Wien" ["311–30 in Vienna"]. Pages 311–30 are in fact missing from the box, but one may conclude from the Vienna photographs (see above) that of the twenty pages 311–30 much of 6 pages (pp. 313–16 and perhaps 321–22 plus fragments) survives.

A card in the box labeled "Seite 381–400" ["page 381–400"] reports: "383/84 385/86 fehlen" ["383/84 385/86 are missing."] Pages 383–86 are in fact missing.

A card in the box labeled "Seite 401/420" ["page 401–20"] reads: "415/16 fehlt; 419/20 fehlt" ["415/16 is missing; 419/20 is missing"]. Pages 415/16 and 419/20 are in fact missing. In the list of acquisitions published in 1940 by Hugo Ibscher (see above), the pp. 415–20 are not listed, but he reported: "Thus between the pages 414 and 421 there are only paltry remains of the missing leaves, which can hardly be identified." Thus the only extant leaf (actually only part of the bottom half of a leaf), assigned the numeration 417/18, may in fact be all that is left of pp. 415–20 (if one is not to conjecture that it might be the missing bottom half of pp. 413/14).

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

In his report of 1965, Rolf Ibscher had stated (see above): "Likewise six leaves of the Kephalaia are missing, as has now become apparent from the reglasing . . . I explain the six missing Kephalaia leaves as still slumbering somewhere in a drawer, having missed the return trip."

These 6 missing leaves can no doubt be identified as pp. 35/36, 61/62, 383/84, 385/86, 415/16, and 419/20, since similar cards in the hand of Rolf Ibscher's assistant Otto W. Luke identify precisely these six leaves as missing. But since the 1940 listing of acquisitions omitted pp. 415–20, and since Hugo Ibscher had spoken of only "paltry remains" between p. 414 and p. 421, there is little reason to assume leaves 415/16 and 419/20 ever were conserved. Thus one may infer that only four leaves (two of which were unpublished and hence presumably permanently inaccessible to scholarship) were lost in the process of being taken into safekeeping to Leningrad and returned to Berlin. For it is known that some material was in fact lost in transit: pp. 447–54, 499–500, have subsequently been identified in Warsaw.

Thus the boxes labeled pages 1–440 actually contain (including those leaves present elsewhere at the Museum) only pages 1–34, 37–60, 63–310, 331–82, 387–414, 417–18, and 421–40, a total of 418 pages = 209 leaves. To this may be added six pages = three leaves in Vienna, a total of 414 pages = 207 leaves, and ten pages = five leaves in Warsaw. This fits rather well Hugo Ibscher's 1940 reference to "over 400 pages." (At that time two of the leaves now missing, pp. 35/36 and 61/62, must also have been extant, since they were published.) Beltz's listing of all pp. 1–440, as in Berlin, must hence be taken merely as a global statement, overlooking the various missing materials among these pages.

Some leaves of the Kephalaia are glassed but not in a box. Like the leaves of the other Manichaean codices, which also are not in boxes, they lie on the wooden shelves in the Magazin, on which the boxes also lie. The glasses in the boxes are 23 cm wide by 36 cm high. The glasses not in boxes vary in size, 23 to 25 cm wide by 35 to 35.5 cm high. The tape sealing the glasses of all the Manichaica varies from light to dark brown; brown is the color used to distinguish Coptic papyri from other papyri. In the case of the glasses not in boxes, the tape is so sticky that the glasses adhere to each other. Hence they are to be stacked in a staggered pattern that keeps tape from bonding to tape.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Although there are no leaves labeled as pp. 441–46, which Beltz reported as present, there is extant the last glass he reported, labeled 455/456. Since he did not itemize any material as missing prior to page 440, one may assume he did not itemize any material as missing in pp. 1–456 (except for the leaves he had identified in Warsaw, pp. 447–54). Thus, one need hardly postulate that pp. 441–46 were identified in Berlin at the time of Beltz's inventory and only subsequently became lost. Their presence may simply have been inferred on the basis of the presence of the leaf labeled pp. 455/456.

There are also 30 other glass containers, numbered 1–30, i.e., by leaf or glass container rather than by page, each with a label (on one side only) reading "Kephalaia Nr. 1" ["Kephalaia Number 1,"] etc. These glasses numbered 1–30 are no doubt the same thirty glasses that Beltz characterized as containing "fragments of various sizes," e.g., number 23 is more a scattering of unplaced fragments than a leaf. The lack of labeled pagination may in part be due to their not having been definitively conserved and labeled by Hugo Ibscher, with the result that Rolf Ibscher left them unidentified. The increasingly fragmentary nature of the latter part of the codex may account for the unidentified status of the leaves.

Since there is no reason to assume that material prior to p. 440 would be among these 30 leaves, they would be expected to fall in the area of pp. 441–46 and 457–502 (except for pp. 499–500, if that is in fact its pagination, in Warsaw), a total of 25 leaves. Thus one may suspect that some of the thirty leaves belong after p. 502 or before p. 440, or may not in fact belong to P[15996].

In the case of "Kephalaia P[15996] Nr. 29" ["Kephalaia P[15996] Number 29"], the number is on an unusually large round label, which also bears the marked-out number 361 (and, marked out on the back, 362), and (also marked out) "zu 15998" ["to 15998"], thus identifying the leaf as once having been ascribed to the Letters. Rolf Ibscher had reported (see above) in connection with the leaves provisionally preserved by his father and confusingly labeled, "from Codex B," and "Letters": "But there is also among these leaves one with the number 361. To what does that belong?" Obviously, it has subsequently been reassigned to P[15996], but with what justification remains unclear. Pages 361–62 are extant at their proper place in the box where they belong, so this marked-out numeration can hardly be responsible for ascribing the leaf to P15996. Yet since such high numbers occur only in the case of the Kephalaia, one might have been tempted to assign such a leaf to that codex if one did not look to see if it were absent from the proper box.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The glass container labeled "Kephalaia 15996 Nr. 30" ["Kephalaia 15996, Number 30"] actually contains two leaves that were apparently never separated from each other. The surface of the typed label is scraped off, except for "P.," with "15996" and "Nr. 30" added in ink.

The reidentification of these two containers as belonging to P15996 was apparently carried out by Walter Beltz when he was preparing his inventory, published in 1978, since Günter Poethke has identified the handwriting as that of Beltz. Hence, they may be three of the leaves previously ascribed to P15998 (the Letters) that currently are missing (see below).

Two glasses are labeled "Kephalaia o. Nr." ["Kephalaia without number."] But these were stacked, when the inventory was begun in 1985, along with 13 other leaves that were labeled P15998, in a group accompanied by a piece of paper with a note in Günter Poethke's hand. The note read: "Wahrscheinlich zu P15998 gehörig (s. Vortrag von Böhlig in Moskau: 'Schweren Herzens'). 15 Platten. 26.7.72" ["Apparently belonging to P15998 (see the lecture by Böhlig in Moscow [that begins] 'With heavy heart . . .'). 15 glasses. July 26, 1972."] Since the labels were not changed to fit the note, one may wonder if these two plates were originally counted among the 15. Perhaps the two containers whose labels apparently Walter Beltz changed to read "P15996 29 and 30" were among the fifteen classified in 1972 as belonging to P15998. Since Beltz does not refer to those fifteen plates in his catalogue, he may well not have been aware of their existence. These two plates from among the 15 may have lain apart by themselves at the time, been seen by Beltz, and been included by him in the large stack that was already ascribed to P15996. In that case, when their labels were changed to P15996, the number of plates ascribed to P15998 would have been reduced from 15 to 13, without the note referring to fifteen plates having been corrected. At some juncture the two plates labeled "Kephalaia without number" would have been stacked with the thirteen to produce the total of fifteen, to fit the note stating there were fifteen leaves. It would seem probable that by some such procedure the thirty plates mentioned in Beltz's catalogue as belonging after page 456 have now become thirty-two, bearing the designation Kephalaia, though his catalogue refers only to thirty. The relabeling of two plates and the removal of two others from the stack of thirty (P^{15996}) to the stack of fifteen (P^{15998}) functioned, in effect, as a trade. Yet any such solution of the confusion must remain very speculative.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

One may hence tentatively assume that there are twenty-nine extant leaves of the Kephalaia without assigned pagination (plates 1–22 and 24–28, not counting plate 23 that contains only fragments, plus two leaves "without number"). One may seek to correlate these twenty-nine leaves with the twenty or circa 25 reported to have been conserved by Rolf Ibscher after the war. Since approximately seven or twelve leaves more are extant than his figures would lead one to expect, the question arises whether some of these extra leaves correspond to those that have been identified as missing. They would not be the six leaves Rolf Ibscher mentioned as already missing when he reconserved the codex, and which have been identified from what is currently missing as pp. 35/36, 61/62, 383/84, 385/86, 415/16, 419/20. Nor would they be the missing pp. 311–20, the remains of which are in Vienna. Nor would they be those in Warsaw—pp. 447–54, 499–500. Since the leaf 501/02 was mentioned as the last extant leaf of the codex at an earlier time, the twenty-five leaves composing pp. 441–46, 457–98, 501–2 would be the only leaves unaccounted for. This minimal number should be reduced to twenty-four, to take account of the leaf atomized by a sneeze. This figure is nearer to Rolf Ibscher's figure of c. twenty-five than to his figure twenty. But it tends to suggest that not all the material that Beltz listed as extant in Berlin and not all the material currently labeled as P^{15996} does in fact belong to P^{15996}, unless one is to assume that there were an indeterminate number beyond p. 502.

Ibscher presents the Kephalaia as consisting codicologically of quires of six sheets (twelve leaves, twenty-four pages). The table below lays out the page ranges and center pages of the Kephalaia's various quires; the chart assumes only complete sheets (i.e., no half sheets plus stubs).

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Kephalaia Quires

Quire Number	Page Range	Center Pages
1	1–24	12–13
2	25–48	36–37
3	49–72	60–61
4	73–96	84–85
5	97–120	108–9
6	121–44	132–33
7	145–68	156–57
8	169–92	180–81
9	193–216	204–5
10	217–40	228–29
11	241–64	252–53
12	265–88	276–77
13	289–312	300–301
14	313–36	324–25
15	337–60	348–49
16	361–84	372–73
17	385–408	396–97
18	409–32	420–21
19	433–56	444–45
20	457–80	468–69
21	481–504	492–93
22	505–28	516–17

Since Hugo Ibscher reported a fragment containing the pagination 514 to have been attached to the last extant leaf[15] (pp. 501/02), from which he inferred that "the work must have included in the papyrus codex more than 520 pages = 260 leaves," one may assume that quire 22 concluding with page 528 is the last quire of the codex, at least the last of which there has been any evidence. Thus, pp. 503–28, 26 pages = 13 leaves, were presumably not acquired by Schmidt (except

15. Hugo Ibscher, Kephalaia, vii.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

for the fragment with the pagination), and the pp. 441–502, 62 pages = 31 leaves, have not, with the exception of the leaf labeled 455/456, been identified in Berlin in the inventory of 1985–1986.

Hugo Ibscher reported as follows regarding the fiber directions of the codices of Medinet Madi, where his information was based primarily on the Berlin Kephalaia and on Sir Chester Beatty's Codex A, the Psalms:[16]

> It is interesting, and corresponds to the distinguished character of our Mani books, that the arrangement of the leaves is such that the horizontal and vertical fibers always came to lie on each other. In this way the opened book attained a much more pleasant appearance, since the surface lying before the beholder was not disturbed by the varying fiber directions. This arrangement is unpleasant only for the person who today must separate the leaves from each other. For the fibers have now become so intertwined with each other through the effect of dampness that the leaves can be separated from each other only with the greatest of care and patience.
>
> Interessant und dem vornehmen Charakter unserer Mani-Bücher entsprechend ist auch die Anordnung der Blätter, die so erfolgte, dass immer die horizontalen und vertikalen Fasern aufeinander zu liegen kamen. Dadurch gewann das aufgeschlagene Buch ein weit gefälligeres Aussehen, weil die vor dem Beschauer liegende Fläche nicht durch die verschiedene Faserun gestört wurde. Unangenehm ist diese Anordnung nur für den, der heute die Blätter auseinanderlösen muss, haben sich doch durch die Einwirkung der Feuchtigkeit die Fasern jetzt derart ineinander verfilzt, dass nur mit der grössten Sorgfalt and Geduld die Blätter voneinander zu bringen sind.

The inventory of the Kephalaia of 1985–1986 has shown that this fiber pattern does characterize the codex. To be sure, this pattern is somewhat obscured by the fact that in the glassing by Hugo Ibscher or in the reglassing by Rolf Ibscher, some labels were incorrectly placed. But in the process of preparing the inventory, such plates have been supplemented with correct labels. This could be determined by the profiles of what is extant, by the postulated fiber patterns, by the running heads in some cases, and perhaps by an occasional pagination. Leaf 431/32 consists of a series of fragments, presumably from this leaf, two of which are conserved with the wrong surface up.

16. Hugo Ibscher, "Ein Mani-Fund," 85.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

One may wonder just what degree of reliability is to be accorded to the pagination ascribed to all the identified leaves, once the minor suggestions here made have been taken into consideration. This is all the more problematic given Hugo Ibscher's view that the sheets were not cut from rolls, which permits the identification of the sequence of sheets. For he argued "that the papyrus material for the present codices was not cut from a roll, but that the leaves were manufactured especially for our Mani books."[17] This phenomenon is otherwise unattested. To make such a claim, he would have had to establish that there are no kolleseis (a point which, to judge by the leaves that have been examined, would indeed seem to be accurate). But since kolleseis could have been trimmed off at the margin by a careful stationer preparing a deluxe codex, Ibscher would have had to verify that there is no continuity of fibers from sheet to sheet. Since he does not refer to this negative criterion, it is unknown whether he examined the codex from this point of view. Hence, this needs to be verified to be certain that this criterion for establishing the sequence of the sheets, and hence of the pages, is not available. If Hugo Ibscher is correct, then missing is the main codicological criterion for establishing the sequence of sheets in a codex lacking much of the Coptic pagination and the continuity of text from leaf to leaf, namely the continuity of horizontal fibers (or, in rare instances such as Nag Hammadi Codex XIII, the vertical fibers) from sheet to sheet in the quire. In the case of the Kephalaia, chapter numbers are sporadically extant in the text itself, so that in general the assigned pagination may indeed be reliable.

The verification of quires in terms of conjugate leaves needs to be carried through systematically to provide a relative confirmation of the page sequence.

Eight smaller plates that seem to involve the remainder of fragments from the conservation of the Kephalaia were located in the Magazin. For a card accompanying the fragments states that they are "bestimmte and unbestimmte Mani-Fragmente (farblos geändert)—8 Platten" ["defined and undefined Mani fragments (colorlessly framed)—8 plates"].

17. Ibid., 84: "dass das Papyrusmaterial für die vorliegenden Kodices nicht aus einer Rolle geschnitten ist, sondern dass die Blätter . . . eigens für unsere Mani-Bücher angefertigt worden sind."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Plate 1: A label reports in pencil "S. 479" ["p. 479"] and in ink "zu Kephalaia" ["to Kephalaia"]. One fragment does have the numeration 479/48[0], another 47[], another 4[ ].

Plate 2: A label reports 459/60. The plate contains about 9 fragments. This pagination was not noted.

Plate 3: A label records Kephalaia and the pagination "503/4??." The plate contains about 18 fragments. This pagination was not noted.

Plate 4: A label reports in Greek ink Kephalaia and the numbers ϟΚΓ/ϟΚΔ i.e., 423/424. This leaf is extant in its proper box, though the pagination was not noted on it. Nor was this pagination noted on the some 12 fragments in plate 4.

Plate 5: It contains about 11 small fragments.

Plate 6: It contains about 6 fragments, two of which seemed to consist of more than one leaf.

Plate 7: It contains uninscribed pads and one small inscribed fragment.

Plate 8: It contains about thirteen fragments, three of which contain waved decorations such as may have been at the end of the codex; the back of these fragments is uninscribed.

These eight plates are to be classified as fragments and hence are not included in the following assessment of the number of extant leaves.

Since the 146 leaves = 292 pages that have been published present pp. 1–292, of which 144 leaves = 288 pages are still extant, there remain in Berlin yet to be published among the extant leaves assigned a pagination: pp. 293–310, 331–82, 387–414, 417–18, 421–40, 455–56, i.e. 61 leaves = 122 pages, plus 29 unboxed but glassed extant leaves without assigned pagination, i.e. 58 pages, a total of 90 leaves = 180 pages; three leaves = six pages plus fragments out of the fragmentary pages 311–30 (K 11010) in Vienna's Österreichische Nationalbibliothek; and pp. 447–54, 499–500, (i.e., five leaves = ten pages), in Warsaw—a total of 98 unpublished leaves = 196 unpublished pages of the Kephalaia

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

that are presumably extant. Thus, there would seem to be a total of 242 extant leaves = 484 pages. (This does not include the second volume of Kephalaia belonging to the Chester Beatty Library, see below.)

Such a listing of unpublished but extant leaves may be somewhat misleading. For although the size of the lacunae is relatively small in many cases, that is to say, although most of the papyrus is usually extant, the amount of extant ink varies considerably, and the resultant legibility of many pages is disappointingly small. Hence, a rough classification of extant ink may give a clearer picture of what one may expect. On a scale of 0 to 5: 0 = no ink is visible; 1 = some ink but probably no letters are visible; 2 = some letters but probably no words are legible; 3 = some words but probably no sentences are legible; 4 = some sentences but probably less than half the page is legible; 5 = probably more than half the page is legible. The 122 unpublished but paginated extant pages in Berlin have been classified in the chart that follows:

Berlin Kephalaia Paginated Leaves

Category	Total pages in category	Individual page numbers
Some ink visible	6	422, 424, 431, 432, 435–36.
Some letters visible	12	309–10, 331–32, 394, 417–18, 421, 423, 427, 433–34.
Some words visible	29	306–8, 333–36, 339, 340, 362, 382, 387, 393, 403–9, 413–14, 425–26, 428–30, 438, 440.
Some sentences visible	42	297, 299, 300, 304–5, 337–38, 341–42, 345–46, 351–52, 355, 357, 359–61, 364, 368–70, 372–74, 377, 378, 380, 381, 388, 390, 392, 398, 399, 401, 410–12, 437, 439, 455–56.
More than half the page visible	33	293–96, 298, 301–3, 343–44, 347–50, 353–54, 356, 358, 363, 365–67, 371, 375–76, 379, 389, 391, 395–97, 400, 402.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The unpaginated extant leaves 1–28 in Berlin can be classified as follows (the labeled side is cited as a, the side without the label as b): In category 1, 21b. In category 2, 18b, 19a, 21a, 22b, 23b, 24ab, 25ab, 26a, 27b. In category 3, 2ab, 3ab, 4ab, 5ab, 6ab, 7b, 8ab, 9ab, 10ab, l2ab, 13ab, 14ab, 15ab, 16ab, 17ab, 18a, 19b, 20ab, 22a, 23a, 26b, 27a, 28ab. In category 4, lab, 11ab.

Some transcriptions by H. J. Polotsky are in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library.[18] They include pp. 25, 26, 30, 34–40, 51, and 54 published in Kephalaia and pages 375–76 published in Schmidt and Polotsky's initial essay,[19] and the unpublished pages 343, 344, 353, 354 and 366, with German translations by Polotsky of pp. 353, 354, and 366, and English translations by Sir H. Thompson of pp. 343 and 344. This work is dated from July 1931 to May 18, 1932. There are also holdings in the Griffith Institute in the Ashmoleon Museum in Oxford and at the Academy of Sciences in Berlin (see above).

Reinhold Merkelbach[20] has remarked that chapter 138, extant in Polotsky's German translation, is lost:[21] "Der koptische Text ist verlorengegangen, es existiert nur noch die deutsche Übersetzung." ["The Coptic text is lost, there still exists only the German translation."] However an examination of the papyri in the Papyrus-Sammlung

18. Crum, A Coptic Dictionary, vi, reports: "As regards the lesser dialects, reference must first be made to the great increase in material resulting from the discovery and gradual publication of the Manichaean papyri, acquired by Mr. Chester Beatty and the Berlin Museum. These we have been able to use, thanks to the permission of their owners and to copies of the unpublished portions kindly sent by Dr. Polotsky and Mr. Allberry. But this advantage has been ours only since reaching the letter P."

Crum, Coptic Dictionary, xii, lists:

Mani I = copies of Chester Beatty's unpublished Manichaean papyri by H. J. Polotsky and H. Thompson.

Mani II = copies of sim. papyri at Berlin by Polotsky.

The Crum Archive of the Ashmolean Museum and the Archive of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin contain material that supplements the incomplete file at the Chester Beatty Library.

19. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 45, for the German translation of p. 375, p. 87, in "Anhang Nr. III," for the Coptic text of p. 375, p. 42 for the German translation of p. 376, and p. 86, in "Anhang Nr. II," for the Coptic text of p. 376.

20. Merkelbach, Mani und sein Religionssystem (Rheinisch-Westfälische Akademie der Wissenschaften, Geisteswissenschaften, Vorträge: G 281; Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag, 1986), 18 n. 9.

21. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 70–71.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms of (East) Berlin on July 13, 1988, tended to indicate that the papyri containing this chapter are in fact not lost. Chapter 136 begins on p. 337, chapter 137 on p. 338, chapter 138 on p. 340, chapters 140 and 141 both on p. 343. The leaf labeled 341/342 is also extant, on which the continuation and conclusion of chapter 138 (and the beginning of chapter 139) presumably take place. Yet the identity of the leaf in question seemed at first unclear, for the labels reading 339/340 and with the chapter numeration 138 were affixed in such a way that when the labels were at the top of the page, the writing was upside down, so that the leaf needed to be returned to its upright position. Nor did the fiber directions conform to the pattern of like fiber directions on facing pages. But if the side labeled 339 is relabeled 340, and that side labeled 340 relabeled 339, then the fiber pattern becomes normal. Furthermore, only on the basis of these corrections do the profiles of this leaf and that of the preceding and following leaves conform to each other. Thus once these corrections were made, the codex seemed at this point to be intact, though the text is less legible than it was half a century ago, to judge by the extant German translation.

In 1986 Wolf-Peter Funk began transcribing the first unpublished leaves, pp. 293–95, 11, here concluding with the numeration and title of chapter 123.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:10 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 11 —

$\mathcal{P}^{15997}$: Acts

Schmidt and Polotsky's basic report made it clear that P^{15997} (Acts) was acquired in the spring of 1931. Their report concerning this specific codex is as follows:[1]

[p. 27] I can be very brief in the case of the third papyrus book, which when acquired lay in the original condition between two wooden covers as remains of the binding. It too belongs to the Berlin holdings. An idea of the desolate condition of the preservation may be gotten from the accompanying photograph (see plate 2). Also there are only a few leaves of this pile that have been separated for the sake of determining the character of the work. Thus it has become clear [p. 28] that it is a work of historical content . . . [p. 29] To judge by [p. 30] the external size, it must have been a work of at least 250 leaves.

[p. 27] Ganz kurz kann ich mich fassen bei dem dritten Papyrusbuch, das bei der Erwerbung noch in dem ursprünglichen Zustand zwischen zwei Holzdeckeln als Reste des Einbandes lag and ebenfalls zum Berliner Bestande gehört. Eine Vorstellung von dem desolaten Zustande der Erhaltung wird die beigefügte Photographie (s. Taf. 2) geben. Auch von diesem Haufen sind nur einige Blätter bisher behufs Feststellung des Charakters des Werkes abgehoben worden. Dabei hat es sich als ein Werk historischen Inhalts heraus- [p. 28] gestellt . . . [p. 29] Nach [p. 30] dem äusseren Umfang zu urteilen, muss es ein Werk von mindestens 250 Blättern gewesen sein.

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 27–30.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Wilhelm Schubart recorded in the Inventarbuch of the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum of East Berlin in black ink for P[15997]: "Koptischer Papyruskodex" ["Coptic Papyrus Codex"]. The column regarding "Art der Erwerbung" ["Nature of the Acquisition"] reads "dsgl" ["the same] as P[15995], i.e., "acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt in Cairo, 1931, gift of Mr. August Pfeffer 1933." Further notes added in pencil report: "Historischer Text" ["historical text"], "z. T. verglast" ["partially glassed"], "8 Blätter" ["8 leaves,"] "Schrank 5" ["cupboard 5"], "z. Zt. Papyrussammlung Regal" ["at present Papyrus Collection shelf"]. A purple carbon note reports "nach dem Osten sichergestellt" ["put in safety to the east"], to which is added in black ink "8 Blätter sind zurück. Codex nicht! [Rolf] Ib[scher]." ["8 leaves are back. Codex [is] not! [Rolf] Ib[scher]."] That is to say, all 8 glassed leaves were at the time thought to have been returned, but the book block that had not been separated into leaves and individually glassed was not returned. A rubber stamp reading "1958 vorhanden" ["1958 present"] records the return of the leaves from Leningrad in that year. The stamp is followed by 8 counting marks. Another rubber stamp reading "1972 vorhanden" ["1972 present"] records that the leaves were present at the time of the inventory of holdings made that year by Ulrich Luft, then a member of the Museum staff.

Böhlig reported in 1960/68:[2]

The codex P[15997] is unfortunately lost except for the 8 leaves that were conserved already before the war. It contained historical reports about Mani and the later time of the church. The loss of this text is so regrettable because one could expect from it, as is already visible from the few remains, both materials on the history of Manichaeism and such as had to do with the history of the Sassanid kingdom and its western neighbors. Whether or not the book formed an inner unity is difficult to say. At the top of a few pages, scarcely legible and hardly interpretable superscriptions are

Der Codex P[15997] ist leider bis auf die 8 Blätter, die bereits vor dem Kriege konserviert waren, verlorengegangen. Er enthielt historische Berichte über Mani und die spätere Zeit der Kirche. Der Verlust dieser Schrift ist deshalb so zu beklagen, weil wir in ihr, wie schon aus den geringen Resten ersichtlich ist, zugleich mit Materialien zur Geschichte des Manichäismus auch solche zur Geschichte des Sassanidenreiches und seiner westlichen Anlieger zu erwarten hatten. Ob das Buch eine innere Einheit gebildet hat, ist schwer zu sagen. Über einigen Seiten sind kaum lesbare und

2. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 183–84.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

present. Schmidt's claim that it [p. 184] had to do here with names of Mani's disciples must be based on an oversight. The handwriting does not have the calligraphic beauty of that of the Kephalaia, but rather has angular and awkward-looking forms. Also the inscribed column is not as carefully divided. If at the end of the page there is less room, one made the letters and the space between lines smaller. Of course this does not contribute especially to the text's beauty.

deutbare Überschriften vorhanden. Die Behauptung Schmidts, es [p. 184] handle sich dabei um Namen von Jüngern Manis, dürfte auf einem Versehen beruhen. Die Schrift besitzt nicht die kalligraphische Schönheit wie die der Kephalaia, sondern hat eckigere, ungelenker wirkende Formen. Auch der Schriftspiegel ist nicht so sorgfältig eingeteilt; wenn am Ende der Seite der Raum weniger wird, macht man die Buchstaben und den Zeilenabstand kleiner; das trägt natürlich nicht gerade zur Verschönerung bei.

It is unclear on the basis of what information Böhlig reported that the 8 leaves were conserved before the war. It may be based on no more than the reference in the Inventarbuch to "8 leaves." But the penciled note in the Inventarbuch is not dated and hence could have been entered after the war, as a deduction from 8 leaves having been returned from Leningrad conserved in glass panes all of the same size, the others of which were labeled P[15997]. In that case, the only information one would have as to how many leaves had been conserved would be the vague reference in the basic report to "only a few leaves." And even this reference to only a few leaves may be out of date, since further leaves could have been conserved after that report, as in the case of P[15998], where 4 leaves were reported to have been separated by the time the initial report was published, whereas Hugo Ibscher separated and glassed a total of 6 leaves, and a good number of others were separated but not permanently conserved or glassed (see below). Although the discussion will continue on the assumption that there were only 8 leaves conserved, the possibility that an indeterminate number have been conserved should not be lost from sight.

Wolfgang Müller's preliminary inventory of 1964–1965 reported: "P[15997]: historical content, 8 leaves in Berlin, the rest is lost."[3]

Beltz's catalogue of 1978 reported:

3. P[15997] historischer Inhalt, 8. Bl. in Berlin, Rest verloren.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

I 605 P[15997]. 8 leaves of a codex from the Mani find. The average height of the leaves is 22–25 cm, the average width 8–11 cm. There are about 36–40 lines per page, poorly preserved. The codex is probably a Vita of Mani. On the text, see R. Ibscher, Akten des XXIV. Internationalen Orientalistenkongresses (Munich, 1957), pp. 226–29, and in Koptologische Studien in der DDR, Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Universität Halle-Wittenberg 1965, Sonderheft, pp. 50–64. In Warsaw there is at present a leaf from this codex at the University. The remainder of the codex is lost. R[ecto] line 1: ⲙⲁⲑⲏⲧⲏⲥ; line 11: ⲟⲩⲥ ⲛⲕⲁⲧⲁⲣⲉⲩ ⲉⲇⲛ.

I 605 P[15997]; 8 Blätter eines Codex aus dem Mani-Fund. Die durchschnittliche H. der Blätter 22–25, die durchschnittliche B. 8–11. Pro S. etwa 36–40 Z., schlecht erhalten. Der Codex ist vermutlich eine Vita Manis. Zum Text siehe R. Ibscher, Akten des XXIV. Intern. Orientalistenkongresses, München 1957, S. 226–29, and in Kopt. Studien in der DDR, WZU Halle-Wittenberg 1965, Sonderheft, S. 50–64. In Warschau befindet sich z. Z. ein Blatt aus diesem Codex in der Universität, der Rest des Codex ist verloren, R. Z. 1: ⲙⲁⲑⲏⲧⲏⲥ Z. 11: ⲟⲩⲥ ⲛⲕⲁⲧⲁⲣⲉⲩ ⲉⲇⲛ.

The transcribed words have not been located on the papyri in Berlin themselves.

This report could readily lead to the assumption that a total of nine leaves are extant. Thus Michel Tardieu reported:[4] "P Berol. 15997 (= I 605 Beltz), of which 8 leaves are in East Berlin and 1 in Warsaw. The rest of the codex has been lost or destroyed during the Second World War."

Wincenty Myszor reported on July 12, 1986, that there are at the Institute for Papyrology of Warsaw University 6 glassed plates. One numbered 499/500 is labeled "with a quite clear P[15997]," but seems nonetheless to belong to P[15996] (see above). It is conserved, as are the 4 leaves of P[15996], in glasses 36 by 23.5 cm. Myszor concludes: "These 5 leaves seem to have belonged to the same codex." But the sixth leaf at the University is from another codex. It is conserved in glass panes 24.5 by 18.5 cm, and is sealed with a different, red tape. It is labeled P[15997], though the last digit "is not quite clear—it can also be 96!" Its "degree of preservation" is "the worse" among the 6 leaves at

4. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6. "P.Berol. 15997 (= I 605 Beltz), dont subsistent 8 feuillets a Berlin-Est et 1 a Varsovie. Le reste du codex a été perdu ou détruit durant la second guerre mondiale."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the University. Myszor concludes that it "belongs quite certainly to another codex than . . . the other 5 leaves." The Warsaw leaf that Beltz ascribed to P[15997] may have been the leaf numbered 499–500 and labeled P[15997], though actually belonging to P[15996] (see above), for Beltz did not list this leaf for P[15996]. There would be no reason to ascribe the smaller sixth leaf to P[15997] other than the indistinct label that may read either P[15997] or P[15996], and the apparent need to ascribe this leaf to some other codex than P[15996]. The dimensions of the glass panes (24.5 by 18.5 cm) do not correspond to those of P[15997] in Berlin (32 by 21 cm).

On September 11, 1986, Wolf-Peter Funk examined the smaller plate, and on November 15, 1986, wrote a report that brings further clarity to the situation:

> The one glass frame of unusually smaller size (Myszor: 24.5 x 18.5 cm) and unusually coloured tape (red) has—if my records are complete—two labels: one (on recto? [right-hand page]) at the bottom, reading "Dr. Kohlhammer" (ink, old), above which is written in blue pencil "P. 1599[.]" (part of paper broken off); the other on the verso side of the glass [left-hand page], of recent origin (Beltz's hand?) "zu P[15997]" ["to P[15997]"].
>
> The glass contains a narrow strip of papyrus, inscribed on both sides, with an appearance very similar to the other Manichaean leaves. The writing is Coptic at least. But the scribe's hand is clearly different from the Kephalaia codex (and, I think, also different from the Letters and Synaxeis codices), though the general style is similar. (The letters appear to be slightly more heavy, or more uncial, than those of the other hands.) I consider it possible that an extremely patient and imaginative person might be able to identify several Coptic words on the recto (approximately one third of each line preserved, the rest is only fibers/debris), but hardly more than isolated letters on the verso.
>
> I can only speculate about the reasons which prompted my predecessor to attach a label "zu P. 15997" ["to P[15997]"] (similarity of the hand? or the peculiar mode of conservation?), because I have not seen the glasses of P[15997] at the Berlin Museum so far.

The two labels that Funk notes seem to include the indistinct label read variously as P[15997] and P[15996] by Myszor, and as P[1599][.] by Funk, and a clear label reading P[15997], apparently not noted by Myszor. This raises the question as to whether this clear label was added subsequently, conceivably by Myzsor on the basis of a query I posed to him as to whether a leaf of P15997 were in Warsaw; this query could have led him or someone else in Warsaw to make such a conjectural identification. Funk's impression that the hand is not that of P15996, and, less certainly, not that of P15995 or P15998, would, by a process of elimination, tend to identify it as P15997, since a conservation of P15999 seems not to have ever even begun; yet such an identification on the basis of hands (uncertain as this would of necessity have been without leaves of P15995 or P15998 available for comparison) would be far from conclusive. Since Kohlhammer paid for P15999, one may wonder if his name on the plate suggests this was, after all, a sample from that codex.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

An inventory carried out in 1986 of the 8 leaves currently in Berlin that are labeled P15997 has raised the question as to whether one of the Berlin leaves does not belong to another codex. It bears a printed label "P15998," with the 8 marked out and replaced in blue ink by 7. Günter Poethke, Custos of the Greek manuscripts of the Papyrus-Sammlung in East Berlin, reports this to be the work of Rolf Ibscher's assistant, Otto Werner Luke. This would suggest that the leaf was previously attributed to the Letters and only at some later time reassigned to the Acts. It also has a separate label, similar to those numbering the leaves of P15997, reading in ink 36, with the 6 marked out and replaced in pencil by 2. This Arabic leaf numeration diverges from that typical of P15997, since Roman numerals, ranging from I to IX (I–V and IX plus an unlabeled leaf), are all that are employed. But in the case of P15998, the Arabic numeration of leaves not assigned a pagination reaches 25, which included 6 leaves glassed by Hugo Ibscher (including Nr. 25) and about 22 that he left half conserved, a total of about 28 leaves. One may recall the similar numeration by glass container rather than by page for the half-conserved leaves of the Kephalaia, where the Arabic numeration reached 30, with 29 (and perhaps 30) secondarily shifted from P15998 to P15996, just as here a leaf originally assigned to P15998 and numbered 35 was secondarily shifted to P15997 and the number 32.

The reason why this leaf was reassigned to P15997 may have been that it is conserved, as are the 7 leaves originally labeled P15997, in glass frames 32 cm high by 21 cm broad, whereas the 6 leaves of P15998 that Hugo Ibscher glassed measure 35.6 by 23 cm, and those of P15998 that Rolf Ibscher glassed were 35 by 25 cm. The smaller format may have been used for the single leaf under discussion because the leaf itself is smaller than is typical for P[15998]. But this does not mean that the dimensions of the leaf fit those of P[15997]. The profile of the leaf is not like that of the leaves of P[15997]. Indeed the frayed edges of the leaf stand in some contrast to the relatively clean edges of the leaves of P[15997]. Thus, in spite of the comparable size of the glass frame, the leaf itself would not seem to belong to P[15997].

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

This leaf in the smaller glass frame may have been packed with the equally small glasses of P[15997] at the time of the war. When it was returned from Leningrad in 1958, it would presumably have been still packed with the 7 leaves of P[15997] that were returned. Since at the time, it was not known that one leaf (the one in Warsaw) was missing, it could readily have been assumed that the 8 leaves recorded in the Inventarbuch as separated from the book block of P[15997] were the 8 leaves glassed in frames of the same size, and hence stacked together, even though only 7 of these similarly glassed leaves may actually have belonged to P[15997].

In the second volume of the facsimile edition of the Chester Beatty Library Manichaean texts, there has been published "a single sheet with historical information":[5]

> The two pages have a text with some historical information, and this can be identified with similar information reported by C. Schmidt from a leaf in Berlin (C. Schmidt, Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten, 1933, pp. 28–29). Exactly the same persons are mentioned: Thadamor, Amaro, Sapores the hyparch, Narsaph, Hormezd, Innaios, Abiesus and others. This must either be a parallel text to that mentioned by C. Schmidt, or the leaf must physically be the same. Parallel texts are well known from other papyri, e.g., in the Nag Hammadi texts the two very close long versions of the Apocryphon of John, and the two versions of the Gospel of Truth.

Yet there is no indication in any reports concerning the discovery from Medinet Madi of there being a duplicate copy of the Acts. There are two volumes of Kephalaia, a first volume in Berlin and the second in Dublin, a two-volume work rather than a case of duplication. And there were two parts of the Homilies codex, the published part in

5. Giversen, Homilies and Varia: The facsimiles are plates on pp. 99–100, the quotation from p. vii. Subsequent quotations are from pp. viii–ix. Note the Errata on p. x, to the effect that the fiber directions are reversed on pp. 99–100: Plate 99 actually has horizontal fibers, plate 100 vertical fibers.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Dublin and the unpublished part (P^{15999}) of Berlin, now lost. But this had to do with two parts of one codex, not of duplicates. Hence there are no known instances of duplication in the library of Medinet Madi (nor is there duplication of the sublibraries among the Nag Hammadi Codices, for that matter). The overwhelming probability is that "the leaf must physically be the same."

Giversen poses the problem of the reports by Böhlig (1968), Müller (1965), and Beltz (1978) cited above, to the effect that all 8 leaves were in Berlin. For a label on the glass initialed by the librarian of the Chester Beatty Library, J. V. S. Wilkinson, is dated "October 1956," and Giversen can report of the leaf that "in 1977 it could be studied in Dublin." He hence speculates: "It is possible that this leaf was not included in the eight pages but was one of the other leaves mentioned by C. Schmidt, and that later on it was transferred to the Chester Beatty collection. In that case it is hard to explain why it was transferred." But Schmidt did not mention "other" leaves than the 8 mentioned in the Inventarbuch; rather he spoke of "only a few leaves," a comment that provides no reason to assume there were more than 8 leaves. But in view of the recognition (see above) that only 7 of the 8 Berlin leaves actually belong to P^{15997}, it is not necessary to postulate more than 8 leaves.

Wilkinson's label read: "This sheet seems to belong to the Homilies, but is not included in Polotsky's publication." Giversen compares the two, noting similarities and divergences, only to conclude: "But despite the similarities, the general impression is that the writing on pp. 99 and 100 is by another hand." But upon quoting Böhlig's description of the awkward hand, Giversen comments:

> This description [p. ix] does not, however, match with the writing of pp. 99 and 100, and if these pages were once a part of the manuscript mentioned by C. Schmidt, this could be the reason why they were separated. If it is true that their handwriting was closer to that of the Chester Beatty Homilies than to the manuscript mentioned by C. Schmidt, such an alteration would be understandable.

Giversen then reports from the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library that in May 1932 there were references in correspondence between Sir Chester Beatty and Sir Alan Gardiner to the Homilies as consisting of 50 leaves:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> Neither Alan H. Gardiner nor A. Chester Beatty in these two letters use the expression "about 50 leaves", but clearly "the 50 leaves" [emphasis Giversen's].

The 50 leaves could be the 49 leaves (48 sheets plus the glass containing the fragments) plus the leaf on pp. 99 and 100. On 19 May 1931 Hugo Ibscher sent A. Chester Beatty an invoice for the preservation and placing under glass of papyri, among others "10 Blatt Manitexte" ["10 leaves of Mani texts"]—probably the first Mani papyri H. Ibscher restored for A. Chester Beatty. An invoice dated 17 June 1934 charges A. Chester Beatty for several Mani pages, the first of them "Manichäische Homilien: 49 Bältter" ["Manichaean Homilies: 49 leaves"]. Afterwards the three codices, A, B, and C, are mentioned. If the leaf on pp. 99 and 100 is included with these papyri mentioned in the invoices, it could be among the "10 Blatt Manitexte" ["10 leaves of Mani texts"], which are not specified, and if this leaf was among the 50 leaves that Polotsky was permitted to publish, the reason it was not included in the publication was probably that it differed too much in appearance from the pages bearing the Homilies.

Giversen concludes:

> Because of the doubts about its identity, it has been hard to decide whether this leaf should be included in this edition. Since nobody besides myself has raised such questions until now, and it is stated repeatedly in the two catalogues of the German collection that all eight leaves mentioned above are kept in Berlin, it has been agreed to include the leaf here. If however the two catalogues are wrong, it remains possible that the two texts are identical. In any case I shall continue to investigate the history of the leaf.

It seems that the question has in fact already been clarified. Only 7 leaves of P[15997] are in Berlin (see above). A Berlin leaf was by mistake taken to London and Dublin, and its absence, though detected by Böhlig and explained by Rolf Ibscher, was lost sight of due to an eighth leaf being erroneously ascribed to P[15997], until inferred again in Berlin in 1986.

Since this codex was acquired "in the original condition between two wooden covers," one might assume that the "few leaves of this pile that have been separated for the sake of determining the character of the work"[6] are a more ordered sequence than in the case of codices that dealers have already separated into smaller batches. One might thus speculate that the leaves were taken from the front of the book, (since this might be assumed to provide a clearer indication of its character) in an effort to arrive at a preliminary identification of the codex. But one could also speculate that the codex was first opened elsewhere, or that leaves from different parts of the codex were conserved first, in order thus to achieve an overview. In fact nothing is known about the selection of leaves to be conserved as the initial sample.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The 7 leaves in East Berlin not only bear the number P^{15997}. They are also numbered with Roman numerals I–V, with one leaf unnumbered and one numbered IX. Since only 8 leaves are thought to have been separated from the book block, the number IX seems out of place. One may at best wonder if the 8 leaves returned from Leningrad and classified as P^{15997} (and the subsequent report of a leaf in Warsaw) are responsible for the numeration system leading to IX, which would hence be a relatively recent numeration. Such a speculation would not explain why the Berlin leaves were given the specific numeration each has. Indeed one would think that the natural thing to have done would have been to consider the Berlin leaves I–VIII and the Warsaw leaf IX, since there was no possibility to compare them side by side and to establish their relative position in the original codex as a basis for a more useful numeration system.

Schmidt and Polotsky reported, primarily on the basis of the Berlin Kephalaia and the London Psalms, that the fiber directions on facing pages were always the same. This pattern would seem to apply also to P^{15997}, since when leaves are so stacked in the sequence of the Roman numerals, there is continuity of extant profiles. But in order to retain the pattern of the fiber directions being the same on facing pages, the leaf numbered IX could not follow directly upon leaf V. Yet the pattern is retained if the unnumbered leaf is placed between V and IX, a sequence supported by the fact that the profile of IX is nearest to that of the unnumbered leaf. Hence the unnumbered leaf is tentatively assigned the number VIII.

The leaves have labels on one side only, listing the codex number and the Roman numeral; this side of the leaves was apparently intended as the side with horizontal fibers, since only plate I is an exception.

6. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 27.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Small labels with letters "a" and "b" were found in 1976 on 4 of the 7 plates to distinguish a "front" from a "back," however that may have been understood. Only leaf IV has "a" on the side with the main label and "b" on the other side. In the cases of leaves III, V, and IX, the side with the main label is designated as "b," with the other side identified as "a." (Stephen Patterson in 1987 found these small labels extant only on leaves III and IV.) This conscious effort to identify a first and a second side does not conform consistently to horizontal and vertical fiber directions (IV), or to vertical and horizontal fiber directions (III, V, IX). The lettering may have been intended to identify the first (right-hand) and second (left-hand) side of the leaf, since in the present hypothetical reconstruction, it does in all four cases happen to fall into this pattern.

P[15997] has no extant page numbers. Whereas P[15996] had its original pagination, P[15998] seems not to have been paginated, or at least Schmidt and Polotsky found no extant page numbers. They observed of P[15997]:[7] "ob das Ganze paginiert war, wird sich erst bei der weiteren Konservierung erweisen" ["Whether the whole was paginated will become clear only with the further conservation"]. Since such a further conservation never took place, the question remains unresolved.

A sequence of leaves or pages cannot be inferred from the text itself. For not only does the absence of the papyrus or the illegibility of the text at the tops and bottoms of pages render impossible an argument about the continuity of text from one leaf to the next; even a vague sequence of the train of thought seems unattainable today (in contrast to the trains of thought that Schmidt and Polotsky reported), given the largely illegible status of the ink today. Hence the pagination to be assigned to the 7 leaves in Berlin must be based on such circumstantial considerations as those here indicated, and will lack any real assurance of corresponding to the original pagination or even to the right page sequence. It is also not known whether the pages were an unbroken sequence. The four passages that Schmidt and Polotsky summarized do not suggest a continuous sequence but rather widely separated texts. The numeration by leaf rather than by page, and in Roman numerals, may indicate an interest to avoid attempting a pagination. Stephen Patterson has drawn attention to the pieces of twine pressed into the surface of the papyrus on the horizontal sides

7. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

of leaves II and IV, without any impressions of these pieces of twine visible on the facing pages of leaves I and III, which might suggest that these are not in fact the original facing pages. It is not even certain that it has been correctly determined which margins were at the spine and which margins were at the leading edge. The use of square brackets [ ] will indicate that the pagination is not legible on the papyrus, and the use of an asterisk (*) will indicate that the pagination is relatively arbitrarily assigned. The pagination should clearly be considered no more than a convention.

In the case of codices with the same fiber directions on facing pages, it was customary that the first page of each quire would have horizontal fibers, the second page vertical fibers, the third vertical, the fourth horizontal, and so on. However, in the case of the present material, leaf I has vertical fibers on the side with the main label (with no labeling of sides as "a" and "b"). One may conjecture that the lack of such letters means that the main label is on the surface facing the front of the book (rather than considering, e.g., the position of the main label as irrelevant, or that the small labels with the letters have in some cases been rubbed off, either of which alternatives is quite possible). The problem of the first page's not having horizontal fibers could be explained in several ways. The codex could simply be atypical. Or the assumptions as to which page is the right-hand page and which the left-hand page (i.e., the assumption about which margin is at the spine and which is at the leading edge) could be reversed. Or the first leaf may be missing. If one may postulate an uninscribed and hence unconserved front flyleaf, then the fiber directions of leaf I (as the second leaf) are as they should be. These are the assumptions, admittedly far from compelling, that have led to the provisional pagination of the seven leaves. It is to be hoped that more solid criteria may emerge as a result of subsequent study.

The following table is intended to identify the pages thus numbered [1*]–[10*], [11*]–[14*] in terms of the labels they already bore:

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Leaf	Side with main label	Label a or b	Conventional numeration	Horizontal or vertical fibers
I	X		[1*]	Vert.
I			[2*]	Hor.
II	X		[3*]	Hor.
II			[4*]	Vert.
III	X	a	[5*]	Vert.
III	X	b	[6*]	Hor.
IV	X	a	[7*]	Hor.
IV		b	[8*]	Vert.
V		a	[9*]	Vert.
V	X	b	[10*]	Hor.
[VIII]	X		[11*]	Hor.
[VIII]			[12*]	Vert.
IX		a	[13*]	Vert.
IX	X	b	[14*]	Hor.

The size of the writing columns and of the leaves is hard to determine. The faded condition of the ink makes measurements of the columns uncertain, in that faint ink traces and darker fibers tend to become indistinguishable, and a completely faded-out area can be mistaken for a margin. The absence of the original edges of the papyrus makes measurements of the original leaf impossible. Even measurements of the extant leaf are imprecise, in that isolated fibers may often extend a measurement by a centimeter or so. In such cases, it may at times be an arbitrary decision how much to include and what to exclude as a stray fiber. The extant writing columns average in height about 20.5 cm.:

> p. [1*] 20.8; p. [2*] 20.6; p. [3*] 20.8; p. [4*] 20.5; p. [5*] 20.7; p. [6*] 20.2; p. [7*] 20.6; p. [8*] 20.3; p. [9*] 20.4?; p. [10*] 20.4?; p. [11*] 20.5; p. [12*] 20.6; p. [13*] 20.5; p. [14*] 20.5?

The top margins have in the cases of pp. [5*], [6*], and [8*] running heads that are up to 1.0 cm high, beginning about .5 cm from the extant top edge of the leaf. These captions are not included in the statistics listed above for the height of the writing columns. The largest measurement of an extant width of a writing column is 11.5 cm for plate 99 in the facsimile edition of Dublin. The extant top margins reach a height of 3.4 cm (p. [7*]) or 3.0 cm (p. [8*]); the extant bottom margins only .8 cm (p. [4*] and p. [6*]), .7 cm (p. [8*] and p. [14*]), or .6 cm (p. [2*] and p. [3*]). The extant dimensions of the leaves reach 24 by 12 cm ([7*]/[8*]), where the width increases by an extension of the top margin on the opposite edge of the leaf from that with some side margin still extant.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Schmidt, Polotsky, and Hugo Ibscher do not give any dimensions for the book block or the wooden covers. That no dimensions are given for the wooden covers is all the more regrettable in that the covers would have provided the only reliable guide to the original dimensions prior to the fraying of the papyrus edges. By comparison, Hugo Ibscher gives the dimensions of P[15996] as 31.5 by 18 cm, with the following breakdown: the writing column is 22 by 13 cm, the top margin 4, and the bottom margin 5.5 cm, the inner margin 2 cm and the outer margin 4 cm (sic!). The corresponding dimensions of the Psalms is a leaf of 27 by 17.5 cm with the following breakdown: the writing column 17.5 by 11 cm, top and bottom margins 3.5 and 5.5 (sic!), the inner and outer margins 2 and 4.5.

The only dimension of P[15997] that seems to be that of the original codex, and relatively certain, is the height of the writing column, some 20.5 cm. This dimension is about midway between that of P[15996] (22 cm) and the Psalms (17.5 cm). This would suggest a basis for conjecturing comparable median dimensions for the width of the writing column and the size of the margins and of the leaves: e.g., a writing-column width of 12 cm, top margins of 3.75 cm, bottom margins of 5.5 cm, inner margins of 2 cm and outer margins of 4.25 cm, producing a leaf dimension of 29.75 by 18.25 cm. When one considers the extant dimensions of the leaves ranging in height from 20.9 ([11*]/[12*]) to 24 ([7*]/[8*]), the estimated loss in height would be 5.75 to 8.85 cm. This would seem to be an excessive estimate of loss, when compared to Plate 2 of the article by Schmidt and Polotsky. For the leaves do not seem quite this much shorter than the covers (if indeed one may assume the photograph displays the height of the codex). Perhaps the conservation process involved loss in the margins.

On October 31, 1986, Günter Poethke confirmed that the two wooden boards of the cover of this codex, mentioned by Schmidt and

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Polotsky but omitted in the Inventarbuch and by Böhlig and Beltz, are not among the three Coptic book bindings listed by Wolfgang Müller as still extant in the museum.[8] Hence the covers must be considered lost.

The information about the contents of this codex must be derived primarily from Schmidt and Polotsky's report. For the seven leaves in Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR have on a first scanning produced no more than isolated letters and words, much less than the continuing phrases or sentences or trains of thought such as Schmidt and Polotsky report. This may be the result of the conservation process itself. For if Polotsky transcribed each successive page on the top of the book block before it was removed, he may well have transcribed much more text from the exposed side that could have been read after the leaf was removed. This would mean, of course, that the back of each leaf would in his (no longer extant) transcription present less text than the front. When in the case of P[15998], one compares the relatively large amount of text legible on the two exposed surfaces of a pair of never-separated leaves with the text legible on individual, separated leaves from the same codex, one can get some impression of the loss involved in rendering the hidden inner surfaces accessible. And the top surface on the lost book block may have been more legible (though the exposed surface on the extant book block of the Synaxeis codex is not markedly more legible that the conserved leaves). Yet Schmidt and Polotsky referred explicitly to what could be read "auf den konservierten Blättern" ["on the conserved leaves"], so that their information is presumably derived from the extant leaves.[9] Of course there may well have been fading over the intervening half century. The amount of flaking that would have been caused not only by the normal handling but especially by the transportation to the Zoo Bunker, by repercussions from exploding bombs and from antiaircraft fire, and by the railroad tracks to and from Leningrad in 1945–1946 and 1958, can be sensed from the quantity of dust and minor fragments littering the inside of the glasses. Yet the published leaves of the Kephalaia do not display such a marked contrast between what was read then and what can be read now.

8. Müller, "Die koptischen Handschriften," 66.
9. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 28.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Böhlig has challenged as an "oversight" the concluding detail of Schmidt and Polotsky's report[10]: "Auf den oberen Rändern standen die Namen der Verfasser." ["In the upper margins stood the names of the authors."] Since one must assume the published summaries from the codex are based on actual readings of the text, one should also assume the superscriptions of pages were more legible then than now. Since Böhlig did not record an alternate reading, it is doubtful he has been able to make them out to read differently, given their present illegibility. Schmidt and Polotsky had just noted[11] that the two disciples whose names they had found in the text of P15997 occurred as authors in the superscriptions of the pages of P15999, so that to make a similar inference concerning perhaps already minimally legible vestiges in the upper margins of P15997 would not be unreasonable, although the degree to which their statement was a conjecture can hardly be determined. The fact that the Cologne Mani Codex documents the names of Salmaios and Kustaios in its headings (see below) would tend to support this interpretation.

Beltz's statement that "the codex is probably a Vita of Mani" seems based not on new information, but simply on his interpretation of Schmidt and Polotsky's report. However, Schmidt and Polotsky did not refer to it as a Vita, but rather as "a work of historical content." The nearest Schmidt and Polotsky came to a discussion of the literary genre of the text is at the conclusion of their summary:

> Since the master put so much weight on the "book," as we will see, an active writing process developed also among the successors. Of course this writing concerned itself vigorously with the life of the religion's founder, especially with his last blows of fate. Early on, the "Martyrdom" was the object of sketches to be read on the day of his death, on the day of the Bema festival, and to serve as source material for cultic actions
>
> [p. 30] Da der Meister so grosses Gewicht auf das "Buch" legt, wie wir noch sehen werden, hat auch unter den Epigonen eine rege Schriftstellerei eingesetzt. Naturgemäss hat sich diese Schriftstellerei mit dem Leben des Religionsstifters lebhaft beschäftigt, besonders mit seinen letzten Schicksalen. Frühzeitig ist das "Martyrium" Gegenstand der Aufzeichnungen gewesen, um am Todestage, am Tage des Bema-Festes, verlesen zu werden und den

10. Ibid., 30.

11. Ibid., 29, where the codex in question is not identified. But from page 30, the identity is clear.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

and hymns. From such a historical work, Arabic historians such as An Nadim have drawn their chronological data. Fragments of narrative content have also been found among the Turfan texts. Hence it need not surprise us if also the Egyptian Manichaean incorporated a historical work about his religion into his library.

Kulthandlungen und den Hymnen zur Unterlage zu dienen. Aus einem derartigen Geschichtswerke haben arabische Historiker wie An Nadim ihre chronologischen Angaben bezogen. Auch unter den Turfantexten sind Fragmente erzählenden Inhalts gefunden worden. Daher darf es uns nicht überraschen, wenn auch der ägyptische Manichäer ein historisches Werk über seine Religion in seine Bibliothek aufgenommen hat.

But Schmidt and Polotsky rejected Alfaric's suggestion that a previously known allusion to a "Book of Apomnemoneumata" should be interpreted as a "Vie du Maître" ("Life of the Master"). For such a reference is very vague and could equally well refer to the Kephalaia. Thus the title Vita is hardly a valid inference from Schmidt's interpretation. Rather the combination of a Martyrdom with subsequent stories about the original disciples after the founder's death would seem to fit better the genre of apocryphal Acts. To be sure, the Martyrdom of the founder is less obviously part of such Acts, perhaps because in early Christianity the genre of Gospel tended to absorb the Martyrdom into it, with of course the Apostle's martyrdom comprising a worthy conclusion (but not beginning) for apocryphal Acts.

If it were correct to assume that the few pages separated from the book block were from the beginning of the codex and composed some 3.2 percent of the codex (8 out of the some 250 leaves that Schmidt and Polotsky estimated), of which only part contained the Martyrdom, then obviously the whole codex should no more be titled after this prelude than should the canonical Acts of the Apostles be named after the ascension with which it begins. But since one does not know whether the conserved leaves were all from the beginning of the codex, or whether they represent a sampling of different parts of the codex, such an argument cannot be pressed.

To be sure, the almost contemporary Life of Pachomius included the administrations of his immediate successors, as abbots of the

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Pachomian order, all of whom had been his disciples. But this is hardly a relevant parallel, since the Life of Pachomius began with his own call and composed primarily his adult life of leadership of the order, with the period of his immediate successors representing more of an appendix, or continuation of his administration.

Ludwig Koenen has suggested[12] that P^{15997} "seemingly showed the same literary structure and probably was part of the same work" as the Cologne Mani Codex. Schmidt and Polotsky had reported:[13] "Our historical work obviously did not flow from the pen of a single author, but rather was a collection made up of different smaller essays and reports that were put together here under the names of the authors in question." To this Koenen remarks:[14] "This description suits the C[ologne]M[ani]C[odex] perfectly. Headings in the Coptic Codex furnish the names of Ammos, Salmaios, and Kustaios as authors of the articles and reports. Having the same function, the names of Salmaios and Kustaios occur in the headings of the CMC." Although Schmidt and Polotsky did not make clear that Kustaios is mentioned in this codex and did not specify just which names appear in superscriptions, mentioning only Ammos as occurring in a subscription, Koenen's observation is nonetheless quite relevant.

Koenen further conjectures that "the whole work was a history of the Manichaean church, and it consisted of several codices."[15] This conjecture is supported by the note: "To judge from the space which the C[ologne] [Mani] C[odex] needed to deal with the early years of Mani, it seems that the history originally was comprised of several volumes." Although the last suggestion must remain quite speculative, the relation of the Cologne Mani Codex to P^{15997} as that of the Gospel of Luke to the Acts of the Apostles does suggest itself in terms of literary genres, though there is hardly any evidence of its having been composed as a two-volume (or multivolume) work.

12. Koenen, "Augustine and Manichaeism," 164.

13. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 29: "Unser historisches Werk war offensichtlich nicht aus der Feder eines einzigen Schriftstellers geflossen, sondern ein Sammelband aus verschiedenen kleineren Aufsätzen and Berichten, die unter den Namen der betreffenden Autoren hier zusammengestellt sind."

14. Koenen, "Augustine and Manichaeism," 164 n. 37.

15. Ibid., 165, and n. 38.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

It is no doubt Koenen's view that has led Michel Tardieu to characterize the Coptic codex largely in terms of the Greek codex:[16]

> 2) On the Birth of His Body
>
> Allusion to Mani's struggles of youth and to the birth of the Manichaean church . . . The complete Greek version of this text is known by means of the CMC.

Yet the Cologne Mani Codex does not contain a complete Greek version (if one were to assume the two codices overlap) for there is no material that is shared between the codices, to the extent that they are known. Only the Cologne codex alludes to Mani's struggles of youth, and some allusion to the birth of the Manichaean church may be found in the reports that follow, which is all that is known about the contents of P[15997].

A summary of the contents of the conserved leaves provided by Schmidt and Polotsky will tend to confirm the orientation of P[15997] to apocryphal Acts. Four passages are summarized, the second and third introduced as "ein anderes Stück" ["another piece"], the fourth as "ein weiteres Blatt" ["a further leaf"]. It is unclear whether Schmidt and Polotsky present them in the order in which they occur in the codex. To judge by their content, the chronological order might well be 2, 1, 4, 3. Their summary of the four passages, in their order, is as follows:[17]

> On the conserved leaves we read brief narrations about Mani's death, e.g., a narrative about the dialogue of the imprisoned Mani with the guard of the prison, which according to the subscription is attributed to a certain teacher (ⲥⲁϩ) named Ammôs; furthermore a narrative about the visit of a female catechumen named Anûschak to the imprisoned Mani, who is extremely worried that, if Mani were to forsake
>
> [p. 28] Auf den konservierten Blättern lesen wir kurze Erzählungen über Manis Tod, so z. B. eine Erzählung über die Unterredung Manis im Gefängnis mit dem Wächter des Gefängnisses, die auf einen gewissen Lehrer (ⲥⲁϩ) mit Namen Ammôs nach der Unterschrift zurückgeführt wird; ferner eine Erzählung über den Besuch einer Katechumenin namens Anûschak beim gefangenen Mani, die höchst betrübt darüber

16. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6: 2) Sur la naissance de son corps Évocation des conflits de jeunesse de Mani et de la naissance de l'Église manichéenne . . . La version grècque complète de ce texte est connue par le CMC.

17. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 28–29.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the world, the catechumens would be robbed of their "father" and come into danger of being lost. Mani consoles her with the observation that his nous remains in the church.

[p. 28] In another piece we hear that the day of the arrest was a sabbath, and that as a result of his arrest great weeping and mourning arose among the elect, the catechumens and the brethren. There follows a judgment scene before the king. The Μαγουσαῖοι, who, as is well known, staged the agitation against Mani, come forward with the accusation: "Manichaios has taught contrary to our law (νόμος)."

[p. 28] Another piece leads us into a later time of Manichaeism. Here we meet a quantity of unknown persons, such as the Queen Thadamor (ⲑⲁⲇⲁⲙⲱⲣ), the king Amarô (ⲁⲙⲁⲣⲱ), the hyparch Sapôres, Malôp, the son of Adb[jesu], the teacher Abiēsu (ⲁⲃⲓⲏⲥⲟⲩ), Yachias, the leader Sethel (ⲥⲏⲑⲏⲗ), Abira, etc. One has to do here apparently with events that take place within the Persian Empire. There are mentioned the ⲭⲱⲣⲁ ⲛ̄ⲟⲩⲉⲉⲟⲥ and the ⲭⲱⲣⲁ ⲛ̄ⲧⲁⲛⲁⲇⲓⲧ ⲁⲇⲟⲩⲣⲃⲁⲗⲁⲅⲁⲛ. Further, one has to do with the position of the provincial governments toward the Manichaean religion, some of which are disposed in a friendly way, especially Amarô, who is designated as "great patron" of the Manichaeans, since they can enjoy his support. One of the heads of the Manichaeans turns to him ist, dass, wenn Mani die Welt verlassen sollte, die Katechumenen ihres "Vaters" beraubt sind and in Gefahr des Verlorenseins kommen. Mani tröstet sie mit dem Hinweis, dass sein Nus in der Kirche verbleibe.

[p. 28] Wir hören in einem andern Stück, dass der Tag der Gefangennahme ein Sabbat war, und dass ob seiner Gefangennahme grosses Weinen und Trauern unter den Electi, den Katechumenen und den Brüdern entstand. Es folgt eine Gerichtssitzung vor dem König, Die Μαγουσαῖοι, die bekanntlich die Hetze gegen Mani inszeniert haben, treten mit der Anklage auf: "Manichaios hat gegen unser Gesetz (νόμος) gelehrt."

[p. 28] In eine spätere Zeit des Manichäismus führt uns ein anderes Stück. Hier tritt uns eine Fülle von unbekannten Personen entgegen, wie die Königin Thadmor (ⲑⲁⲇⲁⲙⲱⲣ), der König Amarô (ⲁⲙⲁⲣⲱ), der Hyparch Sapôres, Malôp, der Sohn des Abd[jesu], der Lehrer Abiēsu (ⲁⲃⲓⲏⲥⲟⲩ), Yachias, der Leiter Sethel (ⲥⲏⲑⲏⲗ), Abira usw. Es handelt sich offenbar hier um Ereignisse, die sich innerhalb des Persischen Reiches abspielen. Es werden genannt die ⲭⲱⲣⲁ ⲛ̄ⲟⲩⲉⲉⲟⲥ und die ⲭⲱⲣⲁ ⲛ̄ⲧⲁⲛⲁⲇⲓⲧ ⲁⲇⲟⲩⲣⲃⲁⲗⲁⲅⲁⲛ. Es handelt sich weiter um die Stellung der Provinzialregierungen zur manichäischen Religion, von denen die einen freundlich gesinnt sind, vor allem Amarô, der als "grosser Patron" der Manichäer bezeichnet wird, da sie sich dessen Unterstützung zu erfreuen haben. Eines der Häupter der Manichäer wendet sich deshalb an ihn mit der Bitte um Fürsprache für

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

for this reason with the request to intercede for the persecuted believers [p. 29] in Persia with the king Narsaph, i.e., Narses (293–302). Amarô assumes this responsibility and sends letters to the main king, which are crowned with success in that the persecutions cease. In these negotiations a certain ⲓⲛⲛⲁⲓⲟⲥ surfaces, who is apparently the transmitter of the letters of Amarô to the king. He has a discussion with King Narses, the result of which is that the oppressions and persecutions of the teacher and believers are suspended on the command of the king . . . [Evidence for Innaios as a disciple of Mani from other sources is listed.] According to the Berlin papyrus the tranquility under Narses continued up to his death. Under his successor Ormizd II (ϩⲱⲣⲙⲏⲍⲇ), the son of Narses, the agitation of the Mages resumed; as a result there were new persecutions. From these notes we see that the work contained precise historical records about the development of the Manichaean movement in the Persian Empire after the death of Mani from the pen of a Manichaean, and one may suspect that we will also receive important information about Mani and his times.

die verfolgten Gläu-[p. 29]bigen in Persien beim König Narsaph, d.i. Narses(293–302). Amarô übernimmt diese Aufgabe und sendet Briefe an den Oberkönig, die von Erfolg gekrönt sind, indem die Verfolgungen aufhören. Bei diesen Verhandlungen taucht ein gewisser ⲓⲛⲛⲁⲓⲟⲥ auf, der wahrscheinlich der Überbringer der Sendschreiben des Amarô an den König ist. Er hat eine Unterredung mit König Narses, deren Resultat ist, dass die Bedrückungen und Verfolgungen der Lehrer und Gläubigen auf Befehl des Königs sistiert werden . . . [Evidence for Innaios as a disciple of Mani from other sources is listed.] Nach dem Berliner Papyrus hat die Ruhe unter Narses bis zu seinem Tode angehalten. Unter seinem Nachfolger Ormizd II. (ϩⲱⲣⲙⲏⲍⲇ), dem Sohne des Narses, hat die Hetze der Magier wieder eingesetzt; die Folge sind erneute Verfolgungen gewesen. Aus diesen Notizen ersehen wir, dass das Werk genaue geschichtliche Aufzeichnungen über die Entwicklung der Manichäerbewegung im Persischen Reiche nach dem Tode Manis aus der Feder eines Manichäers enthielt, und man darf vermuten, dass wir auch wichtige Aufschlüsse über Mani und seine Zeit empfangen werden.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Given the fact that the book block is presumably permanently lost, and in view of the deplorable condition of the seven leaves in Berlin, this last hope must of course be given up.

Søren Giversen in a separate article[18] has provided a translation of some of this leaf, though without making the identification. Yet in light of the language used to describe the leaf in the facsimile edition, the language introducing the translation makes it clear that he has in view the same leaf.

> The last example is taken from the Addenda et Varia. It is a sheet, damaged, but not too bad[ly]. This sheet [h]as some historical informations [sic]. The handwriting reminds very much on [sic] that in the Homilies, published by H. J. Polotsky. But this text is not published, and for some reasons I think, that it was not restored together with the Homilies, because the glass and a black buckram frame is quite different from that of the Homilies. I am for the moment becoming more convinced that it has had its own history.
>
> This sheet mentions persons we know from other Manichean texts: Innaios and Sapores. I shall shortly give you a small part of it:
>
> (X, 11); . . . He told us [that] the king had arrived into the neighbourhood of our shepherd Innaios, together with the noble Persians [who were] his assistants. He spoke to him . . . He asked him to go to the king. He achieved mercy for us from him [and he] stopped our destruction. The king together with the nobelmen [sic], who were many . . . [In]naios, shall I raise . . . Innaios went into [. . .] of the king. Sapores . . .
>
> This was only to give you a little glimpse. Innaios (Zabed's brother in CMC 74, also mentioned in the great formula PG 1; 1468) is mentioned in connection with king Sapores. When the two pages are fully deciphered a more detailed definition of the text and where it comes from, can presumably be given.

The identification of the leaf need not await further decipherment; it is clearly the Berlin leaf reported upon by Schmidt and Polotsky.

Schmidt and Polotsky's report concluded with the summary of another leaf:

18. Giversen, "The Unedited Chester Beatty Mani Texts," 1985/1986, 179–80.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

[p. 29] A further leaf takes us in fact back into the time of the beginnings, for here, as mentioned above, the ARXHGOS Sisinnios is named, and a certain Salmaios, who bears the honorary title ASKHTHS. Also this Salmaios belongs, as does Sisinnios, to the first generation, for we find his name Salmaios among the disciples of Mani in the great abjuration formula. According to An Nadim in the Fihrist under Nr. 64 there is a letter of Mani directed to a certain Salam and Ansara. Besides, his name occurs on the top margins of a papyrus book [P[15999]] alongside of that of Kustaios, so that he himself must have left written material. Our historical work obviously did not flow from the pen of a single author, but was a collection of various smaller essays and reports that have been put together here under the names of the authors in question.

[p. 29] Ein weiteres Blatt führt uns nämlich in die Anfangszeit zurück, denn hier wird, wie erwähnt, der ARXHGOS Sisinnios genannt und ein gewisser Salmaios, der den Ehrentitel ASKHTHS führt. Auch dieser Salmaios gehört wie Sisinnios zu der ersten Generation, denn wir finden seinen Namen Salmaios unter den Schülern des Mani in der grossen Abschwörungsformel. Nach An Nadim im Fihrist unter Nr. 64 ist ein Sendschreiben des Mani an einen gewissen Salam und Ansara gerichtet. Ausserdem erscheint sein Name auf den oberen Rändern eines Papyrusbuches [P[15999]] neben dem des Kustaios, so dass er selbst auch Schriftliches hinterlassen haben muss. Unser historisches Werk war offensichtlich nicht aus der Feder eines einzigen Schriftstellers geflossen, sondern ein Sammelband aus verschiedenen kleineren Aufsätzen und Berichten, die unter den Namen der betreffenden Autoren hier zusammengestellt sind.

This codex, thus represented today by seven (or eight) largely illegible leaves in Berlin, 1 part of a leaf in Warsaw, and 1 more legible leaf in Dublin, a total of 9 (or 10) leaves = 18 (or 20) pages has not been published beyond the facsimiles of the leaf in Dublin and the part of this leaf published in English translation by Giversen. Stephen Patterson prepared a preliminary transcription of the leaves in Berlin during three trips there in 1987, and of the leaf in Dublin on the basis of the facsimiles in Claremont in 1988.

Photographs of both sides of the leaf without Roman numeration (here tentatively numbered [VI] 11*/12*) are on file at the Papyrus-Sammlung. One copy of each side was donated to the Manichaean Archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:14 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 12 —

P 15998: Letters

The basic report of Schmidt and Polotsky had stated:[1]

We now turn to the second papyrus book of the Berlin Manichaica. This can raise the indisputable claim to be an original work of Mani, for it has to do with the collection of his Letters. Unfortunately, thus far only 4 leaves have been separated from the pile and put under glass, but there can be no doubt of the fact itself, for again the papyrus transmits the title on the verso side and the name of the addressee on the recto side. Also in the text itself the whole title is repeated as a superscription. The papyrus book hence corresponds outwardly to the Kephalaia, except that it does not seem to be paginated. At least no numbers have thus far been found on the conserved leaves. As superscriptions there have been read ⲦⲘⲁϩⲤⲛⲦⲉ ⲛ̄ⲉⲡⲓⲥⲧⲟⲗⲏ on the verso, and on the recto ⲛ̄ⲥⲓⲥⲓⲛⲛⲓⲟⲥ, and

Wir wenden uns nun zu dem zweiten Papyrusbuch der Berliner Manichaica. Dieses kann den sicheren Anspruch erheben, Originalwerk des Mani zu sein, handelt es sich doch um seine Briefsammlung. Leider sind bis jetzt nur 4 Blätter von dem Haufen abgehoben und unter Glas gebracht worden, aber an der Tatsache selbst kann kein Zweifel bestehen, denn wiederum überliefert der Papyrus den Titel auf der Versoseite und den Namen des Adressaten auf der Rektoseite. Auch im Texte selbst ist der ganze Titel als überschrift wiederholt. Das Papyrusbuch entspricht also äusserlich den Kephalaia, nur scheint es nicht paginiert gewesen zu sein, wenigstens sind keine Zahlen auf den konservierten Blättern bisher gefunden worden. Gelesen sind als Überschriften ⲦⲘⲁϩⲤⲛⲦⲉ ⲛ̄ⲉⲡⲓⲥⲧⲟⲗⲏ auf dem Verso, auf dem Rekto ⲛ̄ⲥⲓⲥⲓⲛⲛⲓⲟⲥ,

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 24–27. The quotations are from pp. 24 and 27.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

ⲧⲙⲁϩⲱⲗⲙⲧⲉ ⲛ̄ⲉⲡⲓⲥⲧⲟⲗⲏ
on the verso, and on the recto ⲛ̄ⲥⲓⲥⲓⲛⲛⲓⲟⲥ; i.e., "the second letter (ἐπιστολή) of Sisinnios" and "the third letter (ἐπιστολή) of Sisinnios." Actually one should translate "to Sisinnios." . . . Hence we can with great expectation put this discovery of the collection of Letters worthily along side the discovery of the Kephalaia and welcome it as an important source for history contemporary with Mani.

und ⲧⲙⲁϩⲱⲗⲙⲧⲉ ⲛ̄ⲉⲡⲓⲥⲧⲟⲗⲏ
auf dem Verso, auf dem Rekto ⲛ̄ⲥⲓⲥⲓⲛⲛⲓⲟⲥ, d. h. "der zweite Brief (ἐπιστολή) des Sisinnios" und "der dritte Brief (ἐπιστολή) des Sisinnios." In Wahrheit muss man übersetzen: "an Sisinnios." . . . Wir können also diesen Fund der Briefsammlung dem der Kephalaia würdig an die Seite stellen und als eine wichtige Quelle für die Zeitgeschichte des Mani mit grossen Erwartungen begrüssen.

Wilhelm Schubart recorded in the Inventarbuch of the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum of Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR in black ink for P[15998] the entry: "Koptischer Papyruskodex" ["Coptic Papyrus Codex"]. The column regarding "Art der Erwerbung" ["Nature of the Acquisition"] reads "dsgl." ["the same"] as P[15995], i.e., "acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt in Cairo, 1931, gift of Mr. August Pfeffer 1933." Further notes added in pencil report "z. T. zwischen Glass" ["in part between glass"], "6 Blätter" ["6 leaves"], "s. Schrank 24" ["see cupboard 24"] "(Briefsammlung?)" ["(collection of letters?)"], "ähnlich 15995" ["similar to 15995"]. A rubber stamp reading "1958 vorhanden" ["1958 present"] records the return of the material from Leningrad. The stamp is followed by 6 counting marks. A faint purple carbon note reports "z. Zt. in Schondorf" ["at present in Schondorf"], and, in darker purple, "6 Blätter nach dem Osten" ["6 leaves to the east"], to which is added in black ink: "sind zurück. Codex nicht! [Rolf] Ib[scher]." ["[they] are back. Codex [is] not! [Rolf] Ib[scher]"]. Thus is recorded both the assumed fact that this codex, or, more precisely, the remains of the book block that had not yet been conserved by separating and glassing the leaves, was thought to be in Schondorf, whereas the 6 separated and glassed leaves had been taken east and were returned, as well as the contradictory assumption that the book block ("codex") was not returned from Leningrad, which seems to suggest that by now Rolf Ibscher or someone had realized that it too had been taken east. Another stamp reading "1972 vorhanden" ["1972 present"] records that 6 leaves were present at the time of the inventory of holdings made that year by Ulrich Luft, then of the Museum staff.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Böhlig reported as follows about this codex in 1960/68:[2]

3. Nobly written in very large format in decorative script is the codex P[15998], which unfortunately has also become a sacrifice of the war, except for a small residue. At the time of the report of the discovery, 4 leaves had been brought under glass, from which one could see that it had to do with the collection of Mani's letters. As page superscriptions the following were read at that time: "The Second Letter to Sisinnios" and "The Third Letter to Sisinnios." I have not found leaves with these page superscriptions now in looking through the material, but I have found a leaf with the following chapter superscription and the beginning of a letter: "The Seventh Letter to Ktesiphon on the pannychismoi (Vigils): Mani the apostle of Jesus Christ and Sisinnios and the believing elect who are with me . . ." Of this book are to be found in Berlin, put under glass already in the pre-war period, 6 leaves with the preliminary numbers 12, 13, 21, 23, 24, and 25, and about 22 leaves in half-conserved condition. The folders in which they lay were numbered, and supplement the numbers of the glassed leaves: 1–11, 14–20, 22. It is worth noting that the leaves 17–21 present an appreciably larger, quite differently arranged script, and that leaf 16 is perhaps uninscribed. Incidentally,

3. Herrlich geschrieben auf sehr grossem Format in zierlicher Schrift ist der Codex P[15998], der leider ebenfalls bis auf einen kleinen Rest ein Opfer des Krieges geworden ist. Zur Zeit des Fundberichtes waren 4 Blätter unter Glas gebracht, aus denen zu ersehen war, dass es sich um die Briefssammlung Manis handelte. Als Seitenüberschriften wurden damals gelesen: "Der 2. Brief an Sisinnios" und "der 3. Brief an Sisinnios." Blätter mit diesen Seitenüberschriften habe ich jetzt bei der Durchsicht nicht gefunden, wohl aber ein Blatt mit folgender Kapitelüberschrift und Briefbeginn: "Der 7. Brief an Ktesiphon über die pannychismoi (Vigilien): Mani, der Apostel Jesu Christi, und Sisinnios und die gläubigen Electi, die mit mir sind . . ." Von diesem Buch befinden sich in Berlin, noch in der Zeit vor dem Kriege unter Glas gebracht, 6 Blätter mit den vorläufigen Nummern 12, 13, 21, 23, 24, und 25 und ungefähr 22 Blätter in halbkonserviertem Zustand. Die Folien, in denen sie lagen, waren numeriert und ergänzen die Zahlen der verglasten Blätter: 1–11, 14–20, 22. Merkwürdig ist dabei, dass die Blätter 17–21 eine wesentlich grössere, ganz anders geartetete Schrift aufweisen, Blatt 16 vielleicht unbeschriftet ist. Die Blattzählung bedarf übrigens der

2. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 184.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the numeration of leaves needs to be corrected, for a leaf treated as an unseparated pair turns out to be triplets, and 2 leaves that were still unnumbered, with the note "Codex B from the volume of Letters of Mani," have to be given a place between 21 and 23.

Korrektur, da ein als ungelöster Zwilling betrachtetes Blatt sich als Drilling erweist und noch 2 ungezählte Blätter mit der Notiz "Codex B aus dem Bande Briefe Manis" zwischen 21 und 23 untergebracht werden müssen.

To judge by the similarity of language, it is apparently to these "half-conserved" leaves that Böhlig had referred earlier in his report of 1960/68, without identifying the codex involved (though it is distinguished from the 20 leaves of the Kephalaia that had remained in Berlin, since they are reported in the preceding text to have been conserved in 1952–1953):[3]

> The urgently needed reglasing of all the pieces that had been glassed by Hugo Ibscher and that returned to Berlin in 1958 was undertaken by Rolf Ibscher beginning in June of this year (1960), along with the conservation of a few half-conserved leaves that Ibscher Sr. had at first put to one side as too difficult, doubtlessly correctly, for it had to do usually with double or triple leaves.

It must also be these leaves that are intended in the confused statement of Rolf Ibscher in 1964–1965 quoted above:

> [p. 63] . . . a sizable number of leaves separated last, quite provisionally, by my father, with an entry on the paper cover that protected them which really creates puzzles: "from Codex B," i.e. then Chester Beatty [Synaxeis] or ?—and with the addition put in parentheses "Letters" i.e., then again Codex Nr. 15[9]98. What is one to make of that? But there is also among these leaves one with the number 361. To what does that belong?

The references by Böhlig and Rolf Ibscher are quite similar: "about 22 leaves" or "a few . . . leaves" / "a sizable number of leaves"; "half-conserved condition" or "half-conserved leaves" / "quite provisionally"; "folders" / "paper cover."

Müller's preliminary inventory of 1964–1965 listed for P[15998] "Briefsammlung, 6 Bl. in Berlin, Rest verloren" ["Collection of Letters, 6 leaves in Berlin, the rest lost"]. Here the 22 folders that created the

3. Ibid., 182.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

confusion have apparently not been identified with the Letters. They are in fact not mentioned at all in Müller's report. They may have been still in the Ibscher home.

The same omission is in Beltz's catalogue of 1978, which reported about the Letters without reference to the 22 folders as follows:

I 606 P[15998]. 6 leaves of a codex from the Mani discovery. 2 leaves of this codex are in Warsaw in the National Museum. The average height is 30 cm and an average width 17.5 cm. On an average there are 35–36 lines per page. The corpus of Mani's Letters. The state of preservation of the leaves is as poor as in the other Mani texts in Berlin. The remainder of the codex must be regarded as lost. Glass 13, recto, lines 4–8: ϵⲕⲕⲗⲏⲥⲓⲁ ϵⲧϵ . . . ⲱⲙⲟⲡⲛ / ⲛⲁⲁⲓⲛ ⲛⲁⲅⲅϵⲗⲟⲥ ⲛϵⲓ ϵⲧⲱⲙⲟⲡⲛ ⲧⲟⲩ ⲇⲟϵ . . . / ⲓⲱ . . . ⲁⲁⲛ ⲟⲩⲁⲛⲛⲓⲙ ϵⲫ . . . / ⲛⲫⲛⲁ2ⲧ ϵⲣⲁⲥ ϵⲥⲁⲱⲱⲡϵ ⲁⲁⲛ . . .

I 606 P[15998]; 6 Blätter eines Codex aus dem Manifund, 2 Blätter dieses Codex befinden sich in Warschau im National-Museum. Die durchschnittliche H. 30 und eine durchschnittliche B. 17,5. Durchschnittlich 35-36 Z., Briefkorpus des Mani. Der Erhaltungsgrad der Blätter ist so schlecht wie bei den übrigen Mani-Texten in Berlin. Der Rest des Codex muss als verloren angesehen werden. P1. 13, R. Z. 4–8: ϵⲕⲕⲗⲏⲥⲓⲁ ϵⲧϵ . . . ⲱⲙⲟⲡⲛ / ⲛⲁⲁⲓⲛ ⲛⲁⲅⲅϵⲗⲟⲥ ⲛϵⲓ ϵⲧⲱⲙⲟⲡⲛ ⲧⲟⲩ ⲇⲟϵ . . . / ⲓⲱ . . . ⲁⲁⲛ ⲟⲩⲁⲛⲛⲓⲙ ϵⲫ . . . / ⲛⲫⲛⲁ2ⲧ ϵⲣⲁⲥ ϵⲥⲁⲱⲱⲡϵ ⲁⲁⲛ . . .

Günter Poethke, Custos of the Greek manuscripts in the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR began on September–October, 1971, saw these materials in Warsaw, and on February 23, 1972, submitted a report preserved in the Archives of the Ägyptisches Museum to the effect that the two leaves are "(1/2; 3/4)." This is apparently an allusion to the two plates numbered 1 and 4, with the assumption that these are page rather than leaf numbers, and hence that the side of these leaves without a label could be numbered 2 and 3. Since he did not see the leaf numbered 3, such an assumption would have been possible, though apparently not correct. Beltz's information is based on what he saw in his own visit to Warsaw, recorded in his "Aktennotiz für die Papyrus-Sammlung der Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin" ["Memorandum for the Papyrus Collection of the State Museums in Berlin"] preserved in the same Archives. There he, following Poethke, listed "zwei Platten, die vermutlich die Seiten 1–4 enthalten" ["two plates that presumably contain the pages 1–4"].

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On December 23, 1985, Wlodzimierz Godlewski reported that 3 Manichaean leaves are at the National Museum in Warsaw. Wincenty Myszor reported on July 12, 1986, as follows on the material at the National Museum:

In the National Museum in Warsaw there are three plates that could belong to a Mani codex. All three are without number and at present only have the number of the National Museum [MN]. Two have 140 160 MN A and B and with the number 1 and 4 on the verso, one has the number 200 611 MN and with the number 3. W. Beltz has certainly seen the first two plates [cf. his catalogue]. The third plate [200 611 MN] has the same size and the same ductus, and so could, in terms of externals, belong to the same codex. On the recto the glass is cracked horizontally, but without damage to the text and the leaf. The leaf is in the same state of preservation as the two others. One can make out about 29 or 30 lines; but perhaps the text continues to 32 lines. But only traces of them survive. At the level of lines 7–8 on the verso the papyrus fibers are destroyed, so that one cannot read the text; on the recto on the other hand the fibers are preserved and hence the text is legible. On the edge a few papyrus parts are pushed [out of place]; the bottom margin of the leaf is completely destroyed except for individual fibers.

Im National-Museum in Warschau befinden sich drei Platten, die zu einem Mani-Kodex gehören könnten. Alle drei sind ohne Nummer und haben jetzt nur die Nummer vom National-Museum [MN]. Zwei sind mit 140 160 MN A und B und mit Ziffer 1 und 4 auf der Verso-Seite, und eine mit Nummer 200 611 MN und mit Ziffer 3 versehen. Die ersten zwei Platten hat bestimmt W. Beltz gesehen [vgl. seinen Katalog]. Die dritte Platte [200 611 MN] hat dieselbe Grösse und denselben Schriftductus: könnte also von aussen gesehen zu demselben Kodex gehören. Auf der Rectoseite ist die Verglasung horizontal angebrochen, aber ohne Schaden für den Text und das Blatt. Das Blatt ist in demselben Erhaltungsgrad wie die zwei anderen. Man kann circa 29 bis 30 Zeilen ausmachen; vermutlich aber geht der Text bis 32 Zeilen. Davon sind jedoch nur Spuren erhalten. In der Höhe der Zeilen 7–8 sind auf der Verso-Seite die Papyrusfasern zerstört, so dass man den Text nicht lesen kann; an der Recto-Seite dagegen sind die Fasern erhalten und ist also der Text lesbar. Am Seitenrand sind einige Papyrusteile verschoben; der untere Rand des Blattes ist bis auf einzelne Fasern ganz zerstört.

The third leaf, which has only recently been mentioned, has been in part transcribed by Myszor, which will help to clarify the identification and the nature of the text.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On September 11, 1986, Wolf-Peter Funk examined the 3 plates (and on October 29, 1986 measured the plates themselves: 35.5 to 35.7 cm by 23.0 cm), and on November 4, 1986, wrote a report that brings further clarity to the situation: The small labels with the numbers 1, 3, and 4 (as well as the Warsaw Museum labels) are on one side only, that with horizontal fibers, which is what Myszor hence meant by recto. If however one would use recto to refer to the right-hand page, as does Funk, the situation is as follows: Since broader margins are usually in the Manichaean codices not at the spine but at the leading edge, and broader margins on one side characterize the leaves in Warsaw, one can distinguish the right-hand page (Funk's recto), whose right edge would be broad, from the left-hand page (Funk's verso), whose left edge would be broad. On this basis one can determine the fiber directions of the 4 leaves (right-hand page / left-hand page) as follows: 1, vertical / horizontal; 3, vertical / horizontal; 4, horizontal / vertical. This would suggest that the numeration of the leaves could reflect the correct sequence of the leaves in relation to each other, i.e. the sequence in which they were successively separated from the book block (though it would not be clear whether the conservation took place from front to back or from back to front). For the numeration conforms to the pattern of like fiber directions facing each other as one turns the pages, i.e., the left-hand page of leaf 3 has horizontal fibers, and the facing right-hand page of leaf 4 also has horizontal fibers (or, if the conservation progressed from back to front, the left-hand page of leaf 4 has vertical fibers, which would face the right-hand page of leaf 3, which also has vertical fibers). If the missing leaf 2 had fiber directions like those of leaf 4, then leaf 2 would present like fiber directions on the side facing leaf 1 as well as on the side facing leaf 3.

This identification of which side is the left-hand page and which the right-hand page is continued by page superscriptions in the top margins. For on the left-hand page of leaves 1 and 4 is an ordinal number, and on the right-hand page of leaf 4 is a personal name, so that the page superscriptions would follow the pattern: The x-th Letter / of (or to) X. Schmidt and Polotsky already identified these page superscriptions. For on the left-hand page of leaf 1 there occurs ⲧⲙⲁϩⲱⲩⲁⲙ, and on the left-hand page of leaf 4 there occurs ⲧⲙⲁϩ . . . ϵ ⲛⲉⲡⲓⲥⲧⲟⲗⲏ . . . The three letters not transcribed could be, in Funk's opinion, ⲥⲛⲧ, though, not having the passage in Schmidt and Polotsky before him,

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

he did not actually examine the papyrus with these letters in mind. Thus the left-hand page of leaf 1 contains "The thir[d . . .]," the left-hand page of leaf 4 "The [second] Letter." Leaf 4 has on the right-hand page NCICIINNIOC. Though this would not be the continuation of the superscription read on the left-hand pages of leaves 1 and 4, but of the leaf next to leaf 4, it would nonetheless indicate the pattern of the superscriptions. This would seem to identify leaves 1 and 4 as those whose running titles Schmidt and Polotsky transcribed, even though they read the complete title. Perhaps merely because they did not indicate lacunae, as Funk expects on the basis of their complete transcription of running titles of the Synaxeis codex that are today and probably always have been fragmentary. It may well be that Schmidt and Polotsky did not actually see the page superscriptions on the right-hand facing pages to leaves 1 and 4, but only inferred from the pattern they had established what it may have been. They based preliminary codicological inferences regarding P[15998] upon their broader experience with P[15996] as they themselves state: "The papyrus book hence corresponds outwardly to the Kephalaia, except that it does not seem to be paginated."

Thus the left-hand page of leaf 4 would have contained part of a second letter, and the left-hand page of leaf 1 part of a third letter. This would suggest that the sequence of the numeration of the leaves is the reverse of their order in the codex. Leaf 4 could have been the first leaf of the codex only if one were to assume a first letter of less than two pages terminated and the second letter began on the left-hand page of that leaf. The second and/or third letters, present on the left-hand page of the first leaf (number 4, in the ordering of the leaves 4, 3, 2, 1) and the left-hand page of the fourth leaf (number 1), a total of nearly seven pages, would have been longer.

It is hence not surprising that Böhlig reported that after World War II he did not find in Berlin the pages with the superscriptions that Schmidt and Polotsky listed. His report to the effect that there were six already-glassed leaves together with the penciled notes in the Inventarbuch that six leaves were glassed and returned to Berlin would lead to the normal assumption that the four leaves that Schmidt and Polotsky reported as already glassed would be among these six. But now this would not seem to be the case. The fact that Böhlig listed the numbers on these six glasses as 12, 13, 21, 23, 24, and 25 would also tend to suggest that the 6 he located did not include the first four that Schmidt and Polotsky reported as glassed.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The inventory carried out in 1985–1986 did not locate what Rolf Ibscher referred to as "the paper cover that protected them" i.e., that protected "a sizable number of leaves." The paper contained the comments "from Codex B" and "Letters," which seemed to Rolf Ibscher confusingly contradictory, in that one reference seemed to point to Dublin (Codex B = Synaxeis), one to Berlin (Letters = P[15998]). If the "paper cover" is the same as the "folders" to which Böhlig referred, then one would no doubt have to do with the usual file folders in which papyri may well have been stored before being put in glass. They would have been left in such folders by Hugo Ibscher, since his conservation was only provisional, and would have been transferred into glass by Rolf Ibscher, even though the conservation was never adequately completed, in that in some instances parts of two leaves are still glassed together. The folders with the confusing information on them would then have been discarded.

But some of the information on the discarded paper cover has apparently been preserved on labels. The glassed but unboxed leaf labeled "Kephalaia 15996 Nr. 29" has inscribed on its label, though marked out, the numeral 361 (and on the back, also marked out, 362) as well as "zu 15998" ["to 15998"] (also marked out). Rolf Ibscher had reported in connection with the leaves provisionally preserved by his father and confusingly labeled "from Codex B" and "Letters": "But there is also among these leaves one with the number 361. To what does that belong?" Obviously the leaf has subsequently been reassigned to P[15996], but the reason remains unclear. For the numeration 361/62 should not lead to such an assignment, since that leaf of P[15996] is present at its correct position in the appropriate box. Yet such high numerations are known only in the case of P[15996], and this could have led to assigning the plate to P[15996] if the relevant box were not checked. In any case, one has here clear evidence that at least this one leaf among those that Rolf Ibscher thought might belong either to "Codex B" (the Dublin Synaxeis) or to the Berlin Letters (P[15998]) is currently assigned by its label to neither, but rather to the Kephalaia.

More extant leaves are currently assigned to the Kephalaia than one is required to postulate are from that codex. For there are only twenty-five leaves missing between the last bound leaf, pp. 439/440, and the last attested leaf, pp. 501/502. For the extant leaf pp. 455–56

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

is clearly identified as extant by its label, and the leaves pp. 447–54, 499/500 are in Warsaw. One leaf was atomized by a sneeze by Rolf Ibscher. This leaves a total of 24 leaves missing. Yet there are 32 leaves labeled P15996 (not counting plate 23, since it consists only of fragments, but recognizing that plate 30 contains 2 leaves). Up to eight leaves with this label may well belong to the Kephalaia, after p. 502, or to other codices. The leaf labeled "Kephalaia number 29," reassigned to P15998, might well belong there.

This may help to explain another instance, which, however, is less clear due to the fact that the earlier assignment is scraped off. This is a pair of leaves glassed together and labeled by hand "Kephalaia 15996 Nr. 30." This plate, like the one numbered 29, may originally have been assigned to the Letters.

When the inventory was begun in 1985, a stack of fifteen leaves (separate from the six leaves regularly listed as present) was found accompanied by a piece of paper with a note in the hand of Günter Poethke that read: "Wahrscheinlich zu P15998 gehörig (s. Vortrag von Böhlig in Moskau: 'Schweren Herzens'). 15 Platten. 26.7.72." ["Apparently belonging to P15998 (see the lecture of Böhlig in Moscow [that begins] 'With heavy heart . . .'). 15 glasses. July 16, 1972."] Poethke has explained the note as simply a pragmatic way to dispose administratively of the matter rather than as the result of new research on his part, which would account for the cautious term "apparently." The reference to Böhlig's paper of 1960/68 would no doubt have in view the passages cited above:

> . . . the conservation of a few half-conserved leaves that Ibscher Sr. had at first put to one side as too difficult, doubtlessly correctly, for it had to do usually with double or triple leaves . . .
>
> Of this book one finds in Berlin, put under glass already in the prewar period, 6 leaves with the temporary numbers 12, 13, 21, 23, 24, and 25, and about 22 leaves in half-conserved condition. The folders in which they lay were numbered, and supplement the numbers of the glassed leaves: 1–11, 14–20, 22. It is worth noting that the leaves 17–21 present an appreciably larger, quite differently arranged script, and that leaf 16 is perhaps uninscribed. Incidentally, the numeration of leaves needs to be corrected, for a leaf treated as an unseparated pair turns out to be triplets, and 2 leaves that were still unnumbered, with the note "Codex B from the volume of Letters of Mani," have to be given a place between 21 and 23.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Each plate in the stack of fifteen leaves is labeled P[15998], except for two plates labelled "Kephalaia o. Nr." "Kephalaia without number." This nomenclature recalls Böhlig's reference to "2 leaves that were still unnumbered, with the note 'Codex B from the volume of Letters of Mani.'" Since a folder was already numbered 22, there were no unoccupied digits between 21 and 23. This would account for the two leaves not having been numbered, pending a renumeration of all the leaves of P[15998], which apparently never took place. By some rather inexplicable transaction(s) they would, according to this conjecture, seem to have then been labeled Kephalaia rather than Letters, but nonetheless stored with the 13 leaves labeled P[15998], with the appended note to the effect that there were 15 leaves of P[15998]. One may suspect that originally the two plates labeled Kephalaia 29 and 30, if in fact they had been previously assigned to P[15998], may have been included in the stack of 15 plates of P[15998]. Once they had become (re)assigned to P[15996], they might have been replaced in the stack of 15 by those labeled "Kephalaia without number."

The ascription to the Letters of the six leaves (12, 13, 21, 23, 24, and 25) singled out by Böhlig as glassed by Hugo Ibscher, has never been questioned. Since what remains of the "about 22 leaves in half-conserved condition" is no longer in "folders" but has now been glassed, the distinction between the two groups can no longer be made in terms of what is glassed and what is in folders. But the 6 leaves always ascribed to the Letters can nonetheless be identified. When first seen on October 28–29, 1985, they were stacked separately. Böhlig's numbers largely confirmed this physical separation. Five bear the numbers 12, 21, 23, 24, 25, and the one lacking a label can be identified from the transcription of a few phrases of a leaf numbered 13 in Beltz's catalogue. These phrases do in fact occur, with but minor deviations from Beltz's transcription, on this leaf, which has hence been labeled in 1986 as number 13.

There is, however, a glass not stacked with the six that nonetheless is numbered 12, which thus repeats a number occurring on one of the 6 leaves that Hugo Ibscher conserved. The distinction of two stacks in which the two glasses numbered 12 lie is a weak criterion to distinguish which is among the 6 glassed by Hugo Ibscher, since the place where a glass is stacked can be so readily changed. But the 6 glasses stacked together measure 23 cm wide and 35.5 to 36.6 cm high, whereas the others assigned to P[15998] measure 25 by 35 cm. And whereas the others are framed in sticky reddish-brown tape, the 6 are framed in tan plastic tape that readily comes loose, exposing narrower white paper tape beneath. (The tan plastic tape was removed, and Gesa Schenke covered the underlying tape with Filmoplast P[90] on February 11, 1986.) Furthermore, those conserved by Hugo Ibscher have brown labels with the number prefaced by B (except for number 13 that had lost its label), and only one of the two leaves numbered 12 includes the letter B. For these reasons, the leaf labeled B 12 is clearly the leaf conserved by Hugo Ibscher.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Böhlig's report that he could not find on the 6 leaves the page superscriptions "The Second Letter to Sisinnios" and "The Third Letter to Sisinnios" that Schmidt and Polotsky quoted has been confirmed by a fresh examination of the leaves in Berlin. But these superscriptions were identified as among those in Warsaw (see above). Yet Böhlig did report finding a chapter titled, "The Seventh Letter to Ktesiphon on the pannychismoi (vigils)," which letter began: "Mani the apostle of Jesus Christ and Sisinnios and the believing elect who are with me . . ." This text, though less legible than this smooth translation suggests, is on leaf 24, the side with horizontal fibers. The title (set off from the text by horizontal lines above and below) is on extant lines 8–9, and the quotation from the opening of the text on the next two lines.

According to Böhlig, the group of about twenty-two leaves were in folders bearing the numbers 1–11, 14–20, and 22, a total of 19 numbers, 3 less than the total of about 22. Also when one adds the 6 leaves under glass and about 22 in half-conserved condition, one reaches a total of about 28 leaves, which, however, were conserved in glasses and folders numbered up only to 25, where again the discrepancy of 3 digits occurs. But this discrepancy could be explained in terms of Böhlig's observation that one folder contained 3 rather than the previously assumed 2 leaves, and that there were 2 unnumbered leaves labeled "Codex B from the volume of Letters of Mani" that belonged somewhere between 211 and 23.

Actually, the only glasses with numbers among the fifteen are the nine numbered 8–12, 14–16, and 18. All these numbers except number 12, which in Böhlig's list referred only to a leaf glassed by Hugo Ibscher and hence not to a folder, may be assumed to be the material from the folders with those numbers listed by Böhlig. The assumption is that one glass was by error given the number 12 when it was transferred from a folder that did not bear this number.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Number 10 has on its label, "Mani-Blatt gebleicht Nr 10" ["Mani leaf bleached No 10"]. The leaf is considerably lighter than the others, while the ink is dark. It is unclear why the bleaching technique, if successful, was discontinued. Perhaps concern for negative long-range effects was involved.

The numbers 1–7, 17, 19, 20, and 22 are all absent from the 15 glasses. This makes a total of 11 numbers, which would be over half of the 19 folders, or half of the original list of some 22 leaves. If one of these missing numbers may be assumed to be the glass inaccurately numbered 12, others of the missing material may be found among 4 glasses without numeration:

One unnumbered glass is labeled "Zwillingsblatt von No 8 abgelöst. Dr. I[bscher]." ["Twin leaf separated from Number 8. Dr. I[bscher]."] This label is in the same red ink as the notation on label 8 that reads "Zwillingsblatt zwischen Glas" ["Twin leaf between glass"]. The extant profile, when placed so that like fiber directions face each other, suggests they may indeed have been adjoining leaves.

One unnumbered glass is labeled (in English!) "Twins," no doubt reflecting Rolf Ibscher's (Germanic) English that he acquired in London, which is documented in his English letters. Its shape would suggest that it might have been part of Number 9, which still has part of a second leaf conserved with it. Especially the excess papyrus (covering the right edge of lines 5–10 of the side of the "Twins" that touches the horizontal fibers of leaf 9 when the contours are aligned) seems to correspond to a lacuna on leaf 9. The fact that leaf 9 is considerably smaller than the "twins" would indicate that as a single leaf, it was weaker, and when stuck would tend to lose papyrus to the stronger "twins." Thus we may have to do with what Böhlig described: "a leaf treated as an unseparated pair turns out to be triplets."

Since leaves 8 and 9 have similar profiles, one may conjecture that Hugo Ibscher separated two adjoining layers: one containing two leaves, the other three; and that Rolf Ibscher separated each layer again, producing a total of 4 plates with 5 leaves. On the assumption that like fiber directions faced each other, one could reconstruct the order as: "Twin leaf separated from number 8," with horizontal fibers facing up; followed by leaf 8, with vertical fibers facing up; followed by the twins, where horizontal fibers are visible on both sides, and hence the side facing up is determined by the extant profile; followed by leaf 9 with horizontal fibers facing up.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

One unnumbered glass lacks a label. It too contains two leaves, and hence may be assumed to fall within the category of half-conserved twins in P[15998]. Since faint traces of large letters seem to be visible, the pair could be the missing leaves 19–20 or the unnumbered two leaves belonging between 21 and 23. The extant profile is, however, so dissimilar as to make an identification difficult.

One unnumbered glass has a label that records: "Mittelteil ohne Schriftspüren, völlig zerstört, deshalb entfernt. Umbettung am 18. III. 1970." ["Middle part without traces of writing, completely destroyed, hence removed. Reconservation on 18 iii 70."] Günter Poethke has identified the handwriting as that of Rolf Ibscher's assistant, Otto Werner Luke (deceased).

Of the about 22 leaves put in folders by Hugo Ibscher and between glass by Rolf Ibscher, one may thus probably account for most of them:

- 8 folders numbered 8–11, 14–16, 18, may be presumed to be, the 8 leaves in 8 glasses with the same numbers.
- 1 leaf in a glass numbered 8 may be assumed to come from one of these folders also.
- 6 leaves are conserved in 4 unnumbered glasses, since in 2 of the 4 glasses there are 2 leaves each.

3 leaves currently labeled Kephalaia may have come from P[15998]:

1. 1 labeled as 29
2. 2 leaves in one glass container labeled as 30 (2 in 2 glass containers listed as without number are here assumed to belong to the Kephalaia.)

Böhlig conjectured that some of this codex was by mistake taken to London, on the erroneous assumption that the leaves belonged to Chester Beatty's Codex B, the Synaxeis:[4]

[p. 186] The question as to the situation regarding the last Chester Beatty codex, Codex B, is very problematic. In London there are 13 leaves, already glassed by Hugo	[p. 186] Sehr problematisch ist die Frage, was es mit dem letzten Chester-Beatty-Codex, dem Codex B, auf sich hat. In London liegen 13 Blätter, noch von Hugo

4. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 186–87.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Ibscher, unfortunately without any note as to content or titles that may have been read. Rolf Ibscher could only tell me that it has to do with an unusually large format. Thus far it has not been possible to take a look at these plates for myself. [Footnote 1: Unfortunately it is precisely their conservation that has not yet been completed; they still lie between paper and glass, so that one cannot read them without removing glass and paper. But Sir Chester Beatty has not permitted that, out of concern for the condition of the papyri.] However, with all due caution on the basis of minimal indications, I would nonetheless like to present an effort at a solution . . .

As has also been conjectured by C. Colpe, we will then indeed, in the case of the Göttingen manuscript, have to do with Codex B of the Chester Beatty collection. What then is the situation with the 13 leaves that are in London as Codex B? They ought to have been 13 leaves of the Göttingen manuscript that were the first separated and glassed by Hugo Ibscher. But if, as Rolf Ibscher recalls, they have an especially large format, that cannot be the case. I would hence like, with all due reservations, to conjecture that they were once brought to London by mistake. They are designated as Codex B. For it could perhaps be possible that Hugo Ibscher, who also designated the Berlin corpus of Letters as Codex B, once by mistake brought to London the plates, from the mass of the Ibscher verglast, leider ohne jede Notiz über Inhalt oder gelesene überschriften. Rolf Ibscher konnte mir nur mitteilen, dass es sich dabei um ein besonders grosses Format handelt. Eine eigene Ansicht dieser Platten war mir bisher nicht möglich. [Footnote 1: Gerade ihre Konservierung ist bedauerlicherweise noch nicht zu Ende geführt; sie liegen noch zwischen Papier und Glas, so dass man sie nicht lesen kann, ohne Glas und Papier zu entfernen. Das aber hat Sir Chester Beatty aus Sorge um den Zustand der Papyri nicht gestattet.] Ich möchte aber trotzdem aus minimalen Indizien in aller Vorsicht einen Lösungsversuch vortragen . . .

Wir werden es also in der Tat, wie auch von C. Colpe vermutet, bei der Göttinger Handschrift mit dem Codex B der Chester-Beatty-Sammlung zu tun haben. Was ist aber dann mit den 13 in London als Codex B befindlichen Blättern? Sie müssten 13 von Hugo Ibscher als erste abgehobene und verglaste Blätter der Göttinger Handschrift sein. Wenn sie aber, wie Rolf Ibscher sich erinnert, ein besonders grosses Format haben, so kann das nicht zutreffen. Ich möchte dann mit aller Zurückhaltung vermuten, dass sie einst versehentlich nach London gebracht wurden. Sie werden als Codex B bezeichnet. Es könnte ja vielleicht möglich sein, dass Hugo Ibscher, der auch das Briefcorpus von Berlin als Codex B bezeichnete, die Platten einmal versehentlich aus der Menge

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Mani manuscripts that were in the process of being worked on, but that they in reality belong to the corpus of Letters. For especially large format occurs only in the corpus of Letters. Besides, I was not able to find in Berlin the page superscriptions read by Schmidt on 4 glassed leaves of the corpus of Letters. But such reflections are actually idle—a glance at the London leaves should suffice to solve all these problematic questions with one blow.

der in Bearbeitung befindlichen Manihandschriften [p. 187] nach London gebracht hatte, sie aber in Wirklichkeit zum Briefcorpus gehören. Denn besonders grosses Format liegt nur beim Briefcorpus vor; ausserdem konnte ich ja die von Schmidt gelesenen Seitenüberschriften auf 4 verglasten Blättern des Briefcorpus in Berlin nicht finden. Aber solche überlegungen sind eigentlich müssig ein Blick auf die Londoner Blätter dürfte genügen, um alle diese problematischen Fragen mit einem Schlage zu lösen.

The simplest way to have identified the leaves now in Copenhagen with P[15998] would have been to identify on them the missing page superscriptions that Schmidt and Polotsky reported. But now that these missing materials would seem to have been located in Warsaw, other criteria would have to be used to identify leaves in Copenhagen as belonging to P[15998].

The 6 leaves that Hugo Ibscher conserved are labeled, in distinction to those that Rolf Ibscher glassed, with the letter B (but no codex number) preceding the number of the leaf. This may be a vestige of the designation of P[15998] as Berlin Codex B. Böhlig has reported:

The division according to capital letters A, B, etc. is in fact not the division of the Museums. It is a division that Hugo Ibscher used privately for himself. I have still seen with Rolf Ibscher file folders in which things were sorted according to such letters. It is not a claim by me that Hugo Ibscher proceeded this way also for the German parts, but here I repeat information from Rolf Ibscher from the year 196[4].

Die Einteilung nach grossen Buchstaben A, B usw. ist in der Tat nicht die Einteilung der Museen; das ist eine Einteilung, die Hugo Ibscher für sich privat benutzte. Ich habe bei Rolf Ibscher noch Verordner gesehen, in denen nach solchen Buchstaben sortiert war. Dass Hugo Ibscher das auch für die deutschen Teile so gemacht hat, ist nicht eine Behauptung von mir, sondern ich gab damit Informationen von Rolf Ibscher aus dem Jahr 196[4] wieder.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Yet this reference from the year 196[4] is precisely what is in need of clarification. For here Rolf Ibscher senses a problem that would not exist if he recognized B as the Ibscher designation for the Letters. The only other reference located thus far to the possibility that Hugo Ibscher designated as Codex B both the Berlin codex P[15998], the Letters, and Chester Beatty's Synaxeis is the confused statement of Rolf Ibscher to the effect that a sizable number of leaves separated last by his father (specified by Böhlig as "about 22") were in a paper cover; Ibscher's statement refers to them as "from Codex B" and "(Letters)." Rolf Ibscher's confusion here would seem to indicate that he was completely unaware of what Böhlig describes as his father's practice of designating the Berlin Codex P[15998], the Letters, as Codex B. For Rolf Ibscher's perplexity presupposes that the Berlin Letters were not designated Codex B. If he had known of such a practice, there would have been nothing confusing or contradictory in the two labels. Both would have affirmed that the leaves in question belong to the Berlin Codex B, P[15998], the Letters. Rolf Ibscher should not have hesitated to add these 22 leaves to the list of 6 leaves of the Letters still extant in Berlin, rather than leaving them unidentified.

Böhlig took Rolf Ibscher's reference to "an especially large format" of the 13 leaves as pointing to the Letters rather than to the Synaxeis. But this reasoning is unclear, since the format of the two codices is similar. The dimensions that Beltz gives for the extant leaves of P[15998], the Letters, is some 30 cm high by 17.5 cm wide. Leaf 18 actually measures 31.5 by 17.0, leaf 23 31.0 by 16.0, leaf 24 30.0 by 17.0, leaf 25 29.5 by 17.5 cm. This is considerably larger than the dimensions Beltz gives for P[15995], the Synaxeis, averaging 18–20 cm high by 11–16 cm wide. But here Beltz is basing his measurements no doubt on the 31 leaves in the Staatliche Museen of Berlin, which are approximately this size. But the book block in Berlin (West) measures 30 cm high (or even 31.8 cm when fringes of fiber are included) by 19 cm wide. Neither the Synaxeis nor the Letters is of unusually large format. P[15996]. The Kephalaia, measures according to Hugo Ibscher 31.5 cm high by 18 cm wide.[5] Hugo Ibscher also lists the measurements of Sir Chester Beatty's Homilies (= P[15999]) as 31.5 cm high by 18 cm wide.[6] Hugo Ibscher provides there the confusing observation:

5. Hugo Ibscher, in Polotsky and Böhlig, Kephalaia, xi.
6. Hugo Ibscher, in Polotsky, Manichäische Homilien, xiii.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

With the exception of the Psalms from the collection of Mr. Chester Beatty, which has a height of 27 cm and a breadth of 17.5 cm [measurements repeated by Ibscher in his introduction to the Psalms[7]], all the rest of the books are 31.5 cm high and 18 cm wide.	Mit Ausnahme des Psalmenbuches aus der Sammlung von Mr. Chester Beatty, das bei einer Höhe von 27 cm eine Breite von 17.5 cm besitzt [measurements repeated by Ibscher in his introduction to the Psalms[7]], sind alle übrigen Bücher 31.5 cm hoch and 18 cm breit.

For Hugo Ibscher seems, in this generalizing statement, to have overlooked P[15997], the Acts, which Beltz reports as averaging 22–25 cm high by 8–10 cm wide. Leaf IV measures 24.0 cm high by some 12.0 cm high. The leaf labeled P[15998] and 36, both changed to P[15997] and 32, is 24.9 cm high by 13.0 cm wide. It would seem that an "especially large format" would not dissociate the 13 leaves from the Synaxeis with which it had been initially associated, but only from the Psalms and the Acts, and would not associate it with any particular one of the other codices such as P[15998], the Letters. It would hence require other criteria to identify more precisely the 13 leaves.

The facsimile edition of 1986[7] presents the plates in natural size, reaching to a height only of 28.5 cm (plates 101/02, 111/12). The width reaches 17.5 cm once (plates 103/04), and, thanks to a fragment less than a centimeter in diameter at the end of a few apparently attached fibers, reaches 18.7 cm once (plates 115/16). The designation "especially large format" hence seems inappropriate, since the height lies between the smaller and larger codices, in fact nearer that of the smaller ones, and the width, which in any case varies only half a centimeter between large and small codices, in this case (with the one exception) only once reaches as much as the smaller dimension.

Tito Orlandi reported as follows on the material in Dublin in 1976:[8]

On another of the same shelves (to the right of the entrance) there are 16 numbered glasses that could represent the part of Codex B restored before the war by H.	Sur une autre des mêmes étagères (a droite de l'entrée), il y a 16 verres numérotés, qui pourraient representer la partie du Cod. B restaurée avant la guerre par H.

7. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, ix–x of the Introduction and the plates on pp. 101–26.

8. Orlandi, "Les manuscrits coptes de Dublin," 324–25.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Ibscher; the other part of Codex B, [p. 325] according to Böhlig, is in Germany (the codex of West Berlin, formerly at Göttingen). They are not of large format, according to what I could determine. This assures us that the fragments do not belong to the codex of Letters (= Berlin, Codex 3).

Ibscher; l'autre partie du Cod. B, [p. 325] selon Böhlig, se trouverait en Allemagne (codex de Berlin ouest, jadis a Goettingue). Its ne sont pas d'un grand format, d'après ce que j'ai pu constater: ce qui nous assure que les fragments n'appartiennent pas au codex des Lettres (= Berlin, Cod. 3).

Although Orlandi only states that these leaves are numbered, one may assume they are also labeled as Codex B, since Rolf Ibscher and, following him, Böhlig presuppose such an identification. The number of leaves that Rolf Ibscher had reported to Böhlig and that Böhlig had published was 13, not 16, as Orlandi reports. But Orlandi seems to have these 13 in view, in that he identifies the plates as Codex B, and in that he explicitly draws attention to the fact that the format is not large, as a correction of Rolf Ibscher's recollection that it was large. Orlandi takes this as evidence that the 16 leaves are not from the Letters, thus correcting the conjecture of Böhlig. Unfortunately, references to larger or smaller formats in this discussion are not accompanied by measurements, so that the base of comparison remains imprecise.

One must thus use all due caution with regard to Böhlig's conjecture that leaves of P[15998] are to be found in Copenhagen. Hence one should tentatively assume only that there survive of the codex of Mani's Letters: 6 leaves conserved by Hugo Ibscher, in the Staatliche Museen zu Berlin, 3 in the National Museum in Warsaw, and 15 leaves in 13 glass containers in Berlin listed in 1972 as belonging to this codex, 3 in two containers numbered 29 and 30 reassigned to the Kephalaia, and 1 reassigned to the Acts. This would make a total of 28 leaves or 56 pages that survive in whole or in part that are tentatively assigned to the Letters.

This codex has not been published.

In 1986 a facsimile edition was published[9] of the 13 leaves that Böhlig had discussed as perhaps belonging to this codex, though in Dublin. Giversen reports that those still in their original glass covers

9. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, ix–x of the Introduction and the plates on pages 101–26.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

bear the label "Codex B," which may have been the basis of the confusion. The pages had also been labeled 51–76, corresponding in the facsimile edition to pages 101–26, in such a way that facing pages have similar fiber directions. A division into two quires, each consisting of "four double leaves" is ascribed to Hugo Ibscher (with the first leaf of the first quire and the last two leaves of the second quire missing). The problem of the identity of the codex is stated, but no solution is indicated:

> The identity of this codex—or poor remnants of a codex—has been widely discussed, for example in the article by A. Böhlig cited above and in a series of other articles, as has the identity of the Mani codex in West Berlin, once called the Schondorf[f] papyrus.
>
> Since this edition should not pre-empt the results of a later critical edition, it has been decided to publish the pages in question in order to promote the work of identifying the papyrus with as little delay as possible. I have therefore refrained from offering any solution, preferring instead to provide some facts which together with the facsimiles should assist in this task.
>
> Not only are the glasses inscribed Codex B, but the frames also are marked "Kephalaia. Codex B." These labels are clearly in Hugo Ibscher's handwriting. The text in most cases is readable, although not easily.
>
> A precise description of the character and content of the text must wait until a critical edition can provide the text in full.

The labeling by Hugo Ibscher as Kephalaia would seem to suggest a still further identification than previously envisaged, either with the first volume of Kephalaia in Berlin (P[15996]) or with the second volume of Kephalaia in Dublin, Codex C, published as Volume I of the facsimile edition.[10] But Giversen does not enter further into the problem of the identification of the material, but contents himself with observing that "important subjects are clearly dealt with" and transcribing a few words.

Photographs of both sides of leaf 13 are on file at the Papyrus-Sammlung of Berlin. One copy of each side was donated to the Manichaean Archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity.

10. Giversen, Kephalaia.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:18 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 13 —

P[15999]: Homilies (Berlin Part)

Schmidt and Polotsky reported as follows:[1]

The papyrus book most recently added to the corpus of Berlin Manichaica could not yet be subjected to any further investigation. This much seems however to be certain, that it contains a collection of so-called λόγοι of different authors. The names of authors from the circle of disciples of Mani crop up on the upper margins, such as Koustaios, Salmaios.	Das jüngst zum Corpus der Berliner Manichaica gekommene Papyrusbuch konnte noch keiner weiteren Untersuchung unterzogen werden. So viel scheint aber festzustehen, dass es eine Sammlung von sogenannten λόγοι verschiedener Autoren enthält. Es tauchen auf den oberen Rändern die Autorennamen aus dem Kreise der Jüngerschaft des Mani auf, wie Koustaios, Salmaios.

Wilhelm Schubart recorded in the Inventarbuch of the Ägyptisches Museum of Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR in black ink to P[15999]: "Koptischer Papyruskodex. Erworben durch Herrn Prof. Carl Schmidt, in Cairo 1932. Geschenk des Herrn Dr. W. Kohlhammer." ["Coptic Papyrus Codex. Acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt in Cairo 1932. Gift of Dr. W. Kohlhammer."] A further note added in pencil reports under the "Standort" ["location"]: "ausgestellt" ["displayed"]. A similar hand in pencil reads "Mani." A purple carbon note reads "z. Zt. in Mo[skau]" ["at present in Mo[scow]"].

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:21 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Rolf Ibscher has reported that Kohlhammer paid 5,000 Marks for this part of a codex.[2]

Böhlig reported in 1960/68[3]:

4. P15999, not yet made accessible, is also lost. Whether this loss is so great can be doubted. For the condition of the manuscript was so desolate that among the collaborators of the papyrus collection it was generally designated as the "wig." Schmidt could determine on the basis of the captions at the top of the pages that it must have had to do with logoi of disciples of Mani.	4. Die noch nicht erschlossene Handschrift P15999 ist ebenfalls verlorengegangen. Ob dieser Verlust so schwer ist, kann man bezweifeln. Denn der Zustand der Handschrift war so desolat, dass sie unter den Mitarbeitern der Papyrussammlung allgemein als die "Perücke" bezeichnet wurde. Schmidt konnte nach Seitenüberschriften feststellen, dass es sich dabei um logoi von Jüngern Manis handeln musste.

Beltz's catalogue omits P15999, since none of it in Berlin in 1978.

This part of a codex in Berlin has not been published. But in fact it is part of the Homilies codex that is among Sir Chester Beatty's codices, which has been published (see below). Michel Tardieu[4] incorrectly refers to the Dublin Homilies as: "Codex complète de 48 feuillets conservé à Dublin (codex D)." ["Complete codex of 48 leaves conserved at Dublin (Codex D)."] He makes no reference to P15999.

2. Rolf Ibscher, in a letter of August 29, 1957, to Carsten Colpe.
3. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 184.
4. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:21 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 14 —

The Wooden Covers

From the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library the story of the acquisition that Schmidt and Polotsky reported has been augmented (above) with the information that on March 23, 1930, Beatty purchased from Maurice Nahman two bindings at £40 each, on the condition that if the British Museum decided they were later than the sixth century, they could be returned. This was the same acquisition that included two Coptic manuscripts on approval, which turned out to be part of the Psalms, which Beatty acquired, and part of the Homilies, which Beatty did not acquire, but which Schmidt did in 1932 (P^{15999}). But the two covers were paid for on March 23, 1930—there is a dated signed receipt from Nahman in the Archives. Yet a small ring binder that seems to have served in the early years as a kind of accessions book for Beatty's library records for July 30, when Nahman visited London to settle accounts with Beatty: "Sent by Nahman, belonging to him. Papyrus, with 1 cover. Safe B. (Ibscher 1930)." The reference to "Ibscher 1930" suggests this was with the Second Part of the Psalms taken in 1930 to Berlin. This suggests that one cover was associated with the manuscript on which Beatty had an option, what was to become P^{15999}, perhaps because the manuscript lay on the cover. A note in another hand reads: "Given to Dr. Ibscher for Nahman." This apparently refers to Beatty's releasing in 1932 his option for the part of the Homilies that he had on approval since 1930 and, on instructions from Nahman dated March 15, 1932, turning it over to Sir Alan Gardiner on May 10, 1932 for Ibscher to take to Berlin to be acquired there (P^{15999}). These notes would seem to indicate that one cover went with the manuscript to Berlin. Since Beatty had already paid for the cover,

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

it would presumably have been an oversight on his or his staff's part to include it in what was sent of Berlin to be purchased from Nahman.

In April 1931 Beatty again acquired two manuscripts, one listed in the ring binder as "Manichaean Hymns," that is to say, the first part of the Psalms codex, and the other as "Manichaean Ritual Laws," which is an early designation for what in fact was the other part of the Homilies codex, the part published by Polotsky. In the same record were listed "3 wooden covers."

Whereas the two covers acquired in 1930 have not been located at the Chester Beatty Library (or at the Egyptian Museum in Berlin), there is at the Chester Beatty Library a large paper envelope with a handwritten note on it stating "purchased Spring 1931," containing three wooden boards, two complete, one only partially so, each apparently a front or back cover of a codex.

Schmidt and Polotsky had reported about the wooden covers of the Manichaean codices as follows (see above):[1]

> In the process, a papyrus book [P^{15997}, Acts] emerged that lay in the original condition as when found, between two bare wooden covers, since one had risked no further handling . . .
>
> My man of confidence must have had the whole discovery before his eyes, for, according to a passing comment that he just now made to me on my visit in March 1932, the papyrus books, each surrounded by bare covers in wood, lay in a wooden box that was found in what had been a dwelling house.

In his more popular presentation of 1933, Schmidt had written: "The box contained a series of papyrus books, each surrounded by rough wooden covers."[2]

There was even a published photograph of the edges of two such boards. For Schmidt and Polotsky had reported concerning P^{15997}, the Acts:[3]

> Very briefly I can turn to the third papyrus book, which when acquired lay in the original condition between two wooden covers as remains of the binding. It too belongs to the Berlin holdings. A concept of the desolate condition of the preservation is given in the accompanying photograph . . .

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 7, 9.
2. Schmidt, Neue Originalquellen des Manichäismus aus Aegypten, 4.
3. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 27.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Wolfgang Müller listed three Coptic book bindings as still extant in 1964/65.[4] But Günter Poethke confirmed on September 31, 1986, that no Manichaean covers are included among them. There are also no references to Manichaean covers in the Inventarbuch (at least not at P15995–15999) or in the reports by Böhlig and Beltz, though they may be tacitly included in references to P15997 and P15999. Thus the two wooden covers to P15997 that apparently came from Egypt to Berlin and the cover of P15999 that apparently came to Berlin via London must be assumed to be lost.

In the case of P15996, the Berlin Kephalaia, by the time of the acquisition, the covers had apparently been ripped off of the book block, according to the report by Hugo Ibscher:[5]

> Of a binding nothing more could be discovered, since the covers had been undoubtedly removed with raw force, whereby along with the binding also at the same time any and every connection of the double leaves had been lost at the spine.
>
> Von einer Heftung war nichts mehr zu entdecken, weil die Einbände unzweifelhaft mit roher Gewalt entfernt worden sind, wobei mit der Heftung auch gleichzeitig sämtliche Zusammenhänge der Doppelblätter am Rücken verlorengegangen sind.

The existence of simple wooden boards, rather than ornate leather covers, initially posed a problem. For it had been assumed that the Manichaean codices were deluxe copies, for which ornate covers would be expected. In the initial report Hugo Ibscher had stated:[6]

> It stands beyond question that such elegantly furnished books must have also possessed valuable covers. The wooden covers without any decoration that lay along with the discoveries can never be looked upon as remainders of covers, at least not of our Mani books. It is possible that these extant wooden covers were once covered with leather. But one finds
>
> Dass derart vornehm ausgestattete Bücher auch kostbare Einbände besessen haben müssen, steht ausser jedem Zweifel. Niemals können die bei den Funden gelegenen Holzdeckel ohne jedwede Verzierung als Einbandreste angesprochen werden, wenigstens nicht für unsere Mani-Bücher. Möglich ist es, dass diese vorhandenen

4. Müller, "Die koptischen Handschriften," 66.
5. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," in Kephalaia: 1. Hälfte (Lieferung 1–10), xi.
6. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschriften," 85.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

no trace of such. But that they served the purpose of covers is proven by the extant holes and the furrows present on the long side, which was intended to receive the cord that binds the book block to the cover. It is after all well known that the Manichaeans decorated their books especially elegantly, which was on occasion turned into a reproach by their enemies. That the Copts were capable of producing precious covers is seen from the remains of covers that the Berlin Museum like the British Museum and Vienna's National Library possess. A rich collection of Coptic manuscripts with covers is also in the Pierpont Morgan Library. Even though all extant covers belong to the eighth to the tenth centuries A.D., one still does not need to doubt that 400 years earlier the Manichaeans were capable of producing even more expensive covers, which would mean for their divine works both protection and decoration. One may hope that the sand of Egypt will some day provide us attestation of this bookbinding art, of the greatest importance for the study of bookbinding.

Holzdeckel einmal mit Leder überzogen gewesen sind. Nur findet man hiervon keine Spur. Dass sie aber Einbandzwecken dienten, beweisen die vorhandenen Löcher und die längsseitig vorhandene Rille, die zur Aufnahme der Verschnürung des Buchblockes an den Deckel bestimmt war. Es ist ja bekannt, dass die Manichäer ihre Bücher besonders prunkvoll ausgestattet haben, was ihnen von ihren Feinden gelegentlich zum Vorwurf gemacht wurde. Dass die Kopten fähig waren, kostbare Einbände herzustellen, ersieht man aus den Einbandresten, die das Berliner Museum wie das British Museum und die Wiener Nationalbibliothek besitzen. Eine reiche Kollektion koptischer Manuskripte mit Einbänden birgt auch die Pierpont Morgan Library. Gehören alle vorhandenen Einbände auch dem 8. bis 10. Jahrhundert n. Chr. an, so braucht man nicht daran zu zweifeln, dass die Manichäer 400 Jahre früher in der Lage waren, noch kostbarere Einbände herzustellen, die für ihre göttlichen Werke Schutz und Zierde zugleich bedeuteten. Hoffentlich gibt uns der Boden Agyptens auch einmal Zeugen dieser Einbandkunst, die für die Einbandforschung von allergrösstem Werte wären.

In the introduction to Charles Allberry's edition of A Manichaean Psalm-Book Part II, Hugo Ibscher had conjectured:[7]

7. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," in A Manichaean Psalm-Book. Part II, xvii–xviii.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

No doubt there lay along side this one, as well as by a few other volumes of the find, raw wooden covers, and, as the dealers explained, the individual books had always lain between two such wooden covers. Here too it is regrettable that the expert could not be on hand as the treasure was dug out. In any case I doubt very much that in this condition the raw wooden covers could ever have been the cover for these valuable books. It is for me certain that the original covers have been removed by force from the book block. Whether this took place already in antiquity, or first after the discovery by the dealers, is left open. I personally assume that the destruction took place already in antiquity, perhaps by a later owner, who either used the valuable bindings for other works, or wanted to make money out of the precious stones and metals that had been used for the decoration of the holy books. Otherwise it cannot be explained that it is precisely at the spine of the books that the destruction appears so strongly. If the books had not been ripped out of the cover, the firm spine of the cover would have protected the book block at this place from harm [p. xviii], and the sewing would have been preserved for us. It is lucky for us that the scribe has left at the spine of the book about 2 cm of free space, otherwise much more line beginnings would have been lost by the brutal ripping out of the book block from the cover. On

Es lagen wohl bei diesem, wie auch bei einigen anderen Bänden des Fundes rohe Holzdeckel dabei, und wie die Händler erklärten, hätten die einzelnen Bücher immer zwischen zwei solchen Holzdeckeln gelegen. Es ist auch hier wieder zu bedauern, dass der Fachmann nicht zur Stelle sein konnte, als der Schatz gehoben wurde. Jedenfalls be-zweifele ich sehr, dass die rohen Holzdeckel in diesem Zustande jemals den Einband für diese kostbaren Bücher abgegeben haben. Fest steht für mich, dass die ursprünglichen Einbände mit Gewalt vom Buchblock entfernt worden sind. Ob dies schon im Altertum oder erst nach der Auffindung durch die Händler geschehen ist, sei dahingestellt. Ich persönlich nehme an, dass die Zerstörung bereits im Altertum, vielleicht durch einen späteren Besitzer erfolgte, der die kostbaren Einbände entweder für andere Werke verwendete, oder aber die zur Ausschmückung der heiligen Bücher verwendeten Edelsteine und Edelmetalle zu Geld machen wollte. Anders ist es nicht zu erklären, dass gerade am Rücken der Bücher die Zerstörung so stark in die Erscheinung getreten ist. Wären die Bücher nicht aus dem Einband gerissen worden, so hätte gerade der feste Rücken des Einbandes den Buchblock an dieser Stelle vor Scha- [p. xviii] den bewahrt, und die Heftung wäre uns erhalten geblieben. Ein Glück für uns, dass der Schreiber am Rücken des Buches etwa 2 cm freien Raum gelassen hat, sonst wären noch weit mehr Zeilenanfänge durch das brutale Herausreissen des Buchblockes aus dem Einband verlorengegangen. Auf der beigefügten the appended picture one can still clearly recognize the violent destruction on the spine of the book.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

If the covers really were of wood, and the dimensions of the two covers found with the Psalms book justify this conjecture, then Greek binding artists must have been at work, who already in very early times knew of the use of wood for covers. All early Coptic covers that have cropped up in Egypt—from the 6th to the 8th centuries A.D.—consistently present covers that have been constructed from the remains of the papyrus stalk, or in which the covers were pasted together from old cartonnage. It would have been very nice to come to know here for once old covers from the beginning of the 4th century A.D., which would have advanced considerably our knowledge in the area of research into book binding, since the earliest covers come from the 6th century A.D.

Abbildung kann man die gewaltmässige Zerstörung am Buchrücken noch gut erkennen.

Sollten die Einbanddeckel wirklich aus Holz bestanden haben, und die Grösse der beiden mit dem Psalmenbuch gefundenen Decked rechtfertigen diese Vermutung, dann müssen hier griechische Einbandkünstler am Werke gewesen sein, die die Verwendung von Holz zu Einbanddeckeln schon in sehr früher Zeit kannten. Sämtliche bisher in Ägypten aufgetauchten frühen koptischen Einbände—aus dem 6. bis 8. Jahrhundert n. Chr.—zeigen durchweg Deckel, die aus Abfällen von der Papyrusstaude hergestellt sind, oder bei denen die Deckel aus alter Makulatur zusammengeklebt wurden. Es wäre erfreulich gewesen, hier einmal alte Einbände aus dem Ausgang des 4. Jahrh. n. Chr. kennenzulernen, die unsere Kenntnis auf dem Gebiete der Einbandforschung ungemein gefördert hätte[n], da die frühesten Einbände aus dem 6. Jahrh. n. Chr. stammen.

In 1938 Charles Allberry was no doubt following Ibscher in conjecturing the bindings were ripped out in antiquity:[8]

> When the dealers divided each book up they had to tear the parts asunder. The books seem to have been ripped out of their bindings in antiquity and in consequence one margin has disappeared, so that on alternate pages for the most part the beginning and the end of the lines are more often than not destroyed.

Hugo Ibscher reported further about the luxurious covers of Manichaean codices in 1940:[9]

8. Allberry, "Manichaean Studies," 341.
9. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," in Kephalaia: 1. Hälfte (Lieferung 1–10), vii–viii.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The fact that the Mani manuscripts have come down to us in codex form does not mean in and of itself anything new, but is actually quite a matter of course. For also the manuscripts of the Manichaean primitive community that may have served as a Vorlage for the Coptic scribes usually already had this book form. Although [p. viii] according to the discoveries in Dura, in the region of the Euphrates, papyrus writing material was not unknown, in contrast to the Mani manuscripts from Egypt the writing material used for the manuscripts of the primitive community will have been parchment. This is clearly and unambiguously shown from the many reports of the Arabic writings, according to which, in burning the Mani writings in the time of persecution, "precious stones fell out and gold flowed out." Both were materials that were used only to decorate codex covers, but never for the protective coverings for papyrus rolls. Just so Augustine also as a fanatical opponent of the Manichaeans called on his followers in his polemical writings, "burn all those parchment manuscripts and those expensive leather covers."

Dass die Manihandschriften in Kodexform auf uns gekommen sind, bedeutet an und für sich nichts Neues, sondern ist eigentlich ganz selbstverständlich. Denn auch die Handschriften der Manichäischen Urgemeinde, die den koptischen Schreibern als Vorlage gedient haben mögen, trugen sicher schon diese Buchform. Obgleich [p. viii] nach den Funden in Dura im Euphratgebiet der Papyrus-Beschreibstoff nicht unbekannt gewesen ist, wird aber im Gegensatz zu den Manihandschriften aus Agypten der für die Handschriften der Urgemeinde verwendete Beschreibstoff Pergament gewesen sein. Dies geht klar und eindeutig aus den vielen Berichten der arabischen Schriftsteller hervor, wonach bei der Verbrennung der Manischriften in der Verfolgungszeit "Edelsteine herausfielen und Gold herausfloss." Beides Materialien, die nur zur Ausschmückung der Kodexeinbände Verwendung fanden, niemals aber bei den Schutzhüllen für die Papyrusrollen. Ebenso forderte auch Augustin als fanatischer Gegner der Manichäer in seinen Streitschriften seine Anhänger auf, "verbrennt alle jene Pergament-Handschriften und jene kostbaren Ledereinbände."

Such assumptions about luxurious Manichaean covers do not provide a solid basis for putting in question that these simple boards were in fact the original covers of these Manichaean codices. There are no grounds for further speculation implying something like a rebinding in antiquity, which of course could take place (P. Bodmer XIV–XV), but should not be conjectured merely as an inference from secondary literature.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

To judge by the similar position of the holes in two of the three Dublin boards and their similar overall dimensions and irregularities, these two belonged to the same codex. The two covers measure 34 cm high by 19.4 (at the top) to 19.8 cm (at the bottom) wide. The third board, presumably from a different codex, is incomplete, having a vertical break resulting in dimensions of 32.7 to 33.0 cm high by 12.5 to 14.4 cm wide. If one may calculate that the relative dimensions of the two codices would have been about the same, one may assume that the original width of the broken board would have been only slightly less than that of the other two boards, indicating an original size for it of about 33 by 19 cm.

These dimensions of the covers are slightly larger than the dimensions of any of the leaves, which reach to about 31.5 cm in height (P^{15996}, Volume 1 of the Kephalaia; P^{15998}, the Letters; the Synaxeis book block, Codex B; and the Dublin part of the Homilies, Codex D), with widths reaching 19 cm for the book block of the Synaxeis. But if one may assume that the covers would normally be slightly larger than the leaves, the measurements of the covers could correspond to any of these four codices. P^{15997}, the Acts, that Beltz reported to average 22–25 by 13.0 cm wide, was still between its wooden covers when Schmidt acquired it, and so does not come in question. The Psalms, Codex A, 27 by 17.5 cm, was also sufficiently smaller that one might doubt that the extant covers belonged to it, even though apparently acquired in the same transaction as that involving the front part of the Psalms. To be sure, Ibscher used "the size of the two covers found with the Psalms book" to justify the conjecture that the codices actually had wooden covers. But these covers would not seem to be the covers of the Psalms codex, but rather of the Homilies, parts of which were sold in each of the transactions (1930 and 1931) involving parts of the Psalms codex, or even to another of the Manichaean codices, given the jumbling of the material in the hands of middlemen, and the fact that both Schmidt and Beatty bought from Nahman.

The two completely extant boards at the Chester Beatty Library do have vestiges of leather on each side, with traces of tooling marks of circles and lines on the outside surfaces. There are a series of holes through the boards at positions near three edges of the boards, positioned on the two boards so that they correspond to each other. Two pegs are still in a hole each on one board, and one peg in a hole on the other, all three on the head and foot sides of the covers. These holes are no doubt near enough the lips of the covers that pegs or thongs could have passed through both covers to hold the codex closed without having to pass through the quires themselves. On the long side without holes, an indention some 2 cm wide and .5 cm deep has been chiseled out for the length of this side. This indention may have been intended to be covered with a leather band functioning as the flexible spine, to hold the two covers together. As to the four corners of each board, those at the end of the long chiseled edge are pointed; whereas those at the end of the long side with holes are rounded.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Since no covers are extant in Berlin, further information about the Manichaean covers is apparently limited to the three boards at the Chester Beatty Library. Unfortunately, the several publications by Berthe van Regemorter on the book bindings of the Chester Beatty Library do not seem to have made reference to such unpretentious boards.[10] Yet they are so dissimilar from the covers of the Nag Hammadi Codices and of the Disnha (Bodmer) Codices (though rather near in time and space), that a detailed analysis might result in the kind of new insight into the history of bookbinding that Ibscher had envisaged, in his appeal to the Greek tradition to explain them.

10. Van Regemorter, "Le Codex relié depuis son origine jusqu'au Haut Moyen-Age," 1–26; Van Regemorter, Some Early Bindings from Egypt in the Chester Beatty Library; Van Regemorter, Some Oriental Bindings in the Chester Beatty Library.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:32:11 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 15 —

Codex A: Psalms

Schmidt and Polotsky list in first place among Sir Chester Beatty's holdings the Psalms:[1]

One has to do in the London collection with a large papyrus book. The individual psalms were numbered. The highest number that has been read thus far is 230. If we could assume for the individual psalms an average length of (at least) 2 pages, this would require an extent of 460 pages = 230 leaves. Hence one does not go wrong in calculating that the whole book, as in the case of the Kephalaia, consisted of over 250 leaves. Unfortunately the individual leaves are not paginated, and there are no running heads on the upper margins. The individual psalms are simply distinguished by the numbers. Thus far about 50 of the extant leaves have been brought under glass, so that our knowledge of the content is still quite limited.

Es handelt sich in der Londoner Sammlung um ein umfangreiches Papyrusbuch. Die einzelnen Psalmen waren numeriert. Die höchste Zahl, die bis jetzt gelesen wurde, ist 230. Würden wir für die einzelnen Psalmen eine durchschnittliche Länge von (mindestens) 2 Seiten annehmen, würde dies einen Umfang von 460 Seiten = 230 Blättern erfordern. Deshalb geht man nicht fehl, das ganze Buch wie bei den Kephalaia auf über 250 Blätter zu berechnen. Leider sind die einzelnen Blätter nicht paginiert and finden sich keine Titelüberschriften auf den oberen Rändern; die einzelnen Psalmen sind einfach nur durch die Nummern unterschieden. Von den vorhandenen Blättern sind bisher nur etwa 50 unter Glas gebracht, so dass unsere Kenntnis des Inhalts noch beschränkt ist.

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30, 34. The quotation is from 34.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:27 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

C. R. C. Allberry published in 1938 the last half of the Psalms, which had been purchased and hence conserved first.[2] In the Preface he reported:

> What is presented here, in the same format as the Homilies and the Kephalaia, is the Psalm-book (see Mani-Fund, pp. 33ff. [actually 30–34]), or rather the second part of the Psalm-book: for before it appeared in the Cairo market the codex had already been split up into several blocks, and on the largest and least mutilated of these, together with a smaller block preceding it, the two forming approximately one half of the codex, Dr. Hugo Ibscher, the Papyruskonservator in the Berlin Egyptian Museum, began his work of reconstruction, and succeeded between 1931 and 1934 in separating and glassing about one hundred and twenty consecutive leaves. These are published here with an English version and a minimum of annotation.

In the Crum Archives of the Griffith Institute in the Ashmolean Museum in Oxford, there is a file of transcriptions (sometimes with translations and/or notes) by H. J. Polotsky. (Its classification in terms of published, inventory numbers II.28.1 ff. on the back of each leaf, and unpublished, II.30.1 ff., is inexact.) Some are pages published by Allberry, but others are unpublished:

- II.30.1 (= II.28.138, with Polotsky's English translation at II.28.142), with the Psalm numeration 213 and the comment that it precedes page 1 of Allberry, i.e., that it is from the unpublished first part of the Psalms (Allberry's volume began with the last 3 lines of Psalm 218)
- II.30.2 (= II.28.140)
- II.30.3 (= II.28.140)
- II.30.4 (= II.28.136)
- II.30.5 (= II.28.139)
- II.30.6 (= II.28.137), with II.30.7 representing a second transcription and a second hand (Allberry?) and
- II.30.10

Unpublished transcriptions or translations of the Chester Beatty holdings have not been located in the Chester Beatty Archives.

2. Allberry, A Manichaean Psalm-Book, Part II.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:27 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Torgny Säve-Söderbergh soon published an important comparison of the Psalms with Mandaean hymnody.[3]

Böhlig presented this first codex of Sir Chester Beatty as follows[4]:

1. The Psalms (Codex A) was edited in 1938 in its second part (115 [read: 117] leaves) by C. R. C. Allberry. It contains various types and collections of psalms and became the most noted work of the Manichaean discovery, especially since religious feeling came here more strongly to expression and addressed one's own religious feeling more than was the case in the rationalistic style of the Kephalaia. The remaining leaves, a total of 56, were conserved by Rolf Ibscher after the war. They have been awaiting editing for years.

1. Das Psalmbuch (Codex A) wurde in seinem 2. Teil (115 [read: 117] Blätter) von C. R. C. Allberry 1938 ediert. Es enthält verschiedene Typen und Sammlungen von Psalmen und wurde zum beachtesten Werk des manichäischen Fundes, insbesondere weil das religiöse Gefühl hier stärker zum Ausdruck kam und angesprochen wurde als durch den logizistischen Stil der Kephalaia. Die restlichen insgesamt 56 Blätter wurden von Rolf Ibscher nach dem Kriege konserviert. Sie harren seit Jahren der Edition.

Since none of this codex is in Berlin, it is not included in Beltz's catalogue. However, Tito Orlandi published a report on Coptic manuscripts in the Chester Beatty Library in 1976, where he reported:[5]

3. Säve-Söderbergh, Studies in the Coptic Manichaean Psalm-Book.

4. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 185. The typescript of the 1960 address that is in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library has been corrected by hand to read 117 rather than 115 leaves, though the text of Böhlig's address published in 1968 was not so corrected. There are in fact 234 Coptic pages that Allberry published, which would support the correction to 117 leaves. Böhlig's comment about the greater popularity of the Psalms is a reflection of Torgny Säve-Söderbergh, Studies in the Coptic Manichaean Psalm-Book, especially p. 1:

> Whereas the Kephalaia, edited by Schmidt, Polotsky and Böhlig, consist chiefly of a rather dry and dull systematization of the Manichaean dogma and the Homilies, edited by Polotsky, are unfortunately very fragmentary, the rather well preserved Psalm Book not only have an interesting content, but are also composed in a most charming poetical form.

5. Orlandi, "Les manuscrits coptes de Dublin, du British Museum et de Vienne," 324.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:27 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

During our visit we were able to verify that the already-edited manuscripts have been carefully separated from the fragments that are still unedited. They are also readily recognizable, leaf by leaf, by comparing them with the editions that one has. In effect we have noted that the part of Codex A edited by Mr. Allberry (Psalms Part II) is perfectly conserved in 9 little wooden boxes, in which the glasses containing the leaves are arranged in vertical position . . .

Let us now come to the unpublished materials. The first part of Codex A (Psalms), which had been conserved soon after the war, and which, according to Böhlig, included 56 glasses, consists in fact of 106 glasses (of which some conserve two fragments), arranged in their turn in 9 little boxes equal to those of the second part. On the shelves to the right of the entrance (where the unpublished leaves restored after the war by R. Ibscher are put) there are also 49 glasses numbered in relation to the recto and verso of the fragments (each glass hence has two numbers). They bear no identification. But, given the characteristics of some titles, of the hand and of the format, they must comprise a third part of the Psalms, [a part] whose existence seems unknown up to the present.

Pendant notre visite, nous avons pu verifier que les manuscrits déjà édités ont été soigneusement separés des fragments encore inédits; ils sont aussi aisément reconnaissables, feuillet par feuillet, en comparaison avec les éditions que l'on possède. En effet, nous avons constaté que la partie du Cod. A éditée par M. Allberry (Psaumes, IIe partie) est parfaitement conservée dans 9 petites caisses en bois, dans lesquelles les verres contenant les feuillets sont ranges en position verticale . . .

Venons-en maintenant aux inédits. La I^{e} partie du Cod. A (Psaumes), qui avait été restaurée peu après la guerre, et qui selon Böhlig comprenait 56 verres, se compose en fait de 106 verres (dont certains conservent deux fragments), rangés a leur tour dans 9 petites caisses, égales a celles de la IIe partie. Sur les étagères a droite de l'entrée (ou sont placés les feuillets inédits restaurés après la guerre par R. Ibscher) ii y a en outre 49 verres, qui sont numerotés par rapport au recto et verso des fragments (chaque verre a donc deux numéros); ils ne portent aucune indication; mais, étant donné les caractéristiques de certains titres, de l'écriture et du format, ils devraient former une IIIe partie des Psaumes, dont l'existence parait jusqu'a maintenant inconnue.

Thus one would be led to infer that there are 155 glasses containing unpublished leaves or fragments of Codex A.

The typed page in the Chester Beatty Library titled "Manichean Papyri on Loan to Royal Library, Copenhagen," dated January 13,

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:27 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

1984, lists under "Psalm Book" 9 boxes containing a total of 106 glasses, which is presumably the material that Orlandi listed as labeled as belonging to the Psalms but unpublished. The list of material taken to Copenhagen then itemizes folios numbered 219–308, 369–78, a total of 50 glasses; numbers 387–404, 9 glasses, marked as fragments; leaves numbered 51–76, a total of 13 glasses, marked as Codex B; and 6 glasses marked fragments and numbered x1–x12. The 13 glasses marked Codex B can safely be identified with plates 101–26 of the second volume of the facsimile edition.[6]

Søren Giversen explained in a telephone conversation of September 4, 1985, that the material taken to Copenhagen included the 13 unidentified leaves that Böhlig had conjectured might belong to the Berlin Letters, P[15998] (that in fact probably belong to the Synaxeis), as well as leaves that, according to the Dublin records, were not listed as from the Psalms but which, since Giversen detected in them psalms, might belong to the Psalms. This would lead one to conclude that the 50 unidentified leaves taken to Copenhagen include the 49 unidentified leaves that Orlandi ascribed to the Psalms. The remaining unidentified leaf in Copenhagen may be that of P[15997].

Søren Giversen published in 1986 an English translation of parts of two Psalms from Part One of the Psalms. He introduced the first with the comment: "From notes and decipherment from 1931, I can see, that something has gone [sic] lost since then, especially at the beginning of lines 30–33."[7] One must infer that this is an allusion to a transcription and/or translation and notes by H. J. Polotsky, such as he provided in 1931–1932 to Sir Herbert Thompson to translate into English and supply to Beatty, though Polotsky's Coptic transcription, translation, and/or notes have not yet been located in the Crum or Chester Beatty Archives. It is unclear why such a use of Polotsky's scholarship would not be clearly stated.

The other Psalm that Giversen translates is numbered 119 and entitled "Psalms on the Lord's Day."[8] From the work of Polotsky (recognizable by his abbreviated signature in the bottom right-hand corners: "P-y") preserved in the Griffith Institute, there is a page in his handwriting that he numbered "C.B.i, 'II'a" (Crum Mss II.30.2)

6. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, ix–x, 101–26

7. Giversen, "The Unedited Chester Beatty Mani Texts," 376.

8. Ibid., 378–79.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:27 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

with the title 'CALMOI THS KYRIAK' and the numeral RIQ, followed by 8 lines of text. Polotsky also provided a typed German translation (Crum Mss II.28.85 = Crum Mss II.28.7). Giversen, after quoting the title and numeral, presents, as "a," 8 lines of text in English translation corresponding to Polotsky's 8 lines, followed by "b," introduced with the comment "plus or minus 7 lines almost illegible" and then an English translation of lines 8–33. These lines correspond to those on the page that Polotsky numbered "C.B. i, 'II' b" (Crum Mss II.30.3 in Coptic transcription and Crum Mss 11.28.86 and Crum Mss II.28.8 in German translation). Since Giversen refers in the case of the first Psalm that he translates to the "notes and decipherment from 1931," it is hard to avoid the conclusion that the other English translation of a Psalm that he presents is also based at least in part on Polotsky's transcription and German translation. But it is very difficult to understand why, in that case, appropriate acknowledgement to Polotsky is not given: all the more so when one recalls that due to racist legislation in the Third Reich, the first volume of the Kephalaia could not carry Polotsky's name, so that the co-editor Böhlig left off his own name as well, and explained the lamentable situation after World War II, when the publication of the first double-fascicle of the second volume appeared. One would think that with such a background, one would be scrupulous to give Polotsky due credit for his excellent work. Only when the facsimile edition of the Psalms appears will it be possible to see to what extent the papyrus itself is still as legible as it was in Polotsky's day, and to what extent we all, including Giversen, are dependent on Polotsky for rescuing text subsequently lost, as Giversen indirectly concedes in the case of the first Psalm that he translates.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:27 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 16 —

Codex B: Synaxeis

Schmidt and Polotsky reported as follows: A third papyrus book, that surely had a size of 250 leaves, seems to belong together with the Living Gospel of Mani. Also a bundle from this papyrus, to the extent of 31 leaves, was brought under glass by Dr. Ibscher. Already there has been a brief report about the titles that were read (see above, P[15995]). The book would be of great importance for Mani research, if some kind of commentary to the Gospel of Mani would be hidden there.[1]

Thus Codex B of Sir Chester Beatty is identified as the bulk of the codex of which 31 leaves are in Berlin. For Schmidt and Polotsky had reported (see above) that these 31 leaves "were acquired in the Fayyum and without doubt belong to the London Mani pieces." For in the description of their acquisition, it was stated that "the antiquities dealer in the Fayyum had sold his manuscripts exclusively to Mr. Chester Beatty." The 31 leaves are an exception, for "one had removed the top and bottom layers of papyrus, which had suffered to an especial extent against the covers of the binding . . . , to give the whole a better appearance." In the spring of 1931, after Sir Chester Beatty had acquired the three codices of the Fayyum dealer, Schmidt "found such outwardly unimpressive remains, which doubtlessly belong to the papyrus books acquired by Mr. Chester Beatty in the Fayyum, and . . . acquired them for a cheap sum, since the dealer already had his great reward in his pocket." Thus only the 31 leaves from the Synaxeis that Schmidt acquired are inventoried in Berlin as P[15995], and the rest of the codex, to the extent extant, comprises Codex B of Sir Chester Beatty.

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 34. "Ein drittes Papyrusbuch, das sicherlich einen Umfang von 250 Blättern gehabt hat, scheint mit dem 'lebendigen Evangelium' des Mani zusammenzuhängen. Auch von diesem Papyrus ist ein Konvolut im Umfang von 31 Blättern von Dr. Ibscher unter Glas gebracht. Über die gelesenen Überschriften ist vorhin kurz berichtet [see above, P[15995]]. Das Buch wäre für die Mani-Forschung von grosser Wichtigkeit, wenn irgendeine Art von Kommentar zum 'Evangelium' des Mani sich dahinter verbergen würde."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Rolf Ibscher reported to Sir Chester Beatty that Codex B had by mistake been left in the anti-aircraft tower at the Zoo, rather than having been taken with Sir Chester Beatty's other codices to Schondorf, and that hence it had been taken to Leningrad along with the Berlin holdings. Rolf Ibscher maintained that the codex that was left in Schondorf when the others there were returned to Sir Chester Beatty was P[15998], the Letters, a codex belonging to Berlin. But once the scholarly study of the Schondorf codex was undertaken in Göttingen by Colpe and Böhlig, it became obvious that this codex was the Synaxeis Codex B, belonging to Sir Chester Beatty.

Böhlig presented in 1957 at the 24th International Orientalists' Congress in Munich a report to this effect:[2]

During the war, along with the codices belonging to Sir Chester Beatty, a Manuscript was stored outside into the territory that is now the Bundesrepublik. This text is at present in Göttingen for conservation. In 1957, while looking through the leaves that have thus far been separated (which are in an unusually bad condition), I thought I could reconstruct from individual words the same running head. [Footnote 3: For the possibility of being permitted to see the codex I am indebted to the friendliness of the Göttingen Egyptologist S. Schott, who was in charge of the undertaking. I also owe special thanks to C. Colpe and R. Ibscher, who occupied

Im Kriege wurde zusammen mit den Sir Chester Beatty gehörigen Codices eine Handschrift in das jetzige Gebiet der Bundesrepublik ausgelagert; dieser Text befindet sich gegenwärtig in Göttingen zur Konservierung. Bei einer Durchsicht der bisher abgehobenen Blätter, die sich in einem ausserordentlich schlechten Zustand befinden, im Jahre 1957 glaubte ich, aus einzelnen Wörtern die gleiche Überschrift rekonstruieren zu können. [Footnote 3: Die Möglichkeit, den Codex ansehen zu dürfen, verdanke ich der Freundlichkeit des Göttinger Agyptologen S. Schott, der das Unternehmen betreute. Besonderen Dank schulde ich auch C. Colpe und R. Ibscher, die sich um die Restaurierung und Abschrift be-

2. Böhlig, "Synaxis = Homilie," 485–86; "Zu den Synaxeis des Lebendigen Evangeliums," 229–30. The full text of this address is published in Mysterion and Wahrheit, 222–27. The quotation is from 222–23.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

themselves with the restoration and transcription.] On one leaf one could read "the first" in a page's running head, as the only surviving remnant at the top left, on another leaf in the middle synaxis, on a third leaf to the left above, logos. These readings could be combined with two chapter titles that for their part could not be completely recognized. One reads: "The [p. 223] synaxis of the [1]9th logos." Though synaxis is here hardly legible, it is nonetheless confirmed by a second chapter title, in which synaxis is to be recognized without doubt as the first word. Through these readings the same title can be assumed for the running heads of the book, as C. Schmidt also read in one of the 31 leaves mentioned above. The running heads of the pages would hence be divided as follows on verso and recto: "The 1st Synaxis of the 1st logos of the Living Gospel." Thus one can assume, as also C. Colpe thinks, that the vestige of a codex in Berlin discussed by C. Schmidt forms with this codex a unity of contents but not of ownership.

mühten.] Auf einem Blatt war als Seitenüberschrift als einziger Rest links oben "die erste" zu lesen, auf einem anderen Blatt in der Mitte synaxis, auf einem 3. Blatt links oben logos. Diese Lesungen konnten mit zwei Kapitelüberschriften kombiniert werden, die ihrerseits auch nicht vollständig zu erkennen waren; die eine lautet: "Die [p. 223] synaxis des [1]9. logos"; ist dabei synaxis kaum lesbar, so wird es doch bestätigt durch die 2. Kapitelüberschrift, in der SYNAXIS als erstes Wort einwandfrei zu erkennen ist. Durch diese Lesungen kann für die Überschriften des Buches derselbe Titel angenommen werden, wie ihn auch C. Schmidt auf einem der oben erwähnten 31 Blätter gelesen hat. Die Seitenüberschriften würden sich auf Verso und Recto folgendermassen verteilen: "Die 1. synaxis des 1. / logos des Lebendigen Evangeliums." Damit kann man annehmen, wie auch C. Colpe meint, dass der von C. Schmidt besprochene Berliner Restcodex mit diesem Codex eine inhaltliche, aber keine besitzmässige Einheit bildet.

Böhlig in 1960/68 reaffirmed this position:[3]

Carl Schmidt, in his report on the discovery, listed as belonging to the English acquisition a book that has to do with Mani's Living Gospel. He considered the Berlin remnant of a codex consisting of 31 leaves (P^{15995}), which we

Carl Schmidt hat in seinem Fundbericht zum englischen Besitz gehörig ein Buch angeführt, das es mit Manis Lebendigem Evangelium zu tun hat. Als Teil von ihm und von den Händlern abgetrennt betrachtet er den

3. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 186.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

listed above as the fifth book of the Berlin collection, to be a part of it separated off by the dealers. The manuscript that is now in Göttingen, and was considered as belonging to Berlin at the time of its rescue in the anti-aircraft tower in 1944, turned out, in the superscriptions identified by me in 1957 and confirmed by C. Colpe, to belong with the 31 Berlin leaves, what now also, on seeing the 31 leaves, is confirmed by the format. So we have to do indeed, as is also conjectured by C. Colpe, in the case of the Göttingen manuscript, with Codex B of the Chester Beatty collection.

Berliner Restcodex von 31 Blättern (P^{15995}), den wir oben als 5. Buch der Berliner Sammlung genannt haben. Die jetzt in Göttingen befindliche und bei der Bergung aus dem Flakturm 1944 als Berliner Besitz angesehene Handschrift erwies sich in den von mir im Jahre 1957 identifizierten und von C. Colpe bestätigten Überschriften als mit den 31 Berliner Blättern zusammengehörig, was jetzt auch bei In-Augenschein-Nahme der 31 Blätter das Format bestätigte. Wir werden es also in der Tat, wie auch von C. Colpe vermutet, bei der Göttinger Handschrift mit dem Codex B der Chester-Beatty-Sammlung zu tun haben.

Rolf Ibscher in 1964/65 (see above) conceded that the Schondorf-Göttingen–West Berlin codex is the same codex from which the 31 leaves P^{15995} come:

> Carsten Colpe, who worked for a time on the leaves that had been won up until then, brought into play in Munich at the International Orientalists' Congress [1957] the thesis that the manuscript does not belong to Berlin at all, but is identical with the 13 leaves of Codex B in Dublin . . . Böhlig on the other hand maintained that the 31 leaves of the Berlin codex Nr. 15995 belong, in view of the shared titles on the pages (SYNAXIS), together with the Göttingen codex, whereas he had earlier held it to be codex Nr. 15998 . . . What is then the situation with the 31 leaves in Berlin, that after all are identical with those of the codex in Göttingen?

Rolf Ibscher also raised the question as to whether leaves still in Berlin might belong to the Chester Beatty Library's Codex B, the Synaxeis:

> . . . a sizable number of leaves separated last, quite provisionally, by my father, with an entry on the paper cover that protected them, which really creates puzzles: "from Codex B," i.e., then Chester Beatty [Synaxeis]or ?—and with the addition put

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> in parentheses "Letters," i.e., then again Codex Nr. 15[9]98. What is one to make of that?[4]

These leaves are currently in the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin, where they are classified as belonging to P^{15998}. They present no running heads or chapter titles like those of the Synaxeis codex.

Rolf Ibscher had sought to maintain that the Schondorf-Göttingen codex belonged to the Berlin Museum on the grounds that it was part of P^{15995}, either ignoring or ignorant of the fact that the Berlin acquisition, P^{15995}, consisted only of 31 leaves. But here he seems indirectly to concede that the Schondorf-Göttingen codex belongs to Sir Chester Beatty by leaving open the question, presumably the question of the ownership, of the 31 leaves in Berlin. He does not seem to have accepted the fact of divided ownership. Carsten Colpe, in a Berlin interview of 1986, attributes this dangling uncertainty in Rolf Ibscher's interpretation to an intentional obscuring of the situation, an obfuscation useful in Rolf Ibscher's perennial efforts to secure German funding for his conservation work on this codex, in view of the fact that there were no papyri left in Berlin to conserve and that his wife pressured him constantly for more money.

Wolfgang Müller's preliminary inventory of 1964/65 had added, in reporting on P^{15995}, the 31 leaves of the Synaxeis: "The rest in Göttingen." Beltz's catalogue had reported similarly on P^{15995}, though by this time (1978) the rest was in West Berlin, at the Ägyptisches Museum in Charlottenburg: "The remainder of the codex is to be found for the time being in West Berlin . . . A. Böhlig and C. Colpe have defined the codex as "Synaxeis to the Living Gospel of Mani." This identification of the Schondorf-Göttingen–West Berlin codex with Sir Chester Beatty's Codex B has thus over the past generation had the support of Böhlig, Colpe, Ibscher, Müller, and Beltz, and has in fact not been contested. The most telling evidence is a list of eleven section titles collected by Colpe, in which the word SYNAXIS is in part or in its entirety preserved, occurring in at least the three more legible cases in the formula "The [e.g.] Fourth SYNAXIS of the [e.g.] First Logos of the Gospel" (on a page he identified as "1957 / 17 V" (= 19.2.2.66 vert.).

4. Rolf Ibscher, "Über den Stand der Umkonservierung der Manipapyri" (1964–65), 52.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Rolf Ibscher's report on his conservation activities had referred to "ca. 145 leaves" that he had separated from the book block, which "still has about 100 to 120 unseparated leaves." Hence Müller's preliminary inventory had reported: "Here 145 leaf units separated, about 100-120 leaves still on the book block." Beltz had reported: "Since 1945, 145 new leaf units have been separated and conserved. The remainder of the book block is not yet conserved." Michel Tardieu continues to refer to 145 leaves.[5]

The inventory of the holdings in the Ägyptisches Museum in Charlottenburg in West Berlin in 1985–1986 located, in addition to the book block, 125 labeled leaves, plus 5 glass frames containing fragments. Thus the figure "ca. 145 leaves" would seem to be an inflated estimate, unless some material has been misplaced.

The combination of 125 conserved leaves in West Berlin and 31 in East Berlin makes a total of 156 leaves. This would mean 312 pages. But the top page of the book block is also accessible, making a total of 313 pages accessible to scholarship.

Such a listing of unpublished but extant leaves may be somewhat misleading. For although the size of the lacunae is relatively small in many cases, that is to say, although a large part of the papyrus is usually extant, the amount of extant ink varies considerably, and the resultant legibility of many pages is disappointingly small. Hence a rough classification of extant ink may, imprecise though it is, give a clearer picture of what one may expect. Each page is graded on a scale of 0 to 5: 0 = no ink is visible; 1 = some ink but no letters are legible; 2 = some letters but probably no words are legible; 3 = some words but probably no sentences are legible; 4 = some sentences but probably less than half the page is legible; 5 = probably more than half the page is legible.

5. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Codex B: Synaxeis

Category	Total pieces in category	Page numbers and fiber directions
No ink is visible	No pages can be listed.	No pages can be listed.
Some ink, but no letters are legible	11 pages and 4 fragment plates	2.2.3.5 (vert.); 3.2.2 [8 1/2] (vert. and hor.); 6.1.2.B (vert.); 13.1.1.85 (hor.); 13.1.1.2.86 (vert.); 13.2.3.90 (hor. and vert.); 14.1.3.93 (hor.); 17.2.1.59 (vert.); 18.2.2.115 (hor.); the fragmentary plates 9.1.3.96 (hor. and vert.); 21.2.3 (hor. and vert.); 22.1.2 (hor. and vert.); 22.1.3 (hor. and vert.)
Some letters but probably no words are legible	60 pages	2.1.2.4 (hor. and vert.); 2.2.2.4 (hor. and vert.); 2.2.3.5 (hor.); 3.1.2.2 (hor. and vert.); 3.1.3.6 (hor. and vert.); 3.2.1.8 (hor. and vert.); 3.2.3.9 (hor. and vert.); 4.1.2.117 (vert.); 5.2.3.16 (vert.); 6.1.2.A (hor. and vert.); 6.1.2.B (hor.); 6.2.2 (hor. and vert.); 7.2.25 (vert.); 8.1.2.39 (hor.); 8.1.3.40 (hor. and vert.); 8.2.1.41 (hor. and vert.); 9.1.1 (hor. and vert.); 9.1.2.95 (hor. and vert.);

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Some letters but probably no words are legible (cont.)	60 pages	9.2.1.97 (hor.); 10.1.100 (vert.); 11.2.2.77 (vert.); 12.1.1.79 (hor. and vert.); 12.1.3.81 (hor.); 13.1.2.86 (hor.); 13.2.1.88 (hor. and vert.); 13.2.2.89 (hor. and vert.); 14.1.1.91 (hor. and vert.); 14.1.2.92 (hor. and vert.); 14.1.3.93 (vert.); 14.1.4.94 (vert.); 14.2.1.106 (hor.); 14.2.2.107 (hor.); 15.2.1.111 (hor.); 16.2.1.48 (hor.); 17.1.2.52 (hor. and vert.); 17.1.3.53 (hor. and vert.); 17.2.1.59 (hor.); 17.2.3.61 (hor.); 18.2.2.115 (vert.); 21.1.2.55 (hor. and vert.)
Some words, but probably no sentences are legible	144 pages	1.1.1.30 (hor. and vert.); 1.1.2.33 (hor. and vert.); 1.1.3.32 (vert.); 1.2.1.31 (hor. and vert.); 1.2.2.124 (hor. and vert.); 1.2.3.123 (hor. and vert.); 2.1.1.27 (hor. and vert.); 2.1.3.29 (hor. and vert.); 2.2.1.3 (hor. and vert.); 3.1.1.1 (hor. and vert.); 3.1.4.7 (hor. and vert.); 3.2.4.10 (hor. and vert.); 4.1.1.116 (hor. and vert.); 4.1.2.117 (hor.); 4.1.3.118 (hor. and vert.);

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Some words, but probably no sentences are legible (cont.)	144 pages	4.2.3.13 (hor.); 5.1.1.119 (hor. and vert.); 5.1.2.34 (hor. and vert.); 5.1.3.35 (hor. and vert.); 5.1.4.36 (hor. and vert.); 5.2.1.14 (hor. and vert.); 5.2.2.15 (hor. and vert.); 5.2.3.16 (hor.); 6.1.1.17 (hor. and vert.); 6.1.3.18 (hor. and vert.); 6.2.1.19 (hor. and vert.); 6.2.3.21 (hor. and vert.); 7.1.1.20 (hor. and vert.); 7.1.2.22 (hor. and vert.); 7.1.3.23 (hor. and vert.); 7.2.1.24 (hor. and vert.); 7.2.2.25 (hor.); 7.2.3.26 (hor. and vert.); 8.1.1.38 (hor. and vert.); 8.1.2.39 (vert.); 8.2.2.42 (hor. and vert.); 8.2.3.43 (hor. and vert.); 8.2.4.44 (hor. and vert.); 9.2.1.97 (vert.); 9.2.3.99 (hor. and vert.); 10.1.1.100 (hor.); 10.1.2.101 (vert.); 10.1.3.102 (hor. and vert.); 10.2.1.103 (hor. and vert.); 10.2.2.104 (hor. and vert.); 11.1.3.75 (hor. and vert.); 11.2.1.76 (vert.); 11.2.2.77 (hor.); 11.2.3.78 (hor. and vert.); 12.1.2.80 (hor.); 12.1.3.81 (vert.);

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Some words, but probably no sentences are legible (cont.)	144 pages	12.2.1.82 (hor. and vert.); 12.2.2.83 (hor. and vert.); 12.2.3.84 (hor. and vert.); 13.1.1.85 (vert.); 13.1.3.87 (hor. and vert.); 14.1.4.94 (hor.); 14.2.1.106 (vert.); 14.2.2.107 (vert.); 14.2.3.108 (vert.); 15.1.2.110 (vert.); 15.2.1.111 (vert.); 15.2.2.112 (hor. and vert.); 16.1.2.37 (vert.); 16.1.3.47 (hor. and vert.); 16.2.1.48 (vert.); 16.2.2.49 (hor. and vert.); 16.2.3.50 (hor. and vert.); 17.1.1.51 (hor.); 17.2.3.61 (vert.); 18.1.1 113 (hor.); 18.1.2.121 (hor. and vert.); 18.2.1.114 (hor. and vert.); 19.1.2.63 (hor.); 19.1.3.64 (hor.); 19.2.1.65 (hor. and vert.); 19.2.2.66 (hor.); 19.2.3.67 (hor. and vert.); 20.1.1.68 (hor.); 20.1.2.69 (hor. and vert.); 20.1.3.70 (hor. and vert.); 20.2.1.71 (hor.); 21.1.1.54 (hor. and vert.); 21.2.1.56 (hor. and vert.); 21.2.2.57 (hor. and vert.); and the fragmentary plate 22.1.1 (hor. and vert.)

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Some sentences are legible; half the page is illegible	34 pages	1.1.3.32 (hor.); 4.2.3.13 (vert.); 9.2.2.98 (hor. and vert.); 10.1.2.101 (hor.); 10.2.3.105 (hor. and vert.); 11.1.1.45 (hor. and vert.); 11.1.2.74 (hor. and vert.); 11.2.1.76 (hor.); 14.2.3.108 (hor.); 15.1.1.109 (hor. and vert.); 15.1.2.110 (hor.); 16.1.1.46 (hor. and vert.); 16.1.2.37 (hor.); 17.1.1.51 (vert.); 17.2.2.60 (hor. and vert.); 18.1.1.113 (vert.); 19.1.1.62 (hor. and vert.); 19.1.2.63 (vert.); 19.1.3.64 (vert.); 19.2.2.66 (vert.); 20.1.1.68 (vert.); 20.2.1.71 (vert.); 20.2.2.72 (hor. and vert.); and 20.2.3.73 (hor. and vert.)
More than half the page is legible	1 page	12.1.2.80

This produces a total of 250 pages (not counting material that should be more accurately considered fragments), graded roughly as follows: 1:11; 2:60; 3:144; 4:34; 5:1. Thus there are hardly more than 35 pages from which one might hope to recover coherent text. This is a much more sober assessment of the quantity of conserved material than simply a list of the total number of conserved leaves.

Tito Orlandi reported as follows on the material in Dublin in 1976[6]:

6. Orlandi, "Les Manuscrits coptes de Dublin," 324–25.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

On another of the same shelves (at the right of the entrance) there are 16 numbered glasses that could represent the part of Codex B restored before the war by H. Ibscher. The other part of Codex B, [p. 325] according to Böhlig, would be in Germany (the codex of West Berlin, formerly at Göttingen). They are not of a large format, from what I was able to ascertain. This assures us that the fragments do not belong to the codex of Letters (= Berlin, Codex 3).

Sur une autre des mémes étagères (a droite de l'entrée), it y a 16 verres numérotés, qui pourraient representer la partie du Cod. B restaurée avant la guerre par H. Ibscher; l'autre partie du Cod. B, [p. 325] selon Böhlig, se trouverait en Allemagne (codex de Berlin ouest, jadis a Goettingue). Its ne sont pas d'un grand format, d'après ce que j'ai pu constater: ce qui nous assure que les fragments n'appartiennent pas au codex des Lettres (Berlin, Cod. 3).

Here Orlandi apparently is here correcting Bohlig's conjecture that the 13, or 16, leaves come from the Berlin Letters, since these leaves do not have a large format such as does the codex of Letters (see above). But the format of the Synaxeis book block in West Berlin is comparable to the larger size, 30 (or with fringes 31.8) cm high by 19 cm wide. Beltz had listed the size of the 31 leaves of P^{15995}, the Synaxeis, in East Berlin, as 18–20 cm high and 11–16 cm wide, which is apparently what Orlandi has in view. But a smaller format for an extant leaf does not necessarily mean that the whole codex was smaller. In this regard, the report of a smaller format is not as decisive for identifying material as the report of a larger format, since a codex is as large in format as the largest leaf, but not as small as the smallest extant leaf, given the fragmentary nature of much of the material. The 31 East Berlin leaves were, after all, the worn outside leaves that the middlemen had discarded. The conserved leaves in West Berlin vary in size down from the maximum represented by the book block. The smaller format that Orlandi reported would of course open the question as to whether the leaves might belong to a smaller codex, the Psalms (or the Acts?). Since there is no reason to assume that leaves of the Berlin Acts would be in the Chester Beatty Library, it is possible that the 16, or 13, leaves belong to the Dublin Psalms, Codex A, and were erroneously labeled Codex B. But it is not necessary to conjecture such an error.

Michael Tardieu[7] refers to "16 feuillets" ["16 leaves"] of the Synaxeis being in Dublin, apparently dependent on Orlandi.

7. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 7.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

This codex has not been published.

The second volume of the facsimile edition[8] has reproduced the 13 (not 16) leaves labeled so confusedly "Codex B," which Rolf Ibscher sought to ascribe to P15998 (see above). Søren Giversen has commented in his introduction:

> The identity of this codex—or poor remnants of a codex—has been widely discussed, for example in the article by A. Böhlig cited above and in a series of other articles, as has the identity of the Mani codex in West Berlin, once called the Schondorff [read: Schondorf] papyrus.
>
> Since this edition should not pre-empt the results of a later critical edition, it has been decided to publish the pages in question in order to promote the work of identifying the papyrus with as little delay as possible. I have therefore refrained from offering any solution, preferring instead to provide some facts which together with the facsimiles should assist in this task.
>
> Not only are the glasses inscribed Codex B, but the frames also are marked "Kephalaia. Codex B." These labels are clearly in Hugo Ibscher's handwriting. The text in most cases is readable, although not easily.

The arguments that have been advanced to identify these 13 leaves with P15998 have proven to be without force. A comparison of the facsimiles with the leaves of the Synaxeis indicates that the hand is so similar that the 13 leaves could well belong to the Synaxeis codex, though no chapter titles have been identified to confirm such an identification. The labeling is misleading insofar as the reference to Kephalaia is incorrect, but the labeling as Codex B, the Dublin designation of the Synaxeis codex, may well be correct. Giversen's allusion in this connection to "the Schondorf papyrus," which Rolf Ibscher identified as P15998 (but is in fact the Synaxeis), indirectly suggests this identification.

Giversen reports that "the leaves were divided by [Hugo] Ibscher into two sections (quires)." Each quire consists of four sheets or eight leaves. The first leaf of the first quire and the last two leaves of the second quire are missing. Orlandi's report of 16 leaves may be due to having in view 2 quires but overlooking the absence of 3 leaves. Facing pages have like fiber directions, with the first page of each quire hav-

8. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, Facsimile Edition, ix–x, 101–26.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

ing vertical fibers. The first quire is reproduced on pages 101–14, the second on 115–26.

Giversen comments: "The sheets are marked from 51 to 76, the equivalent of this edition's 101–126." The document dated January 13, 1984, on the letterhead of the Chester Beatty Library, entitled "Manichean Papyri on Loan to Royal Library, Copenhagen," lists "Codex B 51–76 13 glasses." Thus it is clear that these 13 leaves of the Synaxeis were in Copenhagen.

The Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin gave to the Manichaean Archives of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity older photographs of pages 1.1.1.30 (hor.), 1.2.2.124 (hor.), 1.2.3.123 (vert.), and 4.1.1.116 (hor.); and newer photographs made at the Ägyptisches Museum itself of pages 1.1.1.30 (hor. and vert.), and 10.1.2.101 (hor. and vert.).

Carsten Colpe put at the disposal of a team that began to form in 1984 transcriptions he had made of the conserved leaves when they had been at Göttingen. In August 1985 Karen L. King made transcriptions in West Berlin of 16.1.2 (hor.), 16.2.3 (hor. and vert.), 17.1.1 (vert.), 18.1.1.113 (hor.), and, in August 1986, of 19.1.3.64 (vert.); and, together with Stephen Patterson, in July and August 1986, of 12.1.2.8 (vert.), 18.1.1.113 (vert.), and 19.2.2.66 (vert.). Wolf-Peter Funk provided draft translations of some of the material in April 1988.

From May to August 1987, Paul Allan Mirecki transcribed the following leaves in West Berlin: 4.2.3.13; 12.1.2.80; 14.2.3.108; 19.1.2.63; 19.1.3.64; 19.2.2.66; 20.1.1.68; and 20.2.1.71. He presented a preliminary report on his work under the title "The Coptic Manichaean Synaxeis Codex: Observations on the Ordinal System of the Synaxis Sections" at the First International Conference on Manichaeism held from August 5–9, 1987 at the University of Lund, Sweden.[9]

In August 1986 King received on loan from the Ägyptisches Museum, for study at the library of Occidental College in Los Angeles, 10 leaves: 9.2.2.98; 10.2.1.103; 10.2.3.105; 11.1.1.45; 11.1.2.74; 15.1.1.109; 16.1.1.46; 17.2.2.60; 19.1.1.62; and 20.2.3.73. King tran-

9. Mirecki, "The Coptic Manichaean Synaxeis Codex: Descriptive Catalogue of Synaxis Chapter Titles," 135–45. This is an expansion of part of the paper presented at the conference. An expansion of another part, entitled "The Coptic Manichaean Synaxeis Codex: Indicators for Codicological Reconstruction," was presented at the Consultation on Manichaeism at the Society of Biblical Literature convention at Chicago November 19–22, 1988.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

scribed in November 1987 10.2.1.103 (hor.), and on November 18, 1987, 19.1.1.62 (hor.) On November 7, 1987, Wolf-Peter Funk transcribed at Occidental College lines 18–19 of 10.2.1.103 (hor.), 11.1.1.45 (hor. and vert.), 16.1.1.46 (hor. and vert.), and 20.2.3.73 (hor. and vert.). On November 13, 1987, he transcribed at Claremont 11.1.2.74 (hor. and vert.) and 15.1.1.109 (hor. and vert.). In March 1988 he made partial draft translations of 10.2.1.103 (hor.), 11.1.1.45 (hor. and vert.), 11.1.2.74 (hor. and vert.), 15.1.1.109 (hor. and vert.), 16.1.1.46 (hor. and vert.), and 20.2.3.73 (hor. and vert.). The leaves were brought to the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity in Claremont for a concentrated teamwork period from June 13 to 23, 1988. There Harold W. Attridge, Charles A. Bobertz, Stephen Patterson, and Gesine Schenke Robinson transcribed as follows:

9.2.2.98 [Bobertz];

10.2.1.103 (hor.) [Robinson, Attridge], (vert.) [Attridge];

10.2.3.105 (hor. and vert.) [Bobertz, Attridge, Patterson];

11.1.1.45 (hor. and vert.) [Bobertz];

11.1.2.74 (hor. and vert.) [Patterson, Attridge];

15.1.1.109 (hor. and vert.) [Bobertz, Attridge];

16.1.1.46 (hor. and vert.) [Patterson];

17.2.2.60 (hor. and vert.) [Patterson];

19.1.1.62 (hor. and vert.) [Robinson and Bobertz]; (vert. only) [Patterson and Attridge];

20.2.3.73 (hor. and vert.) [Robinson, Attridge].

The leaves, though mostly among the better ones in terms of legibility, are nonetheless so obscure that the transcriptions are very far from complete and at best are provisional.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:31 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 17 —

Codex C: Kephalaia, Volume Two

The fourth codex of Sir Chester Beatty presented by Schmidt and Polotsky, though unidentified, is described as follows[1]:

A last and fourth papyrus book, which seems to be rather completely preserved—here too it is possible to assume about 250 leaves—has thus far been subjected to no conservation, so that a deep darkness still lurks over its content.

Ein letztes and viertes Papyrusbuch, das ziemlich vollständig erhalten zu sein scheint—auch hierfür wird man etwa 250 Blätter annehmen können—ist bis jetzt noch keiner Konservierung unterzogen, so dass noch ein tiefes Dunkel über dessen Inhalt lagert.

This codex has been identified as Kephalaia, though with chapters bearing higher numbers than those in the Berlin Kephalaia, so that one might think of this as a second volume, rather than as "la seconds partie du codex" ["the second part of the codex"] P15996.[2] Böhlig described it as follows:[3]

2. Already before the war Hugo Ibscher began the work of conservation on the text of Codex C, which was still completely unconserved at the time of the report of the discovery, so that by

2. An dem nach dem Fundbericht noch vollkommen unkonservierten Text Codex C begann schon vor dem Kriege Hugo Ibscher die Konservierungsarbeit, so dass sich bei Kriegsausbruch bereits 34 ver-

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund in Agypten," 34.

2. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6. This error may account for the problem of referring to "sept titles" ["seven titles"] and then listing only six.

3. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 185.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

the time the war broke out already 34 glassed leaves were in London. One hundred forty five more leaves could be separated by Rolf Ibscher after the war. Whereas already at the beginning of the conservation the book could be recognized as Kephalaia with appreciably higher chapter numerations than the Berlin Kephalaia show, now a still-further surprise emerged, in that perhaps another text had been laid inside the book. This is not yet identified, since for this book as well still no arrangements for an edition have been made.

glaste Blätter in London befanden. Weitere 145 Blätter konnte Rolf Ibscher nach dem Kriege ablösen. Hatte man schon bei Beginn der Konservierung das Buch als Kephalaia mit wesentlich höheren Kapitelzahlen, als sie die Berliner Kephalaia aufweisen, erkennen können, so fand sich nun noch eine Überraschung dadurch, dass in das Buch vielleicht ein anderer Text hineingelegt worden war. Dieser ist noch nicht identifiziert, da auch für dieses Buch noch keine Anstalten einer Edition gemacht wurden.

Beltz's catalogue does not mention this codex, since it is not in Berlin. But Tito Orlandi reported in 1976 on the material at the Chester Beatty Library as follows[4]:

Finally, the most important piece in the collection, in my opinion, is Codex C, which contains the second part of the Kephalaia and another, unknown text. It consists today (a) of 30 glasses [in a footnote Orlandi presents this as a correction of Böhlig's figure 34] numbered in terms of recto and verso (hence two numerals per glass) up to the number 60; these are obviously the pieces restored before the war, which are now put on two sets of shelves (numbered 1 and 2). (b) After them are to be found the fragments conserved between plexiglass, more recently restored, which are numbered in the same way; nonetheless their numeration begins again with

Finalement, la pièce la plus importante du recueil est, a mon avis, le Cod. C, qui contient la deuxième partie des Kephalaia et un autre texte inconnu. Il consiste maintenant (a) en 30 verres [in a footnote Orlandi presents this as a correction of Böhlig's figure 34] numérotés par rapport au recto et verso (donc deux numéros par verre) jusqu'au numero 60; ce sont évidemment les pièces restaurées avant la guerre, qui sont maintenant placées sur deux étagères (numérotóes I et II). (b) Après eux, se trouvent les fragments sous plexiglas, restaurés plus récemment, qui sont numérotés de la même facon; toutefois leur numérotation recommence par le no 1. Comme

4. Orlandi, "Les manuscrits coptes de Dublin," 325.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

number 1. Since they were stacked pell-mell on the shelves, I put them all back in order, and I verified at the same time that no glass is lacking. They are in fact 368 numbers and hence 184 fragments, divided among 18 shelves (shelves 3 to 20). The 20th shelf contains 8 fragments without numeration, in very bad condition, which nonetheless seem to belong to Codex C; they are marked: Cl, C2, C3, C4, C20, C24, C25, C96 [C26?].

It is necessary to draw attention to the fact that the numeration of the part described under (b) is juxtaposed to a preceding numeration that seems to represent the primitive classification given at the time that the leaves were detached from the ensemble of the codex, in separating each quire, beginning with the last. The numeration of the quires (in Roman numerals) is hence the reverse of the new order; however the numeration of the pages inside the quires follows the same order. We give an example:

> "new numeration" = "other" numeration
>
> 31/32 . . . to 45/46 = C VIII 120 . . . to 127
>
> 47/48 . . . to 61/62 = C VII 113 . . . to 119 [?]

As much as we were able to determine, no other piece of the Manichaean collection is conserved at the Chester Beatty Library.

ils étaient déposés pêle-mêle dans les étagères, je les ai tous remis en ordre, et j'ai contrôlé en méme temps qu'aucun verre ne manque. Ils sont en fait 368 numéros, donc 184 fragments, partagés entre 18 étagères (étagères III a XX). La 20e étagère contient 8 fragments hors numérotation, en très mauvais êtat, qui toutefois semblent appartenir au Cod. C; ils sont marqués: Cl, C2, C3, C4, C20, C24, C25, C96 [C26?].

Il faut signaler que la numérotation de la partie décrite sous le par. (b) est juxtaposée a une numérotation précedente, qui parait representer la classification primitive, donnée au moment oû les feuillets ont éta détachés de l'ensemble du codex, en separant chaque cahier, a partir du dernier. La numérotation des cahiers (en chiffres romains) est donc contraire au nouvel ordre; cependant la numérotation des pages a l'interieur des cahiers suit le même ordre. Nous en donnerons un example:

> "nouvelle numérotation" = "autre" numérotation
>
> 31/32 . . . jusqu'a 45/46 = C VIII 120 . . .jusqu'a 127 47/48 . . . jusqu'a 61/62 = C VII 113 . . . jusqu'a 119 [?]

Pour ce que nous avons constaté, aucune autre pièce de la collection manichéenne n'est conservée à la Chester Beatty Library.

This codex has not been published.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

The first volume of the facsimile edition[5] has published 354 plates.

In the preface (pages xi–xii) Søren Giversen indicates the limited objective of the edition:

> It was evident from the state of the papyri that if they were to be published in the foreseeable future, it would be necessary initially to abandon all thought of perfection. What was needed was first to establish the correct order of the unpaginated sheets, so far as this was possible within a reasonable time, and then [page xii] to publish a facsimile edition without delay. Once this was published, every interested scholar would have plenty of time and opportunity to work on the texts.

Thus plate 339 has the note: "Collocatio paginarum 339–354 incerta," ["the ordering of the pages 339–354 is uncertain."] But even plates 1–338 are not to be taken as pagination of the original codex. Thus when the Introduction refers to the plates as pages, what is meant is pages in the facsimile edition itself, not in the codex. This is clear from the comment (p. xvii) ". . . missing pages not being counted," and for the fuller observation (p. xxi):

> It must however be emphasized that the continuous numbering does not show the many lacunae which occur in the quires, and little can be said about the loss of perhaps one or more quires, for example between C.VI and C.B.

5. Giversen, The Manichaean Coptic Papyri in the Chester Beatty Library, Vol. 1, Kephalaia, Facsimile Edition, i–xxvi, 1–354. The title page reports that the edition is "Published under the Auspices of the Trustees of the Chester Beatty Library with the Support of the Carlsberg Foundation and under the Responsibility of the International Committee for the Publication of the Manichaean Coptic Papyri from Medinet Madi Belonging to the Chester Beatty Library (Søren Giversen, Rodolphe Kasser, Martin Krause)." The Preface, p. xii, reports concerning the facsimile edition: "Once this was published, every interested scholar would have plenty of time and opportunity to work on the texts." But it is also reported: "This committee . . . is also responsible for the critical edition of the texts." At the meeting of the Association francophone de Coptologie in Paris on May 23, 1986, Rodolphe Kasser circulated an announcement concerning the committee "qui repartira cette tache [les éditions critiques] entre les divers coptisants" ["who will distribute this task {the critical editions} among the various Coptologists."] "Seuls seront invités a participer aux editions princeps manichéennes coptes Chester Beatty ceux qui n'ont pas déjà obtenu cette faculté en ce qui concerne les éditions princeps manichéennes coptes des fragments de Berlin oû de Vienne." ["Only they will be invited to participate in the editio princeps of the Chester Beatty Coptic Manichaica who have not already received this privilege regarding the of the Coptic Manichaica of Berlin or Vienna."]

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

One should also note the disclaimer on page xvii:

> Both Hugo and Rolf Ibscher found the task of reconstructing the leaves and fragments in the right order extremely difficult, and as we are not in possession of all the observations made by the two conservators during their work, it is today perhaps impossible for us to so reconstruct them—or it will take a very long time and will probably necessitate the deciphering of the texts in some detail. According to the wishes of the committee, I have therefore chosen to publish the results of my work so far in the hope that these will be of use to scholars. Any improvement that they make will naturally be a pleasure to me.

The problem is partly ascribed to ambiguities on the part of Rolf Ibscher (p. xix):

> Rolf Ibscher later gives different figures for the number of leaves restored by his father. Sometimes he said that Hugo Ibscher had restored 34 leaves from Codex C, sometimes 36 and sometimes 47 . . . Rolf Ibscher perhaps added to the 34 leaves from Codex C the 13 leaves which Hugo Ibscher had already restored in 1934 and which are also mentioned in the letter quoted above as belonging to Codex B. This is borne out by the fact that on the frames of the glasses which contain these 13 leaves is written "Kephalaia. Codex B."

Thus Giversen concludes (page xvii) that Hugo Ibscher conserved only 34 leaves. But Rolf Ibscher is quoted (pages xviii–xix) as listing at times 136, at times 139 as the number of leaves he himself had conserved. Since there are 346 plates, one would assume the figure 139 to be correct (since 139 plus 34 equals 173 leaves, = 346 pages). This calculation admittedly, does not account for plates 347–54, of which it is said, p. xxvi: "The following pages or fragments are in such poor condition that it will be very difficult to locate their original position." Though they seem uninscribed, they are not just fragments—a characterization that actually only fits 347–48—but in three cases leaves (in one case hardly more than the vertical fibers), which must be assumed to have been consistently omitted from numerations (unless the figure 36 was reached by adding 2 from this group to the figure 34).

The confusion is augmented by Giversen's explanation (pages xix–xx):

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

> The sheets restored by Hugo Ibscher were marked la–4b and 1–60, and Rolf Ibscher has arranged them into quires. The sheets which Rolf Ibscher restored are marked first according to codex with a C, then according to section (quire), so that indications are as follows: C.1–C.8, C.OI, C.I–C.X. To this a number is added, so that the sheets are numbered from 1 to 140. This last numbering was presumably given when Rolf Ibscher succeeded in rescuing the sheets, and as he sometimes had to work on the papyri from different ends this numbering does not always follow the order of the sheets in the codex. To this must be added the fact that the codex was in some disarray when it reached the conservators' laboratory. There is yet another numbering system to be mentioned. This may have been given when the sheets were photographed, or to indicate which of the papyri were restored by Rolf Ibscher. This system, however practical [page xx] it may have been for its special purpose, is now useless and possibly confusing for anyone who is not aware of its meaning, since it does not give any information about the reconstruction of the codex or the real order of the sheets. In my attempt to arrange the order of all the sheets in the collection which is called Codex C I have therefore not used this numbering at all.

The way to account for 139 sheets being numbered 1–140 is to note that the numbers 1, 2, 97, and 111 occur twice, whereas the numbers 91, 92, and 96 are missing, leaving a balance of one more number than there are sheets.

The hope is expressed (page xxi): "This introduction will, I hope, provide some background information until a much more detailed account is made available as a result of this facsimile edition."

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:35 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

— 18 —

Codex D: Homilies (Dublin Part)

This codex is part of the Berlin codex P[15999]. Schmidt and Polotsky report:[1]

A second papyrus book contains a collection of Homilies (logoi) of various contents and by different authors. Here we have before us a completely faithful report about the last days of Mani, which must have come from the pen of an eye witness . . . 48 leaves of this papyrus book have been brought under glass and are to be published separated by Dr. Polotsky. As I mentioned above, a large part of this book has come to Berlin.

Ein zweites Papyrusbuch enthält eine Sammlung von Homilien (logoi) verschiedenen Inhalts und von verschiedenen Verfassern. Da haben wir vor uns einen ganz getreuen Bericht über die letzten Tage des Mani, der aus der Feder eines Augenzeugen geflossen sein muss . . . Von diesem Papyrusbuch sind 48 Blätter unter Glas gebracht und sollen von Dr. Polotsky separat publiziert werden. Von diesem Buche ist, wie ich oben erwähnt habe, ein umfangreicher Teil nach Berlin gekommen.

Polotsky's transcriptions of pages 8, 11, 12, 27–30, 44, 60, 69, 76, 78, 79, 82–84, 91, and 93 from 1931–1932 are in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library. Polotsky published Beatty's part of the Homilies in 1934.[2]

Tito Orlandi's 1976 report of the material in the Chester Beatty Library noted:[3]

1. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 34.
2. Polotsky, Manichäische Homilien, Band I.
3. Orlandi, "Les manuscrits coptes de Dublin," 324.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:37 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Indeed we have noted that the part of Codex A edited by Mr. Allberry (Psalms, Part II) is perfectly conserved in 9 little wooden boxes, in which the glasses containing the leaves are arranged in vertical position. The part of Codex A [read: D] edited by Polotsky (Homilies) has been arranged in the same way.	En effet, nous avons constaté que la partie du Cod. A éditée par M. Allberry (Psaumes, Ile partie) est parfaitement conservée dans 9 petites caisses en bois, dans lesquelles les verres contenant les feuillets sont ranges en position verticale. La partie du Cod. A [read: D] éditée par Polotsky (Homilies) a été rangée de la même façon.

Since in early reports the part of the Homilies codex that Sir Chester Beatty acquired was found with the Psalms codex, Orlandi lists the Dublin leaves of the Homilies also as A. But since these letters designate codices, and the leaves of the Homilies come from a different codex than those of the Psalms, the leaves of the Homilies should not be given the same codex designation as those of the Psalms. Rolf Ibscher hence introduced the letter D for the leaves of the Homilies, which is used in the present report.

Michael H. Browder has prepared an English translation of the published Homilies in machine-readable form.[4]

A facsimile edition of the Homilies of the Chester Beatty Library was published in 1986.[5] The glass panes could not be opened to make minor adjustments in the positioning of already-placed fragments, since the panes are stuck to the papyrus. But some have been "repositioned photographically" on pages 19–20, 25–26, and 97–98, while tiny fragments needing to be repositioned could not, "for technical reasons" be adjusted, "for example on pp. 3–4 and 49–50." A facsimile of page 29 published in the 1934 edition lacks a fragment present in the facsimile edition but also present in the transcription of page 34 in the 1934 edition, due presumably to the 1934 published photograph's being made prior to the placement of the fragment, which however, took place prior to the completion of the 1934 edition. Such

4. Browder, A Manichaean Anthology: A New English Translation of the Manichaische Homilien, 1985, unpublished.

5. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, vii–viii for the Introduction, from which the quotations come; and 1–96, plates corresponding to the pagination of Polotsky's edition, with pp. 95–96 reproducing the unplaced fragments that Polotsky did not publish.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:37 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

photographs made early in the conservation procedure would serve as a record "if some smaller, fragile pieces perhaps went missing in the process of conservation." Thus pages 41–42, "where some lines are now lost." Polotsky omitted pages 65–66 since so little text survived, but they are included in the facsimile edition.

Eleven fragments not placed by Polotsky are published on pages 97–98, still unidentified. "They will presumably be placed when the much needed critical study has been carried out." In view of the fact that the critical edition has already been published, it is unclear what occasion is envisaged for "the much needed critical study," if the publication of the facsimile edition itself did not provide such an occasion.

Michel Tardieu[6] has incorrectly stated: "Codex complet de 48 feuillets conservé à Dublin (codex D)." ["Complete codex of 48 leaves conserved at Dublin (Codex D)."] This is only part of the codex of which P^{15999} was also a part, no doubt the major part.

6. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 6.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:37 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Scholars, Collectors, Dealers, and Others

Charles R. C. Allberry (1911–1943). British Coptologist and Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge. He was editor of the Journal of Egyptian Archaeology from 1939–43. He translated and edited the first edition of A Manichaean Psalm-Book, Part II in 1938.

Hugh Murray Baillie (1916–1982). A British officer, who after World War II remained in Germany as a member of the Fine Arts Commission of the British Zone.

Sir A. Chester Beatty (1875–1968). Major collector of manuscripts and papyri. He founded the Chester Beatty Library. Born in the U.S., he became a naturalized citizen of Great Britain, and was an honorary citizen of Ireland. He made his fortune mining copper in the U.S. and around the world.

Alexander Böhlig (1912–1996). German Coptologist and Byzantinist, who taught first at the University of Halle and after 1963 at the University of Tübingen, where he was eventually emeritus. At Halle he was director of the Institut für Byzantinistik.

William M. Brashear (1946–2000). Papyrologist and curator of the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin-Charlottenburg.

Carsten Colpe (1929–2009). German professor of Iranian studies, first at the University of Göttingen and then at the University of Berlin.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Walter Ewing Crum (1865–1944). British Coptologist and Egyptologist. He edited the monumental reference work, Coptic Dictionary, and catalogued the Coptic manuscripts in the John Rylands Library and the British Museum.

Sir I. E. S. Edwards (1909–1996). Egyptian Egyptologist and leading expert on the pyramids. He became the Assistant Keeper in the Department of Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities at the British Museum in 1934. He was the Keeper of Egyptian Antiquities from 1955 to 1974.

Otto Firchow (b. 1912). Director of the Ägyptisches Museum and Papyrus-Sammlung in Berlin.

Wolf-Peter Funk. Coptologist and Research Associate at the Université Laval in Quebec. He is the editor of the series Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin.

Sir Alan Gardiner (1879–1963). One of the leading Egyptologists of the twentieth century.

Søren Giversen (1928–2009). Danish New Testament scholar and Coptologist who taught at Aarhus University. He was the president of the International Committee for the Publication of the Manichaean Coptic Papyri from Medinet Madi Belonging to the Chester Beatty Library.

Hugo Ibscher (1874–1943). Papyrus conservator from Kleinmachnow, near Berlin, who worked for Chester Beatty.

Rolf Ibscher (1906–1967). Son of Hugo Ibscher, who took over papyrus conservation for Beatty after his father's death.

Rodolphe Kasser (b. 1927). Swiss Coptologist and archaeologist. He was Professor at the University of Geneva until becoming emeritus in 1998. He is a member of the International Committee for the Publication of the Manichaean Coptic Papyri from Medinet Madi Belonging to the Chester Beatty Library and head of the archaeo-

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

logical excavations of the Swiss Mission of Coptic Archaeology in the Kelia, Lower Egypt.

Martin Krause (b. 1930). German Coptologist and Professor at the University of Münster. He was the first President of the International Association for Coptic Studies. He is a member of the International Committee for the Publication of the Manichaean Coptic Papyri from Medinet Madi Belonging to the Chester Beatty Library.

Wilfrid Lockwood. Librarian and Director of the Chester Beatty Library.

Otto Werner Luke. Assistant and then successor to Rolf Ibscher.

Paul Allan Mirecki. Coptologist and historian of religion at the University of Kansas.

Wolfgang Müller (1922–2012). Papyrologist and ancient historian. He became Director of the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin as well as overseer of the Papyrus-Sammlung.

Wincenty Myszor. Professor of Papyrology at the Institute for Papyrology at Warsaw University.

Maurice Nahman (1868–1948). The leading Cairo antiquities dealer prior to World War II, who showed H. O. Lange Manichaean manuscripts in 1929. He sold Manichaean manuscripts to Chester Beatty and Carl Schmidt in the 1930s.

Tito Orlandi. Italian Coptologist and Professor at La Sapienza University, Rome. He was President of the International Association for Coptic Studies (2000–2004). He is Director of Corpus dei Manoscritti Copti Letterari.

Günter Poethke (b. 1939). Custos of the Greek manuscripts in the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin and Professor of Papyrology at the Humboldt-Universität zu Berlin.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Hans Jakob Polotsky (1905–1991). German-born Israeli Egyptologist, Coptologist, and Semitist. He was professor at the Hebrew University, Jerusalem.

Berthe van Regemorter. Belgian bookbinder.

Gesine Schenke Robinson. New Testament scholar, Coptologist, and Director of the Coptic Texts Editing Project at the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity.

James M. Robinson (b. 1924). Professor of New Testament and Coptologist at Claremont Graduate University (emeritus). He is the founding Director of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, Director of the Coptic Gnostic Library Project, and the editor of the Nag Hammadi Library.

Carl Schmidt (1868–1938). German New Testament scholar, church historian, and papyrologist; his mentor was Adolf von Harnack. He discovered and published numerous ancient gnostic and Manichaean texts.

Wilhelm Schubart (1873–1960). German papyrologist, professor of ancient history, and Director of the Papyrus-Sammlung of the Ägyptisches Museum in Berlin-Charlottenburg.

Michel Tardieu (b. 1938). French Coptologist, historian of religion, and professor at the Collège de France, Paris. He became emeritus in 2008.

Sir Herbert Thompson (1859–1944). British Egyptologist and Coptologist who represented Chester Beatty beginning in 1931.

J. V. S. Wilkinson (d. 1957). After working in the Department of Oriental Manuscripts at the British Museum (1924–46), he became Librarian of the Chester Beatty Library in 1946.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:41 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Bibliography

Allberry, C. R. C., editor. A Manichaean Psalm-Book. Part II. Manichaean Manuscripts of the Chester Beatty Collection 2. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1938.

———. "Manichaean Studies." JTS 39 (1938) 337–49.

Beltz, Walter. "Katalog der koptischen Handschriften der Papyrus-Sammlung der Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin." APF 26 (1978) 57–119; 27 (1980) 121–222. The Manichaean codices are catalogued in 26 (1978) 97–98.

Böhlig, Alexander. "Die Arbeit an den koptischen Manichaica." WZUH Gesellschafts und Sprachwissenschaftliche Reihe 10 (1961) 157–61. Reprinted in Mysterion und Wahrheit. Also published in Actes du XXVe Congrès International des Orientalistes, Moscou 9–16 aut 1960, 1 (Moscow, 1962) 535–41.

———. "Aus den Manichäischen 'Kephalaia des Lehrers,' Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Universität Halle-Wittenberg 5 (1956) 1067–84 (translation of pages 244–92, 6th double fascicle).

———. Gnosis und Synkretismus: Gesammelte Aufsätze zur spätantiken Religionsgeschichte. 2 vols. WUNT 47–48. Tübingen: Mohr/Siebeck, 1989.

———. "Ja und Amen in manichäischer Deutung." ZPE 58 (1985) 59–70.

———. Kephalaia. Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin herausgegeben im Auftrag der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, zweite Hälfte, (Lieferungen 11/12 = Coptic pages 244–91). Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1966.

———. Mysterion und Wahrheit: Gesammelte Beiträge zur spätantiken Religionsgeschichte. Arbeiten zur Geschichte des späteren Judentums und des Urchristentums 6. Leiden: Brill, 1968. Reprints, revised. "Die Arbeit an den koptischen Manichaica," 177–87. The text has been copyedited, but not altered, in terms of the typescript of the address of 1960 in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library.

———. "Neue Initiativen zur Erschliessung der koptisch-manichäischen Bibliothek von Medinet Madi: James M. Robinson zum 65. Geburtstag gewidmet." ZNW 80 (1989) 240–62.

———. "Neue Kephalaia des Mani." BSAC 18 (1965/66) 5–22.

———. "Synaxis = Homilia?" WZUH 6 (1957) 485–86.

———. "Zu den Synaxeis des Lebendigen Evangeliums." In Mysterion und Wahrheit: Gesammelte Beiträge zur spätantiken Religionsgeschichte, 222–27. Arbeiten zur

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Geschichte des späteren Judentums und des Urchristentums 6. Leiden: Brill, 1968. Originally delivered at Akten des Vierundzwanzigsten Internationalen Orientalisten-Kongresses München 28 August bis 4 September 1957. Wiesbaden: Deutsche Morgenländische Gesellschaft, 1959.

———. "Zu den Synaxeis des Lebendigen Evangeliums," pp. 222–27. The text is enlarged (see above, 1957). "Neue Kephalaia des Mani," 252–66.

Browder, Michael H. "Al-Biruni as a Source for Mani and Manichaeism." PhD diss., Duke University, 1982.

———. A Manichaean Anthology: A New English Translation of the Manichäische Homilien. Floppy Disc, 1985.

Crum, W. E. A Coptic Dictionary. 1939. Reprinted with a new foreword by James M. Robinson. Ancient Language Resources. Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock, 2005.

Fackelmann, Michael. Restaurierung von Papyrus und anderen Schriftträgern aus Ägypten. Studia Amstelodamensia ad Epigraphicam, Jus Antiquum et Papyrologicam Pertinenta 24. Zuphen, The Netherlands: Terra, 1985.

Gardner, Iaian. Coptic Theological Papyri II Edition, Commentary, Translation: With an Appendix "The Docetic Jesus." Mitteilungen aus der Papyrussammlung der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek [Papyrus Erzherzog Rainer], n.S. 21 MPER XXI. Vienna: Österreiche Nationalbibliothek bei Verlag Brüder Hollinek, 1988.

Giversen, Søren. The Manichaean Coptic Papyri in the Chester Beatty Library. Vol. 1, Kephalaia. Facsimile edition. Cahiers d'Orientalisme 14. Geneva: Cramer, 1986.

———. The Manichaean Coptic Papyri in the Chester Beatty Library. Vol. 2, Homilies and Varia. Facsimile edition. Cahiers d'Orientalisme 15. Geneva: Cramer, 1986 [1987].

———. The Manichaean Coptic Papyri in the Chester Beatty Library. Vol. 3, Psalm Book Part 1. Facsimile edition. Cahiers d'orientalisme 16. Geneva: Cramer, 1988.

———. The Manichaean Coptic Papyri in the Chester Beatty Library. Volume 4, Psalm Book, Part 2. Facsimile edition. Cahiers d'orientalisme 17. Geneva: Cramer, 1988.

———. The Manichaean Papyri of the Chester Beatty Library. Proceedings of the Irish Biblical Association 11. Dublin, 1988.

———. "The Manichaean Texts from the Chester Beatty Collection." In Manichaean Studies: Proceedings of the First International Conference on Manichaeism August 5–9 1987; Department of History of Religions—Lund University Sweden, edited by Peter Bryder, 265–72. Lund Studies in African and Asian Religions 1. Lund: Lund University plus Ultra, 1988.

———. "The Unedited Chester Beatty Mani Texts." In Codex Manichaicus Coloniensius: Atti del Simposio Internazionale (Rende-Amantea 3–7 settembre 1984), edited by Luigi Cirillo with Amneris Roselli, 371–80. Cosenza: Marra, 1986.

Ibscher, Hugo. "Die Handschrift." In Kephalaia, edited by H. J. Polotsky and Alexander Böhlig, v–xiv. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1940.

———. "Die Handschriften." In A Manichaean Psalm-Book. Part II, edited by C. R. C. Allberry, i–xxiii. Manichaean Manuscripts in the Chester Beatty Collection 2. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1938.

Ibscher, Rolf. "Das Konservierungswerk an den Manichäischen Papyruscodices: Vortrag, gehalten auf dem VIII. Internationalen Papyrologen-Kongress in Wien 1955." Unpublished typescript.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

———. "Mani und kein Ende." In Atti dell'XI Congresso Internazionale di Papirologia, Milano 2–8 Settembre 1965, 218–24. Milan: Istituto Lombardo di Scienze e Lettere, 1966.

———. "Über den Stand der Umkonservierung der Manipapyri." In Koptologische Studien in der DDR: Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Martin-Luther Universität Halle-Wittenberg 1965, Sonderheft, 50–64. Originally presented December 14–15, 1964.

———. "Wiederaufnahme und neuester Stand der Konservierung der Manichäischen Papyruscodices." In Proceedings of the Twenty-third International Congress of Orientalists. Cambridge, 21st–28th August, 1954. London: The Royal Asiatic Society,- 1956. Abstract, pp. 359–360. Zusammenfassung des auf dem Internationalen Orientalisten-Kongress gehaltenen Berichts, typescript, 4 pp. [Cited according to the complete text in typescript, 12 pp., unless otherwise indicated.]

Ibscher, Rolf, Carsten Colpe, and Alexander Böhlig. "Der Mani-Fund." In Akten des Vierundzwanzigsten Internationalen Orientalisten-Kongresses München, 28. August bis 4. September 1957. Wiesbaden: Deutsche Morgenländische Gesellschaft, 1959.

Kasser, Rodolphe. "Projet international pour la publication des manuscrits manichéens coptes de Medinet Madi appartenant à la Chester Beatty Library (premier communiqué)." Newsletter of the International Association for Coptic Studies 19 (1986) 6–7.

King, Karen. "A Progress Report on the Editing of the Manichaean Synaxeis Codex." In Actes du IVe congrès copte, Louvain-la-Neuve, 5–10 Septembre 1988, edited by Marguerite Rassart-Debergh and Julien Ries, 281–88. Publications de l'Institut orientaliste de Louvain 40. Louvain: Université Catholique de Louvain, 1992.

Koenen, Ludwig. "Augustine and Manichaeism in Light of the Cologne Mani Codex." Illinois Classical Studies 3 (1978) 154–95.

Krause, Martin. Review of The Facsimile Edition of the Nag Hammadi Codices: Introduction. ZDMG 138 (1988) 378.

Kühnel-Kunze, Irene. Bergung—Evakuierung—Rückführung: Die Berliner Museen in den Jahren 1939–1959. Jahrbuch Preussicher Kulturbesitz, Sonderband 2. Berlin: Mann, 1984.

Lewis, Patricia K. G. Charles Allberry: A Portrait. Cambridge, UK: Plumridge, 1984.

Luke, Otto Walter. "Die Umkonservierung des Berliner Kephalaia-Kodex." Staatliche Museen Berlin: Forschungen und Berichte 12 (1970) 151–52.

Maugham, W. Somerset. The Razor's Edge. Introduction by Anthony Curtis. Penguin Twentieth-Century Classics. New York: Penguin, 1992.

Merkelbach, Reinhold. Mani und sein Religionssystem. Rheinisch-Westfälische Akademie der Wissenschaften. Geisteswissenschaften. Vorträge: G 281. Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag, 1986.

Mirecki, Paul Allan. "The Coptic Manichaean Synaxeis Codex: Descriptive Catalogue of Synaxis Chapter Titles." In Manichaean Studies: Proceedings of the First International Conference on Manichaeism August 5–9, 1987; Department of History of Religions, Lund University, Sweden, edited by Peter Bryder, 135–45. Lund Studies in African and Asian Religions 1. Lund: Lund University plus Ultra, 1988.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

Müller, Wolfgang. "In memoriam Rolf Ibscher (18.9.1906—5.2.1967)." APF 20 (1970) 207.

———. "Die koptischen Handschriften der Berliner Papyrussammlung." In Koptologische Studien in der DDR, 65–85. Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg 1965, Sonderheft. Halle: Institut für Byzantinistik der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg, 1965. [The meeting at which the paper was presented took place December 14–15, 1964.]

Orlandi, Tito. "Les manuscrits coptes de Dublin, du British Museum et de Vienne." Le Muséon 89 (1976) 323–38.

Polotsky, H. J. Manichäische Homilien. Manichäische Handschriften der Sammlung A. Chester Beatty 1. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1934.

Polotsky, H. J., and Alexander Böhlig, editors. Kephalaia. Manichäische Handshhriften der staatlichen Museen Berlins, herausgegeben im Auftrage der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften unter Leitung von Prof. Carl Schmidt, 1. Hälfte (Lieferung 1–10). Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1940.

Putt, S. Gorley. "Charles Allberry and Roy Calvert." Encounter 69 (1987) 70–76.

Regemorter, Berthe van. "Le codex relié depuis son origine jusqu'au Haut Moyen-Age." Le Moyen Age 61 (1955) 1–26.

———. Some Early Bindings from Egypt in the Chester Beatty Library. Chester Beatty Monographs 7. Dublin: Hodges Figgis, 1958.

———. Some Oriental Bindings in the Chester Beatty Library. Dublin: Hodges Figgis, 1961.

Robinson, James M. "International Committee for the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi." Newsletter of the International Association for Coptic Studies 19 (1986) 3–4.

———. "Organizational Meeting and First Work Session: International Committee for the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi." Newsletter of the International Association for Coptic Studies 19 (1986) 5.

Säve-Söderbergh, Torgny. Studies in the Coptic Manichaean Psalm-Book: Prosody and Mandaean Parallels. Arbeten utgivna med Understöd av Vilhelm Ekmans Universitetsfond, Uppsala 55. Uppsala: Almqvist & Wiksells, 1949.

Schenke, Hans-Martin. "Gnosis-Forschung 1984–1988." Paper presented at the Fourth International Congress on Coptic Studies of the International Association for Coptic Studies. Louvain-la-Neuve, Belgium, 5–10 September 1988.

Schmidt, Carl. Neue Originalquellen des Manichäismus aus Ägypten. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1933.

Schmidt, Carl, and H. J. Polotsky, with a contribution, "Die Handschriften," pp. 82–85, by Hugo Ibscher. "Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten: Originalschriften des Mani und seiner Schüler." In Sitzungsberichte der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, philosophisch-historische Klasse, 4–90. Berlin: Akademie, 1933.

Snow, C. P. The Light and the Dark. Strangers and Brothers. New York: Scribner, 1947.

Strangers and Brothers. Original release date, January 11, 1984 by the British Broadcasting Corporation. Distributed by Masterpiece Theatre. Directed by Jeremy Summers and Ronald Wilson. Written by Julian Bond, based on novels by C. P. Snow.

Tardieu, Michel. "Les Manichéens en Égypte." BSFE 94 (1982) 5–19.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

GUIDES

Brashear, William, Joachim Selim Karig, and Jürgen Settgast. Ägyptisches Museum Berlin: Staatliche Museen Preussicher Kulturbesitz, 1982.

[In the pocketbook series Museum. Braunschweig: Westermann, 1981, reprinted 1984. This material is summarized in more or less detail in the hardback booklet published by the Ägyptisches Museum der Stattlichen Museen, Preussischer Kulturbesitz, Berlin (West) in German, English, and French: Kniese, Sigrid and Liselotte Robbel. Ägyptisches Museum Berlin (1983). Fay, Biri. Egyptian Museum Berlin (1982, revised 1984); Alte, Monique. Musée Égyptien Berlin (1984).

Geismeier, Willi. Die "Museumsinsel." Die kleine Berolina-Reihe. Berlin Hauptstadt der DDR: Berlin-Werbung Berolina, n.d. (1961?)

Hühns, Erik. "Zur Geschichte der Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin." In Schätze der Weltkultur, 8–28. Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR: Staatliche Museen zu Berlin, and Berlin-Information, 2. Überarbeitete Auflage, 1981.

Müller, Wolfgang. "Einleitung." Kleiner Führer durch die Ausstellung des Ägyptischen Museums, 5–7. Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR: Staatliche Museen zu Berlin, Ägyptisches Museum, 1981.

Wipprech, E. Schloss Berlin-Friedrichsfelde: Der Bau und seine Wiederherstellung. "Vorwort" by H. Dathe, J. Schuchardt, and L. Deiters. Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR: Magistrat, n.d.

Zauzich, Karl-Theodor. "Die Papyrussammlung." In Kunst der Welt in den Berliner Museen: Ägyptisches Museum Staatliche Museen Preussicher Kulturbesitz, 10–12. Stuttgart: Belser, 1980.

This content downloaded from 128.119.168.112 on Sun, 04 Jun 2017 13:27:43 UTC
All use subject to http://about.jstor.org/terms

IAIN GARDNER AND
SAMUEL N. C. LIEU

Manichaean Texts from the Roman Empire

CAMBRIDGE www.cambridge.org/9780521560900

MANICHAEAN TEXTS FROM THE ROMAN EMPIRE

Founded by Mani (c. AD 216–76), a Syrian visionary of Judaeo-Christian background who lived in Persian Mesopotamia, Manichaeism spread rapidly into the Roman Empire in the third and fourth centuries AD and became one of the most persecuted heresies under Christian Roman emperors. The religion established missionary cells in Syria, Egypt, North Africa and Rome and has in Augustine of Hippo the most famous of its converts. The study of the religion in the Roman Empire has benefited from discoveries of genuine Manichaean texts from Medinet Madi and from the Dakhleh Oasis in Egypt, as well as successful decipherment of the Cologne Mani-Codex which gives an autobiography of the founder in Greek. This first ever single-volume collection of sources for this religion, which draws from material mostly unknown to English-speaking scholars and students, offers in translation genuine Manichaean texts from Greek, Latin and Coptic.

DR IAIN GARDNER is Chair and Senior Lecturer at the Department of Studies in Religion, Sydney University. He has published widely in Coptic and Manichaean studies, including the standard The Kephalaia of the Teacher (E. J. Brill, Leiden 1995). He is also editor for the newly found Manichaean texts from the Dakhleh Oasis.

SAMUEL NAN-CHIANG LIEU is Professor of Ancient History and Co-Director of the Ancient History Documentary Research Centre, Macquarie University. He is the author of many books including Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire and Medieval China (1985, second edition 1992); The Roman Eastern Frontier and the Persian Wars II AD 363–630 (with G. Greatrex, 2002); From Constantine to Julian: Pagan and Byzantine Views (with D. A. S. Montserrat, 1996); and The Roman Eastern Frontier and the Persian Wars AD 226–363 (with M. Dodgeon, 1991, revised 1994, 1996).

MANICHAEAN TEXTS FROM THE ROMAN EMPIRE

EDITED BY
IAIN GARDNER AND SAMUEL N. C. LIEU

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

Contents

List of plates page xi
List of maps xi
List of contributors xii
Preface xiii
Acknowledgements xiv
Notes for the reader xv
List of abbreviations xvii

1 Introduction 1
The purpose of this book 1
The life of Mani 3
The Manichaean system 8
Worship and ethic 21
The development of Manichaean studies 25
The survival of Manichaean texts from the Roman Empire 35

2 The life of Mani 46
Childhood, youth and calling 46
1 Mani's parentage, birth, childhood and adolescence 46
2 Mani's own version of early revelations from his divine Twin 47
3 Incidents from Mani's youth showing his refusal to harm even plants 48
4 Mani's account of his call 49
5 Mani's conflicts and break with the baptist community 58
6 The beginning of Mani's mission 66
Mani at the court of the Shahanshah (King of Kings) 73
7 Mani's calling and his summons before Shapur I 73
8 Mani's first encounter with Shapur I 75
9 Mani recounts his travels 76
The last days and death of Mani 79
10 Mani's change of fortune after the death of Hormizd 79
11 The confrontation between Mani and King Vahram I 84

12 Mani's imprisonment and death 85
13 Mani's entry into parinirvana 88
14 Praise for the martyred Mani 89
15 The sufferings of Mani compared to those of other true apostles 91
16 The institution of the bema 93
17 The death of Mani compared to the trial and crucifixion of Jesus the Messiah 94
18 The death of Mani commemorated in two bema psalms 95
The Manichaean church under Sisinnios and his successor Innaios 102
19 Persecution of the Manichaean church 102
20 The prayer and martyrdom of Sisinnios (Mar Sisin) 104

3 Manichaeism in the Roman Empire 109
Early mission and reaction 111
21 The mission of Mār Addā and Pattek the teacher 111
22 The healing of Nafšā of Tadmor (Palmyra) by Mār Addā 112
23 A warning against Manichaean missionaries 114
24 Alexander of Lycopolis on the Manichaean mission in Egypt 115
25 Edict (rescript) of Diocletian against the sect (AD 302) 116
26 Warning against door-to-door missions by the Manichaeans 119
Manichaeans and Christian ascetics in Egypt 119
27 Manichaeans out-argued by Didymus the Blind 119
28 A travelling Manichaean converted by true 'hospitality' 120
29 A Manichaean missionary challenged to trial by fire 121
30 A food-test imposed by the Patriarch Timothy 121
31 A story of two Manichaean merchants 122
Manichaeism in the Levant, Asia Minor and Greece 125
32 The debate between the Manichaea Julia and Porphyry the bishop of Gaza 125
33 The conversion of the Manichaeans at Ziph 129
34 The works of Mani and of Mār Addā refuted by Heraclianus of Chalcedon 129
Manichaeism in Italy and North Africa 130
35 The young Augustine joins the sect at Carthage as a hearer 130
36 A Manichaean house at Rome 134
37 Letter of the Manichaean Secundinus to Augustine 136
38 The Manichaean Firmus converted by a sermon of Augustine's 142
39 Victorinus exposed as a crypto-Manichaean 143
40 Manichaeans detected and punished in Carthage 144
Select legislations against the Manichaeans from Theodosius to Justinian 145
41 Anti-Manichaean legislation issued by Theodosius 145
42 The death penalty for Manichaeans 149
43 Mandate of Justinian I on Manichaeans' wills 150

4 The scriptures of Mani 151
44 Mani's canon according to the Kephalaia 153
45 Canon lists from an Arabic and a Chinese source 154
46 From The Living Gospel 156
47 From The Treasure of Life 159
48 From an unnamed work of Mani, probably The Pragmateia 160
49 From The Psalms and Prayers (?) 163
50 The titles of Mani's Epistles 165
51 A quotation from 'The Letter to Edessa' 166
52 Passages from The Epistles preserved at Ismant el-Kharab 166
53 'The Fundamental Epistle' 168
54 'The Letter to Menoch' 172
55 Spurious letters attributed to Mani 174

5 Teachings 176
56 The community sing 'the knowledge of Mani' 176
57 Alexander of Lycopolis on the Manichaean system 179
58 The Acta Archelai on cosmogony 182
59 Augustine's summary of the teaching 187
60 An account of the evocation of the gods 191
61 'The prayer of the emanations' 194
62 Concerning the coming of the soul 196
63 The five worlds of the kingdom of darkness 199
64 The 'three days' and the 'two deaths' 202
65 The seven works of the Living Spirit 204
66 Mani discusses astrology 205
67 The Coptic treatise on the Light Mind 208
68 The descent of Jesus 217
69 Augustine on Manichaean Christology 218
70 A psalm by Herakleides 219
71 The great war and the last judgement 220
72 Four recently edited Kephalaia 226
73 Manichaean and other 'errors' concerning the destiny of the soul after death (Christian polemic) 229

6 Worship and ethic 231
74 The essential precepts of the elect and the catechumens 231
75 The archetypes of ritual action 232
76 The three seals 236
77 Augustine on the bema festival 237
78 A bema psalm 237
79 The profits of fasting 240
80 A psalm of endurance 240
81 Augustine on Manichaean ethics 244

82 Augustine on the redemption of the light particles 245
83 A psalm of the universal soul 246
84 A psalm to glorify the Mind 247
85 Mani's discourse on the 'assent' and the 'amen' 249
86 The nature of love 252
87 A psalm in praise of Jesus 253
88 A psalm to the Trinity 254
89 A prayer for the ascent of the soul 256

7 Community texts 259
90 The advent of Mani 260
91 On the ten advantages of the Manichaean religion 265
92 An apologia for the distinction between elect and hearer 268
93 A father instructs his young son 272
94 The son writes to his mother 275
95 An elect encourages a sick catechumen 277
96 An elect writes to ask for alms 277
97 A Manichaean scribe sends a spell to a colleague 278
98 Horion discusses preparations for the agape 280

List and concordance of texts 282
Glossary 290
Bibliography 298
Index 307

Illustrations

PLATES

2.1 Cologne Mani-Codex p. 94 page 64
5.1 Prayer of the Emanations from Kellis 194
7.1 General view of Ismant el-Kharab (ancient Kellis) 260
7.2 Manichaean psalms from Kellis 273

MAPS

1 The Sassanian Empire xix
2 The Roman Empire xx

Contributors

SIMONETTA CALDERINI is Senior Lecturer in Islamic Studies, University of Surrey Roehampton.

SARAH CLACKSON was Lady Wallis Budge Research Fellow in Egyptology at Christ's College, Cambridge and co-editor of the Dictionary of Manichaean Texts vol. I (Turnhout, 1998) which is part of the UNESCO-sponsored Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum Project.

IAIN GARDNER is Chair of the Department of Studies in Religion at the University of Sydney.

MICHAEL LAFFAN is post-doctoral Research Fellow with the International Institute for Asian Studies, Leiden University and formerly Research Fellow, Melbourne Institute of Asian Languages and Societies.

SAM LIEU is Professor of Ancient History and Co-Director of the Ancient History Documentary Research Centre at Macquarie University, Sydney.

JUDITH LIEU is Professor of New Testament Studies at King's College London.

STEPHEN LLEWELYN is Lecturer in Early Christian and Jewish Studies in the Department of Ancient History at Macquarie University.

MARK VERMES is a lawyer in Birmingham (UK) and an honorary Senior Research Fellow of the Ancient History Documentary Research Centre at Macquarie University, Sydney, Australia. He was formerly research assistant to the Directors of the Greek and Latin sections of the Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum Project.

Preface

The genesis of this book was in the late 1980s when Samuel Lieu first proposed the concept for the volume and approached Iain Gardner to collaborate, especially with translations of the extensive Coptic corpus. Gardner began to prepare portions of the Kephalaia codex, but in fact that developed into an entirely separate volume which is only partly represented here. Over a number of years the authors collected texts and made translations whilst they were occupied with other projects (often these contributed entirely new or previously unavailable pieces). Then, in 2000, we finally had the opportunity to put together the translations and introductions that we had gathered for this volume. We are very grateful to our contributors, some of whom had to complete their translations to meet stringent deadlines. We are grateful too to the British Academy, the Australian Research Council, the Seven Pillars of Wisdom Trust and Warwick and Macquarie Universities for grants over a number of years for research on Manichaean texts discovered in Egypt and in Central Asia. To Dr Malcolm Choat we owe a warm word of thanks for helping in the task of indexing and final checking of the typescript. We would also like to thank Dr Michael Sharp at Cambridge University Press for his personal interest in the project and Professor Aloïs van Tongerloo and his research assistants at Catholic University of Leuven, Mr Dieter Taillieu and Kristof D'hulster for checking the translations from the Fihrist of Ibn an-Nadīm. Sam Lieu would like personally to thank the staff and fellows of the Ancient History Documentary Research Centre at Macquarie University for providing an excellent home for the Manichaean Documentation Centre which greatly facilitated research on this volume.

Notes for the reader

A good number of the translations included here have been made by the editors specially for this volume, either individually or in some combination with various scholars. Other translations have been specifically commissioned, whilst some have been drawn from published works. We would like to note that all the pieces have, to some extent, been adapted to conform to a basically uniform style throughout. In particular, technical terms, such as the names of Manichaean divinities, have mostly been given the same form throughout (there are some exceptions, such as the retention of the term Syzygos in the Cologne Mani-Codex). Where improved readings have been suggested (for instance to the Manichaean Psalm-Book text edited by Allberry in the 1930s), the translation will reflect those according to the judgement of the editors. These adaptations, which range from minor matters of house style to major improvements to the textual sense, have not been individually noted; though the occasions where radical revisions to the editio princeps have been possible are generally explained or referenced in the introductions to those pieces.

While the selection of texts is intended to be as representative as possible, and includes well-known pieces as well as some previously unavailable, some allowance has been made for the question of whether texts are easily accessible in a modern English translation. Thus, at the beginning, it was intended to provide especially substantial portions of The Kephalaia of the Teacher, since this only then existed in a German translation that was not always easy to obtain. However, now that that work has been published by Gardner as a separate volume, the selections of that text have been substantially reduced, and are slanted towards parts of the codex edited after Gardner's English translation of the rest appeared.

Sources that appear here have been restricted to only a few pages per piece. This means that some especially long texts (such as the Cologne Mani-Codex) have been artificially broken up according to subject matter. These sections accord only to the purposes of this book, and do not reflect the intentions of the ancient authors. Equally, punctuation, paragraphs and such like have been imposed upon texts with the intention to make them more accessible to the modern reader. The following editorial signs are also used: round brackets ( ) indicate explanatory material added by the editors; square brackets [ ] indicate lacunae in the text; angular brackets < > denote words or phrases added to the text.

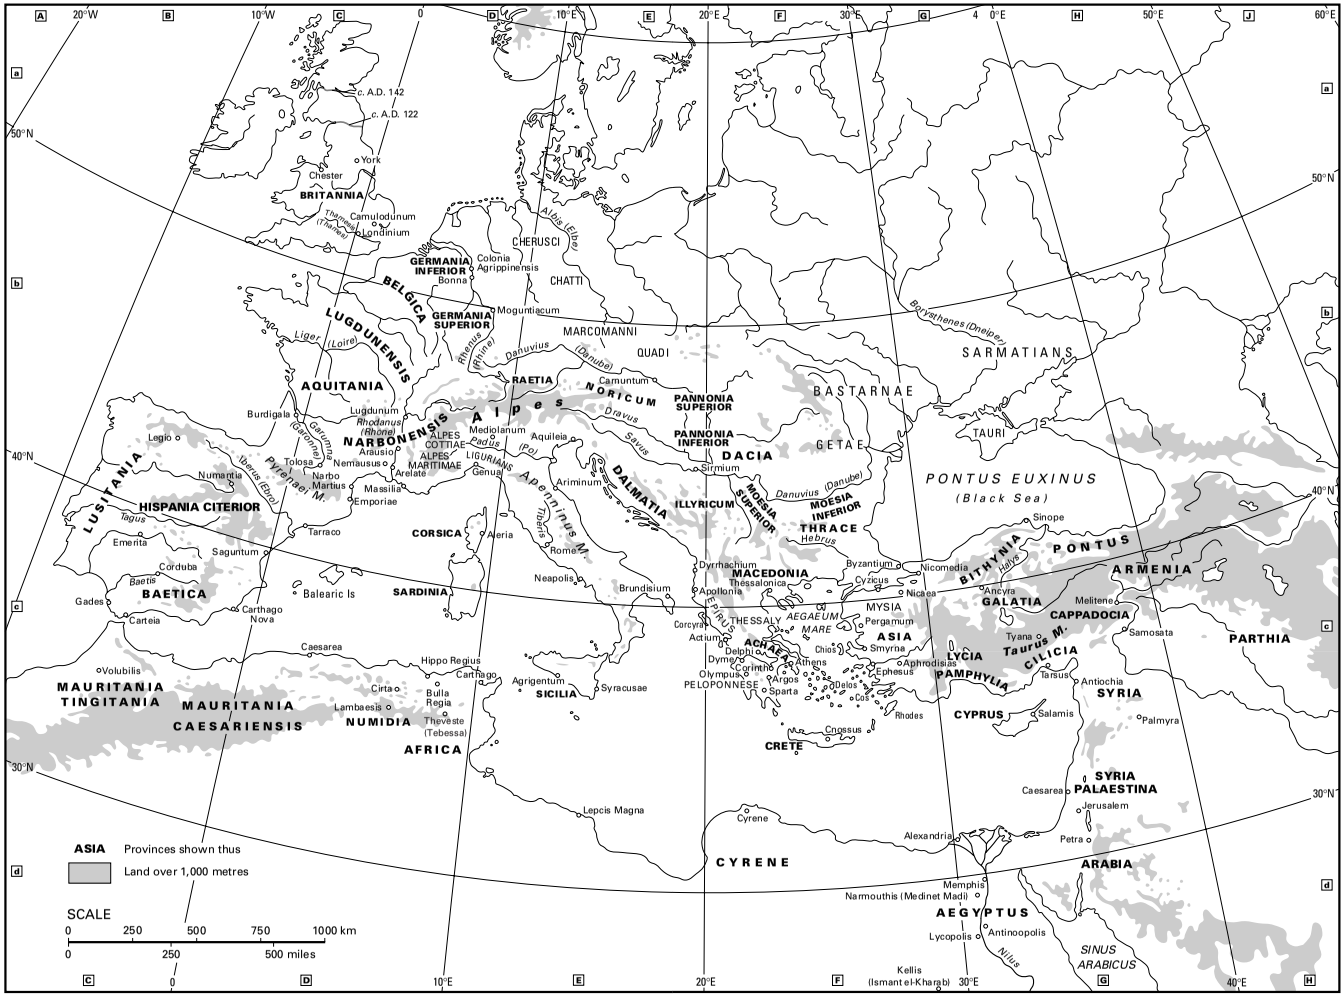
Linguistic notes and terms in the ancient languages have been kept to the absolute minimum. Often, where the editors are aware that divergent interpretations are possible, these are not recorded; but a choice has been made according to our judgement. The overall purpose is to fulfil a felt need for an easily accessible selection of Manichaean texts from the Roman Empire; accurate to the best standards of contemporary scholarship, but in English and uncluttered with technical detail.

Abbreviations



Full details of works referred to by author and date may be found in the Bibliography. Abbreviations of journal titles follow those in L'Année Philologique (Paris, 1927-).

APAW	Abhandlungen der königlichen preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Berlin, 1815–1907; philosoph.-hist. Klasse, 1908–49.
Arab.	Arabic
Aug.	Aurelius Augustinus (Augustine)
Chin.	Chinese
CJ	Codex Justinianus, ed. P. Krueger, Corpus Iuris Civilis, II (Berlin 1929)
CMC	Cologne Mani-Codex
CSCO	Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium (Paris, Louvain etc. 1903ff)
CSEL	Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum (Vienna, 1866ff)
CSHB	Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae, 49 vols. (Bonn 1828–78)
CT	Codex Theodosianus, eds. Th. Mommsen and P. M. Meyer, Theodosiani libri XVI cum Constitutionibus Sirmondianis et Leges novellae ad Theodosianum pertinentes, 2 vols. (Berlin 1905)
Fihrist	an-Nadīm, Fihrist, ed. Flügel (1871)
Gr.	Greek
GSR	Klimkeit (1993)
Hipp.	Hippolytus
Hom.	Manichäische Homilien, ed. H. J. Polotsky (Stuttgart 1934)

HR II	F. W. K. Müller, Handschriften-Reste in Estrangelo-Schrift aus Turfan, Chinesisch-Turkistan II, aus den Anhang zu den APAW, 1904, 1–117
Keph.	Kephalaia, eds. A. Böhlig and H. J. Polotsky (1940); A. Böhlig (1966) and W.-P. Funk (1999-) (Stuttgart)
KG	Sundermann (1981)
MCPCBL	Giversen (1986, 1988)
Mid. Pers.	Middle Persian
MM I-III	F. C. Andreas and W. B. Henning, Mitteliranische Manichaica aus Chinesisch Turkestan I, SPAW 1932, X, 175–222; II SPAW 1933, VII, 294–363; III SPAW 1934, XXVII, 848–912
P. Harr. I	The Rendall Harris Papyri of Woodbrooke College, Birmingham, ed. J. E. Powell (Cambridge 1936)
P. Kell. II	Gardner (1996)
P. Kell. V	Gardner, Alcock and Funk (1999)
PG	Patrologiae cursus completus, series Graeco-Latina, eds. J. P. Migne et al., 162 vols. (Paris 1857–66).
PL	Patrologiae cursus completus, series Latina, eds. J. P. Migne et al., 221 vols. (Paris 1844–64) and 5 suppl. (1958–74)
PO	Patrologia Orientalis, eds. R. Graffin and F. Nau (Paris 1907ff)
P. Oxy.	The Oxyrhynchus Papyri I- (London 1898-)
PsBk2.	A Manichaean Psalm-Book. Part II, ed. C. R. C. Allberry (Stuttgart 1938)
Pth.	Parthian
Sogd.	Sogdian
SPAW	Sitzungsberichte der preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Berlin, 1882–1921; philosoph.-hist. Klasse, 1922–49.
T. Kell.	Tabula Kelliensis, texts either in Gardner (1996); or published separately (publication details in respective entries)

Map 1 The Sassanian Empire

Map 2 The Roman Empire

CHAPTER I

Introduction

THE PURPOSE OF THIS BOOK

The term 'Manichaean' is here used in its primary sense, with reference to the religion that was founded by Mani (or Manichaios, that is Mani 'the living' as the original Syriac was transmitted into Greek) in the early Sassanian empire during the third century of the common era. Mani was a visionary, for he was a mystic and a painter; he was an intellectual, with a passion for understanding all aspects of the natural world and integrating them into a coherent system; but he was also intensely practical in his approach to this divine revelation and this knowledge. We might say that Manichaeism is the first real 'religion' in the modern sense, because Mani established it directly and deliberately, with its scriptures and its rituals and its organisation all in place. A principal aspect of his purpose was that this teaching and this practice and this community would be universal, and would supersede all previous faiths (which indeed were understood to reach their true culmination here). Mani himself travelled widely to preach, heal, convert and establish communities; and he dispatched missionaries in all directions. This book is concerned with the religion's spread and success and ultimate demise to the west of its homeland, that is in the world of the later Roman Empire.

> In the last years of Ardashir the king I came out to preach. I crossed to the country of the Indians. I preached to them the hope of life. I chose in that place a good election. In the year that Ardashir the king died Shapur his son became king. I crossed from the country of the Indians to the land of the Persians; from the land of Persia I came to the land of Babylon, Mesene and Susiana. I appeared before Shapur the king. He received me with great honour. He gave me permission to journey . . . preaching the word of life. I even spent some years . . . in the retinue; many years in Persia, in the country of the Parthians, up to Adiabene, and the borders of the provinces of the kingdom of the Romans.

> I have chosen you, the good election, the holy church that I was sent to from the Father. I have sown the seed of life. I have . . . from east to west . . . my hope has gone toward the sunrise of the world, and every inhabited part; to the clime of the north, and the . . . Not one among the apostles did ever do these things . . . (my hope) will remain in the world until (the return of Jesus in judgement, and he will place my) church on the right side (and the evildoers) on the left.[1]

Mani's call to the founding of this new and final community came about the year AD 240, and the first Manichaean mission would have reached Alexandria about AD 260. In the Roman Empire Manichaeism arrived as a rival to Christianity, itself suffering its final persecutions before the triumph under Constantine. Indeed, Mani announced himself as the 'apostle of Jesus Christ', its preachers proclaimed that they preached the true gospel, and condemned their opponents as failed or only 'part Christians'. The fourth century saw a bitter conflict between these two interpretations, a conflict that what we now call Christianity ultimately won, allied as it became with secular power. Manichaeism became cursed as the ultimate heresy.

Manichaean studies have seen major growth and development over recent decades. A substantial reason has been the repeated and often spectacular discoveries, of primary and previously unknown texts in particular, which have led to the transformation of our understanding and to the emergence of an entirely new discipline. At the same time, the topic has spoken to contemporary interests in the deconstruction of received histories, here with regard to the 'triumph' of Christianity and its defeat of heresy; in the reconstruction of alternative Christianities, especially the so-called 'gnostic' movements of the early church; in attitudes to the body and to the natural world, where Manichaeism provides a striking and obsessive new vision; and in dialogue between religions and cultures, for Manichaeism spread to both east and west, and interacted not only with Christianity but also with Buddhism, Islam and Taoism.

The purpose of this book is, therefore, to make available many of the diverse and scattered sources relevant to an understanding of the subject. The development of Manichaean studies in the anglophone world has been hampered by the traditional leadership in this field by scholars from the elite universities of the European continent. Also, the topic is shared (and in a sense falls) between many traditional disciplines, so that developments are often not followed by non-specialists. As authors of this book, it is our hope to provide in a convenient and accessible format the resources and the knowledge necessary for an understanding of Manichaeism in the Roman Empire; this for scholars and students of ancient history and adjacent disciplines in the English-speaking world. It is with this purpose in mind that we have made our selections of material, imposed structure and order, and offered introductory comments to each piece (and these we have tried to keep short and specific). Specialised linguistic notes have been kept to an absolute minimum, and we have mostly omitted seriously damaged text. The material presented here is not intended to substitute for advanced work, for this the scholar must turn to the critical editions of the primary texts in the original languages, and to the detailed studies. In this sense, this is an introductory source-book; but at the same time we have striven for total accuracy and awareness of the very leading scholarship in the field; and, indeed, some of the material presented here is in advance of that published anywhere in the world.

[1] Keph. 15. 24–16. 17 abbreviated.

THE LIFE OF MANI

Mani was born, according to a Manichaean source in Chinese, on 14 April 216. His father, Pattek (Arab. Futtuq, Gr. Pattikios, Mid. Pers. Ptyg), is said to have come from Ecbatana (modern Hamadan), the ancient capital of the Parthian Kingdom; and to have later taken up residence in Seleucia-Ctesiphon in Mesopotamia, then the winter capital of the Parthians and later of the Sassanians. The name of his mother is known to us in Arabic as Mays[2] or Awtāḫīm or Mar Maryam, and in Chinese as Man-yen (lit. 'full of beauty', perhaps a transliteration for Maryam) of the royal house of the Arsacids (Arab. Ašgāniyya) and from Chin-sa-chien (probably a transliteration for Kamsaragan, a region of Parthia).[3] The presumed descent of his parents from Arsacid lineage could explain Mani's reserve toward the first Sassanian ruler Ardashir who overthrew the last Parthian king Artabanus V in 224. His father is said to have been told by a divine voice in a pagan temple at Seleucia-Ctesiphon not to eat meat or to drink wine, and to stay away from women. In obedience to this call he joined one of the baptist sects existing in Mesopotamia. The group he joined, which acknowledged the Jewish-Christian leader Elchasai(os) as one of its founders, was very active in missionary work, and not only endeavoured to spread within the Persian Empire, but had even gone as far as Rome. It is possible that Mani received some impetus for his world mission from it, and it may be the source of his reference back to the patriarchs of Hebrew tradition: Adam, Seth, Enosh, Enoch, Shem.

[2] Fihrist, trans. Dodge, II, 773.
[3] Mo-ni kuang-fo chiao-fa yi-lüeh, ms. line 19, trans. Haloun and Henning (1952), 190.

After his birth, Mani stayed with his mother for four years until his father took him to join the 'baptists'. He lived in their community until he left them soon after his twenty-fourth birthday (his twenty-fifth year) and began to preach his own doctrine. The time with the 'baptists' was of special importance for his personal and spiritual development. He believed that he had twice had a vision in which he encountered his divine 'twin' (his Syzygos), at the age of twelve and at the age of twenty-four. In true hagiographical fashion, Mani was shown in the CMC as wanting to reform the sect. He even put words characteristic of his own teaching into Elchasai(os)'s mouth. For example, the 'baptists' used to carry out ablutions; they washed or baptised vegetables which they grew in their gardens, not only for their own use but also to sell in town (see below, pp. 48–9). Mani, however, was utterly opposed to the baptisms and ablutions, because he saw them as being harmful to the light particles which were bound in them. According to Mani, Elchasai(os) had already had a vision while bathing which pointed out to him the sinfulness of this act. Mani regarded the ablutions carried out by the baptists in the context of a great cosmic event, and criticised them. The Sabbath 'rest of hands' observed by the community seems to have led him to the radical conclusion that hands should do no work at all. Mani opposed the ritual use of a certain type of bread, so he was asked if he wanted to eat 'Greek bread'. His companions simply noticed that he neglected their customs; nor did he take vegetables from the garden himself, but asked for them as if asking for alms (see below, pp. 48–9 and 60–5).

Among the men of revelation who, in Mani's opinion, preceded Elchasai(os) was Jesus the Messiah. Thereafter, after failing to reform the community along more gnostic lines, Mani was able to present himself as the fulfilment of the promise of the Paraclete given in the Gospel according to St John. According to the young Mani, Elchasai(os) already wanted to use this name to give himself mythical justification. In the war of words prior to his leaving the sect, the young Mani was accused by some of turning to another trend in Christianity, namely the 'Greeks'; it is possible to understand this as Marcionism. As Mani set great store by Paul in his own writings, and as Paul was regarded as the enemy to many Jewish-Christian sects, Mani could not have derived this reverence from the teaching of the baptists. Mani also seems to have been familiar with the teaching of the Christian gnostic thinker Bardaiṣan (who flourished in Edessa in the last years of the Abgar Dynasty during the second and third centuries AD), on cosmogony; as well as that of Valentinus on the division of body and soul.

Mani was not one who merely wanted to construct a system out of philosophical elements and then disseminate it. Rather, he was wholly convinced that he was the 'seal of the prophets'. As mentioned before, he had a vision of his alter ego on his twelfth birthday who had enlightened him about his true existence and calling, but who also required him to stay with the Elchasaites until he had reached full maturity. In those days one reached adulthood at twenty-five. In fact, Mani stayed with the baptists until after his twenty-fourth birthday; but he was already leading a life according to the revelation of his Syzygos ('Twin', or more accurately 'Pair-comrade'). As has already been said, this finally led to disagreements between Mani and his group. When he had turned twenty-four (i.e. in his twenty-fifth year – 'when my body had reached completion'), he had a new vision of his Syzygos. He ordered Mani to appear independently from now on, and that he should do missionary work. This heavenly alter ego is also identified in Manichaean writings with the Johannine Paraclete. Mani unites with his alter ego in the revelation, so that he can be rightly regarded as Paraclete. He began his missionary work during the reign of Ardashir (224–42), but presumably at a time when Shapur I (240–73) had already been crowned co-sovereign.

The second part of the preserved sections of the Greek Mani Codex, which narrates the early missionary activities of Mani and the foundation of his church, is very fragmentary (viz. ms. pages 99 ad fin., see below, pp. 65–73). It appears that after he had broken away from the community Mani first went to Ctesiphon, and from there to a village called Naser where he was joined by his father Patticius who had also left the sect. The two then, with a small band of fellow baptists, became wandering holy men; and Mani soon showed his mettle as a dispenser of wise teaching and a performer of miracles. The party travelled northeast to Ganzak, at that time a Zoroastrian stronghold and a residence of the King of Kings. There he introduced himself as a doctor and cured a young child. It was probably on the Iranian Plateau that Mani encountered a hairy hermit who admitted to him that his abnormal covering was the result of taking the best fruits from a tree, thus confirming Manichaean belief in the need of the elect members to avoid hurting the Light elements which are in fruit and vegetables (see below, pp. 67–70).

Mani then turned his attentions to India, probably because he was unable to win imperial patronage for his new teaching from Ardashir during his visit to Ganzak. He travelled first to the important port of Ferat on the Persian Gulf, where he befriended a rich merchant called Oggias (?), and it appears that he travelled to India via Turan and Makran; but it is equally possible for him to have travelled back to Ferat in Mesene from Ganzak via these regions. According to Middle Iranian sources he is said to have converted the Shah of Turan in the course of his journeys, and we have in the Greek Mani Codex the account of the conversion of at least one local king and his entourage before he reached Ferat. The encounter with Buddhism in India and adjacent territories was important for the development of the universal and the ascetic aspects of his teaching. Manichaean hagiographical sources speak of him being regarded as Buddha by the ruler there, and being successful in his teaching; whereas the Kephalaia also acknowledges difficulties in gaining acceptance. When Ardashir died in 242 and Shapur I became his fully acknowledged successor, Mani returned to the Iranshar from India. He landed in Rew-Ardasir, went to Persis (modern Fars) and then to Babylonia, from where he went to Mesene and Susiana. In Mesene he won over the ruler Mihrshah;[4] he was introduced to the Great King by the latter's brother Peroz whom Mani had presumably got to know in Marw as governor of Chorasan.[5] Shapur I intended to expand the Iranian Empire in all directions and to strengthen it internally at the same time. Mani seemed to him to be the very man for this purpose. His belief was especially suited to the East because of the elements which either came from Buddhism or were confirmed by it. The syncretistic self-awareness which was characteristic of Mani's perception of himself, and which made him consider himself to be the perfection and fulfilment of the three great religions, Buddhism, Zoroastrianism and Christianity, would allow him to appear as a spiritual cement for the Iranian Empire. He was granted membership of the King's retinue for a long time. Furthermore, it was possible for him to do missionary work within the boundaries of the empire or its sphere of influence. Apart from the aforementioned provinces, he was thus able to preach in Media and Parthia also; and in the Caucasus as well, as at least one Manichaean missionary was active during Mani's life-time in the city of Waruc in Iberia (modern Georgia).[6]

Given the fact that Zoroastrianism was the official religion of his imperial patrons, Mani's religion diffused within the Zoroastrian milieu and at an early stage it assimilated Zoroastrian deities into its pantheon. A more Judaeo-Christian version of his religion spread in the Roman Empire, and also into Parthia where it came under the influence of Zurvanism and later of Buddhism. The two main streams (Judaeo-Christian and Zoroastrian) of Manichaeism later merged in Central Asia, from where many Manichaean texts were recovered in the region of Turfan, and in the Cave of Thousand

[4] M47, KG, §10 (1576–1607), pp. 102–3. [5] Fihrist, trans. Dodge, II, 776.
[6] M216b + M2230 (Parthian), KG, §2.3 (130–49), pp. 24–5 and U237 + U295 (Turkish), ed. Zieme (1975) §21, pp. 50–1.

Buddhas from Dunhuang. The lack of awareness by earlier scholars of the complex history of diffusion of the religion has led to it being seen either exclusively as a form of Zoroastrianism (or Zurvanism) or as a deviant form of Syriac Christianity.

It appears from circumstantial references in the Kephalaia that Mani spent much of his years under Shapur's patronage in the Twin-Cities of Seleucia-Ctesiphon teaching his growing band of disciples. This may explain why the Twin-Cities (Arab. al-Madain) later became the seat of the archegos (Arab. imam) of the sect. After Shapur's death (273) Mani does not seem to have had any difficulties under his successor Hormizd I, but his reign only lasted for one year (273–4). He was succeeded by his brother Vahram I (274–6/7). From Hormizd-Ardashir (Suq al-Ahwaz) in Susiana Mani wanted to go to Kushan, which must be Chorasan, the governor of which held the title of Kushanshah. It was probably the only territory within the Iranshar which could offer him personal safety. In any case he was forbidden to undertake the journey. Full of anger and grief, he returned to Hormizd-Ardashir and then went to Mesene. He knew then that he was on his last journey.[7]

Mani travelled to Ctesiphon in order to go to Bet Lapat from there. At the same time he wanted to meet the vassal King Baat, who seems to have joined his religion and who intended being there also but who then preferred to absent himself. The King later reproached Mani for this. It is likely that Vahram had a hostile attitude towards Mani and his teaching right from the start, thinking it had a destructive effect on his Empire where the Magians and their superiors had gained a decisive influence. After all, Mani's teachings, and the ethics derived from them, were totally contradictory to the feudalist lifestyle. The rejection of procreation, the condemnation of hunting, indeed in effect of all knightly sport because of the fear of harming light particles, must necessarily have led to disputes when it came to acquainting the ruling warrior class with his teachings. They might well be useful as a means of controlling subjects of non-Iranian mentality. According to a later Arabic tradition, Vahram said: 'This man has set off, incited to cause the destruction of the world. Because of this, it is necessary to begin by destroying him before any of his intentions can succeed.'[8] The discussion between the King and Mani, which was extremely acrimonious, amply demonstrates the conflict between secular and spiritual power. The King of Kings was angered especially by Mani's self-assurance of being enlightened by God. He saw in this the arrogance of a subject who took to himself unauthorised qualities. Here the conflicting interests of king and prophet clash. It was of no help to Mani either that he referred to King Shapur who had given him his support. Opinion against Mani was certainly stirred up by his accusers. The preserved texts are quite concrete in the description of the events. They show how the charge was carried out through the official channels. The Magians who saw Mani arrive in Bet Lapat turned to the chief Magian, Karder. He then consulted a colleague of his. Next to the Chief of Chief Magians (mobadan mobad) was also the Chief of the Priests of Fire (herbadan herbad). Whereas the former had special moral and spiritual influence over the King, the latter was a man who had not only ritual but also juridical functions. It is no wonder that these two men, as representatives of state church offices, consulted the Vizier in a difficult religious trial. The Vizier reported the situation to the King, who thereupon summoned Mani before him. The King's wrath resulted in the chaining and imprisonment of Mani, where he died after 26 days.[9] However, he had the opportunity to receive visitors, and thus to prepare his congregation for his end. The year of Mani's death is still in dispute. Scholarly opinion vacillates between 276 and 277 (see below, p. 89).

[7] All the relevant sources (mainly Middle Persian and Parthian) are conveniently collected in Henning (1942).

[8] al-Biruni (1878) 207. 7–9.

THE MANICHAEAN SYSTEM

Manichaeism was a religious system that taught a practice for the salvation of the divine in the universe; and which presented a revealed (and in principle total) knowledge of transcendent realities, including the divine nature of the soul, and the details of the pathway to eternal life. At its core was an analysis of the causes and nature of evil and suffering in the world, the predicament in which human and all life are entangled, that was entirely coherent in its own terms. Certainly, Mani directly utilised prior revelations; and in this way particular concepts can be tracked, especially from esoteric or heterodox forms of prior Judaisms and Christianities, through Manichaeism, and into later metamorphoses such as in Shi'ite Islam and the neo-Manichaean sects of the medieval period. However, the religion should first be studied and must be understood as a complete, self-contained world-view; for this was how Mani and his followers presented it to society. Echoes of other faiths and teachings were placed in relation to the revelation of Mani, so that for the believer all reality was measured against this given presentation of the one truth. Thus, Manichaeism should be categorised as a religion in its own right, and not subordinated to whatever influences the historian may track.

[9] The most important source on the death of Mani is the 'Narrative on his Crucifixion' in the Coptic Homilies (42–85, ed. Polotsky). This text has been translated in full by Dr S. Clackson for this collection (10).

What is often termed the 'gnostic' character of Manichaeism must be strongly qualified, for Mani turned his revealed knowledge outwards to a universal evangelical purpose. Thus, whilst the elect learnt the secret workings of the divine nature, all were offered the call to faith, and the religion firmly grounded itself in time and the existential world. The religion promulgated faith, knowledge and good works; and rose above the obscure and short-lived irrelevancies of most gnostic sects. An analysis of the core tenets of Manichaeism, when measured against what we suppose to be gnosticism (for instance esotericism, elitism and a sense that the world is a product of error), shows that this faith must be differently categorised. It will be better if we set it apart from such labels, which have their origins in the polemic of its opponents, often reinvented by modern scholars of religion seeking to impose patterns upon the unique products of history.

Certainly, it is possible and important for the historian to trace the diverse elements that Mani drew upon in his revelation; but we emphasise that it is first vital to understand Manichaeism as a discrete and coherent entity, for this is how one can enter the world of the believer. The following account of the teachings of Mani will emphasise this inner structure and coherence. Nevertheless, any such summary can tend towards artificial synthesis. Manichaean knowledge was carefully graded and tailored to the needs of its audience, as with any other avowedly evangelical ideology that seeks the power to change people's life and thought. For the lay faithful in the Roman Empire it was a kind of superior Christianity, and the metaphysical details that attract the attention of scholars (and the higher echelons of the elect) had little profile. In the personal letters of the believers at Kellis (see chapter 7) there appears to be scarce knowledge or interest in the many gods and demons, and the intricacies of cosmology, that dominate a handbook for the elect such as the Kephalaia (see particularly chapter 5). The textual material derived from Kellis (modern Ismant el-Kharab) evidences how carefully the hierarchy attempted to draw adherents further into the church and the knowledge of truth.

Whereas Christianity took centuries to formulate its doctrines, and the controversies of the great councils seem far removed from the teachings of Jesus, Mani took great pains to establish a total religion based upon his own comprehensive scriptures and preaching. He may be said to have combined the charisma of Jesus, the missionary purpose of Paul, and the doctrinal stringency of an Augustine. He understood himself to be the final and universal apostle of God, called to restore the truth of all prior messengers, including Jesus, the Buddha and Zarathushtra. There is thus less scope in the study of Manichaeism to trace the evolution of doctrine, since all teaching was rigidly tied to the very details of the divine word in Mani's scriptures. Nevertheless, the eschatological urgency of earliest Manichaeism may be said to have slowly turned towards an accommodation with the world. It may also be true that the absolute centrality of Mani and his teaching, and the self-standing nature of the religion that we have emphasised, was the result of an evolution in Mani's own religious consciousness, further developed and hardened in the early generations of the church's life. In his Epistles Mani habitually introduces himself as an 'apostle of Jesus Christ', and it took both time and confidence for the founder to achieve his full stature as 'Mani the living' (i.e. Manichaios).

Mani believed that he was the recipient of divine revelation from his heavenly Twin (Greek: syzygos): '. . . everything that has happened and that will happen . . . I have seen the totality through him (Keph. 15: 19–23)'. Although later systematisation asserts that the divine counterpart will appear and bring help to every apostle (Keph. 36: 6–9), for Mani this was clearly a deeply personal experience, which is firmly embedded in the traditions (see especially the account of his call and early life recorded in the Cologne Mani-Codex (chapter 2)). Scholars have sought to explain the concept with reference to various sources, especially the Thomas narratives of early Syriac Christianity, where that apostle is indeed the twin of Jesus; and calling upon the 'Hymn of the Pearl' with its curious correspondences to the spiritual life of Mani (the origins of this text have been much discussed, but never satisfactorily resolved). However, the core is one of those unaccountable religious experiences, where the recipient knows him or herself to be especially called. It seems certain that Mani himself came to understand his Twin to be the Paraclete, foretold by Jesus, the 'comforter' and 'Spirit of Truth' who would be sent afterwards according to the divine will. Since Mani asserts that with the Paraclete, 'I have become a single body, with a single Spirit! (Keph. 15: 23–24)', he himself came to be proclaimed as the Paraclete. This then became one of the most characteristic assertions of the Manichaeans, and one of the most offensive to their catholic opponents; however, it was not intended to mean that Mani was the Holy Spirit, as that equation is part of catholic not Manichaean tradition.

This revelation given by the Twin was systematised, in substance at least by Mani himself, into an elaborate and holistic account of the cosmos, human history, and the natural world. Manichaean thought was highly structured and maintained a remarkable uniformity from Roman North Africa to medieval China, claiming to provide a coherent and quasi-scientific explanation of everything from the movement of the stars to the origins of fire and the genera of creatures. The claim to knowledge would have been a source of great appeal, but the provision of such detail in the scriptures also demanded a rigidity that finally undermined the religion. For these reasons it can be misleading to describe Manichaean doctrine as a myth; and it was certainly not intended as an allegory. For the believer, the teachings were absolute truth: an eclipse of the sun was not an illustration of the power of darkness against the light, it was visible evidence of the forces of evil in attack against those of good. Mani emphasised that the reality of the teachings was apparent to the senses.

Mani's teaching was summarised by the catchphrase, that 'of the two principles and the three times (or moments)'. The two principles are those of light and darkness: whose realms in the beginning are separate, the dark unknowing of the light; then during the middle are in part mingled, the reality of this present universe; but at the end will be the triumph and eternal victory of life and light over death. We should note that Manichaean dualism was absolute, there was no need to account for the origin of evil. Whilst monotheistic opponents would appeal that this curtailed the absolute power of God, the Manichaeans could respond that only thus was the absolute goodness of God assured. Evil was entirely real, as present as death and darkness are to life and light.

In Manichaeism what is true in the macrocosmos is also true for the microcosmos. The individual soul partakes of this whole history, so that our present enfleshment in a demonic body is only the middle time between two eternities. Note too that the dualism is not the hellenistic one of spirit and matter, but of two essences, even substances. The divine life is visible, has spatial and quantifiable elements; and evil matter is the active principle of lust, the elements and 'thought of death'. In the beginning time the light and the dark occupy distinct spaces: the light above, and to the north, west and east; but the darkness below and to the south. Between them there was a border.

Manichaean theology is not easily categorised. The Father evokes or emanates powers of himself for purposes in the cosmic drama, and these too may call forth further gods or angels. The language of 'calling out' the powers of light is crucial, to avoid any suggestion of generation, for sexuality is inextricably tied in Manichaean thought to evil matter and the lust that is its nature.

The Manichaeans, or at least the elect, delighted in establishing elaborate systemisations of these beings; but all the divine is ultimately one, so that the diversification represents levels of descent into or entrapment by darkness. Relationships between spiritual levels, for instance a lay believer or catechumen to an elect, will be an exact image of that relationship all the way back up the scale through the gods to the Father. The same is true of all the representatives of the essence of darkness; so that Manichaean teachings are characterised by elaborate series of parallels and shifts of scale.

In the 'first time' the Father of Greatness rules the realm of light, which indeed is an extension of himself, and has four divine attributes: purity, light, power and wisdom. He resides in five intellectuals or limbs: mind, thought, insight, counsel and consideration. These are otherwise substantially detailed as the five elements: living air, light, wind, water and fire. Surrounding the Father are the twelve aeons, distributed three each to the directions of heaven, and refracted also to the one hundred and forty-four aeons of the aeons.

To the south of this kingdom of life is the realm of the King of Darkness. His form combines the shapes of the animals representative of his five warring worlds and kings:

> For they ascribe five elements which have generated their own princes to the people of darkness and give to these elements the names: smoke, darkness, fire, water and wind. Two-footed animals were generated in smoke, and from this source they believe men to take their beginnings; serpents were generated in darkness; quadrupeds in fire; swimming creatures in the waters; flying creatures in the wind. (Augustine de haer. 46, 7 Müller)

This realm is a seething manifestation of the conflict and carnality that is its essence, matter, the thought of death. In the course of its constant turmoil, by accident for darkness blindly grasps but cannot know, the demonic powers glimpse the light and desire to possess its life. Since peace is the nature of the light the Father must call out from himself the great divinities, both as the only means to defend his kingdom, and to distance the inevitable conflict from the land of light. In the ensuing 'second time' the drama is driven by these gods and goddesses in the arena of mixture, the universe, while the Father himself remains apart until he can again reveal himself and his inner treasury after the final victory. A characteristic tenet of Manichaean theology is that during the whole history of conflict the Father is 'hidden' (e.g. T. Kell. Copt. 1, 11; P. Kell. Gr. 92, 45 and 51–2).

It is vital to remember that the history of conflict and loss, of which the universe is a product, is not the result of some error in the divine. It is driven by the knowledge and foresight of the Father, who knows that this is the only way that evil can be overcome. Suffering is caused by the reality of evil, but the terrors of the middle time must be measured against the divine plan. God may not be all-powerful, but he is all-knowing and all-good. Thus, the necessity of sacrifice may be taken as the cardinal Manichaean quality. Evil is real, and even God must suffer. The reality of divine loss is an unavoidable consequence of this recognition of the absolute nature of evil.

First the Father evokes the Great Spirit who is the Mother of Life:

> He first sculpted her like this. He established her in his inner storehouses in quiet and silence. When (they had) need of her she was called and came forth of the Father (of Greatness). She looked at all her aeons of light! (Keph. 70, 28–32)

She in turn calls forth the First Man. This is the first emanation, that of the gods of descent. It also evidences a consciously trinitarian structure embedded in Mani's system, which in common with related Syriac forms of Christianity details the Spirit as feminine. However, there is a temporal and essential order here: first the Father, the origin of all that is good; then the Mother; and then the Son.

Thus it is the first-born Son of God who descends to battle, and ultimately eternal victory over death. The Man is armed with the five light elements, personified as his five sons; and it is this portion of the divine that will be devoured by the powers of evil, and which constitutes the Living Soul. This Soul comes to be compounded with the dark elements of matter throughout the universe, and is in need of redemption for the duration of the 'second time'. It is emphasised that this sacrifice of the Son, defeated and stripped of his armour (i.e. the Soul), is the only means by which evil can ultimately be overcome. Here we see a transformation and universalisation of the crucifixion motif. The Son does not die once for all; the Soul is crucified through all the time and space of history.

This history can be followed in Theodor bar Khoni's citations from Mani in Syriac. They are the best available source in the absence of the original scriptures written in the apostle's own Aramaic:

> And he says that the Father of Greatness evoked the Mother of Life, and the Mother of Life evoked the Primal Man, and the Primal Man evoked his five sons, like someone who puts on armour for the fight. And he says that an angel named Nahashbat came towards him holding the crown of victory in his hand; he says that he spread out the light before the Primal Man, and that when the (King) of Darkness saw it, he thought and said: "I find close at hand that which I sought far away." Then the Primal Man gave himself and > his five sons to be consumed by the five sons of darkness, like a man who has an enemy and mixes a deadly poison into a cake and gives it. He says that when they had partaken of the five nourishing gods, the latter's intellect was removed, and that due to the poison of the sons of darkness, they became like people who are bitten by an enraged dog or a snake. (Theodor bar Khoni Lib. Schol. XI, CSCO 69 pp. 313, 27–314, 12)

So, while this first conflict appears outwardly to be a victory for death, as with the crucifixion the believer understands that it was a necessity for the binding of evil. Nevertheless, the inevitable consequence is the distress and suffering of the divine Soul, termed the Cross of Light, and personified as the suffering Jesus awaiting redemption. The entire resultant history of the 'second time' involves the mechanics of once more separating the light from darkness, not just to restore the status quo ante bellum, but also to so fatally weaken the power of death that it can never again threaten the life. Life is a poison for the forces of death; for, consumed by their own desire for what they can not have, they ultimately destroy themselves. This is necessary, for the good cannot itself bring death, which is not its nature.

In order to establish the arena in which liberation can take place, that is the universe, a new divine trinity is called forth: the Beloved of the Lights, the Great Builder, and the Living Spirit (also termed the Father of Life). This is the second emanation, that of the gods of creation.

It is the task of the Living Spirit to rescue the First Man, which is a prototype of all future redemption; and then to fashion the universe from the powers of darkness in which the light elements, the five sons, are mixed.

> They came to the land of darkness and they found the Primal Man and his five sons sunk in darkness. Then the Living Spirit called aloud, and the voice of the Living Spirit had been made like a sharpened sword, and it revealed the image of the Primal Man and said to him: "Greetings to you, who are the good among evil, the light in the darkness, the god dwelling among the animals of anger who do not recognise their privilege!" The Primal Man replied and said: "Greetings to you, who bring peace and salvation in return!" And he said to him: "How are the fathers of the sons of light in their city?" And the call said to him: "They are well." And the call and the answer accompanied each other in ascending towards the Mother of Life and the Living Spirit, and the Living Spirit reclothed the call, and the Mother of Life reclothed the answer, her beloved son, and they descended towards the earth of darkness, where the Primal Man and his sons were dwelling. (Ibid. pp. 314, 20–315, 7)

Thus call and answer are themselves hypostasised into a pair of divinities. Together they are the 'counsel of life' that throughout the time of mixture personifies the awakening and motivating force of the Soul and light elements that are sunk in darkness (Keph. 178: 2–5). To prepare for that, the Living Spirit and the Mother of Life descend into the abyss. There they defeat the demonic powers and rulers, and out of their bodies fashion the universe. Thus the demiurge is a light god, though the dead matter of the creation is darkness, albeit shot through with the elements of life. The structure of the universe is divinely conceived, even if its matter is evil. In this sense, our environment and history is the best of all possible worlds; it is all that the divine can do in the face of such absolute evil.

The Living Spirit constructs ten heavens and eight earths, flaying and crucifying some of the evil powers above, and forming the earths out of the bodies of others. To hold the whole elaborate structure in place he evokes his own five sons: the Adamant of Light, the Keeper of Splendour, the King of Glory, the King of Honour, and the Porter or Atlas. Each of these five has his own domain of authority. By means of three wheels or garments, fire and water and wind, the three evil vessels of fire and water and darkness are swept down from the heavens; and then, with the corresponding dark elements of the earth, are finally swept into graves that have been prepared for them.

The Keeper of Splendour oversees the eighth, ninth and tenth heavens; whilst the King of Honour watches over the lower heavens from the seventh. The King of Glory turns the wheels so that the light elements may ascend. The Light Adamant humbles sporadic demonic uprisings on earth. The Porter supports the entire structure from below. The sun and the moon are vessels of purified light, and stations on the path of ascent or descent for the redeemed soul and the gods. They may be termed 'ships' (of living fire and water) or palaces. However, the planets and stars are evil rulers. Mani and his followers gave particular attention to integrating contemporary astrological ideas into this system, for their faith was understood as providing a total scientific knowledge; but various problems and inconsistencies are apparent, especially caused by the divine nature of the sun and moon compared with the other planetary bodies.

Once the machinery for the purification has been made ready by the second series of evoked gods, they turn to the Father to plea for a new emanation to set the cosmos in motion, and thus achieve the process of redemption through time. The Father approves and calls forth his Third Ambassador or Messenger, so termed because he introduces the third age of the world. He dwells in the ship of the sun; whilst the Virgin of Light, his feminine doublet, has her throne in the ship of the moon. Jesus the Splendour, another in this series of salvific deities, is closely related in Manichaean systematics to this androgynous sun-moon god. This is the third emanation, that of the gods of salvation or ascent.

The Ambassador and Virgin achieve a first redemption of trapped light, again turning the uncontrollable lust of the darkness, which is its nature, back upon it. They reveal their images, or more graphically appear naked, before the male and female rulers (archons) chained in the heavens. These powers spontaneously ejaculate or abort across the cosmos. Some light is drawn to the height, whilst the remainder that is more deeply embedded in matter sinks downwards and must endure further degradation before it is redeemed. A part falls into the sea and rises as a monster that the Adamant subjugates. Other dross falls to the earth to become the seeds of plant life that the abortions eat. Such complicated details of prehistory were drawn from a variety of prior traditions, which seem to have fascinated Mani and his followers. Inevitably they drew the attention and ire of their opponents.

The abortions form a rampaging demonic group from which the different genera of creatures originate, corresponding to the varieties of the five worlds of darkness from which they stem. Adam and Eve are fashioned by demons after the image of God that they have glimpsed, that is the Ambassador who had appeared to the rulers in the heavens; and are procreated after various cannibalistic and sexual acts by the dominant demonic pair: Saclas and Nabroel.

> (Mani) said that the daughters of darkness were already pregnant by means of their nature, and that through the beauty of the Messenger's image that they had seen, their foetuses aborted and fell to earth and ate the shoots of the trees. The aborted foetuses consulted among themselves and remembered the image of the Messenger which they had seen, saying: "Where is the image which we have seen?" Asaqloun (i.e. Saclas), son of the King of Darkness, said to the aborted foetuses: "Give me your sons and daughters, and I will make you an image like the one you have seen." They brought them, and gave them to him; he consumed the males, and gave the females to his wife. Nabroel and Asaqloun had intercourse; she conceived and bore his son and named him Adam; she conceived and bore a daughter and named her Eve. (ibid., pp. 317, 3–15)

Thus, lust is endemic in human nature. Mankind has been deliberately fashioned by demonic forces in an attempt to prevent the redemption of the light, for through the urge for sex humans will multiply, and further entrap the divine Soul in multitudes of material bodies. This inverts the core of Hebrew tradition, that God approves of the creation of man and woman, and ordains that they should 'be fruitful and multiply'. Nevertheless, as with the macrocosmos, the structural form of humans is in a sense divinely conceived as the image of God, and acts as a mechanism for the purification of soul.

Since the human soul is a principal repository of the trapped divine, the abortions having concentrated therein such that they had gained from the buds and fruits they had eaten, humans become the focus of the salvific mission of the gods. In an archetypal episode Jesus the Splendour approaches Adam, lying as dead after his creation and without consciousness, and awakens him to the saving knowledge of his own condition. Here Manichaeism has inherited and developed the widespread gnostic retelling and inversion of the 'fall' narrative, so that now the serpent has become entirely transformed into the heavenly redeemer. The 'right hand' that Jesus gives to Adam to raise him repeats that given to the First Man lying defeated in the abyss, and acts again as a type for the salvation of each individual.

> (Mani) says that Jesus the Splendour approached the innocent Adam, and awoke him from the sleep of death, so that he might be saved from an excessive nature; as if a righteous man were found to be possessed of a violent devil and might be calmed by one's skill. Thus was Adam also, when the beloved found him in a profound sleep, roused him, shook him and awakened him, drove the deceitful devil away from him and kept the female archon far from him. And then Adam looked closely at himself and he knew who (he was). And (Jesus) showed him the Father on high; and his own self cast before the teeth of panther and elephant, devoured by dogs, mingled and imprisoned in everything that exists, shackled in the corruption of darkness. (Mani) says that he made him arise and taste the tree of life. And Adam looked, wept, and raised his voice violently like the roaring lion. He tore out his hair and beat himself: "Woe, woe to the maker of my body, and to he who imprisons my soul, and to the rebels who have subjugated me!" (ibid., pp. 317, 14–318, 4).

The process of redemption now enters into human history. Again Mani drew upon a variety of non-biblical traditions to develop a complex narrative about the family of Adam. Note the veneration of the virginal Seth, a characteristic feature of esoteric traditions; and the fierce antipathy to female sexuality. In another episode from the early generations it is related how the demons guarded by the King of Honour rebelled, and two hundred of these watchers escaped to earth to wreak havoc and unveil to mankind the mysteries of heaven (Keph. 92: 24–32). In these episodes prior Judaic material has been reworked and integrated into the Manichaean system.

The revelation by Jesus the Splendour to Adam is the exemplar for all future human redemption. Gradually over the generations more of the divine Soul is liberated, so that 'they that are begotten today, in these last generations, stand diminished and maimed (Keph. 147: 10–11)'. To achieve this liberation Jesus evokes the Light Mind, and in turn summons forth the Apostle of Light who becomes incarnate in the great religious leaders throughout history and the world. So the process of redemption is the work of the Light Mind who transforms the human soul by enlightening and freeing the five intellectuals of light from the shackles of the body and the five members of sin. 'He shall set right the members of the soul; form and purify them and construct a new man of them, a child of righteousness (Keph. 96: 25–27).' This 'new man', a concept ultimately to be derived from Paul, will now display the five virtues of love, faith, perfection, patience and wisdom.

Mani believed that he had been commissioned to make the final and universal proclamation of truth for the last generations. Thus the cycle of true apostleship was important to him; and included patriarchal figures such as Seth, Noah and Enoch; also founders of true religions, in particular Buddha, Zarathushtra and Jesus; and more recent apostles such as the gnostic Nikotheos, and Paul upon whom Mani modelled his own style of mission. Kephalaia I provides an extended simile wherein the advent of the apostles is compared to the months of seedtime and harvest. Each apostle is a farmer who plants a church, labouring over it till it matures and ripens. As it finally comes to fruition another will be seeded: 'There is no single time the tree is bare of fruit! (Keph. 11: 26–7).' However, the exemplar of the true church was that established by Mani himself, and the authenticity of other communities came to be measured against the practices of this final manifestation of the divine will on earth. (For details of the organisation of the Manichaean church, its worship and ethic, see the following section.)

The various listings of the apostles evidences Mani's concept of universal revelation-history, and indicates sources which he regarded as authentic. Nevertheless, it is the figure of Jesus which dominates all the others who in comparison are little more than names. Preeminently Mani regarded himself as the apostle of Jesus Christ. United with his divine Twin he becomes the Paraclete foretold, as according to John 14:16 where Jesus promises the disciples that he will ask the Father who will send them another helper, the Spirit of Truth, who will remain with them for ever. It is notable that in the personal letters of believers from fourth-century Kellis, Mani is quoted not by name but 'as the Paraclete has said . . . ' (P. Kell. Copt. 19, 9).

As a whole Manichaean Christology draws upon a range of influences that are woven into a coherent thread running through the entire revelation. Regarding the historical Jesus the influence of prior docetic tradition is evident. Christian polemic against the Manichaean Jesus as a phantasm without human birth, and capable of only an illusory suffering, reiterates the arguments raised against the second century heretic Marcion. Similarly, the Manichaeans in their missionary endeavour in the Roman Empire drew upon the Marcionite critique of the Old Testament and the Jewish God, even though in contrast to Marcionism the Manichaean demiurge is good. Again, following Marcion, Mani believed that he had been called to restore the true teaching of Jesus. This had been corrupted and falsely interpreted by Judaisers, against whom Paul had preached, as evidenced by a particular reading of the Pauline epistles. Thus it lay upon Mani to establish a firm canon of scripture that could never again be adulterated.

Mani and the first generation of his church believed that they were living in the last days before the return of Jesus as judge. The powerful salvific and apocalyptic emphases of his teaching are evident in the rich details of the eschatology, both individual and cosmic. At death each soul will be judged, and if triumphant will be greeted by the Form of Light and angels with victory prizes. Devotional texts, such as Manichaean psalms, developed a powerful symbolic language to express this hope.

Specifically, there are three paths for the soul at death. Gross sinners beyond any hope of redemption will be damned to hell to await the second death at the end of time, when all of matter and the darkness will be finally bound and sealed in its eternal grave. In contrast, the souls of those such as the catechumens, who are not inextricably compounded with lust, will be reborn in new bodies and have the hope of final purification. The origins of this core doctrine of rebirth have been much discussed, with scholars divided between discerning an Indian or Hellenistic (or 'gnostic') model. Certainly, the teaching is fully integrated as a coherent element within the system; but it may very well provide an important clue as to the basic influences upon Mani's religious development. It is our view that the complex of ideas relating to action in the world and its consequences, rebirth and liberation, the striving for perfection by the elect and their intimate dependence upon the lay faithful are evidence of a deep current of Indian religious influence in Mani's own life experience, which is not yet fully understood but can not be ignored.

The third way is that of the elect, and indeed of all the light freed from dead matter to life, such as that liberated from fruits and vegetables. This divine ascends up the Pillar of Glory, the great porter of souls, to the moon. This Pillar is itself divinised as a god of the third emanation. It is the Perfect Man (see Ephesians 4:12–13), the representation of the church as the body of Jesus in its ascent to the Father. It is also the restoration of the First Man, who descended into dissolution and now ascends reconstituted. This Pillar is visible in the night sky as (what we would call) the Milky Way.

The moon in its waxing and waning also provides visual and actual evidence of its role as a ship and stage in the transit of souls, thence to the sun. For fourteen days the arrival of the ascending light is manifest, then on the fifteenth 'the filling up overflows' (T. Kell. Syr. / Copt. 2, 4). For the remainder of the lunar cycle the light flows on to the sun. From the sun (whose continuous filling 'displays the mystery of the Father' (Keph. 162: 26–7)) the redeemed light passes to the new aeon that has been built by the Great Builder for the time of mixture. Here the gods rest, and the souls must await the final burial of darkness, before the Father will again unveil to them his image, and can once more receive them into his treasury.

Individual and cosmic eschatology are interwoven in Mani's teaching, for each soul's own tragedy and victory are but a microcosm of the history of the universal Soul and its liberation from matter. The Sermon of the Great War is an apocalyptic homily from the first generation after Mani's death, wherein the eschatological event is understood to have already begun. It utilises material from the Gospel tradition; as Mani himself did in his earliest writing, the Šābuhragān. After the horrors of persecution and the final terrors Jesus will return to take the judgement seat that is prepared for him, to separate the sheep from the goats and to reign in glory. Then will come the great fire that will achieve such final purification of the light still in the world as is possible. This Soul will gather up and rise as the Last Statue, a divinity that again (as with the Perfect Man) recapitulates the descent into the abyss of the First Man. Then the five sons of the Living Spirit will leave their tasks, and the dead husk of the universe will collapse in upon itself to sink to the depths. All the evil will be sealed up; the males and females separated (respectively in a 'lump' and a 'tomb') so that they can never again renew themselves and threaten the light.

> For, when all the light will be purified and redeemed in the universe at the last, the collector of all things, the Last Statue, will gather in and sculpt itself. It is the last hour of the day, the time when the Last Statue will go up to the aeon of light. The enemy too, death, will go in to bondage; to the prison of the souls of the deniers and blasphemers who loved the darkness. They will go in with it to bondage and the dark night overcomes them; and thenceforth this name 'light' will not shine upon them. (Keph. 165, 5–15)

Time in the sense of the workings of the universe and the history of redemption has come to an end. The 'third time' is a new eternality without fear. It is important that it represents a victory and a conclusion, rather than just the restoration of the 'first time'. Never again will the darkness be able to threaten the light. However, it is an important illustration of the materiality of Mani's conception that evil can not be destroyed in the sense of obliterated from all existence; instead it must be sealed and buried. Still, now that the history of conflict and mixture is ended, the hidden Father can again reveal himself and welcome all the redeemed back to their home:

> (The Father) can give the grace to his fighters, they whom he (sent) to the contest with the darkness. The veils will be rolled back and gathered, and he unveils to them his image! The entire light will be immersed in him! They will go in to the treasury. They will also come forth from him in glory. (Hom. 41: 13–17)

Now there will be two kings, the Father in the aeons of light, and the First Man reigning with the gods in the new age.

WORSHIP AND ETHIC

Mani was himself brought up within the confines of a narrow religious sect (see chapter 2), and his teachings, although able to drive a religion of world-wide significance, made radical demands upon its followers. Indeed, the question of submission to the demands of this world was the focus of the Manichaean accusation that the 'Christians' were only half believers who had betrayed the teachings of Jesus. The sudden influx and even visual appearance of these new ascetics from the late third century on may well be taken as the spark that lit the fire of Christian monasticism in the decades that followed. Certainly, the rapid growth of the community marked a truly new wave of religious enthusiasm breaking upon the Roman Empire from the east. In this sense the reaction by both secular and ecclesiastical authorities to this 'Persian' incursion can be well understood; although the modern scholar may rather identify Manichaeism as the conduit by which Indian religious practices and ideals flowed to combine with heterodox currents of Judaeo-Christianity from the east.

The teachings which underpinned this new ethic provoked fierce polemic from the leaders of the catholic community, and indeed also the imperial authorities. On the one hand the belief that the divine substance was scattered through all the material world led to devotional attitudes, for instance towards fruit and vegetables as vessels of the Soul, that were received with horror. Christian polemic focused on the complex food rituals intended to liberate the divine light from matter and pain, and accused the Manichaeans of worshipping the sun and the moon. On the other hand Mani's negative account of creation, and fierce antipathy to matter and sexuality as intrinsically demonic, was equally abhorrent.

For Mani the whole rationale for history, and any continuation of human existence, is the liberation of the light elements from the dark. The Manichaean attitude to marriage was entirely negative as the act of procreation prolongs the imprisonment of Soul, which would now be further diversified into matter. Moreover, if a peasant works the land, or if a craftsman uses his tools or the soldier his weapons, then they harm and pain the living Soul. The same applies to speech that calls for such activities; or incites immorality, anger or envy. It is perhaps no accident that the Manichaean community in fourth century Kellis, the only such group from the Roman Empire that we can study in their full socio-economic context, appears to have centred on families of traders.

The principal symbol was that of the Cross of Light, the universal divine stretched and bound upon matter. Particularly the Cross was associated with plant life as manifested in sweetness, colour and translucence; in comparison to the heavy carnality and odour of flesh. Here again we can see the substantial nature of the Manichaean conception of divine light or Soul. It is apparent to all the senses in the world around us. The human endeavour is to separate life from death in all our actions, to surround ourselves (and, indeed, for the elect to take into their bodies and thus expand and free the divine within) with what is beautiful and good. The stink of death and dark matter would be met with revulsion. Still, the condition of the divine in the world and in history is one of entanglement and mixture with all that is disgusting, and thus the characteristic ethic was of sacrifice, pain and long-suffering tempered by glorious hope. Mani writes in one of his Epistles:

> If you wish to liken yourself to me: Bear up, like the wise shall bear, so that you will live. I reveal to you, my child, my loved one: Whoever wishes life, and life added to his life, long-suffering is what awaits; because without long-suffering he will not be able to live. For long-suffering has everything in it. (Provisional translation of a text from Ismant el-Kharab, in the process of being edited by I. Gardner and W.-P. Funk)

The Manichaeans strove to consume food and drink with as high a percentage of light as possible, such as melons and cucumbers; and indeed were much concerned with the classification and preparation of foods, which inevitably attracted the scorn of opponents. Specifically, meat and wine were regarded as dominated by the dark elements that would reinfect the believer striving for personal purification, and lead directly to sensuality and ignorance. On the positive side, while the very act of eating caused pain to the light elements, the body as a microcosm of the universe also acted as a machine for liberation of the divine, so that the righteous person could literally discard the gross elements below, and (through the periodic fasts) breathe forth angels to rise above. Thus, the elect were charged to 'eat the world', and by so doing to free the entangled light. This desperate mission was constantly countered by the evil forces of material desire working ever new depravity upon the innocent Soul. This was a strange but powerful vision of the world and all action within it. In the following passage one of Mani's disciples calculates the number of angels engendered by the fasts in his community:

> Once again, it happened one time while the apostle (Mani) is sitting down among the congregation. One of his disciples stood up in front of (him). He says to him: I have heard you, my master, saying: 'Seven angels shall be engendered by the fasting of each one of the elect; and not only the elect but the catechumens engender them on the lord's day'.
>
> (The work) of fasting is this in summary. Now, I, I have . . . have passed since I became leader. Fifty (elect were with) me in the church over which I became the head. (They stood) before me while they fasted every day. Now, I (took account of the) fasting that a person performs at these three (lord's) days singly, and I found that each one of these (elect) had engendered seven angels by their fasting. So, I (counted the) fasting of these fifty people at the three lord's days: they totalled three hundred and fifty angels, as seven angels are reckoned to each one of the elect, who engender them daily through total fasting. I counted these three lord's days when these fifty people fasted, and I multiplied by three. I found: the number of angels engendered by them totalled one thousand and fifty, and I (was grateful) on account of the great profit and good that I had achieved (on these three) lord's days. (Keph. 193, 26–194, 13)

Such an ethic could only really be applied by a small group of people. Yet, the goal that Mani felt to be his vocation was the foundation and propagation by mission of a world religion. The compromise was achieved, possibly under Indian influence, by instituting a two-tiered structure incorporating a doctrine of transmigration of souls. In fact, there was an intimate symbiotic relationship between the ascetics and the lay faithful, with the former needing the latter to support their divine work just as much as latter depended on the former for their hope of ultimate salvation. Although the language of monasticism is used, the Manichaean 'monks' could not live apart from the world, for it was their constant mission to transform it. Mani emphasised active engagement and endeavour against withdrawal.

The community was divided into an inner circle of the elect ('the virginal', both male and female) who lived a life of extreme asceticism; around which a greater number of hearers or catechumens ('the continent') gathered, who were able to profit from the piety and righteousness of the spiritually more advanced. In actual fact the catechumens were allowed to marry and carry out normal daily activities; but they were obliged to see to the alimentary needs of the monks, whose daily meal was the focal ritual practice. Their duty, termed in Middle Persian ruwānagān (soul-service), brought merit to the hearers who could hope to advance to perfection in a future life. Augustine explains:

> However, they claim that not only do the powers of God effect this purgation and liberation of good and evil throughout the whole universe and all of its elements, but also that their own elect achieve the same results by means of the food of which they partake. And they state that the divine substance is intermingled with this food just as it is with the whole universe, and imagine that it is purified in their elect by the mode of life which the Manichaean elect live, as if their mode of life were holier and more excellent than that of their auditors. For they would have their church consist of those two classes, elect and auditors. Moreover, they believe that this portion of the good and divine substance which is held mixed and imprisoned in food and drink is more strongly and foully bound in the rest of men, even their own auditors, but particularly in those who propagate offspring. (Augustine, de haer. 46, 5–6)

As the final apostle of God Mani led the community for as long as he lived, and after his 'crucifixion' was believed to have ascended to the moon to wait in attendance upon the faithful. During his life-time, concerned at the corruption of earlier churches, he endeavoured to establish the community for the rest of history through writings, missions, and a strong hierarchy. Until the tenth century the Twin-Cities (al-Mada'in) remained the seat of the archegos or imam. Ecclesiastical authority was mediated downwards via twelve teachers (magister), thence to the bishops (episcopus), then the elders (presbyter), and so to the general body of the elect and hearers. In the Roman Empire the religion established an elaborate network of cells both to facilitate evangelism and to avoid detection. Fascinating glimpses of the workings of the community in fourth-century Egypt, before oppression reduced its ability for effective action in the west, are preserved by the personal letters of the community recovered from Ismant el-Kharab (see further chapter 7). Thus, the boy Matthaios writes news to his mother Maria about his brother who has been given to the elect, and has joined the company of the 'Teacher' (perhaps the foremost Manichaean leader in Egypt at the time):

> And Piene: The great Teacher let him travel with him, so that he might learn Latin. He teaches him well. Their body is set up, and they are good (and) worthwhile. (P. Kell. Copt. 20, 24–7)

We even have a complete short letter by Piene himself, writing again to Maria:

> (To) my loved mother, greatly revered by me; her whom I love with all my heart, whose memory is planted in my thought every hour. I am looking forward to seeing you, my mother Maria, precious to me. It is I, your son Piene, who is greeting you; in the Lord, – greetings.
>
> This is my prayer every hour to the Father, the God of Truth, that He may preserve you healthy in your body, joyful in your soul and firm (in) your spirit; for all the time that you (will) spend in this place. Also, after this place, you may find life in the kingdom for eternity.
>
> And know, my beloved mother, that I am doing well here. I am following the Teacher, and will go to Alexandria with him. I shall be . . . I am coming to stay with Apa Lysimachos. Should I come, I will send (a message) to you.
>
> (I greet) my brothers by name, and everyone who loves you. All they who (are with me (?)) greet you. Live and be healthy according to the body and the spirit for a long time.

In later centuries the episcopal hierarchy seems to have been better preserved in the east, especially whilst it was the dominant religion in the Turfan area during the second Uighur kingdom (tenth–twelfth centuries). In central Asia the Manichaeans finally had the freedom to worship openly, to observe their regular fasts, and to develop church practices. However, the most important festival remained the commemoration of Mani's martyrdom when a judgement seat (bema) was raised in the middle of the worshipping congregation. Upon this was placed a portrait of Mani to celebrate his continuing presence in the community of the elect; and to symbolise his position as proxy for Jesus until his return as judge.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF MANICHAEAN STUDIES

Few subjects in the study of the religious history of late antiquity have been so fundamentally affected by the discovery of original writings of the community as that of Manichaeism. In this respect the study of Manichaeism in the later Roman Empire, during the second half of the twentieth century, mirrors that of gnosticism. For both systems, the chance discovery in Egypt of a large amount of original writings in Coptic fundamentally altered the direction of research. Whereas for gnosticism it was the find of more than twelve codices from Nag Hammadi after the Second World War, for Manichaeism it was seven (or more) codices from Medinet Madi. However, unlike the study of gnosticism, the rediscovery of Manichaean texts had begun much earlier; though not in a region which was once within the frontiers of the Roman Empire, but in Turfan and Dunhuang in Central Asia. However, the fact that they were extremely fragmentary and, with the exception of those in Chinese, in relatively little-known languages (Middle Persian, Parthian, Sogdian, Tocharian B, Uighur and even one fragment in Bactrian) meant that they remained very little known to English-speaking scholars of religious history; for almost all the pioneering work on the Turfan texts was accomplished by German scholars, and for long the texts remained available to non-specialists only in German translation.[10]

Prior to the discovery of the texts from Turfan, the scholar of Manichaeism had to rely on the highly biased accounts of the Church Fathers, especially the anti-Manichaean writings of Augustine and of the Greek Fathers like Titus of Bostra, Serapion of Thmuis and Epiphanius for information on the teachings of the sect. As for history, the sole source was the so-called Acta Archelai which purports to be a debate between Mani and a Christian bishop (with predictable outcome) at Carrhae: a city in Mesopotamia near the Persian frontier and famous for its links with Crassus' defeat at the hands of the Parthians. One source, however, the discovery of which marked a major turn in the study of the religion was the long entry on the sect and its writings in the Fihrist (catalogue) of the tenth century Arabic encyclopaedist and book-seller Abū'l-Faraj Muḥammad Ibn Abī Ya'qūb Isḥaq al-Warraq al-Baġdādī, commonly known as Ibn an-Nadīm, which clearly draws material sine ira et studio from genuine Manichaean sources which were still extant in Arabic in his time.[11] Without this source, which provided new material on almost every aspect of the early history and teaching of the sect, the task of identifying the fragmentary texts from Turfan as Manichaean and of putting them into the right literary context would have been very much harder.[12]

For the specialists in History of Religion in Germany in particular, the Manichaean texts from Turfan which were being conserved and edited in Berlin gave a massive initial boost to the study of Manichaeism. As many of the fragments were in dialects of Iranian and abound in Zoroastrian or Zurvanite terminology, the religion of Mani inevitably came to be seen

[10] For long the only collection in English was Jackson (1932), which also gives the Middle Iranian texts in the outdated transliteration system of F. W. K. Müller. The useful but also dated selection (in translation only) by Jes P. Asmussen (Asmussen (1975)) is known mainly to specialists. The most comprehensive collection of Manichaean texts from Turfan in English translation now is Klimkeit (1994); but some of the translations are heavily abridged and sometimes unreliable. It contains, however, an excellent introduction to the texts with a full account of their discovery. On the latter see also Lieu (1998), 1–58. The same work also contains (196–246) an index of sources to Klimkeit's book.

[11] Flügel (1862). See also the English translation of the whole work by B. Dodge (Dodge (1970)).

[12] See especially F. W. K. Müller (1904), 20–2.

as a reform movement within Zoroastrianism by a prophet who had a good knowledge of Christianity, especially of the writings of the Christian gnostics.

Of particular interest to German scholars was evidence termed by its leading exponent, Richard Reitzenstein (this came later to be known as the 'Religionsgeschichtliche Schule'), as the Manichaean dogma of the 'redeemed Redeemer'. 'In Persian', says Reitzenstein, 'this "man" is the renewer of the world, the bearer of the divine message and power, the redeemer for the whole race, but at the same time the one who has been redeemed who can return to heaven as the first of the Light Beings, a god and also the ideal representative of souls, the great soul.'[13] It is not only for Manichaeism that this basic attitude, that the Primeval or Primal Man is the sum of all the souls which he is to redeem, is typical and of fundamental significance; but for gnosticism in general, for the whole faith about redemption is built on it. This Zoroastrian, or more particularly Zurvanistic, understanding of Manichaean origins gained ground especially amongst distinguished German scholars who worked in related areas, like Rudolph Bultmann;[14] and the great influence and popularity of his works gave ready dissemination to the ideas of Reitzenstein and his school.

In Britain, however, the Cambridge theologian F. C. Burkitt had drawn attention in his Donellan Lectures of 1925[15] to the unexpectedly large numbers of Iranian and Turkish text fragments from Turfan which bear the unmistakable imprint of Christianity, especially of Syriac Christianity. Despite the fact that the Turfan texts were recovered from a region which was a major centre of Buddhism and later of Islam, Jesus (Mid. Pers. and Parth. yyšw', yyšw) was more frequently invoked in Manichaean hymns and homiletical texts than any other Manichaean deity. Manichaean literature, both poetry and prose, also contains many easily identifiable biblical (i.e. Judaeo-Christian) names, themes and scriptural citations; and especially Gospel citations. Some are reminiscent of Tatian's Gospel harmony, the Diatessarōn, in the manner in which material from the different gospels are combined; and in the frequent occurrence of words transliterated from the Syriac. Mani's teaching on the Last Judgement, for instance, as expounded by Mani in the Šābuhragān (a semi-canonical work which Mani composed in Middle Persian in order to summarise his teaching for his great patron, the Sassanian King of Kings Shapur I) is closely based on the words of Jesus as given in Matt. 25:31–46.[16] One of the most eminent Semitic philologists of his time, Burkitt proved beyond all reasonable doubt that the first Manichaean missionaries in the Roman Empire, especially in Roman Egypt, were Syrians and not Iranians. On the Syrian aspect of the subject, Burkitt rightly paid tribute to the then little known but essential contribution to the subject of the origins of Mani's teaching made by the late Revd C. W. Mitchell. Prior to his tragic death in the First World War, Mitchell with endless patience and exceptional philological skill had succeeded in deciphering the under-writing of a palimpsest in the British (Museum) Library containing the prose-refutations of Mani, Marcion and Bardaiṣan by the Syrian theologian Ephraim of Edessa.[17] Ephraim, who was himself a native Syriac speaker, could read the original writings of the Manichaeans; and he saw innumerable parallels and similarities between their teaching and those of two Christian heretics Marcion and Bardaiṣan.[18]

[13] Reitzenstein (1921) 116, n. 2. For a succinct exposé of the views of Reitzenstein and his school on Manichaeism see Widengren (1978), esp. 284–90.

[14] Particularly in Bultmann (1925).

[15] Published as Burkitt (1925). See esp. 37–43 and 92–3.

Burkitt's views on the western and Christian origin of Mani's original teaching found strong support in Germany from H. H. Schaeder, a pupil of Reitzenstein. The latter was then highly influential historian for his advocacy of the existence of a pan-Iranian theologumenon, which he saw as the origin to many of the mystery religions of the Roman Empire and of gnosticism. Schaeder reacted against this, and the new material from Ephraim was precisely what he needed to help formulate his argument that Manichaeism should be seen as a product of Hellenism in the widest sense of the term: a Hellenism which embraces both the teaching of the great Graeco-Roman philosophers and of Judaeo-Christianity. In this he made extensive use of the anti-Manichaean writings of the Neoplatonist Alexander of Lycopolis (modern Assiut) who saw Mani's teaching essentially as a form of Christian revelation masquerading as a respectable philosophical system.[19] 'The teaching of Mani', remarks Schaeder, 'which is generally regarded as a purely oriental mystery religion, is founded on a basis that is conceptually theoretical and oriented towards hellenistic knowledge'.[20] Schaeder's work marks a clear turning point in Manichaean studies in Germany where the subject had hitherto been monopolised by orientalists, especially Iranologists and Turcologists, working at the Orientalische Kommission established in Berlin since 1925 specially for the conservation and publication of the Buddhist, Christian and Manichaean texts from Chinese Turkestan. This westward reorientation would soon prove highly necessary as sensational news reached Germany of the discovery of a small library of seven genuine Manichaean codices in Egypt (see below, pp. 37–9).

[16] Burkitt (1925) 88–9. Cf. Lieu (1992), 78–80. [17] Mitchell (1912–21). [18] Burkitt (1925), 71–86.
[19] Schaeder (1927), esp. 106–27. [20] Schaeder (1927), 97.

The new Coptic texts seemed to confirm Schaeder's theory of a close link between Mani's intellectual outlook and Hellenism; since in them occur terms like 'nous', 'psyche' and 'hyle' (transliterated from Greek into Coptic), concepts familiar from the account by Alexander of Lycopolis (see below, pp. 179–82). Moreover, the almost complete lack of Zoroastrian terms and concepts in documents which clearly belong to the earliest stage of the community's history shows beyond doubt that the Zoroastrian (more precisely Zurvanist) elements found in Manichaean texts from Turfan are later additions, or the product of parallel developments in the Sassanian Empire. It was also clear from the new texts that the sect was intellectually linked to the teaching of gnostic groups within the Roman Empire, especially that of Valentinus; and that Mani also had a good knowledge of Christian writings. A young German scholar of great linguistic ability who played a major role in the editing of the texts was Hans Jakob Polotsky. Prior to his work on the Coptic texts as assistant to Carl Schmidt, who first identified them in Cairo, Polotsky had already researched on Manichaean texts in Middle Iranian under F. C. Andreas at Göttingen; and he was therefore in a unique position to review the new material. However, the rise of National Socialism in Germany forced him to flee to Israel; but his authoritative monograph-length article on Manichaeism in the Sixth Supplement Volume to Pauly's Encyclopaedia which appeared in 1934 remains a landmark in the study of the subject.[21] In this, while agreeing with Schaeder's views regarding Hellenistic influence on Manichaeism, Polotsky also drew attention to many key elements in Mani's religious system which did not have Hellenic roots. The editing and publication of the new texts from Medinet Madi was severely affected by the outbreak of the Second World War; but the study of the subject was continued immediately after the war by the great French scholar of gnosticism H.-C. Puech, who also played a major role in the study of the newly discovered gnostic texts from Nag Hammadi. His slim, but fully annotated monograph on Manichaeism, draws material from Manichaean texts from both Turfan and Medinet Madi;[22] and he also produced a series of important studies on aspects of the religion which are models of judicious and balanced scholarship.[23]

Of the texts from Medinet Madi, the one which drew most attention was a substantial collection of Manichaean psalms which were (in part) made available in English translation by the brilliant Cambridge classical scholar and Coptologist C. R. C. Allberry (see below, p. 39). The [21] Polotsky (1935a); also issued separately as Polotsky (1935b). [22] Puech (1949).

[23] The most important ones are collected (with revisions) in Puech (1979).

psalms, which are among the earliest examples of Christian hymnology, give evidence not only of the liturgical practices of the congregation, but also of their general way of thinking. Allberry was sadly killed on active service with the Bomber Command during the Second World War; but in the post-war period a thorough examination was given to these psalms by T. Säve-Söderbergh, who thought he had established that there was a close relationship (amounting to dependency) with the psalmic tradition of the Mandaeans. This is a gnostic baptising sect which until recently flourished in Southern Iraq and adjacent Iran, but whose existence before the Islamic period could not be decisively proved.[24] A branch of research led by another Swedish scholar Geo Widengren, who believed Mani to have had his origins among the Mandaeans, thereby appeared to be confirmed.[25] And, as Widengren's monograph was the only work available in English which was published after the finds of Manichaean texts from Medinet Madi, his views enjoyed wide circulation.[26]

The belief in an early link between Manichaeism and Mandaeism was seriously challenged by the documentary evidence provided by the Cologne Mani-Codex (see below pp. 40–3), which was successfully deciphered by A. Henrichs and L. Koenen in 1969.[27] This tiny parchment codex contains a biographical account of Mani in Greek compiled from the witness accounts of his earliest disciples. It states that Mani grew up in a hemerobaptist sect in S. Babylonia which acknowledged a past-figure Alchasaios (sic) as one of its founders. The young Mani was the recipient of special revelations from his divine Twin (or Syzygos), and he was expelled from the sect at the age of twenty-four because of irreconcilable differences over food-taboos and rituals. In one of the most dramatic sections of the Codex, the young Mani was arraigned before a 'synhedrion' of the baptists who accused him of having 'eaten Greek bread' and, in defence of his refusal to harvest from their vegetable gardens and palm-trees and to perform ritual baptism, the young Mani cited the authority of Alchasaios the founder (archegos) of the sect for his defence (CMC 94.1–97.10, trans. below, p. 63).

The name Alchasaios reminded scholars immediately of the putative leader of a Jewish-Christian sect Elxai or Elchasaios who was linked to an apocalyptic work known as the 'Book of Elxai'. A small number of brief excerpts of this work are found in Christian sources, especially the [24] Säve-Söderbergh (1949), 85–166.

[25] Widengren (1946); and more importantly his popular monograph Widengren (1961).
[26] Widengren (1965).
[27] Henrichs and Koenen (1970). See also the important account of the successful decipherment and identification in Henrichs (1979).

writings of heresiologists like Hippolytus of Rome and of Epiphanius of Salamis, the famous heresy-hunter from Salamis in Cyprus whose Panarion ('Medicine-Chest', completed c. 377) is a major encyclopaedia of ancient and contemporary heresies. (The work is so-called because Epiphanius saw it as providing the antidote for Christians who might be 'bitten' by heretics or schismatics whom he depicted as venomous reptiles or dangerous animals.) According to these tendentious sources, a certain Elchasaios known to us from Christian heresiological sources is closely linked to the 'Book of Elxai'. The work, according to Hippolytus, came into prominence at the church in Rome during the pontificate of Callistus (217–22) in relation to the controversy over re-baptism. Alcibiades, a native of Apamea in Syria, was said to have gained followers through advocating the practices laid down in a specially revealed work. This he claimed to have originally been received from (the) Seres (= silk-merchants?) by a certain 'righteous man' called Elchasai. He in turn transmitted it to a certain Sobiai (or a community of baptists) as a book revealed by an angel of gigantic proportions.[28] Hippolytus makes no mention of Elchasai as a founder of a sect, nor whether he was a Jew or a Christian of Jewish origin. That Alcibiades was a Christian there is no doubt, but there is nothing specifically Christian in the surviving excerpts of the 'Book of Elxai'.[29] By the time of Origen (c. AD 245), however, the Elchasaites were depicted by their opponents as a troublesome evangelising sect; and they were characterised by their rejection of the teaching of Paul.[30] More information is furnished by Epiphanius from whose Panarion we learn that Elchasai, the leader of the sect, was of Jewish origin; and though his beliefs were Jewish in origin, he did not live according to the Law.[31] He later joined a Jewish–Christian sect called the Osseans (also known as the Sampseans), and his name means 'hidden power'.[32] To add apparent veracity to his biographical reconstruction of the heresiarch, Epiphanius adduces two sisters called Marthous and Marthana, who claimed descent from Elchasai and who were venerated as goddesses in the reign of Constantius II (337–62).[33]

The new information furnished by the Cologne Mani-Codex on the apparent Jewish-Christian roots of the sect in which Mani grew up is nothing short of revolutionary and has led the study of Manichaean origins into [28] Hipp., ref. omn. haer. IX.13.1–2, p. 357, ed. Marcovich. On the place of the Elchasaites in Jewish Christianity see esp. Cirillo (1984); and Cirillo (1986).

[29] With the exception perhaps of the description of a vision of two celestial figures of gigantic proportions which finds a Jewish-Christian parallel in the Ascensio Jesajae, IX.27–40, ed. Tisserant.

[30] ap. Eusebius, hist. eccl. VI.38, p. 592.16–22, ed. E. Schwartz, GCS (Leipzig, 1903–7).

[31] Epiph., Panarion XIX.1.4–5, ed. K. Holl, rev. J. Dummer, GCS (Berlin, 1985) 218.4–10.

[32] Ibid. XIX.1.10, ed. cit., 219.5–10. [33] Ibid. XIX,1,12, ed. cit., 219,13–16.

completely new territory. Scholars have for some time been aware of the Jewish elements in Manichaeism, especially in Mani's use of apocryphal Jewish works like the Enochic writings[34] and other haggadic writings on Adam and Eve which have found their way into Manichaean texts.[35] The new material not only connects the study of Manichaeism to that of Judaeo-Christianity, it also draws the attention to scholars to a possible 'genetic' linkage between the teaching and community rules of the sect in which Mani grew up and those of Second Temple Judaism, especially sectarians associated with the texts found at Qumran. The practice employed by the compilers of the Codex of attributing at the beginning of each section to a particular tradition indicated by the name of a tradent is itself reminiscent of Jewish practice.[36] The 'baptists' appear to have been vegetarians and certain types of food were tabooed.[37] The 'baptists' were given to working in the fields and individual members were allocated their own lands to cultivate, as the Codex at one point describes two of Mani's friends as 'of the adjacent fields'.[38] The young Mani was expected to assist in the harvesting of fruit and vegetables and the gathering of firewood.[39] The fact that according to a reliable Arabic source (Fihrist, trans. below, p. 47) Mani was taken into the sect at a young age brings to mind the Essenes who, according to Josephus, while eschewing marriage yet picked out male children of other people and moulded them according to their rules.[40] A similar practice among the Mughtasilah may explain why Mani joined the sect at such a tender age and why Theodor bar Khoni alleged that Mani was bought by the sect as a slave. Since abstinence from the flesh (*hapax.*σαρκοδερία) was a fundamental precept of the 'baptists' and since the Codex mentions no woman in connection with the sect, we may assume that it was an all-male community. Another indication of the Jewish roots of the sect is that their religion was referred to throughout the Codex as the 'Rule' or 'Law' (νόμος), which implies that the sect lived in conformity with 'the Law'. Entry to the sect for a gentile like Mani's father might therefore have involved circumcision and obedience to the Mosaic Law. The members of the sect observed the Jewish Sabbath which in the Codex is referred to as the 'Rest of (or: Abstinence from) the Hands' (ἀναπαύσις τῶν χειρῶν), a term which anticipates the 'Seal of the Hands' of the Manichaean elect.[41] Though not actually cited in the Codex, the 'Book of Elxai' also contained [34] On this see especially Reeves (1991a); Reeves (1991b) and especially his monograph Reeves (1992).

[35] Cf. Reeves (1996), 79–88. [36] Cf. ibid. 6–7.
[37] CMC 88,2–9, eds. Koenen and Römer (1985), 60. [38] CMC 106,15–19, p. 74.
[39] See e.g. CMC 6,7–12,5. [40] Josephus, bellum Judaicum II, 8, 2(119–20).
[41] CMC 102,12–16, p. 72.

elements of an imminent eschatological war involving angelic beings which has echoes in the War Scroll from Qumran. Similarly the instructions for baptism 'a second time' for sexual sins (including bestiality) are also found in the Damascus Document – another Jewish text closely connected with Qumran though it originally came to light in the Cairo Genizah.

A possible link between the sect in which Mani grew up and a religious leader called Elchasai was already hinted at by the Arabic antiquarian Ibn an-Nadīm in his brief article on the Mughtasilah (i.e. those who baptise themselves) in his Fihrist ('Catalogue'):

> The Mughtasilah. These people are very numerous in the regions of al-Baṭa'ih; they are (called) the Ṣābat al-Baṭa'ih (i.e. Ṣabians of the marsh-lands). They observe ablution as a rite and wash everything which they eat. Their head is known as al-Ḥasīḥ and it is he who instituted their sect. They assert that the two existences are male and female and that the herbs are from the likeness of the male, whereas the parasite plants are from the likeness of the female, the trees being veins (roots). They have seven sayings, taking the form of fables. His (al-Ḥasīh's) disciple was named Sham'ūn. They agreed with the Manichaeans about the two elemental (principles), but later their sect became separate.[42]

Though the passage has been made available in German translation since the mid nineteenth century,[43] the connection between the Elchasaites and the baptist sect in which Mani grew up was not made by most Manichaean scholars until the discovery and initial publication of the Cologne Mani-Codex. The seemingly circumstantial and sometimes contradictory nature of the patristic evidence on Elxai has led at least one major scholar, Professor Gerard P. Luttikhuizen, to sound a note of warning against accepting too readily the link between the 'baptists' (i.e. the Mughtasilah of the Arabic sources) and the Elchasaites of the Church Fathers. While the 'Book of Elxai' is amply attested among Jewish Christian texts as a major Jewish apocalyptic work, the existence of a Jewish Christian sectarian leader called Elchasaios is less secure as the heresiological accounts give the impression of a developing myth.[44] Moreover, there is little to link the beliefs and practices of the Elchasaites of the heresiologists with the 'baptists' of the Codex. The second baptism taught by Alcibiades allegedly from the 'Book of Elxai' has nothing in common with the daily ablutions and ritual washing of food practised by the 'baptists'. Furthermore there are no citations from the 'Book of Elxai' in the Codex, not even in the sections in which the disciples [42] The Fihrist of al-Nadim, trans. Dodge (1970), II, 811.

[43] Cf. Chwolsohn (1856) I, 543–4. See also the discussion in Flügel (1862) 305.
[44] Luttikhuizen (1985) 210–20 and 225–6. See also Luttikhuizen (1987), 104–6.

of Mani sought to authenticate his revelation with citations from Jewish apocalyptic works and Christian writings (CMC 48.16–62.9). There also appears little in common between the teaching contained in the fragments of the 'Book of Elxai' and that of the 'baptists' of the Codex save for the doctrine of the cyclical rebirth of the True Prophet.[45] The Alchasaios of the Codex was clearly a mouth-piece of Manichaean teaching on the prohibition of harvesting and bathing by the elect and might have been just any 'leader' (archegos) of the 'baptists' and not the founder. The similarity in the name Alchasaios with that of the putative founder of the sect of the Elchasaites might have been purely accidental.[46]

The discovery by Professor Werner Sundermann, the principal researcher on Middle Iranian Manichaean texts from Turfan housed in Berlin, of the name 'lxs' in a biographical text of Mani in a Parthian text suggests that the Alchasaios of the Codex was not just an ordinary leader of the sect as Luttikhuizen has alleged. The fact that the text was in a dialect of Middle Iranian rules out the possibility of Manichaean missionaries active in the more Christianised parts of Mesopotamia and the Roman Empire 'inventing' the Alchasaios anecdotes to strengthen the sect's link with Christianity. In any case, the Manichaeans were hardly likely to have chosen to connect themselves with a heretical figure of shadowy existence for missionary purposes nor to refer to the sect in which Mani grew up as 'Elchasaites' – an odious epithet coined by heresiologists to denigrate sectarianism. Though the Parthian text is fragmentary, there is little doubt that the name 'lxs' occurs in an autobiographical account about Mani's youth and his calling.[47] Though the name of the founder of the sect of the 'baptists' is consistently spelt with an Alpha rather than an Epsilon in the Greek in the Codex, there are plenty of examples of such vowel changes in papyri; especially if the name was transliterated from a Semitic source.[48] The Syriac form of the name 'Elchasaites' is found in Syriac in the anti-heresiological writings of Theodore bar Konī on the Sampsaeans – a sect which was said to be descended from the Elchasaites – and the Syriac spelling is 'lq'sy'[49] and the initial semitic Aleph would have certainly lent itself to be transliterated into Greek by either Alpha or Epsilon. Furthermore, if the search for Elchasaite influences on Mani is widened to what is known of Manichaeism in general from western sources, rather than focusing narrowly on the Codex, [45] Luttikhuizen (1985), 222. [46] Ibid.

[47] The autobiographical nature is clear due to the word ymg "Twin" on the previous line. M1344 + M5910, KG, §2.2 (25–7), p. 19.

[48] Cf. Gignac (1976) I, 235 and 242–9.

[49] Theodor bar Khoni, Liber Scholiorum XI, CSCO 69 (Louvain, 1912), p. 307.2 – reading 'lq'sy' for 'ql'sy'.

there is much to be found. Both sects for instance placed great emphasis on apocalyptic literature, on the call to repentance, and on the cyclical reappearance of Christ. Both reject the Mosaic Laws, and both believe in all matter and plants and animals possessing souls, and in the transmigration of souls.[50] Though none of these similarities is in itself conclusive of a definite link, they do suggest a similar Jewish Christian background between the Elchasaites and the 'baptists' of the Codex; especially when one takes into account Mani's one-sided representation of the teaching of a sect whose teaching he rejected.

Controversies over the existence of Elchasaios and doubts over a fourth–fifth century dating of the codex (see below, pp. 42–3) have been relegated to the sidelines in Manichaean studies as another major discovery of new Manichaean texts is announced. The new material from Ismant el-Kharab (the Roman period village of Kellis) in the Dakhleh Oasis in Egypt has been found and recorded in a precise archaeological context; and it throws a great deal of light on the nature and activities of a Manichaean community which flourished in that oasis village in the fourth century because of its ability to present itself as a Christian church, and because the remoteness of the location gave it refuge from the persecuting authorities, first pagan and then Christian. The bilingual texts in Syriac and Coptic astounded scholars who had held the belief that given the pervasiveness of Greek, Manichaean texts would have been translated first into Greek and from Greek into Coptic. The new texts also emphasise the predominantly Christian elements of Manichaeism, although one text which was probably originally composed in Greek (the 'Prayer of the Emanations', see below, 61) may have been deliberately polytheistic in order to attract followers from pagan cults. With such a steady stream of new discoveries, and the need to continue work on still unpublished texts from Turfan and Medinet Madi, the study of Manichaeism is inevitably heavily dominated by the editing, translating and interpreting of new material, and is likely to remain so for some time to come.

THE SURVIVAL OF MANICHAEAN TEXTS FROM THE ROMAN EMPIRE

Manichaeism was a religion of the book; and Manichaean preachers, like Felix the doctor who debated with Augustine, took with them the canon of Mani's writings as well as other works belonging to the community. As a result Manichaean texts were often the target of confiscation by both imperial and ecclesiastical authorities in the Roman Empire. This led to the virtual disappearance of genuine Manichaean texts after the time of Augustine, and until the end of the nineteenth century almost all the examples we have of Manichaean texts which were disseminated in the Roman Empire come from the writings of opponents, especially those passages embedded in the voluminous anti-Manichaean writings of Augustine (who had himself been a Manichaean for at least nine years). Later, as a bishop, he also had access to confiscated Manichaean works. For modern scholarship, the situation as regards availability of texts changed rapidly with the discovery of the long section on Manichaeans and their writings in the Arabic Fihrist of Ibn an-Nadīm; and later the Liber Scholiorum of Theodor bar Khoni the Nestorian bishop of Kashkar in Iraq, which contains a lengthy citation from an undoubtedly canonical work of Mani in its original Syriac. Almost at the same time occurred the identification of a substantial citation from another unnamed Manichaean work in the Cathedral Homilies of Severus, the Monophysite patriarch of Antioch. Although originally this work was composed in Greek, these homilies have come down to us in two Syriac rescensions (the better known one being the work of Jacob of Edessa, the lesser that of Paul of Callinicum).[51] Then, the discovery of genuine Manichaean texts from Central Asia greatly added to our knowledge of the scriptures of the sect. Similarly the arduous task of deciphering the palimpsest which contains the Prose Refutation of Ephraim against Mani, which was completed by Revd C. W. Mitchell before the outbreak of the First World War (as mentioned above), added considerably to the number of genuine citations from Manichaean writings; but Mitchell's death in action led to considerable delay in the publication of the second and final volume of his work.[52] Nevertheless, for the patristic scholar, what was still lacking were genuine Manichaean texts from the Roman Empire itself which were free from the selective presentation and refutation of the community's opponents.

[50] As well demonstrated by Merkelbach (1988).

The first texts from lands within the confines of the Roman Empire to be identified as genuinely Manichaean were a number of small papyri fragments in Syriac from Oxyrhynchus in Egypt. These are written in an Estrangela script which is very close to that used by the Manichaean communities in Central Asia for texts in both Middle Iranian and Turkish (as well as Bactrian and Tocharian B).[53] These fragments are conveniently collected in an appendix to the seminal monograph of Burkitt,[54] but their fragmentary nature offers us only brief glimpses into a variety of Manichaean writings and their use of Christian scriptures. A slightly more substantial find was made in 1918 when thirteen very damaged leaves of a Latin theological manuscript, containing a large number of biblical citations, were found in a cave south-west of Theveste (Tebessa) in Algeria. Its identity initially perplexed scholars as the contents do not remind one of any of the known writings of the Latin Fathers. It was later suggested that the Tebessa Codex (as the text came to be known) was the work of a critic writing against the Manichaean distinction between the elect and the hearer. However, the most generally accepted view, first championed by Alfaric, is that it was rather the work (part of a pastoral letter?) of a Manichaean leader justifying this distinction, a teaching and practice which must have drawn considerable criticism from the Christian opponents of Manichaeism, and which might have also caused discontent among the hearers who could not see the purpose of their service of the elect.[55]

[51] The first major western scholar to study the Liber Scholiorum was H. Pognon; but the best known work which gives translations of the citations of both Theodor and Severus of Antioch (rescension of Jacob of Edessa) is Cumont (1908), and Cumont and Kugener (1912).

[52] Mitchell (1912–21). The quotations from Manichaean works cited by Ephraim for the purpose of refutation have been conveniently collected together by Reeves (1997).

A community which treasured its scriptures as greatly as the Manichaeans was highly likely to hide them from the prying eyes of its enemies. The discovery of a cache which had not been recovered by the sect could therefore yield more than one text. Such a cache, once put into concealment by Manichaean missionaries in the Fayum in Egypt, came to light when in 1929 local workmen digging for fertiliser in the ruins of an ancient house in Medinet Madi discovered at least seven papyrus codices still with their wooden covers in a chest.

The sensational news of Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten, Originalschriften des Mani und seiner Schüler, announced in 1933 by C. Schmidt, H. Ibscher and H. J. Polotsky,[56] marked a decisive turning point in the modern rediscovery of the religion. The codices were already broken up before they reached the Cairo market, where they were first seen by the Danish egyptologist H. O. Lange in November 1929. However, it was C. Schmidt in 1930, while on his way to Palestine to collect manuscripts for the Prussian Academy, who was shown a codex entitled Kephalaia and made the connection with Manichaeism. By sheer coincidence Schmidt was in the process of checking the proofs of the late K. Holl's edition of Epiphanius's Panarion, and [53] Cf. Margoliouth (1915); and Crum (1919).

[54] Burkitt (1925), 111–19. This replaces the earlier studies on these fragments by Margoliouth and Crum. See also additional comments in Lieu (1994, 1999), 62–4.

[55] The intitial discovery is given in Omont (1918). A translation of the text with fuller bibliography is given below, 92.

[56] Schmidt, Ibscher and Polotsky (1933).

he remembered that among the books that Mani was alleged to have received from Scythianus was one with the same title. Further examination revealed the characteristic clause: 'Once more the enlightener speaks to his disciples . . .'

News of the discovery was immediately communicated to A. Harnack in Germany; but, before adequate funds could arrive in Egypt for their purchase, part of the find was acquired by the Irish-American philanthropist and collector A. Chester Beatty. His famous collection of classical and biblical manuscripts was housed first in London, then after the second world war were transferred to Dublin, where they remain. The rest of the codices were then purchased by Schmidt with financial aid from the Stuttgart publishing company Kohlhammer, and shipped to Berlin.

The entire collection comprised seven codices, four in Berlin and three in London (now Dublin). In Berlin were: The Kephalaia of the Teacher (a small part of this went to Vienna); The Epistles of Mani; The Synaxeis of the Living Gospel;[57] and a (Manichaean) church history. In London: a book of psalms, together with an index; a collection of homilies; and The Kephalaia of the Wisdom of my Lord Mani.[58]

The Coptic texts themselves date from about AD 400, and are translations of Syriac originals that reach back to Mani himself (as with the canonical Epistles), or to the first generations of the church. They are written in a form of Coptic commonly known as sub-Achmimic or Lycopolitan (specifically dialect L4); and thus did not originate in the Fayum, but perhaps from the region of Assiut (Lycopolis) in upper Egypt.

Various sources indicate that this was an important and successful area for Manichaean evangelisation. One of the earliest critics of the new religion was the neo-Platonist Alexander of Lycopolis who reported that the religion attracted followers amongst his philosophical colleagues. The region also features in the mercantile travels of Scythianus, the proto-Manichaean of Christian polemics. Most importantly, this area of the Nile valley was, and still remains, the closest point in terms of communications to Kellis in the Dakhleh Oasis. The Coptic texts from Kellis are also written in a form of Lycopolitan; although admittedly this term is more convenient than specific, since strictly it covers a number of distinct dialects.

[57] The exact contents of this codex (i.e. whether it also contains other works), and its relationship to The Living Gospel itself, remains unclear.

[58] The relationship between the two Kephalaia codices has also been open to debate. However, despite the variation in titles, it appears that the Dublin codex can best be regarded as simply a continuation of the Berlin one.

The conservation of the extremely fragile codices, both from London and Berlin, was entrusted to the renowned H. Ibscher; and the task of printing the editions consigned to Kohlhammer Verlag. A special Coptic font was cut to resemble as closely as possible the hand-written originals. For the first ten years publication proceeded apace: in 1934 H. J. Polotsky's edition and German translation of 96 pages of Manichaische Homilien; in 1938 the latter 234 pages of A Manichaean Psalm-Book Part II, with an English translation by C. R. C. Allberry; and fascicles of the Berlin Kephalaia by A. Böhlig and H. J. Polotsky that reached page 244 in 1940.

Unfortunately the rise of National Socialism in Germany, and the advent of the second world war, heralded a number of tragedies. These included the departure from Germany of a number of the leading scholars due to the threat of anti-semitism; the death of Allberry; and the loss and probable destruction of some of the codices housed in the soviet sector of Berlin. Specifically the historical work and The Epistles seem to have been removed, and now only a few leaves remain in Berlin and Warsaw.

Such events led effectively to an end of work on the Medinet Madi texts for over forty years. Admittedly A. Böhlig published a further fascicle of the Kephalaia (pages 244–91) in 1966, but the work for this was largely prepared in 1943. However, the current outlook is much more positive. With the financial support of the Carlsberg foundation S. Giversen (University of Aarhus, Denmark) has published a facsimile edition of all the Dublin texts in four volumes: Kephalaia; Homilies and Varia; Psalm Book Part I; and II.[59] Meanwhile a separate team led by Wolf-Peter Funk (Université Laval, Québec) is working on the remaining material from Berlin: the Kephalaia, Epistles, Synaxeis and Church History codices.[60]

Whereas the provenance of the Medinet Madi find is relatively well known, and the subsequent history of how the texts were divided between Berlin and London (now Dublin) has since been described in some detail;[61] the same cannot be said of the next major Manichaean text from Egypt to be identified and published. The learned world first came to know [59] Giversen (1986, 1988).

[60] In fact, as this volume has been in the latter stages of collation, Funk has published Kephalaia fascicles 13/14 (1999) and 15/16 (2000). Some passages of these are included here, with a first English translation by Gardner. Under active preparation are the Epistles (Funk and Gardner), church history (Funk and Patterson), and Synaxeis (Funk and various scholars). As regards the Dublin codices, Nils-Arne Pedersen is near completion of his new edition of the Homilies (we have benefited from a prior view of some of his new readings); whilst various scholars such as Gardner, Giversen, Wurst, and Richter have published, at least in draft form, some passages from Part 1 of the Psalm-Book. However, a definitive edition of either the Dublin Kephalaia or the Psalm-Book Part 1 is still some years away.

[61] See esp. Robinson (1992); see also Robinson (1991).

of an extraordinary discovery by two German scholars, Albert Henrichs and Ludwig Koenen, in their preliminary study published in 1970.[62] The manuscript in question was the smallest parchment codex from the Graeco-Roman world then discovered to date. Measuring only 38 × 45 mm, with a single column of an average of 23 lines per page, in size it approximates to Christian amulets like P. Ant. II 54 (26 × 40 mm, Pater Noster) or P. Oxy. XVII 2065 (Ps. 90); but with nearly 200 pages it had much the largest number of quires (eight as against one). However, the wearing of (complete?) gospels as amulets is mentioned by Chrysostom, and the Codex might not therefore have been unique in its day. The tiny pages were ruled both for the lines and for the margins, and the ruling is still visible in places. The height of the individual letters never exceeded 1 mm and the text is hardly readable with the naked eye.[63] A glass-bottle filled with water was the most likely enlarging tool used by the ancient scribes to execute such delicate calligraphy. When enlarged by modern methods, the writing is very clear and possesses distinctive proportional spacing and wide and thick strokes. Most of the text was copied by one scribe; but another hand supplied the first quire and parts of the eighth, and several others corrected the text throughout. Although the format of the codex gives the appearance of a prophylact, the text was clearly intended to be read. The scribes made few errors and they even observed very strict syllabic rules in breaking up long words at the end of lines.[64]

Information as to how and when this remarkable manuscript came into the possession of the Papyrus-Sammlung at the University of Cologne is conspicuously absent from the early publications of the text, and the true story may never be known outside a small circle of scholars involved with its decipherment and publication. A more detailed and circumspect account of the preliminary conservation work and identification was provided by Henrichs almost a decade later.[65] According to this Henrichs met Dr Anton Fackelmann, a renowned conservator, in Fackelmann's residence in June 1969. He had in his possession four small dessicated and fragile lumps of parchment. Preliminary reading of individually identified words gave the impression that the document was probably a religious text of an esoteric or apocalyptic nature. Two recurrent phrases were περι της γεννης and του σωματος αυτου. There seemed little hope of separating the pages and thereby revealing the contents more fully. However, a special chemical was applied to the lumps by Dr Fackelmann and the result appeared nothing short of a miracle.

[62] Henrichs and Koenen (1970). [63] In Matt. hom. 83, PG 58.669.
[64] Cf. Koenen and Römer (1993), 39–42. [65] Henrichs (1979).

The pages of vellum came off more easily than was expected. The first ones to be detached contained a series of what appeared to be Judaeo-Christian apocalypses, as they were addressed to descendants of Adam. By next day (15 June 1969), however, the Manichaean nature of the work was discovered when this unmistakable exordium was encountered on one of the pages: 'I, Mani, the apostle of Jesus Christ through the will of God, the Father of Truth, from whom I was born.' The recurrent phrases mentioned above combine to form the running title which heads every other double spread: 'Concerning the Birth | of his Body'. This odd-sounding title conforms to the Manichaean teaching of Mani's body as only a vehicle of his earthly life; but it may well also allude to the 'body' as his church.[66] A total of one hundred and ninety-two pages in eight quires, together with some unlocalisable fragments, were conserved;[67] making it one of the longest texts to be recovered from a miniature codex. Oxyrhynchus was originally suggested as the place of origin of this unique text; but Lycopolis (modern Assiut), a major centre of Manichaean acitivities in Roman Egypt, was later put forward as the more likely source.[68] Henrich's own words remain vitually our only statement on the possible provenance of the codex:

> Ancient manuscripts which antedate the Byzantine period are almost never identified at the place of their original discovery, and more often than not the circumstances of their disinterment are shrouded in obscurity and secrecy. The Cologne Codex is no exception. Rumour has it that the remains of the codex were located several decades ago in Luxor, and it is a reasonable guess that they were found in the vicinity of ancient Lycopolis, a stronghold of Manichaeism in Upper Egypt. In other words, next to nothing is known about the fate of the Mani Codex before it reached Cologne.[69]

The Cologne Mani Codex is unique among extant Manichaean texts both in its literary format and in the information it provides.[70] The conserved pages probably once formed the first part of a historical text similar to the Coptic work now so very partially preserved in Berlin codex P15997 (v. supra). However, the format of the Codex is different. It is a compilation of the written testimonies by some of Mani's closest disciples such as Salmaios [66] Henrichs (1979) 342–9.

[67] See the facsimile edition: Koenen and Römer (1985).
[68] Cf. Koenen (1973). [69] Henrichs (1979) 349.
[70] The editio major remains the four-part article of Henrichs and Koenen, (1975–82). The commentary on the last part of the text is provided by C. Römer in Römer (1994). The editio minor of the text: Koenen and Römer (1988), is the most convenient version for scholars; but note also the numerous articles by Römer et al. in ZPE giving improved readings and suggested reconstructions to its publication. See also the summary of these relevant to pp. 121–92 of the codex in Römer (1994), 163–5.

the ascetic, Baraies the teacher, Timotheos, Abiesus the teacher, Innaios the brother of Zabed, Za(cheas?), Koustaios the son of 'the treasure of life' and Ana the brother of the disciple Zacheas; and concerns the early life (i.e. the first twenty-four to twenty-five years) of Mani. A number of minor inconsistencies exist between the extracts, especially on the number and frequency and timing of the appearance of Mani's divine alter ego (Syzygos), which point to the work being compiled directly from different sources with minimal editing. There are also citations from Mani's writings, e.g. the Evangelium and his 'Letter to Edessa', as well as from the writings of St Paul and several hitherto unattested apocalypses. The work was clearly translated from Syriac, as indicated by a number of unmistakable semiticisms; and the fact that it was a translated document obscures the stylistic differences between the different authors from whose individual eye-witness accounts the excerpts were drawn.

The original editors of the Codex dated the manuscript to the fourth century on the basis of the similarity in format to other miniature codices used as amulets by Christians such as like P. Ant. ii 54 (26 × 40 mm. Pater Noster) or P. Oxy. xvii 2065 (Ps. 90). A fourth century date also coincides with the hightide of Manischaean missions in the Roman Empire before they were driven underground by the antiheretical edicts of Christian emperors. An attempt has been made by two scholars to date the Codex on palaeographical grounds to the seventh/eighth century.[71] The distinctive style of the writing, termed 'die rechtsgeneigte Spitzbogenmajuskel palästinischen Duktus', is typical, according to the two scholars, of texts produced in the early Islamic period and, in particular, liturgical texts with Syriac and/or Arabic. The similarity is specially marked in a number of letters (α, δ, ζ, ρ, υ, φ, ψ, ω) especially in the alternation of thick and thin strokes and the distinctive use of serifs in the letter τ.[72] The historical problems confronting such a late dating are considerable. The Codex, apart from the biblical citations, shows clear Semitic influence which is characteristic of an early stage of textual diffusion from Syriac-speaking areas. Some of these semiticisms would undoubtedly have been modified as the text was copied and recopied. A direct translation from the Syriac in the seventh century and copied into a miniaturised codex for concealment would be hard to imagine, except it would explain why a number of accurate details including the Greek versions of the names of some of the tradents of the Codex were found in an Early Byzantine anathema text and not in earlier Greek anti-Manichaean polemical writings.[73] The Codex could of course have been merely a prophylactus in which the text copied is of little importance. But the high quality of the calligraphy and the trouble the scribes took to ensure legibility (even in its minute format) down to the very strict rules observed by the scribes in line-breaks involving long words, implies that it is designed to be read. Maybe there was a final renaissance of Manichaeism in Egypt in the early Islamic period with new texts imported from Mesopotamia. In the time of Abū Ja'far al-Mansur (754–75), a Manichaean from Africa, Abū Hilāl al-Dayhūri became the Imam (i.e. archegos) of the sect at al-Madain (formerly Seleucia-Ctesiphon) – the traditional seat of the supreme head of the Manichaean church.[74] That a Manichaean from Africa could be chosen for the most prominent office in the land of the sect's origins within a century of the Arab conquest shows either how quickly the religion re-established itself in Africa (including possibly Egypt) or how resilient it was to Christian persecution.

[71] Fonkič and Poljakov (1990), 22–30. [72] Art. cit., 25–6. [73] Cf. Lieu (1983), 194–6.

There was one final dramatic discovery before the turn to the twenty-first century: again it was made in Egypt, and in its own way was just as unexpected. In the 1970s Anthony J. Mills had inaugurated a long-term research project in the Dakhleh Oasis, with the goal to make an holistic study of this remote area and of the adaptation of human life to such an arid environment. Over the years a substantial team from a variety of disciplines (as varied as palaeobotanists and folk historians) had joined the Dakhleh Oasis Project (DOP), initial surveys had been made, and a number of sub-projects had been inaugurated ranging over a vast time-span of human activity. One of the major of these was an archaeological excavation led by Colin A. Hope, from Monash University in Australia, which was begun in the mid 1980s at the site of Ismant el-Kharab. The initial seasons made apparent that this was the remains of a Roman period village named Kellis, which had been abandoned (probably for agricultural reasons, being dependent on scant water resources and in a harsh climate) by about the year AD 400. It was learnt that in this period the oasis constituted an administrative district (a nome) centred at Mothis (modern Mut), and that it lay within the governance, though at the limit, of Roman imperial authority. As indeed is still the case, although the nome had strong administrative and cultural links with Egypt, the local people regarded themselves in important respects as separate. 'Egypt' properly was the Nile valley, which lay some 300 kilometres and more to the east.

By the late 1980s the team at Ismant el-Kharab had begun to recover substantial papyrological remains, and in the 1990–1 excavation season at [74] Al-Nadim, Fihrist, trans. Dodge, 794.

'House 3' in residential area A these became quite remarkable both for reasons of quantity and type. In particular there were unexpected bilingual fragments in Coptic and Syriac, and a most unusual proportion of Coptic documentary texts (for this time-span) found with equally major Greek finds. The first notice of a Manichaean context was made by the epigrapher Olaf Kaper (of the name 'Manichaios' which appears in text T. Kell. Copt. 2, A 5), and shortly after Geoffrey Jenkins identified portions of a psalm parallel to the Medinet Madi Manichaean Psalm-Book no. 222 (T. Kell. Copt. 4). The major textual discoveries led to an expansion of the papyrological team, with the Coptic Manichaean specialist Iain Gardner joining in 1991, and soon afterwards the Greek documentary papyri expert Klaas Worp. As Gardner began to view photographs of fragments supplied to him in Australia, and then from 1992–3 began to work each season on site in Dakhleh, the extent of the Manichaean context became much more apparent; and Gardner was able to begin to publicise and publish these finds, sometimes in collaboration with other members of the team.

In House 3 during the later fourth century, and certainly living also elsewhere in Kellis and its environs, there was a thriving community of Manichaean believers; but it must be noted strongly that the numbers of such, and their proportion relative to Christian or pagan contemporaries, can not be known with the present state of knowledge. At this time of writing, the actual sheer quantity of Manichaean texts recovered is relatively minor in comparison with (especially) the Medinet Madi library. However, this new find has marked a major step forward in the recovery of the community's history and its texts for a number of reasons.

Firstly: this was the first time within the Roman Empire that textual resources belonging to a Manichaean community had been uncovered by a scientific archaeological excavation. Previous finds, such as from Medinet Madi or the CMC, had appeared divorced of any real context, and the communities or persons to which such texts might have belonged could only receive the most tentative and speculative discussion. Now at Kellis there existed a secure material environment, and such a variety of evidence (coins, ceramics, legal documents, church buildings, burials, etc), that the outline of a real social, economic and cultural history for the village could confidently be begun. This is certainly not to say that all such evidence belonged to the Manichaean believers, but rather that the worlds in which they had lived could take some definite form.

In consequence, with the recovery of such a context where it is now possible to identify the social dimensions of a Manichaean community in late Roman Egypt, the trajectory of research leads to the identification of traces of the faith where previously they had been invisible; and to a truer understanding of the relations between such religious groups as Manichaeans and Christians in late antiquity, and consequently to a reevaluation of Manichaean identity. For these points see especially chapter 7: the discussion of Manichaean epistolary style, and the evidences of everyday concerns made apparent in the personal letters written by believers to their friends and relatives in Roman Kellis.

Furthermore, while it has already been remarked that there is no massive quantity of Manichaean literary remains yet recovered from Ismant el-Kharab, yet there are some important new genres or examples of type, and the variety of texts is itself impressive. In particular one must mention the bilingual Coptic-Syriac texts (not exampled in this present volume due to their lack of narrative coherence),[75] which evidence the importance of text and authority for the community, as well as illustrating technical aspects relevant to the development of Manichaean literatures in the Roman Empire. Also important are the first examples of Greek Manichaean psalms.

Finally: where the finds from Ismant el-Kharab parallel previously known genres or texts, and this is most apparent with the various 'duplicates' to Medinet Madi psalms that have been identified, they begin to enable the history of these literatures to be recovered. Thus, the 'Manichaean Psalm-Book', of which part II was famously edited by C. R. C. Allberry and published in 1938, can now be better understood as a constructed text that stands at the end of a lengthy redaction history; which itself can also, of course, be extrapolated into an as yet unexampled future.

Thus, the recovery of Manichaean texts from the Roman Empire has been punctuated by a series of remarkable discoveries over the last century, which can only promise more for the future. Consequently, this has been a topic that has seen rapid development; and sudden, unexpected shifts in direction. We can not imagine all the future trajectories of research, but the delineation of the faith and its followers is now so much clearer. The purpose of this volume is to make accessible material that in a rapidly changing field may most likely be unknown except to the specialist.

[75] See M. Franzmann and I. Gardner in: Gardner (1996), 101–31; with improved readings in Gardner, Alcock and Funk (1999) 344–64.

CHAPTER 2

The life of Mani

On the life of Mani see Introduction (pp. 3–8). The following excerpts are primarily taken from the Greek Cologne Mani-Codex and Coptic sources from Medinet Madi, supplemented by texts in Arabic and Middle Iranian (especially Parthian) which are clearly derived from Manichaean sources ultimately belonging to the same original literary (Syriac?) tradition.

CHILDHOOD, YOUTH AND CALLING

1. Mani's parentage, birth, childhood and adolescence

This extract, taken from the section devoted to the teaching of the Manichaeans in the Fihrist (Catalogue) of Ibn an-Nadīm[1] (composed towards the end of the tenth century AD in Baghdad), draws material from the writings of Abū 'Isā al-Warraq who lived a century earlier and had access to genuine Manichaean writings. It supplies information not yet found in Manichaean texts from the Roman Empire.

Muḥammad bin Isḥaq said: 'Mānī bin Fatiq[2] Bābak bin Abī Barzām was of the Ḥaskāniyya. His mother's name was Mays, but she was also called Awtāḫīm or Marmaryam of the Ašġāniyya.[3] It was said that Mānī was the Bishop (usquf) of Qunnī[4] and of the kinsmen of (328) the Ḥūḥī, the Bādarāyā and the Baksāyā nearby. He had a deformed foot. It was said that his father was originally from Hamadān and had moved to Babylon, settling in al-Madā'in in the place called Ṭīsfūn (Ctesiphon) which had a temple (a house of idols). Fatiq attended this temple, like everyone else, when, one day, a voice called to him from the inner sanctum of the temple saying: 'Fatiq! Do not eat meat, do not drink wine and abstain from intercourse

[1] An-Nadīm, Kitāb al-Fihrist, ed. G. Flügel, Leipzig, 1871, pp. 327–8, trans. M. Laffan (unpublished).
[2] The text of Flügel gives Futtuq.
[3] Probably a miscopy for Asghanijah, see next note.
[4] Here we have a confusion of Mani with the legendary Christian missionary Mari who established a monastery at Qoni as well as the see (later the catholicate) at Seleucia-Ctesiphon. On this see W. B. Henning, 'Zwei Fehler in der arabisch-manichäischen Überlieferung', Orientalia, NS, 5 (1936) 84–7.

with anyone.' Fatiq heard this call repeated many times over three days. Having witnessed that, Fatiq attached himself to a group of people in the vicinity of Dastumīsān known as the Cleansers (al-Muġtasila). Their remnants persist to this day in that place and in the marshes. These people were (thus) of the sect which Fatiq was ordered to join when his wife was pregnant with Mānī. Once she gave birth (to him), they claimed that she had had lovely dreams about him. And (once) she gained consciousness she had a vision of him being taken up into air by a force which then returned him, after perhaps a day or two (aloft). And then, having returned, his father came forth and took him to his place of residence to raise him and care for his community.

Mānī acquired the art of wise words at a very young age. And at the completion of his twelfth year, he was inspired from above by (a being) he called the King of the Gardens of Light, (for) it was God Almighty who addressed him. And the angel that brought him (this) revelation was called al-Tawm, from the Nabatean word meaning 'companion'. And the angel said to him: 'Abandon this community, for you are not of them. You must be unblemished and abstain from desires. The time is not right for you to appear, for you are still young.' (So) when he turned twenty-four, al-Tawm brought him forth saying: 'Now is the time for you to appear and call (others) to your cause.'

What al-Tawm told Mānī:

'Peace be with you, Mānī, both from myself and from the Lord Who sent me to you and Who chose you for His message. He has commanded you to invite (others) in your own right and to preach on His behalf the Truth, laying it upon you to do so with your utmost effort.'

2. Mani's own version of early revelations from his divine Twin

We here begin a series of passages from the Greek Cologne Mani-Codex.[5]

(fr. 1) (Perhaps the Syzygos in a vision spoke to Mani): '. . . the fellow-believers . . . prophets . . . and saviour(s ?) . . .' 1 (Mani appears to continue with his account after about thirty-nine lost lines:) . . . this same (vision (?) . . .) to me . . . it(self(?) . . . 2 '. . .) little by little (I (i.e. the Syzygos)) have shown you (what is hidden (?) . . .) from many (. . .) You will be able to see that mystery in magnificence and complete clarity.' And then the angel was concealed from (me . . . about 13 lines lost . . . 3 . . .) I was protected through the might of the angels and of the powers of holiness which were entrusted with my protection. They also brought me up by means of the visions and signs they showed me, which were short and very brief such as I could bear. For sometimes (he came) like lightning, (. . . 9 lines lost . . . 4 . . .) this I perceived with all exactitude. He also gave me a firm grounding in that power which remains steadfast in affliction.

[5] CMC fr. 1 and 1-5.13, eds. Koenen and Römer (1988), 2–4. All citations from the CMC in this volume are translated by Profs. J. M. and S. N. C. Lieu who would like to acknowledge the helpful comments and observations of M. Vermes and Dr Rosalie Cook. Departures from this edition mainly follow suggestions and improvements made by Dr Cornelia Römer in subsequent publications.

Very many are the visions and very great the marvels which he showed me throughout all that period of my youth. Yet I remained in silence, except (. . . 10 lines lost . . . 5 . . .) whilst I with wisdom and cunning wandered in their midst and observed the 'rest' and did no wrong, neither did I cause distress or follow the rule of the baptists or engage with them in dialogue in the same way (as they do).

3. Incidents from Mani's youth showing his refusal to harm even plants

This passage (from the Greek Cologne Mani-Codex.[6]) is credited by that text to a certain Salmaios the (ascetic).[7]

6 . . .[8] to him: 'Yet you neither take vegetables from the garden nor do you carry wood for his use.'

Then that baptist rebuked me saying: 'Get up and come with me to the place where there is wood, take it and bring it.' We went to a palm and he climbed it (. . . 9 lines lost . . . 7 (The palm-tree spoke): '. . .) If you spare us the pain, you will not die along with the murderer.' Then that baptist, overwhelmed by fear, leapt out of the tree in confusion and fell at my feet saying: 'I did not know that this secret mystery is in your power. How was the (great pain of the palm) revealed to you?' (. . . 7 lines lost . . . 8 . . . (Mani spoke)): 'Why did you take fright and change colour (when the palm said) this to you? How much more should he, with whom all the (plants) speak, be disturbed?' He was then gripped by wonder and alarmed because of me. He said to me: 'Guard this mystery, tell it to nobody, lest anyone becomes jealous and kills you.' Therefore someone (. . . 8 lines lost . . .

[6] CMC 5.14–14.2; 4–8.

[7] Salmaios from whose writing this extract was excerpted for the CMC was an early disciple of Mani. Cf. Tubach (1997), 381–2.

[8] The young Mani was here admonishing a fellow 'baptist'.

9 . . .)[9] One of the leaders of their law spoke to me when he saw that I did not take vegetables from the garden but was asking them for them as a form of alms. He said to me: 'Why do you not take vegetables from the garden, but ask me in turn for them as a form of alms?' And after that baptist had said to (me . . . 7 lines lost . . .

10 (Part of another incident) . . .) and it[10] cried (lamen)ting just like human beings and like children. Alas, alas! Blood poured from the place which was cut by the sickle which he held in his hands. And they cried out with a human voice because of their blows. The baptist was greatly disturbed by what he saw and he came and fell before me. When now . . . someone . . . me (. . . 5 lines lost . . .

. . .) from infancy 11 (until) my fourth year. Then I entered the religion of the baptists[11] in which I was brought up when I was young, protected through the might of the angels of light and of the powers of great strength who had a command from Jesus concerning my protection.[12] As they then immediately (. . . 8 lines lost . . .

. . . from the spring of) 12 the waters there appeared to me a human form which showed me by hand the 'rest' so that I might not sin and bring distress on him.

In this way, from the age of four until the time when I reached my physical prime, I was (secretly) kept safe in the hands of the most holy angels and powers of holiness (. . . 8 lines lost . . .

13 . . .) Another time a voice as of the Syzygos (Gr. σύζυγος, σύζυξ) addressed me from the air saying: 'Strengthen your power and discipline your mind and accept everything which is to be revealed to you.' Yet again he said the same: 'Strengthen your power and confirm your mind and submit to everything which is about to come to you.' Then I (fell . . .) the voice (. . . 7 lines lost . . .

14 . . .) from the great (fathers) we have been sent forth.

4. Mani's account of his call

The following sections[13] contain Mani's own account of his second and definitive revelation.

[9] '(Because of the Rest of the Hands . . .)' was read in the Editio Major (Henrichs and Koenen 1975:11) but Koenen and Römer (1988: 6) find it hard to retain.

[10] I.e. the plant which was being harvested.

[11] The same term 'religion (or dogma) of the baptists' is also found in the Homilies (87.13, ed. Polotsky) transcribed from Greek into Coptic. Unfortunately, the relevant section of the Homilies (which is clearly a summary of biographical material closely related to the CMC) is highly fragmentary.

[12] 'Jesus concerning my protection': new reading suggested by Maresch (1988) 84.

[13] CMC 18.1–41.11; 12–26.

Baraies the Teacher:

18 (. . . When) I was twenty (four) years old, in the year in which Dariadaxar,[14] the king of Persia, conquered the city of Hatra,[15] and in which his son King Sapores[16] assumed the mighty diadem, in the month Pharmouthi, on the eighth day according to the moon,[17] the most blessed lord had compassion on me and called me to his grace and sent to me (my) Syzygos (who) in great (glory . . . 8 lines lost . . . 19 . . .) He remembered and (passed on) all noble counsels which came from our Father and from the original beneficial good.

And he spoke again as follows: 'Even as my Father has been well pleased and has shown me mercy and pity, to redeem me from the error of the sectarians, and showing me compassion through his many (revelations) he sent (to me my Syzygos . . . 5 lines lost . . . 20 He (the Syzygos) conveyed to me the) noblest (hope and) redemption for the long-suffering, and the truest counsels and judgements and the laying on of hands which comes from our Father. Therefore, when he came, he released me and separated me and drew me away from the midst of that rule in which I was brought up. In this way he called me and chose me and drew me and separated me from their midst. He drew (me away to one) side (. . . 6 lines lost . . . 21 . . .) and (showed me) who I am and what my body is, in what way I came and how my coming into this world happened, and who I have become among those who are most distinguished in pre-eminence, and how I was born into this fleshly body, or through what woman I was brought to birth and delivered into this flesh, and by whom I was begotten.[18] (. . . 7 lines lost . . . 22 . . .) and how that . . . came about, and who is my Father on high or in what way I was separated from him and was sent according to his will, and what command and instruction he gave to me before I clothed myself with this frame, and before I fell into error in this loathsome flesh, and before I put on its intoxication and its habits, and who (he is) who is (my unsleeping Syzygos . . .) and the (. . . 5 lines lost . . . 23 . . .) (and the Syzygos further shows) the secrets and the (thoughts), and the pre-eminence of my Father, and concerning myself, who I am, and who is my inseparable Syzygos; moreover, concerning my soul, which is the soul of all worlds, what [14] I.e. Ardashir (r. AD 224–42), the founder of the Sassanian Dynasty.

[15] Hatra was loyal to the deposed Parthian Dynasty, and its defence against a long siege conducted by the crown-prince and co-regent Shapur was assisted by Roman forces.

[16] I.e. Shapur I (r. 240–73, co-regent 240–2).

[17] I.e. 17/18 April AD 240.

[18] The Manichaeans believed that the fleshly human body was the lustful creation of evil forces and was a prison for divine light-particles. The passage suggests that Mani had a divine and 'flesh-free' existence before he was incarnated.

it is itself or how it came to be. He also revealed to me, in addition, the measureless heights and unsearchable depths, he showed (me) everything which (. . .' 8 lines lost . . .

24 . . . 1 line lost . . .
. . .) he who is (the most protected:
I received) him piously,
and I obtained him as my own property.
I believed him,
that he belongs to me
and that he is a good and useful counsellor.
I recognised him,
and understood that I am he from whom I was separated.
I have borne witness, that I myself am he and am (completely) the same . . .
. . . 8 lines lost . . .
25 . . .) to him.

Again he spoke thus: 'With very great skill and understanding I went about in that rule, guarding that hope in my mind while no one perceived who it was that was with me. And I myself revealed to no one anything during that very long time. Yet I did not . . . fleshly . . . in the same way as them (. . .' 6 lines lost . . .

26 I reve)aled to them none of those things which had happened or were to happen, nor what it was that I knew, or what it was which I had received.

The teachers speak:[19]

'Therefore when that highly renowned and greatly blessed one revealed to me these great unspeakable secrets, he began to say to me: "Declare this mystery which I have revealed to you from . . . to everyone . . . and reveal (. . . ms. pp. 27–8 are missing.)[20]

28 . . . (line 23) (by means of the reaping-hook)

29 which separates the weeds and fruits of the earth, to cut off the branches of all the rebels, then truth alone is glorified and reigns like the (Father?) of the heights. (. . . 14 lines lost . . .)

[19] The text turns now from the witness of Baraies to another source (unknown).

[20] Fragment 4a/b suggested in Koenen and Römer (1985) 54–55 as part of these lost pages has now been placed more securely on pp. 35 and 36 (see below).

30 . . .) to those who are bound according to the flesh; but even in this way, little by little I separated myself from the midst of that rule (in) which I was brought up; I admire beyond (measure . . .) mysteries . . . many[21] (. . . 7 lines lost . . .)

31 (my enemies are) great in number, but I am alone. These are rich, but I am poor; how then shall I who am alone against all, be able to reveal this mystery in the midst of the great number which is (entangled in) error? (How will I go) to the (kings) and governors (. . .) good (. . .) race (. . .) to converse (. . .) indeed (. . .) for (I am . . .) and (poor and) alone[22] (. . . 3 lines lost . . . 32 . . .) [23] very many helpers also associate with him (viz. the King of Kings (?)). While these thoughts were passing through my mind, there stood before me immediately my (most glorious) Syzygos and he said to me: 'Why have you said that this mystery can not be revealed to the kings by you? So just as I counselled you before as a good adviser, so now am I advisor of your counsel.'[24]

Timotheos:[25]

33 Throughout (this) time (. . .) and (. . .) mysteries (. . .) Then (. . . 2 lines lost . . .) of light (. . . 6 lines lost . . . of the) 34 fathers of light. And he revealed to me everything which took place in the ships. Moreover, he disclosed the bosom of the pillar and the fathers and the powers of great strength which are hidden (in it . . .) and (. . .) the heights (. . .) he showed (. . .) this (. . . 9 lines lost . . .

35 . . .) to be chosen and to appear to me, prepared and perfected in her teachers and bishops, elect and catechumens, in the meals, acts of piety and greatest helpers and everything that would happen so that this church of mine would be revealed, and for him, that (Syzygos), upon whom ([26] . . . 3 lines lost . . .

[21] The Greek for 'I admire . . . many' (i.e. CMC 30.9–16) was not included in the 'Reading Text' of the Editio Major (Henrichs and Koenen: 1975: 35).

[22] The word used in the Syriac original might well have been yḥydy' (a person who lives singly) which is a fundamental term in Syrian ascetic vocabulary. Cf. Vööbus (1958) 1, 106–8; and Henrichs (1973) 35–39.

[23] The Greek for '(How will I go) . . . (poor and)' (i.e. CMC 31.10–20) was not included in the 'Reading Text' of the Editio Major (Henrichs and Koenen: 1975: 35).

[24] 'While these thoughts . . . so now am I advisor of your counsel.' (i.e. CMC 32.10–18) is suggested in the apparatus criticus of Koenen and Römer (1988), 18.

[25] Little is known of this witness with a distinctively Greek name. Cf. Tubach (1997), 384.

[26] 'and everything that would . . . upon whom(. . .' (i.e. CMC 35.10–15) these lines have been added in the Editio Minor with the placing of fragments 4b and 6b in this page. See Koenen-Römer (1988), 20–2 and pl. 1.

(Witness unknown):

. . .) the (truest) 36 unspeakable (knowledge (?)) he revealed to me, and I knelt before him and said: 'These things I beg of you, are they given to me and will they remain with me all the time, not hidden, but openly (revealed) through my hands and made manifest (to the) eyes (of all people)? So that the church will continue (to grow), I (request of you all the) power (of the signs), so that I might perform (them) with my own hands . . . throughout every (place, every) village (and city[27] . . . 1 line lost . . . 37 and so that I might) bring (forgiveness) to those who have transgressed; and, moreover, so that no one might overcome me in wisdom, and I might be free of sickness and danger; and that the souls of the victors coming out of the world might be seen by the eyes of all men. Likewise (. . . 3 lines lost . . .) and moreover (. . . 1 line lost . . .) the glory (. . . 1 line lost . . .) and so that (. . . 4 lines lost . . .); and moreover that when 38 surrounded by oppression or persecution, I might be hidden from the sight of my enemies'.

Then that most glorious one said to me: 'Of these gifts which you have asked of me, one of them is (given) to some of the brothers . . . in . . . to others . . . generation . . . were revealed (. . . 1 line lost . . .) to see with the eyes . . . the gifts (. . . 3 lines lost . . . 39 . . .) according to what is fitting for the generation in which you (Mani) were revealed, so that you might bring forgiveness of sins for those sinners who accept repentance from you and rely on holiness, that by releasing you might bring (release from) sins (and from accusations for your elect), and moreover . . . blame . . . repentance . . . And furthermore (. . . 3 lines lost . . .) belief (. . . 1 line lost . . .) 40 Furthermore, if you ever summon me when you are oppressed, I shall be found standing by you and shall be your protector in all oppression and danger. These signs, which you have asked of me, shall be seen in me so as to be made (most) manifest to you. For I shall (show) everything by my hand and be (like a mirror to you so that (the) wisdom) is perfected (in you and you are freed) from illness. The signs are given to you through (. . . 4 lines lost . . . 41 the mar)vels of falsehood, which have been set up in opposition to them; for through the signs of truth, those of falsehood have been brought to nothing.' After the most glorious one had said these things to me and had strengthened and emboldened me in my (apostolate, he disappeared . . .) therefore . . . reveal . . . when (. . . 1 line lost . . .) similarly (. . . 2 lines lost . . .)

[27] 'So that the church will continue (to grow . . . throughout every (place, every) village (and city' (i.e. CMC 36.12–23) these lines have been added in the Editio Minor with the placing of fragments 4a and 6a in this page. See Koenen-Römer (1988), 22 and pl. 2.

45 Baraies the Teacher:

Therefore know, brethren, and understand everything which has been written here, about the way in which this mission was sent in our generation, just as we were taught by him, and also concerning (his) body (. . . 13 lines lost . . .) 46 . . . of this sending of the spirit of the Paraclete, and having turned away say that those men alone wrote about the rapture of their teacher in order to boast.

Moreover (he wrote) also concerning the origin of his body and also . . . of that . . . (. . . 14 lines lost . . .) 47 (. . .) he sins. For let him who is willing hear and attend how each one of the forefathers has made known his own revelation to his own elect, which he chose and brought together in that generation in which he appeared, and has written about it and passed it on to posterity. One of them declared about his rapture, while those outside attended (. . . 8 lines lost . . .) 48 (. . .) afterwards to write about and make known and to praise and extol their teachers and the truth and hope which was revealed to them. So, therefore, each one of them, according to the period and course of his mission, spoke what he had witnessed and has written it as a memorial, including about his rapture.

(Thus) Adam, first,[28] spoke with the clearest voice (in) his (apocalypse),[29] saying:

'I saw an angel revealed . . . 49 (in front of) your (shining) face, which I do not know'.

Then he said to him:

'I am Balsamos,[30] the greatest Angel of Light. Receive from me and write these things I reveal to you on the purest papyrus which is not perishable or liable to worms.'

(And he spoke) also of many other things which he revealed to him in the vision. For the glory round him was very great. And he also saw (the) angels and the commanders (-in-chief and the) greatest (powers (. . . 5 lines lost . . .) 50 . . . and Adam became above all the powers and angels of creation. And many other things, like these, are in his writings.

[28] The Greek does not support the translation of Reeves (1996, 68 and comm. 69) as 'the first Adam'.
[29] On the Apocalypse of Adam and the Adamic tradition in Manichaeism see the important study by Reeves (1996), 67–109.
[30] Balsamos is almost certainly the Greek form of the important semitic deity Baal Shamin to whom important temples were dedicated in Palmyra and other cities in the Roman Near East.

Similarly Sethel,[31] his son, has also written in his apocalypse saying,

'I opened my eyes and I saw before my face (an angel) whose (brightness) I could not describe (for he was) nothing other than lightning. (. . . 5 lines lost . . .) 51. . . . When I heard these things, my heart rejoiced and my mind turned about and I became like one of the very great angels. That angel put his hand on my right hand and drew me from the world from which I came, and took me to another very large place. From behind me I heard a huge noise from those angels I had left behind in that world in which they (belonged. . . . And I) saw . . . men . . . (. . . 2 lines lost. . . .)'

(Many) similar things 52 are said in his writings, and how he was seized by that angel from a world into (another) world, and he revealed to him the greatest mysteries of magnitude.

Again, in the apocalypse of Enos[32] it says as follows:

'In the third year and in the tenth month I went out to wander in the desert land. I considered in my mind the heaven and the earth and (all) works (and affairs), in what manner (and by whom) and by whose (purpose) they came to be (. . . 3 lines lost . . .) 53 . . . . . of death. And he seized me with very great quietness. My heart was heavy and all my limbs trembled. The bones of my back were shaken by the violence and my feet did not stay firm on their joints. I went away to many plains and saw there very high mountains. And the spirit seized and took me to the mountain with quiet strength. And there many great (sights) were revealed to me.'

Again he (said):

(the angel) (. . . 4 lines lost. . . .) 54 (and he led me to the) northern (region), and I saw there immensely great mountains and angels and many places. He spoke to me and said, 'He who is all-powerful in supremacy sent me to you, to reveal to you the secret things you have thought about, since you have been chosen for the truth. Write all these secrets on bronze tablets and hide them in the ground of the desert.[33] Everything you write, (write) very clearly. For this (my) revelation (which never) perishes is ready (to be) revealed to all the brothers.'

Many other) 55 similar things are found in his writings which inform about his rapture and revelation. For everything he heard and saw he wrote down and passed on to all later generations who are of the spirit of truth.

[31] On the Apocalypse of Seth or Sethel see Reeves (1996), 111–40 and on Seth in gnostic and Manichaean traditions see Klijn (1977), 81–117.

[32] The writings of Enos or Enosh are rarely mentioned in Jewish literature because the author was alleged to have been the first idolator. Interestingly the fragment shows parallels to the role played by Anōš, the son of Šitil, the son of Adam in Mandaean literature. On this see Reeves (1996), 142–4.

[33] On parallels to the use of bronze or copper as a writing material for archival purposes along with its subsequent deposit in the wilderness, see Reeves (1996), 152–3.

Similarly, Sem[34] also spoke in this way in his apocalypse:

'I was thinking about in what manner all works came to be. And while I was considering, suddenly, the living (spirit) seized me and (took me) with great (force and) set me (on the top) of a (very) high mountain (and) spoke to (me) saying (. . . 1 line lost . . .) 56 give glory to the greatest king of honour.'

And again he said:

'The doors were opened silently and clouds were divided by the wind. I saw a glorious throne room coming down from the topmost height and a very great angel standing there. The appearance of his face's form was very beautiful and youthful, more than the shining brightness (of the sun), and even than (lightning). Like the light of the sun (. . . 2 lines lost . . .) 57 of many colours (like ?) a crown woven from spring flowers. And then my facial expression altered so that I fell to the ground; the bones of my back were shaken violently and my feet did not stay firm on their joints. A voice inclined towards me, and calling from the throne room and coming to me it took my right hand and made me stand. It puffed the breath of life into my face and effected the increase of (my) power and glory.'

Very many other things (similar to) these are found 58 in his writings, and also the things the angels revealed to him with the instruction to write them for a memorial.

Again Enoch[35] also spoke in this way in his apocalypse:

'I am Enoch the righteous. My grief is great and tears are streaming from my eyes because I have heard slander which comes forth from the mouth of the godless.'

And he said,

'While tears were in my eyes and entreaty in my mouth, I saw (standing before) me seven angels (who came down from) heaven. (I saw) 59 them and was shaken with fear so that my knees knocked against each other.'

And again he said thus:

One of the angels, Michael by name, said to me: 'I have been sent to you for this reason, that we may make known to you all works and reveal to you the land of the pious, and I may show you the land of the ungodly and what the place of punishment of sinners is like.'

[34] The gnostic codices from Nag Hammadi also contain a work entitled the Paraphrase of Shem. See the excellent discussion on the relationship between the various apocalyptic writings attributed to Shem in Reeves (1996), 163–81.

[35] Though no direct parallels can be found for these citations in existing Enochic literature, Reeves (1996, 183–206) has demonstrated that the Manichaean 'apocalypse of Enoch' is a composite work which has pieced together textual traditions, motifs and patterns from known Enochic material.

He also says,

'They put me on a chariot of wind and brought me to the limits of the heavens. And (we) traversed the worlds, both the world (of death) and the world 60 (of dark)ness and the world of fire. And after this they led me into the richest world which is most glorious in light and is more beautiful than the stars I had seen.'

He saw everything and questioned the angels, and whatever they said to him he inscribed in his writings.

In the same way also the apostle Paul; we know that he was seized as far as the third heaven (2 Cor. 12:2) as he says in the letter to the Galatians:

'Paul, apostle not of men or through a man but through (Jesus) Christ and God the Father who (raised) him from the (dead).'

And in the 61 second (letter) to the Corinthians (12:2–5) he says:

'I shall come back to visions and revelations of the Lord. I know a man in Christ – whether in the body or out of the body I do not know, God knows – that such a man was seized up into paradise. And he heard secret words which man may not speak of. Concerning him I shall boast, but concerning myself I shall not boast.'

Again in the letter to the Galatians (1:11–12):

'I show (you), brethren, that the gospel which I proclaimed to you, I did not receive (or) learn from man but (through a) revelation of Jesus (Christ.'

He became outside himself 62 and was seized into the third heaven and into paradise, and he saw and heard, and he inscribed this enigmatically about his rapture and mission for fellow initiates of the secrets.

In short all the most blessed apostles, saviours, evangelists and prophets of truth – each of them observed, as the living hope was revealed to him for proclamation, and wrote and has handed it down and deposited it for the reminding of the future sons of (the Holy) Spirit who would know the perception 63 (of his) voice.

In this way also, it follows that we should write about the all-praiseworthy apostle, through whom and from whom our hope and inheritance of life have come, and tell of him to all later people and members of the faith and the spiritual offspring who are increased through his very bright waters, so that his rapture and revelation may become known to them. For we know, brethren, the exceeding greatness of his wisdom towards us through this coming (of the) Paraclete of (truth). 64 (We acknowledge) that he did not receive truth from men nor from the report of books, as our father himself says in the writings he sent to Edessa. He says as follows: (the excerpt from the Letter to Edessa (64.8–65.22) is translated in §51 below, p. 160)

He wrote (again and) 66 said in the Gospel of his most holy hope: (the three quotations from the Living Gospel (66.4–70.10) are translated in §46 below, pp. 156–9)

In the books of our father there are very many other extraordinary events similar to these, which make known his revelation and the rapture of his mission. For great is this magnificent coming which comes to (us) through the Paraclete, the spirit of truth. For what purpose and what reason 71 have we dealt with such things, when we have been convinced once for all that this mission excels in its revelations? It is because of the reasonings of those who have clothed themselves with unbelief and think nothing of this revelation and vision of our father, that we have repeated from our forefathers their rapture and each one's revelation, so that they may realise that the commission of the (earlier) apostles was likewise of (this nature). For when each of them was seized, (everything he saw) and heard 72 he wrote down and made known, and himself became a witness of his own revelation; while his disciples became the seal of his sending.

5. Mani's conflicts and break with the baptist community

At first Mani conceals his divine revelation from his fellow 'baptists'. This is followed by a temptation narrative concerning Sitaios, one of the elders of the sect's council, which Mani successfully resists. There are then various debates, (which must pre-figure aspects and attitudes from later Manichaean teaching and practice), before his final expulsion from the community.[36]

Baraies the Teacher:[37]

As for us, brethren, who as children of our father's spirit have heard and hearkened to those things, and have rejoiced because of them, let us understand his (coming) in a spiritual manner: how he was sent by command of (his) father, and the way in which he was born in terms of the (body and) how there came to 73 him his most holy Syzygos who separated him from the rule in which his body had been brought up. For in his twenty-fifth year[38] he was magnificently revealed to him. For, while he was still under that doctrine of the baptists, he was like a lamb dwelling in an alien flock, or similar to a bird living with other birds who do not speak the same language; for throughout all that time he lived always in their midst with wisdom and skill without any of them knowing who he was, 74 or what [36] CMC 72.8–106.23; 50–74.

[37] The semitic original of his name probably means 'Son of Life'. Cf. Tubach (1997), 383.
[38] I.e. when Mani was twenty-four years old.

he had received and what had been revealed to him. Rather, they treated him with the respect due to him as a person.

Abiesus[39] the Teacher and Innaios[40] the brother of Zabed:

The lord said: 'When I dwelt in their midst, one day Sitaios, the elder of their council (Gr. sunhedrion), the son of Gara, seized me by the hand because he loved me greatly and considered me as a beloved son. He seized (me) by the hand while no one else (was) with us, and going forward he (dug up) and showed 75 me great treasures which he had secretly stored away. He said to me: 'These treasures are mine and I have control over them. From now on they will be yours; because I love no one else like you, to whom I shall give these treasures.' When he had uttered these words to me I said in my mind: 'My most blessed father took me first and gave me an immortal and unfading treasure. Whoever inherits this will (earn) from it (immortal) life.' Then I said to Sitaios (the) elder: 'Our (forefathers) 76 who possessed these earthly treasures before us, and who inherited them, where are they? For behold, they died and perished and did not keep them as their own, nor yet did they take them with them.'

I said to him: 'What use are these treasures to me since they introduce errors and faults to everyone who possesses them? For the treasure of God is very great and very valuable and provides everyone who inherits it with life'. When Sitaios saw that (my) mind was not induced to (accept) the treasures 77 he had shown me, he was utterly amazed at me.

Timotheos:

Then after a short time I decided to tell Sita and those of his council some of the things my most blessed father had revealed to me and to make known the way of holiness. While I was considering this I had a vision of the whole world which had become like a sea full of very (black) waters. (I saw thousands) and tens (of thousands) sinking in it and drowning, 78 coming up and drifting round the four zones of the sea. I saw in the middle of it a foundation laid which was very high, and on it alone a light was rising and a path was levelled out on it and I myself was walking on this. I turned [39] The name Abiesus, which means 'Jesus is my father', underlines the Judaeo-Christian background of some of Mani's earliest followers. Cf. Tubach (1997), 384. His name is also attested in Coptic Manichaean sources; cf. Schmidt, Ibscher and Polotsky (1933), 28, n. 20.

[40] Innaios was the name of the second successor to Mani after Sisinnios. Cf. Tubach (1997), 384–5.

round and saw Sita holding on to a man who was held by someone else. He was plunging into the midst of the sea and darkness, having fallen and gone under. I saw only a little of (his hair), so I was deeply (grieved over Sita); but that man 79 who had thrown him in said to me: 'Why are you grieving over Sita? For he is not of your elect nor will he follow your path.' Having seen this I did not reveal anything to him. Later when I was speaking the word of truth I saw him contradicting my word.

Baraies the Teacher:

My lord said: 'I had sufficient debate with each of them in that rule, (arising) and questioning them (about the) way of God and (about the) commands of the saviour, (and about) 80 (ritual) ablution and about the vegetables they wash ritually and about their every law and ordinance by which they live.

When I declared invalid and denounced their teaching and mysteries, showing them how they had not received the things they followed from the commands of the saviour, some of them were amazed at me; but others were angry and in their wrath said: 'Does he intend to go over to the Greeks?' When I (perceived) their thoughts, I said to (them) kindly: 'There is (no value) in (this) ritual washing with which 81 you cleanse your food. For this body is defiled and is formed from a mould of impurity. Consider how, when someone purifies his food and then partakes of it after it has been ritually washed, it is obvious to us that from it come blood, bile, burps and shameful excrement and the foulness of the body. If someone restrains his mouth for a few days from this food, immediately it is clear that all these shameful and loathsome discharges cease and decline (in the) body; (but if he then) partakes (again of food, in the) 82 same way they abound in the body again, thus showing that it is from the food itself that they multiply. If someone should partake of food that has been ritually washed and purified, and (then) partake of that which has not been washed, it is plain that the beauty and power of the body are shown to be the same (in both cases). Similarly, the foulness and excrement from both are seen not to differ at all from each other. Therefore, it is not clear that the one which has been ritually washed, which he (casts) out and discharges, is any different from the (other) which is not (washed).

83 And the way you ritually wash yourselves in water every day also has no value: For, if you have once been cleansed and purified, why do you ritually wash yourselves again every day? From this it is evident that you become loathsome every day, and because of the foulness you ritually wash yourselves before you can be purified. Thus, it is very clearly plain that all defilement comes from the body. Behold, you (yourselves) are clothed in it.

Therefore, (look) at yourselves and see (what) your (purity) is, (for it is) impossible 84 to purify your bodies completely; for every day the body is moved and calmed on account of the excretions of the dregs which come from it. Therefore, this thing takes place without the command of the saviour. However, the purity which is spoken of is the purity through knowledge; it is the separation of light from darkness, of death from life, and of living waters from turbid ones; so (you) may know (that) each . . . from the others, and you (will keep) the commands of the saviour (so that) he may redeem (your) soul from (destruction) and from 85 perdition. This is in truth the most righteous purity which you have been exhorted to practise. You have turned away from it and have been washed clean, and have adhered to the purification of the body which is utterly defiled and fashioned from impurity; through it the body coagulates and comes to take its shape.'

When I had said these things to them and annulled and denounced what they (strove) after, some of (them) were (amazed) at me and praised me and treated me as leader and (teacher). Yet (there was much) whispering in that (school) 86 on my account. Some of them treated me as prophet and teacher; some of them said: 'The living word is sung through him. Let us make him teacher of our doctrine,' Others said: 'Has a voice spoken to him in secret and is he saying what it revealed to him?' Still others suggested: 'Has something appeared to him in a dream and is he saying what he saw?' Others asked: 'Is (this) he concerning whom our teachers prophesied when they said, "A young man will (rise up from) our (midst) and will come (forward) as a new (teacher) 87 to call into question our whole doctrine, just as our forefathers have spoken of the 'rest of the garment'?"'[41] However, others said: 'Is not that which is voiced by him error, does he want to lead astray our people and split the doctrine?' Others of them were filled with malice and wrath and some of them voted for death. Others said: 'This is the enemy of our (rule).' Some (said:) 'Does he intend to go to the gentiles and eat (Greek) bread? For we have (heard him saying): "it is right 88 to partake of (Greek) bread".[42] Similarly, he says that to partake of wine and wheat and vegetables and fruit, which our forefathers and teachers strictly [41] Perhaps a precedent for the Manichaean 'rest of the hands' (i.e. no harvesting, labouring or fornicating).

[42] We may have here a jibe about Mani's reading of the Letters of Paul, particularly through the writings of Marcion like the Apostolicon which is known to be heavily Pauline. There are innumerable Pauline forbade us to eat, is logically consistent. Likewise also he declares the ritual washing we practise invalid and does not ritually wash himself like we do or cleanse his food like us.'

Then (indeed) Sita and his (companions) saw that I would not come over to their (persuasion, but that) I was little by little invalidating and denouncing their rule and their exclusion of food, and that 89 I was not practising ritual washing like they did. When they saw that I opposed them in all these matters, Sita and the majority of his fellow elders held a synod on my account. They also summoned the steward Patticius and said to him: 'Your son has turned aside from our rule and wishes to go into the world. Those things which we prohibit and do (not) eat, wheaten bread and fruit and vegetables, he does not adhere to and (says) that it is right to handle them. He (transforms our) practice of ritual washing. 90 He wants to eat (Greek) bread.' Then, because he saw their great agitation, Patticius said to them: 'Call him yourselves and convince him.'

Then they summoned me to their assembly and said to me: 'From your youth you have been with us and have lived correctly by the ordinances and customs of our rule. You have been like a modest bride in our midst. What has happened to you now or what has appeared to you? For you are (opposing) our (rule), and invalidating (and) abolishing our (doctrine). You have taken a 91 different path from ours. We hold your father in great honour: why then do you now declare invalid the ritual washing of our and our fathers's rule by which we have long lived? You are also invalidating the commands of the saviour. Indeed you want to eat wheaten bread and vegetables which we do not eat. Why do you live in this way and not comply with farming the earth like we do?'

Then I said (to them): 'May I never (declare invalid the) commands of the saviour. However, if you are (reviling) me on (account of wheaten) 92 bread, because I have said that it is right to eat of it, the saviour did this; as it is written: "When he had said the blessing, he provided to his disciples; he said a blessing over the bread and gave it to them." Was not that bread made from wheat? It also shows that he sat down with tax collectors and idolators. Similarly, he was invited to the house of Martha and Mary. When Martha said to him: "(Lord), do you not care about (me) enough to tell my (sister to) help me?"; the saviour said (to) her : "Mary has chosen the (good) portion 93 and it will not be taken from her."

echoes in Mani's writings, especially in his epistolary formulas and his concept of the conflict between the Old Man and the New.

Observe, therefore, how also the disciples of the saviour ate food from women and idolators. They did not separate bread from bread or vegetable from vegetable, neither did they eat by earning their living by labouring and farming the earth, in the way you do today. Similarly, when the saviour sent his disciples everywhere to preach they did (not) take a millstone or (oven with) them; (but) they . . . took one . . .'

94 Za(. . .)[43]

'If then you are accusing me about ritual washing, I shall again show you from your own rule and from the things which have been revealed to your leaders that it is not right to ritually wash yourself.

Alchasaios the founder of your rule shows this: when he was going to bathe himself in water, an image of a man appeared to him from the spring of the waters and said to him, "Is it not enough that your beasts abuse me? Yet, you (yourself) maltreat (my home) and commit sacrilege (against my waters)." Thus (Alchasaios was amazed), and he said to 95 it: "Fornication and defilement and the impurity of the world are thrown at you and you do not forbid it, but you are distressed by me." It said to him: "Perhaps all these did not know who I am, but why did not you, who claim to be a worshipper and righteous, respect my honour?" Then Alchasaios was affected and did not bathe himself in the waters.

After some time he again wanted to bathe himself in (water), and he instructed his disciples to (find) a place which (had) not (too much) water for him to bathe himself. (His) disciples (found the place) 96 for him. When he was (about to) wash for the second time there appeared to him the image of a man from that spring, which said to him: "We and those waters in the sea are one. Therefore you have come here also to sin and abuse us." Alchasaios in great alarm and agitation allowed the dirt on his head to become dry and so shook it off.'

Again, Mani tells that Alchasaios (had ploughs lying ready) and went (to) them. (The earth) addressed him saying: 97 "(Why) are you earning your living from me?" Then Alchasaios took soil from the earth which had spoken to him, and weeping he kissed it and embraced it and began to say: "This is the flesh and blood of my lord."

[43] The witness could have been Za(cheas), known to us as Abizachias in Syriac and Mar Zaku in Middle Iranian. Cf. Tubach (1997), 377–8. Za(bed), the brother of Innaios (mentioned above), is less likely; as he is not otherwise known among the early disciples of Mani.

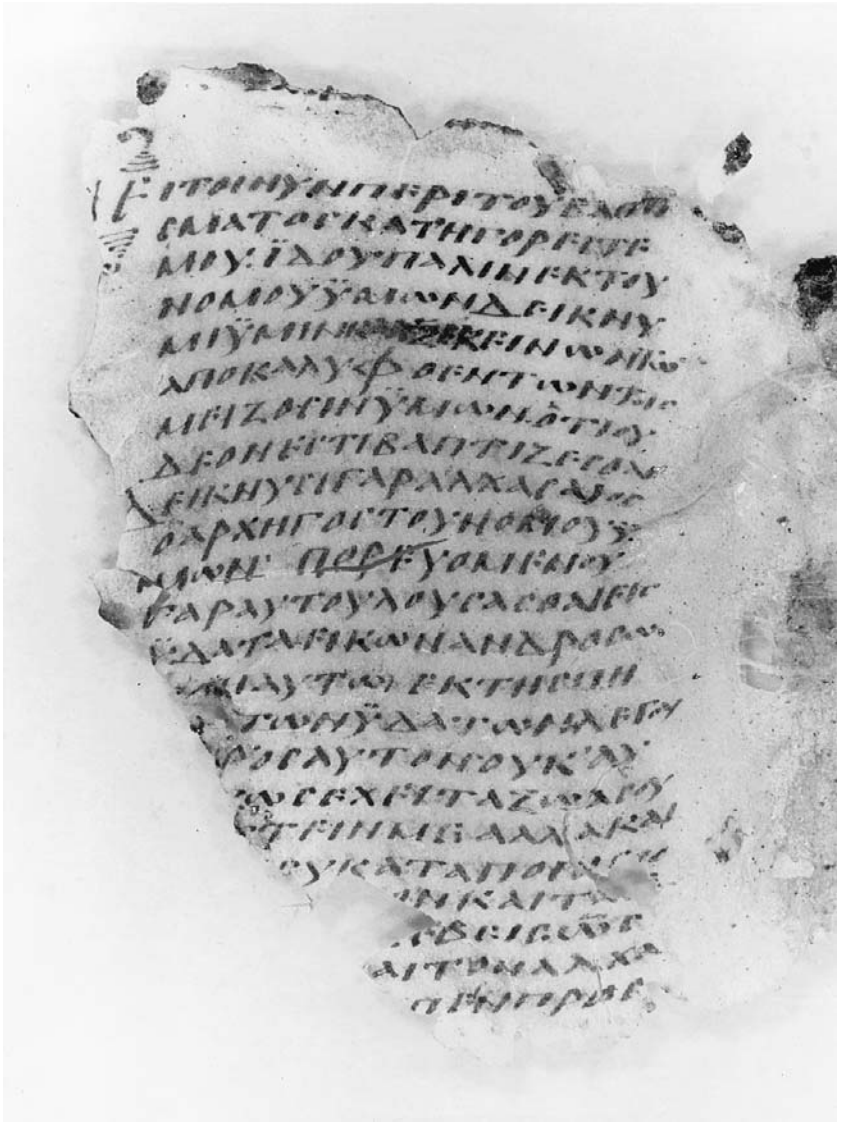

Figure 2.1. Cologne Mani-Codex p. 94

Again, Mani said that Alchasaios found his disciples baking loaves. At this the loaf spoke to Alchasaios who then commanded them not to bake again.

Again, Mani points out that (Sab)baios[44] the baptist was bringing vegetables (to) the elder (of the) city. And that (vegetable wept) and (said) 98 to him: 'Are you not righteous, are you not pure? Why then are you taking us to fornicators?' Sabbaios was alarmed by what he had heard and took the vegetables back.

Again, Mani tells how a date palm spoke with Aianos the baptist who was from Coche, and instructed him to say to my lord: 'Do not cut me down, because my fruits have been stolen. Let me be for this (year), and next year I shall give you (fruits) equal to those which were stolen (in) all the (other years).' 99 It also instructed him to say to that man who stole its fruit: 'Do not come this time to steal my fruit! If you do come, I will throw you from my height and you will die.'

Timotheos:

'Then I said to them: "Look at these famous men of your rule, who saw these visions, were moved by them and preached them to the others. In the same way I am practising everything that I learned from them."

100 When I had thus spoken to them and confounded their words, they immediately all became so angry that one of them stood up and hit me. They held me fast in the middle of them and beat me up. They seized me by the hair as they would an enemy. In bitterness and anger they screeched at me as loud as they could, as if I were a heretic, and because of the envy which had overcome them they wanted to (strangle) me. However, because Patticius, the overseer of the house, begged them not to commit sacrilege against 101 those who were amongst them, they had consideration and let me go. After this attempt had befallen me I withdrew myself to one side, took up the attitude of prayer, and beseeched and begged our lord to support me.

When I had finished my prayer and was quite sad, my most blessed Syzygos – he is my lord and helper – (appeared) before me. He said to me: "Do not be sad and do not weep!" I said to him: "How can I not be sad? (For the men) of this (religion), amongst whom I have been (since my childhood), 102 have changed and have become my enemies because I have separated myself from their rule. Where shall I go then? All religions and sects are adversaries of the good. I am a stranger and alone in the world.

[44] The name Sabbaios is clearly derived from Aramaic sobai which means one who baptises.

When in this religion, whose believers have read about purity, mortification of the flesh and observance of "resting of the hands", who (in addition) all know me by name and therefore (know) the worth of my body better (than other) religions, when therefore my body 103 was brought up, cared for and cherished in this religion, I also had contact with its overseers and elders, in relation to the bringing up of my body. How then, if these people have given me no room to accept the truth, will the world, its princes or its teachings, receive me when it comes to hearing these secrets and to accepting (these) hard precepts? How shall I (speak) before the kings . . . and . . . 104 of the world, and the leaders of religions? For, see, they are mighty and exercise power with their wealth, their authority and their material means; but I am alone and poor in all these things."

Then the splendid one said to me: "You have been sent out not only to this religion, but to every people, every school, every town and every place. For (by you) will (this) hope be explained and proclaimed to all (zones) and regions (of the world). In very great numbers will men (accept) 105 your word. So, set out and go abroad; for I will be with you as helper and protector in every place, where you proclaim everything I have revealed to you. So do not worry and do not be sad."

Very many were the words which he spoke to me, encouraging me and giving me confidence through his hope. I fell down before him and my heart rejoiced at the (remarkable) sight of that most splendid and sublime one, my most blessed Syzygos. (I said) to him: ". . . what . . . 106 For Patticius is an old man; he was shaken, when he just saw one single battle coming my way." Then he said to me: "Set out and go abroad; for, see, two men from that rule will come to you and be your companions. Equally, Patticius will also be the first of your elect and will follow you." (At that time) there came to me two young men from the baptists, (Simeon) and Abizachias, who had been my neighbours. (They came) to me, to accompany me everywhere, and they were with me as helpers, (wherever) we (went).'

6. The beginning of Mani's mission

CMC 107.1–147.12, ed. cit., 76–104.

107 'Thus, according to the will of our lord, I left that rule; in order to sow his most beautiful seed, to light his brightest candles, to redeem living souls from subjection to rebels, to walk in the world after the image of our lord Jesus, to throw on to the (earth) a sword, division and the blade of the spirit, to scatter the (bread) on (my) people and to overcome the (immeasurable) shame which is in the (world) and . . . 108 I came abroad and into foreign lands, like a sheep in sight of the wolves, so that through me believers could be separated from unbelievers and be chosen, the good seed from amongst the weeds, the children of the kingdom from the children of the enemy and the descendants of the heights from the offspring of the depths; thus through me the Father might separate his own from strangers.

(At that time) therefore I was (sent out) according to the good will of my most blessed Father to travel about (in the world) so that creation might be (sanctified) by me, and so that (through) me 109 he might let the truth of his (own) knowledge (Gr. gnosis) be visible among the religions and peoples, and use me to make a stand before the kings of the earth and the princes of the world in order to take his own from all of them.

In this way I had left, and no follower of that religion had noticed where we went. We travelled about until we crossed and came to Ctesiphon. When I (could not get on further), the river (being high), (one) of the baptists saw (that I was staying there). When I (had left) Patticius, I had (not) said anything 110 to him about where I was going, and so Patticius was sad because of me and wept. He left and visited the surrounding synods; and still he did not find me. He wept and mourned, and the baptists stood by him to comfort him.

Then that man who had seen me came to them; and when he saw that they were in mourning he said to them: "Why do you (mourn)?" They answered: "Because of Mani, who went away and we do not (know) where he has gone. (We fear) that somehow (someone) will . . . him." 111 However, he said to them: "I saw him on the bridge, when I went over into the towns." When Patticius heard that he was glad and set off to come to me in Ctesiphon.

When he arrived there he did not find me. He went away again and made enquiries. Then he came and (found) me outside the town (in) a village called Naser in the assembly of the (saints). As soon as Patticius (saw me he stepped up, kissed) and embraced me, (and fell on the ground) before me. In tears (he said to me: ". . . 112 . . .) I was sad, because I thought you were dead and that I would never see you again. I said: 'Whom shall I call? Who will obey me? Whom could I see before my eyes? To whom shall I lament my grief or open the secrets of my heart?' For I had hoped to have you as administrator of all matters now in (my) old age. For (whom) can I trust more than you? I see, however, that you will not be with me. I have prayed (to God) that he will not destroy you! . . . of you . . . 113 sad (. . . and) for (love of you) the sighing of remembrance will be planted in my heart. For very sighing for you perhaps I will leave the world."

Then my lord said to him: 'Do not weep, do not be sad and do not worry about me! For you yourself will be with me. You will find ample grace through me; what you have done up to today (has happened according) to the will of the Father of Light. (. . . 114 . . . , to be revealed) means nothing; for they do not behave as they read in their scriptures.'

Kustaios, the son of the treasure of life:[45]

Again Patticius spoke to him with tears in his eyes: 'My son, why do you speak so? Just now with your words you have scattered and cancelled all (the doctrine). Your (. . .) your friends (. . .) of their midst (. . .) worthless (?) (. . .) the Lord (?)[46] . . . seven lines lost . . .'

115 (Mani replies): '. . .) without knowing, what had happened. For you have built the house, but another has come to dwell in it. You have become the horse for that one to ride, but another will enter the war with him and thereby complete his will. And you have made the robe beautiful, but another has put it on. (For I) Mani (. . . four lines lost . . .) the whole world (. . . 116 . . . five lines lost . . .) of that good (i.e. of Syzygos); for it is he who is my leader in the way that he wishes and is fitting. Recognise and be sure of this, that I myself shall not (observe) that religion nor follow its rule.'

Timotheos:

'So, I left the assembly (of saints . . . 4 lines lost . . .) 117 The (sg.) . . . of that woman . . . When we (arrived there, we rested) in the garden of the . . . village. When they saw . . . , they said to that woman: "Strange men have been asking (us) questions; they will speak about God in unusual new ways . . . They are (. . ."' Mani preaches in the garden; after 6 missing lines . . .) angels (. . . 2 lines lost . . . 118 . . .) all . . . as they were in error (?) . . . their (. . . However, the woman) was amazed at (my) wisdom, which not . . . to her.

(Equally) Patticius was surprised; for he had never heard this speech from (me). He said in his mind: 'When I heard this teaching, I was (moved . . . 6 lines . . .) of the humble (. . .' 5 lines lost . . .) 119 They saw an apparition in the shape of a man (like) an angel of God, so that they were (all) moved at what they saw. (Then) that appearance of the man disappeared from before (them) and like . . . I followed. The . . . until (. . .

[45] The epithet echoes the title of one of Mani's: canonical works the Treasure (of Life) (see quotation given below, 47).

[46] Cf. '(. . .) worthless (?) (. . .) the Lord (?)' are suggested new reading of Römer (1992b) 103.

after 13 lost lines Patticius speaks 120 '. . .) to reveal (this) to me. According to God's will I recognised who it is, that is with you.' In the same way that woman came before me, fell down and said: 'I thank God, who has made (. . . but you have come) here (so that) I might see (the greatness of the power) of God.' (. . . seven lines lost . . .

It is to be assumed that one or more quires with twenty-four pages each are missing here. In the ensuing story Mani has left Babylon and Media and resides in Azerbaidjan.

(Witness unknown):

121 the first 3 lines are missing; Mani is giving an account '. . .) but . . . I did (not) stay. In (the land)[47] of the Medes I went (to the brothers in) Ganzak. (There) was then a great famine.[48] When we came into the town of Ganzak, the followers of our brothers were concerned for the fo(od-supply[49] . . . 11 lines lost . . .) 122 (the father says to Mani): "Who are you? (What power) do you have?" (I replied) to him: "(A doctor) is what I am." He (answered) me: "Come, (if) you are willing, into my house; for my daughter is being tossed about by (an illness)." I went with him and found that the girl was (unconscious) and . . . with (the illness . . . after 6 missing lines containing an account of the healing, the father expresses his gratitude . . .) 123 Although . . . other men were standing there too, (he fell) at my feet and said: "(Ask of me) what you will." I replied to him: "Of your treasures (of gold and silver) I ask for nothing." I took from him only (food for one day for)[50] the brothers who were (with) me.'

Ti(motheos):

Again (my lord said: '. . . in six missing lines Mani gives an account of the appearance of the Syzygos . . . 124 . . .) said: "(Consider the will) according to which[51] you came into being bodily, and the truth (which I) have proclaimed to (you). For this reason ambassadors and (apostles) will be sent at your command to every place, and this hope (and the) message of peace will be declared by them in every town (where) you wish to go."'

[47] 'In (the land)': new reading suggested by Römer (1994), 163.
[48] '(There) was then a great famine' : new reading suggested by Römer (1994), 163. The 1988 edition suggests: 'There was at that place tin-ore.' On possible geological evidence for the earlier reading which may help us to locate Ganzak see Tardieu (1998), 257–8.
[49] 'fo(od-supply . . .)': new reading suggested by Römer (1994), 163.
[50] '(food for one day for)': new reading suggested by Römer (1994), 163.
[51] '(Consider the will) according to which': new reading suggested by Römer (1994), 163.

(Witness unknown:

8 lines are missing; Mani is giving an account '. . . 125 . . .) When we . . . went into the middle of the mountains and Patticius was with (me), there suddenly rose up a storm, so that the sand whirled about and confused (our senses). I went in front of Patticius . . . Then he, (my) most splendid Syzygos, came to my side, to give me (strength and encouragement). Then (he said to me[52] . . . 6 lines lost . . .)'

126 (Unknown, the) teacher;
(and unknown, the) bishop:

'(So then) the most blessed and radiant (. . .) raised me into the air; and took me to secret places, which are unknown in these abodes of men where (we live). He showed (me everything) that is there. (I saw) amongst them huge (mountains) and (. . .) neighbouring (. . . 6 lines lost . . . 127 . . .) and unlike those which are in these lands. Between these and the very delight(ful and) sweet waters were . . . He (took) me on to the (highest) mountain; there I saw a (man) who had growing on his body hair which was eighteen inches long, thick and (hanging down) in full curls.[53]

When, however, . . . one of the (. . . 8 lines are lost; at the end of them the hairy man speaks to Mani 128 ". . .) Teach (me) the message of knowledge! For that is why you have come up here." However, I taught him in (a cave . . .),[54] so that wisdom dawned in him. I (declared) to him about resting, the commandments and worship before the lights of heaven.

(Again) I spoke to him: "How did you get the (hair) of (your) body, which makes you different from (all) people? . . . to this (. . . in six lost lines the man answers ". . . 129 . . .) my (. . .) a tree (. . .) and I took of the best fruits. Since that time I have had this hair on my body." As I still stood there he was removed from me and went to that place where I had seen (. . .) the people. (In) that (place) he became a herald of (hope) and showed the (people) wisdom (. . . 7 lines are missing; Mani tells of the continuation of his journey . . . 130 . . .) I (went) to a place, which was unknown and cut off from those towns. There was also there a crowd of people and (many) towns. Just as I arrived at that place the heavenly light of the day was rising and the king of (that) land[55] (was going) hunting. Then my most splendid [52] 'he said to me': new insertion suggested by Römer (1994), 163.

[53] On the significance of long-hair as a topos in ascetical literature see the material collected in Römer (1994), 41–63.

[54] 'in (a cave . . .)': new reading suggested by Römer (1994), 164.

[55] Is this an account of the conversion of the Shah of Turan, which is well recorded in Manichaean missionary texts in Middle Iranian? See especially the Parthian fragments M48 + alii, KG, §2.2 (37–129) pp. 20–4. English translation in GSR, 207–8.

(and quite infallible leader and Syzygos) came to my side (and said) to me: "(. . . 6 lines are missing, in which the Syzygos apparently brings Mani near to the king and leaves him there 131 . . . not far) from the king (and his) princes . . .) When the king and his princes saw me, they became agitated and (astonished . . . He beckon)ed me (from the throne to come to him)[56] so that (. . .) to them (. . .) When I had got nearer (to them), the king and his (princes) got down off their (chariots). I (stood before) him (and bowed in obei)sance[57] (. . . 8 lines lost . . . 132 . . .) to him. Before (him I explained) wisdom and the commandments and (declared) everything to him.

(On not) a few days, when I was staying (there), he himself (with) his princes sat before (me). I showed (them) the separation of (the two) natures (and the doctrine of beginning, middle and) end (. . . 7 lines missing . . .) 133 He treated (. . .) he accepted (everything) that he had heard (. . . from) me. After he had carried out (his) splendid work through me, while the king was sitting on the throne and his princes were before him, (this) most magnificent one suddenly flew down and stepped up to me, and . . .) to me. The king and his princes (. . . 7 lines lost . . . 134 Then) the king grew strong in (wisdom) and he was grounded in knowledge and faith. (Equally) his princes became (full) of faith. The king accepted (joyfully the commandments) which I had taught him, and (commanded) that they should be (explained) and (declared) throughout his kingdom . . . place . . . this and . . . after (. . . 6 lines lost 135 . . .) and (faith . . .) From that time onwards this religion was preached to that place.

Then the most splendid one took me to that place where he had parted me from (Patticius). When he saw me he was very (happy, he kissed me) and (said to me): "Where did you go? . . . leave me alone? (. . ."

after line 16, eight lines are missing, in which it is possible that a new passage from another authority has begun 136 . . .) for I (Patticius) saw with my own eyes his strong power exceeding all visions that I might usually expect. So . . . My lord said to him: "You are one of his own." Then he took (him to places) very high up (and said): "I have done (this according to the) will (of your father); he himself (sent me) to you."'

(Witness unknown):

6 lines lost, Mani gives an account'. . . 137 . . .) until (. . . I came) into (a) village called S(. . .) and went (into the) assembly of the (. . .),[58] the [56] 'He beckon)ed me (from the throne to come to him)': based on a series of new readings suggested by Römer (1994), 164.

[57] '(bowed in obei)sance' ((πρόσε)κύνησα) or alternatively part of a word to do with hunting (κύνη(γιο(ν))? Cf. Römer (1994), 164.

[58] On the identity of the sect (Magusaeans, Chaldaeans or Jews ?) over which Mani triumphed see J. M. and S. N. C. Lieu (1991). See also Römer (1994), 94–105.

so-(called sons(?))[59] of the truth. The head of the (sect of) unrigh(teousness)[60] said (to me: "The) exact understanding of the teaching (of our fathers . . ." 10 lines lost . . . 138 He conducted a) disputation with me before the men of his faith. In all points he was (defeated) and (drew) laughter on himself, so that he was filled with (envy) and malice. He sat down, according to the (rituals),[61] and practised[62] the spells of his (. . .) whose (. . .) chanting (. . .) and full (. . .) spell (. . .) to (. . .) said: (" . . .) your (. . . 6 lines lost, apparently the leader of the group chants a spell against Patticius 139 . . .) so that Patticius (. . .) is well." In this way he chanted (over him) conjuring[63] (. . .) wickedness. And so his intention came to nought. For as much as he himself (spoke) the (magic) words, my lord frustrated (his) wickedness. Immediately (that most infallible Syzygos) of mine, (flew down and appeared (. . .)

8 lines lost . . .) 140 in the (village . . .), where (?) (Patticius?) had recovered (?), (we went (?)) to Pharat, the town near the island of the people of Mesene.'

(Unknown), the teacher; and Ana, the brother of Zacheas, the disciple:

(When) my lord and (Patticius the) overseer of the house had come (to Pharat), (he preached) in (the assembly of) the baptists (. . . 5 lines lost '. . . 141 " . . .) he revealed his (king)dom to us.[64]" We, however, were astonished (at him) and were shaken at his words.

When the (hour of) prayer came, we said to Patticius: "(Let us pray!) For the commandment (of God calls) my lord (and us) to prayer (. . . Patticius, however,) asked us (. . . the next nine lines of the account are missing; presumably the baptist asks Mani: 142 ". . . Why do you (?) pray) differently (from us?)"

Furthermore, at the time when fasting (was over (?) . . .) he went out and asked for alms (before) the houses (. . .) He did not put (. . .) I said to him: "Why did you (not) partake the daily food?"[65] (. . . 11 lines are destroyed at

[59] Römer (1994), 164 also suggests 'the so-(called guardians) of the truth.'
[60] 'The head of the (sect of) unrigh(teousness)': new reading suggested by Römer (1994), 164.
[61] 'according to the (rituals)': new insertion suggested by Römer (1994), 165.
[62] 'practised': new reading suggested by Römer (1994), 165.
[63] 'he chanted (over him) conjuring': new reading suggested by Römer (1994), 165.
[64] 'he revealed his (king)dom to us': new reading suggested by Römer (1994), 165, but Römer also suggests '(perdi)tion' instead of '(king)dom' for a more negative context.
[65] 'partake the daily food': new reading suggested by Römer (1994), 165. The 1988 edition suggests: 'share (at our table)'.

the end of which a baptist says the following to Patticius: 143 "(. . .) this (. . .) is with your son as it is with the elders and teachers. (Earlier I) saw already (in) him, that he (with all) his wisdom, (intelligence) and exposition of the scriptures (bore witness) to us (. . .) that (. . .) in con(trast to) (the words) of our teachers[66] (. . .)" if a new excerpt began in the missing part of the page, it must be presumed that in all 8 lines are missing

(Witness unknown):

Mani tells that he went to the port of Pharat 144 '(. . .) In Pharat there was a (. . .) called Oggias (?), a man who was (famous) because of his (influence) and his power over the men.[67] (He[68] saw (how)) the merchants, who were preparing to travel (by) ship as far as the Persians and Indians, sealed his (wares, and did) not (put to sea), until he came on board. (. . .) When Oggias (?) (. . . 10 lines lost . . . 145 . . .) him (. . .) to you. Then (he answered) me: "I want to (get) on a ship and (travel) to the Indians (so that I) get (. . .) if (I should) so (succeed . . .")[69] I said (to him) however: "I . . . you (. . .)" if a new excerpt begins in the destroyed half of the page, in all 11 lines will have been broken off

(Witness unknown):

Mani seems to have interrupted his journey in a Persian port and to have been visited by a missionary (?) from Armenia (?) 146 '(. . .) He had persuaded (. . .) Patticius (?) and (. . .) me and (. . .) had taken (. . .) with him to the Armenian town (.)isthar. (From there) he came to Persia to us (. . .) He said (. . :) "To whom (. . .) lord (. . .) father . . . 147 he has a wife (?) (. . .) for the (. . .) He (or: she) said: ("(. . .) once again (. . ." . . .) I said (. . . : "(. . .) from(?)(. . .) pro(fit (?) . . .")'

MANI AT THE COURT OF THE SHAHANSHAH (KING OF KINGS)

7. Mani's calling and his summons before Shapur I

This passage (Keph. 14.3–16.2) is taken from the important first kephalaion, the remainder of which text can be found below as 90.

[66] 'in con(trast to) (the words) of our teachers': new reading suggested by Römer (1994), 165.

[67] Römer (1994), 165 suggests a probable alternative may be: 'a man who was (eminent) for his (philanthropy)'.

[68] Römer ibid. suggests that Oggias and not Mani might have been the subject in contrast to the 1988 edition.

[69] 'if (I should) so (succeed . . .")': new reading suggested by Römer (1994), 165.

When the church of the saviour was raised to the heights, my apostolate began, which you asked me about! From that time on [5] was sent the Paraclete, the Spirit of truth; the one who has come to you in this last generation. Just like the saviour said: When I go, I will send to you the Paraclete. When the Paraclete comes, he can upbraid the world concerning sin; and he can speak with you on behalf of righteousness; and [10] about judgement; concerning the sinners who believe me not; . . . [70] he can speak with you . . . [15] . . . he can speak with you and preach . . . that . . . , the one who will honour me and . . . and he gives to you.

. . . preach on behalf of the Paraclete of truth, that he . . . he came to manifest the one whom he had known . . . [20] . . . the appointed time of all these years, as they . . . from Jesus until now . . . until he . . . and he makes them free. Yet, when the church [25] assumed the flesh, the season arrived to redeem the souls; like the month of Parmuthi that cereal shall ripen in, to be harvested.

At that same season he . . . my image, I assuming it in the years of Artabanus the king of Parthia. Then, in the years of Ardashir the king [30] of Persia, I was tended and grew tall and attained the fullness of the season. In that same year, when Ardashir the king was crowned, the living Paraclete came down to me. He spoke 15 with me. He unveiled to me the hidden mystery, the one that is hidden from the worlds and the generations, the mystery of the depths and the heights. He unveiled to me the mystery of the light and the darkness; the mystery of the calamity of conflict, and the war, [5] and the great . . . the battle that the darkness spread about. Afterwards, he unveiled to me also: How the light . . . the darkness, through their mingling this universe was set up . . . He opened my eyes also to the way that the ships were constructed; to enable the gods of light to be in them, to purify the light from [10] creation. Conversely, the dregs and the effluent . . . to the abyss. The mystery of the fashioning of Adam, the first man. He also informed me about the mystery of the tree of knowledge, which Adam ate from; his eyes saw. Also, the mystery of the apostles who were sent to the world, to enable them [15] to choose the churches. The mystery of the elect, with their commandments.[71] The mystery of the catechumens their helpers, with their commandments. The mystery of the sinners with their deeds; and the punishing that lies hidden for them.

This is how everything that has happened [20] and that will happen was unveiled to me by the Paraclete; . . . everything the eye shall see, and the ear hear, and the thought think, and the . . . I have understood by him everything. I have seen the totality through him! I have become a single body, with a single Spirit!

[70] Cf. John 16.7–9+ff. [71] <the mystery of the sinners with their deeds>

In the last years of Ardashir 25 the king I came out to preach. I crossed to the country of the Indians. I preached to them the hope of life. I chose in that place a good election.

Yet, also, in the year that Ardashir the king died Shapur his son became king. He . . . I crossed from the country of the Indians to the land of the Persians. Also, from 30 the land of Persia I came to the land of Babylon, Mesene, and Susiana.[72] I appeared before Shapur the king. He received me with great honour. He gave me permission to journey in . . . preaching the word of life. I even spent some years . . . him in the retinue; many years in 16 Persia, in the country of the Parthians, up to Adiabene, and the borders of the provinces of the kingdom of the Romans.

8. Mani's first encounter with Shapur I

Fihrist, ed. Flügel (1871) 328, trans. Laffan. The material preserved by an-Nadīm comes almost certainly from the same Syriac source as that of the CMC.

'The Manichaeans say: 'So he went out on the very day that King Sābūr bin Ardašīr was crowned, being Sunday 1 Nīsān, when the Sun was in Aries.[73] And with him were two men of his sect. One was called Sham'ūn[74] and the other was Zakū;[75] His father was also present, observing all that was to be of his cause.

Muḥammad bin Isḥaq said: 'Mānī appeared in the second year of the reign of Ġālūs ar-Rūmī. Marqiyūn had appeared about one-hundred years before him, during the first year of the reign of King Titus Antonianus (Ṭiṭūs Anṭūniyānūs). Ibn Dayṣān (i.e. Bardayṣān) appeared about thirty years after Marcion (Marqiyūn). He was called Ibn Dayṣān because he was born on the banks of a river called the Dayṣān. Mānī claimed that he was the Paraclete, foretold of by Jesus – peace be with him. Mānī derived his doctrine from (the teachings) of the Magians and the Christians. Similarly, [72] The travels which took place between Mani leaving the sect and his audience with Shapur are alluded to in the Homilies (91.1–11, ed. Polotsky) where Mani spoke of visiting many lands and crossing many seas. Unfortunately the relevant section is very fragmentary.

[73] The CMC (17.23–18.10, see above) has shown that this piece of synchronism is over simplistic. Mani received his confirming revelation in April 240 when Shapur was crowned co-regent after his triumph at Hatra. Ardashir was then still alive; he died two years later.

[74] I.e. Simeon, otherwise unknown. On the Syriac versions of his name see Tubach (1997), 377.

[75] I.e. Abizachias, see Tubach (1997), 378.

the script with which he composed (his) scriptures was derived from Syriac and Persian. Mānī travelled the land for about forty years before meeting Sābūr, having appealed to Fayrūz, the brother of Sābūr bin Ardašīr, who took him into his brother's presence.'

The Manichaeans said that when Mānī came into his presence, there were on his shoulders two lights resembling lamps. And when Sābūr saw him he was impressed and Mānī grew in his estimation. (Indeed) Sābūr had been resolved to having Mānī slain, yet when he met him he was overcome by admiration and delight, asking Mānī what had brought him to him and promising a further audience with him. So Mānī made a number of requests, including that Sābūr would show favour on his companions in the provinces and in the other lands governed by him, and that they could enjoy freedom of movement. Sābūr granted all of Mānī's requests. So Mānī was able to spread his message in India, in China, and among the people of Ḫurāsān (i.e. Khorasan). And Mānī appointed a companion of his order in every place. (329)

9. Mani recounts his travels

This kephalaion, entitled 'Concerning lord Manichaios: how he journeyed' (no. 76: 183.10–188.29), provides considerable detail about Mani's missionary journeys. Unlike most other kephalaia it is given an extended and clear context, including incidental details that contribute to the impression of historicity.

Mani is kept so busy answering the calls of King Shapur, (who does seem to have given him and his teaching some real protection), that a disciple wishes that there could be two Manis! The apostle replies that the world has scarcely been able to accept him alone. The phrase 'a single Mani' is characteristic of his style. He then recounts the trials of his missionary journeys, and the opposition of the authorities in various lands. The frank admission to a lack of success adds to the sense of authenticity.

Further, it happened one time while our master Manichaios, our light enlightener, was staying in the city [15] of Ctesiphon. Shapur, the king, enquired after and summoned him. Our master stood up and went to Shapur the king. Afterwards he returned and came back to his congregation. When he had been a short while sitting down, before delay elapsed, King Shapur [20] enquired after him another time. He sent, he called for him. Again (Mani) returned, he retraced and went to King Shapur. He spoke with him and proclaimed to him the word of God. Again he returned and came to the congregation. Also, a third occasion, King Shapur enquired after and called for him; [25] and he returned to him once more.

Then one of his disciples made a retort, Aurades by name, the son of Kapelos. He says to our enlightener: 'Please, our master Manichaios, give to us two Manis resembling you; passing for you! Good, peaceful, and [30] compassionate . . . disciples in righteousness like you . . . one Mani will remain with us as you; and the other go to King Shapur, his mind at ease, and proclaiming it to him'.

184 When our enlightener heard these words from that disciple, he shook his head. He says to him: 'Now behold, I, a single Mani, came to the world to proclaim in it the word of God; and do [5] therein the good will that had been entrusted to me.

Then look, I, one Mani alone, have not been permitted to speak freely in the world; I . . . that I find room to fulfil the good will that has been entrusted to me. Yet, I have done the will of the mystery, [10] which I preach in the living truth.

For the world loves the darkness; but it hates the light, because its works are evil.[76] Still, I, I have travelled so that I would do the will of the light, and spread the truth far and wide, in accord with what they entrusted to [15] me. And, behold, the world bears down on me with . . . upon me with its sects. They give me no place to preach therein, and besides I am a single Mani. I came to the world, and they have not given me time to preach according to my will. They have not accepted me. [20] On the other hand, if we do as . . . as you have spoken to us, what might we do then? How were . . . ? Rather, this . . . to you, and recount it to you.

At the time when I sailed the sea in the ship, I went . . . [25] I found it necessary . . . the life that is with me in the world . . . I stirred the whole land of India . . . all the people who dwell in it . . . all of them to me, so that they might bear [30] two to three times . . . in their land according to their heart . . . and the wise man . . . they . . . 185 set them against me. At that moment I ceased finding light, I ceased speaking freely with the voice that is of truth, which is entrusted to me.

Now behold, . . . in India. It may act against me in its . . . [5] . . . and accept the greater ones and the counsellors and the satraps and the governors who are found there . . . I was difficult for it, it stirred not . . . because they belong to it . . . from all the sinners . . . [10] . . . to me. I was more difficult for it than all these . . . did not accept me, and it persisted to . . . it. For the world loves the darkness; but it hates the light, because its works are evil.

I crossed the seas another time. I took . . . [15] . . . India. I went up to the land of Persia. I leapt from the sea and went . . . the land of Persia and its cities . . . in this living truth that is with me . . . to the light of . . . proclaim . . . the powers and the authorities . . . [20] . . . and the holders of authority . . . enlightener . . . in the land of Persia . . . body . . . because of this truth that I proclaimed, sitting in their midst . . . to one another. See [25] now, . . . in their land . . . to me the power. The Father . . . living . . . all occasions. The one who . . . to it . . . [30] . . . in the land . . . 186 how strong is it? (The land) tolerates the kings and accepts the satraps and the governors who are there. It stirred among them, it was not defeated in their midst . . . it was not able to accept the truth that I [5] proclaimed there. It did not . . .

[76] John 3.19.

I came out from the land of Persia. I went up to Mesene, the city that . . . in this truth that is in me, in . . . I proclaimed this knowledge; I separated the light from the darkness and [10] discriminated life from death, what is good from what is evil, the righteous person from the sinner. I proclaimed the path of life and the commandments . . . Yet, when they had heard the voice of truth and life, the ruling-power and the swarm of demons . . . [15] . . . and the race of mankind . . . under wickedness and hatred, they . . . they did not allow me, nor did they permit me to preach the truth in tranquillity, the way that it is. See: In . . . [20] for they tolerate the kings, they accept . . . and the caesars and the satraps and the governors who are found among them. Yet, the truth that I proclaimed among them, they did not accept it, and . . . they did not listen to the voice of life that I cried out among them.

[25] Again, from that place I came to the land of Babylon, the city of the Assyrians, and walked in it. I went in to the other cities, and spoke in this truth of the life that is with me. I proclaimed there the word of truth and life. With the voice of the proclamation I separated the light from the darkness [30] there, what is good from what is evil . . . the powers who are master over . . . 187 their envy to the heart of the kings and the leaders there. They and the sects of that place, they were set against me. Even as you yourselves see, they have waged some great wars with me. The lawless judges [5] took me, they watched. They and their rulers and their leaders took me in the midst of their land. If as . . . to me the protection of the Father, who does not help the lawless. Yet I, he helps me at all times against his enemy. Still, they would not permit me in [10] Babylon a single day to journey in their land.

See now: How great is the land of the Assyrians? It is able to tolerate the kings and accept the eparchs and the generals and the caesars and the governors . . . in it. It did not stir, nor was it defeated before them.[15] . . . but, on the other hand, to me, it stirred and was disquieted . . . It waged against me a multitude of struggles. Therefore, I left behind me the Assyrians.

I went to the land of the Medes and Parthians. At that place I played the harp of wisdom; I spoke in this living truth that is with me. The whole land [20] of the Medes and the Parthians stirred, it shook . . . , to accept the hope of the life that I proclaimed. Yet see: How great is the land of the Medes and the Parthians? Many cities are found there. It was able to accept the kings and the leaders who were there; but, on the other hand, it was not able to accept [25] the power of my truth. It stirred, it all shook just as . . .'

Then the apostle speaks to that disciple: 'Indeed I, a single Mani, came to the world. All the cities of the world stirred, they shook. (The world) did not wish to accept me; unless I humbled its rebelliousness [30] . . . I have subdued its powers and brought . . . all that were there. I have planted in it . . . I have sown this seed of life. I chose 188 a few from among the multitude . . . I, one Mani alone, came to the world; and . . . all the powers of the world stirred. A turmoil arose before me. And thus, if two Manis had come [5] to the world, what place would be able to tolerate them, or what land would be able to accept them?

I, a single Mani, did come, and walking on tip-toes . . . no place was found for me wherein I could stand fast . . . on the fullness of my feet, and walk on [10] the earth like everyone, and do there . . . all of you, pray to God that he might . . . feet henceforth, this single Mani, who is among you on that day, that . . . will happen . . . [15] . . . he might do the will of the living ones in the holy church. However, you, blessed are you if you make yourselves strong in this truth that I have given to you; so that you may be confirmed in it, in the life which continues for ever and ever.'

Then, when that disciple had heard these things, he says to [20] the apostle: 'Blessed am I my master! I, and all my other brothers who hear these great things from you, we know that we all are among the living. And we are alive by your advent to us! We have found the truth more than all people who are in the world. Who of us will be able fully to repay you for the goodness [25] that you have done us, our father? Only the Father who sent you is sufficient fully to repay you for this toil. For the recompense that you desire of him, the God who has sent you, is this: every prayer you entreat of the Father, may he grant you your prayer and your consolation.'

THE LAST DAYS AND DEATH OF MANI

10. Mani's change of fortune after the death of Hormizd

The most complete account of the events leading to Mani's imprisonment, and of his subsequent death, is found in the source entitled: 'The report (or: recitation) about the crucifixion' (Hom. 42.9–85.34). We here begin a series of passages from this text, which we have broken up into sections to aid the reader.[77]

The part of the recitation about [10] the (crucifixion)

(Then) King Shapur entered Persia and came into the city of Bih-Shapur.[78] An illness took over his (body) and a great danger overtook him. He reached the (time) of his departure. King Shapur died [15] and was sent from the world.[79] King Hormizd was established and crowned in his place[80] . . .

My lord went in to (the king and said to him): 'They call you "a good king" . . . sins. You give the means (lit. 'road') of life to (each (?) . . . [20] . . .) I myself, if you are willing, . . . me (because from) today (. . . up) to now I am with you . . . you are released / forgiven (?)' . . . [25] . . . he sent him . . . that he should go to the (Assyrians . . .)

My (lord) said '. . . Mousak (?)[81] . . . person sins against me and (afflicts me [30] . . .) Assyrian(s) (?).' Then he gave him / it to . . . Mousak (?) to bear a letter furthermore . . . Mousak to my lord: 'You . . . in a place (?) . . .' 43

. . . that while my lord was in (Belapat (?) . . .) a good . . . gift . . . glorious greatness . . . from the heights through the Mind . . . [10] . . . the words of the gods . . . in the land of light. The matter of . . . of the (rich) ones . . . the richness of light . . . the angels of the blessing . . . The . . . songs [15] of the maidens; the form of the beloved . . . the glorious Gospel, (the Book) of the Mysteries of Wisdom; the king of every (writing (?)); the god of every good counsel; the (prayer (?) of) all the apostles; he who has been awaited by [20] (generations). He sealed it / himself with (. . . word(s)); with the first alphabet[82] . . .

[77] Hom. 42.9–50.17. All the citations from 'The report about the crucifixion', which are reproduced in this and the succeeding sections, are translated by Dr S. Clackson (and slightly adapted by I. Gardner). Dr Clackson wished to draw the reader's attention to the following points: the use of . . . (three dots) represents lacunae as well as illegible text, and sometimes . . . may represent more than one line of illegible text; the presence of numerous lacunae has affected the translation, and consequently the narrative is difficult to follow at times; whilst an attempt has been made to divide the text up into paragraphs to make it easier for the reader to digest the translation, it should be remembered that these paragraphs do not reflect the order of the original Coptic text; wherever speech can be ascertained, quotation marks have been added; in order to improve the flow of the translation, words and phrases which can be read clearly have sometimes not been translated if they occur in isolation, surrounded by illegible text, and do not add to the understanding of the narrative as a whole. She also wished to record her thanks to Dr Iain Gardner for his helpful comments on an earlier draft of her translation.

[78] The manuscript gives ⲃⲁϣⲁⲃⲁϩⲱⲣ, which is most likely a copyist error for ⲃⲁϩⲁϣⲃⲱⲣ (Polotsky). Bih-Shapur or Veh-Shapur is the capital of the province of Pars.

[79] Shapur I died c. 272. [80] Hormizd the Good only ruled for one year (272–3).

[81] The name (or term) Mousak is highly reminiscent of that of a grade of Manichaean priest (Sogd.) mwz'k, (Mid. Pers.) 'mwc'g, (Pth.) 'mwcg, (Chin.) mushe.

[82] The Gospel of Mani has twenty-two chapters each beginning with a letter of the semitic alphabet.

(. . . he) went forward, writing (. . . he) went to every land, every . . . he went on the river Tigris (. . . 25 every) place; all of his children . . . and his catechumens . . . every land (. . . with them) joined (?) to him, in one . . . church . . . 30 . . . 44 . . . 5 . . . from the crossing he came to the (Assyrians (?) 10 . . .) he did not move until he (reached) Hormizdakshar.[83] He wished to . . . out to Koushan . . . him to go.[84]

Then he turned (wrathfully), since he was (distressed). He arrived at the land of Ozeos,[85] and went . . . Hormizdakshar until he reached Mesene. 15 From Mesene he went to the river (Tigris), and he embarked for Ctesiphon. And when he had departed, whilst going along the road, he made (allusions) to his crucifixion, saying to them: 'Look at me and have your fill of me, my sons, because bodily I shall be (far 20 away from you.)'

He went away from those . . . and he went to Pargalia.[86] He (. . . that) place. He went with Baat to the (interpretation (hermeneia?)[87] . . .) his children and the (presbyters . . .) He gave them orders concerning every matter . . . 25 '. . . give heed to my books . . . look after my widows and my orphans . . .'

. . . to Cholassar;[88] from (Chalassar (sic) . . .) his disciples . . . 30 . . . 45 . . . For . . . that if he went to (that) place . . . 5 . . . he went with Baat in the (interpretation (?) . . .) came into Belapat, the place of the crucifixion 10 and the place in which the cup of the . . . was mixed.

When the Magi observed (them), they asked: 'Who indeed is this who has come (in?'; and they said) to them: 'It is Manichaios.'[89] When they (i.e. the Magi) heard (this, they shook) and were filled with anger so they went and accused (him) 15 to Kardel.[90] Kardel himself told (the accusations) to [83] Modern Ahwaz on the Kharun.

[84] Mani might have contemplated fleeing to the eastern regions of the Sassanian Empire; where his teaching had found many followers, especially among the members of the governing class.

[85] I.e. the province of Susiana.

[86] Probably to be identified with Phalcara on the Peutinger Tables which is situated between Hatra and Ctesiphon. Cf. Polotsky, Hom., 44, n. b.

[87] Baat was probably one of the interpreters as Mani was not a speaker of Middle Persian. He was also probably a client king, and his involvement with Mani's religion might have been a source of concern to the Sassanian kings.

[88] Cholassar is a city on the River Diyala and was the site of a Hellenistic foundation by the name of Artemisia.

[89] Manichaios is the full Greek version of Mani's name (Lat. Manichaeus). It was probably derived from Syriac mny hy' meaning 'Mani the Living' or 'Mani of Life'.

[90] Middle Persian Kirdir, the Zoroastrian chief priest (Mobedan Mobed). According to his inscription at Naqsh-i Rustam, it was his mission to rid the Sassanian Empire of heterodoxies and imported religions (Kerdir's Inscription at Naqsh-i Rustam §11, ed. and trans. MacKenzie (1989) 58): 'And from province to province, place to place, throughout the empire the rites of Ohrmezd and the gods became more important and the Mazdayasnian religion and magians were greatly honoured in the empire and great satisfaction befell the gods and water and fire and beneficent creatures, and great the (synkathedros.) Then Kardel and the synkathedros[91] went (and repeated) the accusations to the magister. The magister himself told (the accusations) to the king.[92] When he had heard these things . . . he then sent for my lord, summoning him.

On 20 Sunday, he (i.e. Manichaios) entered Belapat;[93] on Monday, he was accused . . . ; (on Sunday), the king issued an order concerning him and condemned him . . . Then my lord . . . 25 the greeting indeed (. . . answered) him (angrily): 'I swear to (you by my good fortune and my soul) and the soul of my (father . . .) living . . . you go upon the . . .' 30 . . . 46 . . . [5] . . . after . . . (-)four(-) days . . . called to (. . .

When) he had gone into (the presence) of the king, he met in the . . . 10 . . . As soon as the king saw him, (his face) convulsed (lit. 'loosened') with angry laughter. He said to him (a torrent) of words (lit. 'the multitude of his words'): 'Look, for three (whole) years (you) have been going around with Badia (?).[94] (What) law is it that you have (taught) him, so that he leaves our (cause) behind him and takes up yours 15 . . . the interpretation? Why did (you) not go with (him) when I ordered (you) to go with him and, furthermore, come (back) with him?'

My (lord) knew immediately that the matter was being distorted (lit. 'stretched') for an (excuse (?) . . .) my lord (. . .) his heart (. . . 20 . . .) the kings (and the) nobles, those from every . . . the glory . . . noble (. . . in) his presence. For, on that (day, 25 . . .) grief of his sister . . . the great (lady) who died at (that) time.[95] The . . . said . . . 'I . . . all the nobles . . . 47 . . . From whom did you learn that our (works) are more (honoured) than worldly things? For, from the first, (when) the Parthians were crowned, these things of (yours) never (happened) when the kingdom was in (our hands.')

(Then) 5 my lord said to him in the presence (of) all (the nobles): 'Ask everyone (about me because) I do not have a human teacher or instructor from whom (I have) learnt this wisdom (. . . from whom) I have received blows and torment befell Ahreman and the demons, and the heresy of Ahreman and the demons departed and was routed from the empire. And Jews and Buddhists and Hindus and Nazarenes (i.e. Aramaic-speaking Christians) and Christians (i.e. Greek-speaking Christians) and Baptists and Manichaeans were smitten in the empire, and idols were destroyed and the abodes of the demons disrupted and made into thrones and seats of the gods.'

[91] A Greek term in Coptic, probably meaning a courtier or councillor.

[92] I.e. Vahram I (r. 273–6).

[93] Coptic Belapat (Gundeshapur) site of the most major of the Sassanian royal palaces and later see of the Nestorian diocese of Beth Laphat.

[94] Reading uncertain.

[95] The king was clearly distraught over the death of his sister Shapur-dukhtar, and was therefore not impressed by the appearance of Mani who once had a reputation as a faith-healer. See below (11) the account of the encounter preserved in the Middle Persian text M3.

these things; but when I received them, I received them from (God) [10] through his angel. (Word) was sent to (me) indeed by God that I should preach this in (your) kingdom since this (whole) world has been led (astray and has erred.) It has turned away in error from the wisdom of God, (the Lord) of all; but it was I who received it from him (and I revealed) [15] the way of truth in the middle of the whole (world) so that the souls of these multitudes shall be (saved) and escape punishment. For the testimony of everything in my hands (?) is manifest. All that I . . . existed in the first (generations); [20] but this is customary, that the way (of) truth is sometimes revealed and sometimes concealed . . .'

The king (said) to him: 'How was it that God revealed (these) things to you . . . God did not . . . us . . . not . . . though we are the lords of the whole land?'

[25] (My) lord (said): 'God is the one who has authority . . . Ask (?) the . . . power (?) . . .' The . . . asked him: 'In this way (?) . . . he revealed . . .' . . . asked him (angrily): 'Did he not reveal [30] . . .'

. . . he was silent (?) (. . . Manichaios said:) 48 'Do (whatever you wish) to me, for I will tell the truth (. . . in) front (of you.) King Shapur looked after me (. . . and he) wrote (?) letters on my behalf to (all) the nobles (saying): "Watch over him, and (help) [5] him (rightly) so that no-one errs or sins (against him"; but) the testimonies are before you that King (Shapur) looked after me well with the (letters) he wrote for me (to the) nobles in every land so that (they) would look after me. Furthermore, when [10] King Hormizd . . . , I was with him . . . after King Shapur. You are the one who does . . . You yourself saw that Hormizd was greatly honoured.'

When the king saw that he was (persuading (?) . . .) every counsel and every defence [15] . . . reason against him at all . . . murder . . . whip(ping) (?) . . . he took the one which . . .

. . . He (i.e. Manichaios (?)) said: 'Look, o sun, you are (witness) to this . . . to me in his shamelessness.'

After this the king gave an order and [20] (bound) my lord. He put three chains on his . . . fetters on his feet, and they threw a chain around his neck. Some young men took him . . . before him in fear. Then after this . . . remembered that there were fetters on his feet . . . [25] . . . brought him (to) this place.

When he went in to the king . . . 'Where has she gone (?) . . .' . . . the king . . . [30] . . . 49 my lord himself . . .' . . . your head . . . or (else . . .' . . .) [5] the (king . . .) the good . . . follow her (deeds . . .) The king (said) to him: 'Reveal the matter to me . . . [10] . . . which place? Where has she gone? . . . or else she went . . .' . . . ; but the king . . . my lord . . . he continued to remain . . . following his (deeds (?) 15 . . .) and the end of the world . . .' . . . but no-one dies now . . .' . . . to the king: 'I let (?) the ones of the . . . 20 . . . him and he caught one.'[96]

Then the king was silent . . . thing he asked him about, this is . . . '. . . the earth. You know that there are seven. What (. . . 25 how) many years does he have . . . and he perishes?' My lord said '. . . the whole world . . . in the number of the journey / return (?) . . . hundred years . . . 30 . . . After this the (. . . of the) whole world came into existence.'

The king once more was (silent . . . 50 . . . 5 . . . 10 . . .) He began to make suggestions . . . they were with him . . . in all ways. '. . . I was waiting (?) . . .' He said 15 . . . Sunday. Then . . . said . . .' . . . shall go . . .'

11. The confrontation between Mani and King Vahram I

Though preserved only in Middle Persian, this account[97] comes clearly from the earliest Manichaean traditions which were contemporary to those of the Homilies. It is composed for an Iranian audience; and, interestingly, the persecuting King gave as his reasons for the imprisonment of Mani not the heretical tendencies of his cosmogonic teaching but the ethical implications, especially the pacifism which prevented Mani from living the normal militaristic life of a Sassanian grandee.

. . . (Mani) (R) came after he (had summoned) me, Nuhzadag the interpreter, Kushtai the (scribe?), and Abzakhuya the Persian. The king was at his dinner table and had not yet washed his hands. The courtiers entered and said: 'Mani has come and is standing at the door.' And the king sent the Lord the message: 'Wait a moment until I can come to you myself.' And the Lord again sat down to one side of the guard (of the window?) until the king should have finished his meal when he was about to go hunting. And he stood up from his meal; and, putting one arm round the queen of the Sakas and the other round Karder (or Kardel), the son of Ardavan, he came to the Lord. And his first words to the Lord were: 'You are not welcome.' And the lord replied: (V) 'Why? What wrong have I done?' The king said: 'I have sworn an oath not to let you come to this land!' And in anger he spoke thus to the lord: 'Ah, what need of you, since you go neither fighting nor hunting? But perhaps you are needed for this doctoring and this physicking? And you don't do even that!' And the Lord replied thus: 'I have done you no evil.

[96] This sadly fragmentary passage seems to have once contained a discussion between Mani and the King on the whereabouts of the soul of his recently deceased sister, and Mani appears to have been expounding his teaching on metempsychosis.

[97] M3, ed. and trans. Henning (1942), 949–50, (adapted). On this see especially the important study of Hinz (1971), 485–99. See also Puech (1949), 49–53.

Always I have done good to you and your family. And many and numerous were your servants whom I have (freed) of demons and witches. And many were those whom I have caused to rise from their illness. And many were those from whom I have averted the numerous kinds of fever. And many were those who came unto death, and I have (revived) them . . .'

12. Mani's imprisonment and death

Hom. 50.19–60.2, trans. Clackson.

. . . he was reconciled and went to rest. Then he . . . 20 gave his followers (lit. 'the ones who belonged to him') orders about each and every one of (his) affairs. Firstly, he gave an order about his sons . . . habit, when they were walking with him, . . . '. . . justice for me (. . .' . . . be) leader (archegos) after him . . . 25 . . . among whom he will be exalted . . . 'Be strong and of right mind . . . do good deeds . . . and the (psalms . . .') 51 year . . . manage (. . . 5 . . . 10 . . . depart) from this world . . . the beckoning of the angels . . . he said . . . 15 . . . the man of light . . . 20 . . . the grace . . . 25 . . . he prayed / his prayer . . . 30 . . . 'O (my) father . . . 52 . . . every . . . iron . . . me . . . father, the (First) Man . . . listen to my voice, (I,) the one who is distressed . . .' . . . him weeping (. . . before) 5 his father so that he might help him . . . his voice. It was heard . . . the pure ones and the mixed ones . . . cry of his (entreaty . . .)

He said furthermore: '. . . 10 . . . the coverings and veils . . . my entreaty and my prayer.' He called . . . by his name and the angels in the . . . brightness: 'I call all your names . . . from his prison. Strip me (of the covering) of . . . 15 . . . from this world. O my father, the First Man . . . open the doors to my entreaty . . . fault . . . 20 . . . maiden . . . 25 . . . my voice . . . angel(s) (. . . listen) to the sound of my entreaty . . . my chains. Let . . . hear (me . . .) who are distressed; . . . 30 . . . 35 . . . 53 . . . prostrated[98] before (. . . the) great (bema.) O judge of (all) the worlds, (listen) to the prayer of the righteous. I shall implore . . . 5 . . . O true father of the orphans, the (husband . . .) of the grieving widow. O first one of (righteousness,) listen (to the cry) of the distressed one | . . . my saviour. (O) Perfect Man, virgin of light, draw my soul to you (from this) 10 abyss.'

'Shame the hated ones with your . . . you sent me to this place . . . the Mind of greatness, the essence of . . . You sent me and dispatched me (. . . entreaty) quickly. Save the prisoner from 15 the ones who have seized him. Release the bound man from (his irons.) Draw my spirit up from the . . . my soul from . . . he / it perished in the midst of this world . . . what I endured in it because of your (?) (. . . since my) [20] childhood. May your great power . . . your zealous (?) angels . . . guile and I put down my bond(s) . . . and I give the house to his / its lord . . . in his body.'

[98] The Coptic web usually translated as 'to roll' clearly here carries the religious sense of 'to prostrate' as it also does in PsBk 2. 13, 27.

'Strip me . . . [25] . . . you. You have . . . they came into being upon the earth . . . the sects. For, whoever asks you, . . . before you, you should give him . . . calls to you . . . [30] you heard the . . . orphan(s); . . . your hope . . . apostle . . . [35] . . . he preached . . . 54 . . . desire of the world . . . until my old age. I found myself . . . name me with your great name [5] . . . is the apostle in the world. I see (?) . . . your glory . . . you are the one I call . . . do not be ashamed of me. Answer me, o my . . . my soul from tribulations . . .'

[10] . . . listened to his voice in the presence of the (king (?) . . .) which he sent. The power of . . . came . . . The gift was given to the apostle of light . . . apostle of this generation departing from the world, the great messenger of the land of [15] (the great) Babylon. The signs were revealed to him . . . world. His body began (to go to pieces); his . . . shook and made a sound, . . . his . . . began to change, . . . his image; they (were?) revealed . . . [20] . . . from his face and his (form (?) . . .) his limbs . . . went to pieces . . . like a house which is faulty, like a . . . amazement (?). He began to bend . . . [25] . . . his prayer, spreading out . . . his arms, calling to . . . angels and every land . . . in (everyone's) mouth . . . his eyes, while his tears [30] . . . gnashing (?) . . . [35] . . . 55 . . .

[5] . . . he came for him. She came . . . They were deposited / dwelled next to him . . . his great soul. They went to . . . the hidden . . . , to release him. His disciples . . . [10] . . . when they were entering . . . angels which were mixed with the glorious . . . , which had come for him to release him; but they did not perceive (him . . .) they perceived a voice. The voice rose . . . [15] . . . on the just one as he was about to raise himself up . . . while the (just one) was raising himself up, the great treasure (?), as he was about to / so that he might leap out, the apostle of light . . . the pearl of light . . . from the troubled seas . . . [20] its value and beauty . . . The voice of the honoured one . . . his saviour . . . the apostle of light . . . the great one, as it was about to leap to the . . . [25] . . . numerous . . . zealous (?) . . . the bound one . . . his feet . . . deposit / dwell . . . man . . . [30] . . . cry of pain . . . of his bonds . . . exalted pillar . . . the voice of . . . 56 . . . as the apostle was about to go (?) . . . leave him / it behind . . . [5] . . . Manichaios . . . Manichaios . . . his kindred. The body . . . the apostle, when he was going to put him / it in the . . . Manichaios, the apostle . . . [10] . . . his host and his . . . when his lord and teacher was about to go and . . . disciple of Manichaios, the apostle (. . . called) them fatherless, orphans.

The time came and he prayed and was granted his (prayer. [15] He left) his children behind him and he left us in a . . . he made his road to the heights level for him. Woe, woe! . . . we did not sin against him and he made us . . . his head. He prayed in a pitiable fashion, while his . . . bonds of iron; tears flowed . . . [20] . . . eye(s); his hands in their (prayer (?) . . .) of iron; his heart in a great . . . his neck in the iron chain . . . he set foot in (?) . . . he stood firm . . . [25] . . . him praying and imploring . . . the ones below (?) . . . [30] . . . the voice of the (. . . peace (?)) while he was departing from the world . . . prayed for mercy from God . . . 57 . . .

[5] . . . came (?) . . . the ones who were to go before his soul came (?) . . . victory . . . The Form . . . demon(s). (The Form) has the (power . . . [10] . . .) apostle Ou(zeos (?))[99] The angels . . . the road of peace.

Then he was at rest (. . . he) fulfilled his word (. . . children). He was taken into . . . [15] . . . When he was seated on the bed . . . his image . . . It changed and it . . . and they were crying out . . . After this he asked for bread and salt . . . to him. He prayed for them . . . [20] . . . his children. He embraced . . . He said to them: '. . . greetings from me to (?) the elect and the catechumens, my children . . .'

He put his hand upon the . . . [25] '. . . which I gave (?) . . . [30] . . . you make . . . all of (you) . . . 58 . . . the lord . . . [5] . . . true . . . outside . . . mankind . . . after me.'

Then he stretched himself out (. . . his) bed. They embraced (him (?) [10] . . .) they embraced him . . . departed (?) and they cried out . . . weeping in front of him . . .' You are going . . . orphans after you (. . . [15] . . . Manichaios) then . . . then . . . betray you . . . today (?) . . . and he sees / saw your . . . set you upright (?) . . . you strengthened / your strength . . . [20] . . . well . . . closed your great eyes. She / it is beautiful . . . [25] . . . clothes . . . [30] . . .

59 that day up to . . . while his body was lying down and his . . . His eyes were fixed and still. Then three female (catechumens) of the faith (went) in to him: [5] Banak, Dinak, and N-(. . .) They sat by him and wept over him (and put their hands) on his eyes. They closed them because they were swollen. For when his soul departed . . . They kissed his mouth . . . [10] weeping over him and saying: 'O our (father, open (?)) your eyes and look at us. Stretch out to us (the right hand (?)) of your love, which is full of mercy and restraint . . . where are (they), the thousands which you chose and the tens of thousands who (believed in) you? Indeed, concerning truth and rectitude which you . . . 15 the earth. All the worlds should mourn you from the midst of (your) churches, and weep (freely) in your assemblies because you have borne witness to thousands.'

[99] A possible reference to a disciple known as Ozeos in the Psalm-Book and Uzzi in Parthian texts. See below, 13.

While their hands lay on (his eyes, they proclaimed) these things and wept; but he was (not (?)) attending 20 . . . silence. His speech failed and his tongue found itself sealed up. His mouth remained still. (O children of) righteousness, bless those women! (Give) them thanks and give them adoration. Speak / sing . . . because / that they closed the eyes of our father . . . 25 . . . among the enemies . . . they went because of fear of the king . . .

When the men . . . had departed . . . The corporeal ones . . . 30 . . . his soul . . . A voice resounded from (. . . , without) sickness, without infirmity. He . . . 60 . . . He came away and rose up (with the power which had) come for him.

13. Mani's entry into parinirvana

This Parthian account preserved on a Turfan fragment[100] is undoubtedly directly translated from Syriac despite its occasional use of Buddhist terms. It is included here as it provides, like M3 above, important details and parallel material to a fragmentary section in the Coptic which is derived from the same tradition.

(R) Just like a sovereign who takes off armour and garment and puts on another royal garment, thus the apostle of light took off the warlike dress of the body and sat down in a ship of light and received the divine garment, the diadem of light, and the beautiful garland. And in great joy he flew together with the light gods that are going to the right and to the left (of him), with harp(-sound) and song of joy, in divine miraculous power, like a swift lightning and a shooting star (lit. splendid swift form), to the Pillar of Glory, the path of the light, and the moon-chariot, the meeting-place of the gods. And he stayed (there) with god Ohrmezd the father (i.e. the First Man).

And he left the whole herd of righteousness (i.e. the Manichaean community) orphaned and sad, because the master of the house had entered parinirvana,[101] and his house . . . parinirvana (?) . . .)

[100] M5569 (T II 79), MM iii, §c, pp. 860–2; trans. Asmussen (1975) 55–6 (adapted).

[101] A Buddhist term signifying a blessed state of death in which the deceased is freed from the cycle of birth and rebirth.

(V) and (it was under) the rulership of . . . sign of the zodiac, on the fourth of the month of Shahrevar,[102] on the day of Shahrevar, Monday and at the eleventh hour, in the province of Khuzistan and in the city of Belabad, when this father of light, full of power, was taken up to his own home of light.

And after the parinirvana of the apostle, Uzzi the teacher[103] gave this testimony to the whole religion concerning what he saw in the cohort, for that reason that he, Uzzi, that Saturday night was left there with the apostle of light. And many pious commands from the apostle of light he brought, orally to the whole religion.

And after the parinirvana of the apostle of light, then the Gospel, the Picture Book (Ardahang),[104] his garment and hands in the province (. . . was brought) to Si(sin (?)).

14. Praise for the martyred Mani

Hom. 60.2–67.32, trans. Clackson.

This is the memoir from (the day of) his crucifixion[105] until the hour he departed. (On Sunday) he entered Belapat. On Monday 5 (they accused) him. On Tuesday they . . . he strengthened his church. (By the) Sabbath, he had been pursued and bound. (Afterwards . . .) all of his enemies. On . . . (they sealed) his bonds and took (him into 10 the prison.) He was bound on day eight of (Mecheir. Until) the day he ascended, for twenty(-six) days, he was bound in iron bonds. At (the) eleventh (hour) of that day he rose from (the body) up to the dwelling-places of his greatness 15 (in) the heights. He met his Form . . . of (the) lights. He came forth and leapt up (with (?)) the power which had come for him.

Behold this is how they . . . the statue rose up from the (temple . . .) shining lamp. It was brought . . . 20 . . . into the house and he rose up from the world . . . treasury, from the heap (?) of . . . the great holy righteous one . . . namely the world and all of the sects . . . enemies and rebels (. . . 25 . . . righteous) and peace-bearing one(s) from . . . between the [102] Mani died on Monday, the 4th day of Addaru according to the Babylonian calendar. This is worked into the calendars of the various communities. Shahrevar (Feb./March) coincides with Addaru in AD 274/77. Cf. Boyce (1975) 47, comm. ad §p 2.

[103] Uzzi is a name of clear Jewish origin, cf. MM iii, 862, n. 1. He appears as Lord Ozeos in PsBk2. 34.13, and may have also occurred in Hom. 57.10 as ⲟⲩⲍⲉⲟⲥ) or ⲟⲩⲍⲓⲁⲥ). Cf. Tubach (1997), 388.

[104] In Coptic the term used for this extra-canonical work is the Greek loan word εἰκών.

[105] Mani's martyrdom was seen by his followers both east and west as a form of crucifixion in imitatione Christi even though he was not actually crucified.

demons and . . . come up (?) with the apostle of . . . the heights . . . [30] . . . it is . . . from his kin. He . . . good interpreter . . . I plucked / seized him from his . . . 61 . . . he came up . . . attended to (?) . . . the voice from the . . . was silent . . . proclamation. The great saviour raised himself up from the (worlds . . .) [5] the elect. The great faithful one went to (rest and ascended), he . . . The good (father) of the orphans (. . . The husband) of the widows (raised himself up), the teacher / writer of the writings . . . the psalms of the psalmists. (. . . from his) [10] slaves, the merchant from his (goods, the teacher from) his pupils, the (good (?)) planter (from) his plants . . .

With the last of all the . . . the apostle who had come chose . . . ; the apostle who had . . . the (apostles) [15] of every generation. The one who had come chose us (?) and released . . . the preacher of life. The (interpreter) of the land of the great Babylon; like an (arrow (?) . . .) from a bow, he penetrated this world and went out . . . like a hero . . . the (great) [20] inhabited world . . . this world (. . . from) the moon, . . . crowned like Sethel[106] . . . [25] . . . he begat them upon the earth and they blessed him, . . . and the powers. In the heavens furthermore . . . firmament . . . gods and angels blessed him and glorified (?) . . . [30] all the holy ones and the . . . [35] . . . who released . . .

62 . . . He went in and rested (. . . the gods) and angels blessed him . . . While his possessions were with him, he [5] . . . great (prisoner) who chose them for his (?) . . . the forms of flesh . . . at the time he rose up, because in the way . . . and the angels of the glorious one . . . he went and entered (that) kingdom [10] . . . Blessed is the one who went after him, . . . his departure and this glory . . . and he (did) not believe that his road . . . a vagrant's wandering; because he did not believe . . . the blessed apostle of light [15] . . . the body, they left it lying on the bed . . . chains of iron.

Then his fame . . . in the whole city. They heard . . . that he had risen. A (crowd) of people gathered together group by group and came along. Then [20] . . . He was brought out and . . . the prison. They gathered (together . . .) catechumen(s) (. . . who were established) in secret . . . peoples . . . [25] . . . he whom they called . . . benefactor . . . while they were saying furthermore: 'Woe and destruction . . . What sort of evil is it that is ready . . . that this good man shall die because of it in the . . . [30] . . . he did not sin indeed against anyone at all, nor did he . . . their property.'

[106] Sethel is an alternative form for Seth, the biological son of Adam. This curious phrase may refer to the Manichaean teaching preserved only in Arabic (Fihrist, ed. Flügel (1871), 332) in which an angel approached Adam with a magnificent garland or crown after he had successfully defended Sethel (Šāṭīl) from the arch-demon (Aṣ-Ṣindīd). On this see esp. Reeves (1996), 130, n. 7.

Then the . . . went . . . the king . . . the prison . . . [35] . . . the king, he . . . and he . . . 63 . . . in / with his eyes or in / with (his . . .) before me, he . . . [5] . . . he did not leave me . . . the king ordered . . . : 'and (take) him . . . in the middle of . . . spread it under him . . . clothing and his (cloak (?)' . . .) [10] they took his bonds from him, wishing to . . . the third Sunday . . . his enemies. They (. . . [15] he was) lying down spread out . . . in the presence of them all . . . grief / grieved, while he lay on the (clothing (?) . . .) the great . . . rolled . . . just . . . thrown down . . . [20] . . . [25] . . . 64 . . . after them with their hands . . . good . . . [5] . . . they said to your . . . they began . . . [10] . . . truly.

This is the manner of his coming . . . he prayed . . . he called . . . he took (?) his . . . [15] . . . the king. They feared (?) . . . [20] . . . a man . . . slave . . . [25] . . . [30] . . . (65–6 too badly preserved to be translated) 67 . . . world(s) in the . . . they were like . . . you in (a) house (?) . . . [5] . . . your custom . . . mysteries . . . they took it to the house of Athimar . . . [10] . . . of the faith. (All) those of his house . . . they went to Persis.[107] For . . . accuser . . . when peace . . . they took it to Ctesiphon . . . [15] . . . left her / it with his bones.

They were . . . justice. His affair needed to (. . . fell) away from us. He hid . . . it was revealed; but whoever . . . namely the sins of his . . . [20] . . . for from this time . . . they put him in a . . . place . . . complete justice . . . like the apostles . . . himself furthermore while he was in (the) body . . . [25] . . . for all of these . . . for his writings and . . . he said: 'The three things to be remembered . . . my gospel, my . . . be glorified eternally. There are many . . . [30] . . . and they swear on my happiness . . . on him, in every (land . . .) I condemned (?) myself . . . '

15. The sufferings of Mani compared to those of other true apostles

Hom. 67.34–70.34, trans. Clackson.

. . . and he found . . . us in the (world . . . [35] . . .) truth . . . 68 . . . of God . . . apostle . . . [5] . . . gods and (. . . afflictions) and shame (. . . from) this place. While the man . . . he supported him / endured it amid . . . [10] . . . which they support / endure . . . and they carry / carried . . . first . . . of the flesh . . . from Eve, his true sister . . . For . . . he [107] Persis is the Greek form of the name of the Sassanian province of Pars (Fars). It does not stand for the whole of the Persian Empire.

fell three (times . . . 15 . . .) Adam, he spent three hundred and seventy-three . . . from Cain and all his race . . . Enosh, Sem, Shem[108] and these other . . . bad . . . ; four hundred thousand just . . . years of Enoch . . . [109]

20 . . . when they had gone down . . . to India. Afflictions (befell them . . .) all of the apostles.[110] What is . . . bema . . . reached this . . . laughed at him. Furthermore, when the . . . 25 . . . they did not destroy / release him . . . crucified some thieves . . . because they made him drink gall . . . his clothes on themselves . . . blood from their lances, and they (. . . 30 the son) of our God . . . apostle(s) . . . after him . . . 35 . . . 'Crucify us' (?) . . . the son . . . Zebedee[111] . . . 5 . . . he went (?) . . . raised them up . . . assembly in the . . . for (?) the bad things and the persecutions . . . 10 waters and seas . . . the things which his (disciples suffered at the hands) of persecutors in every (land) are bad. (There is one (disciple)) whose skin was scraped from the soles of his feet . . . cauldron, he was set over (it and a fire was kindled 15 under) him. There is one who was thrown into a copper (kettle) and fire was lit beneath it (until the water) boiled. He cried out, sounding like a . . . There is one who was flayed . . . There is one whose . . . were plucked 20 out.

Behold these (men) have / were revived . . . and these afflictions befell (them) . . . abroad . . . their bodies fell . . . and trees. Their bones were (scattered in every) 25 land. Wolves and lions . . . their forms. Behold Paul . . . lord(s), when he had made signs and (. . . how many) did he endure? How many did he see . . . on the sea and the dry(-land) (. . . the) 30 inner ones and the outer ones . . . put him into a basket and let him down (through a) window away from the Jews[112] . . . destruction overtook him. He put the garment (. . . twelve (?)) (loaves) of bread, he ate 35 . . . 70 . . . the prayer . . .

Zarathustra[113] furthermore . . . him from the Persians . . . him before the king 5 . . . how many from the . . . he revealed in . . . God (?) . . . because [108] Shem is the son of Noah. The forms Shem and Sem seem to alternate in Coptic lists; but they are found together in a Middle Persian fragment of a Manichaean "Book of Enoch" which may be part of the canonical Book of the Giants (M299a R 5, cf. Henning (1934), 27). This would indicate that the 'Sem-Shem' doublet (which must refer to the same figure) goes back to the original Syriac writings of Mani. Passages from the Apocalypse of Sem are cited in the CMC (55.9–57.21).

[109] The listing of names of antediluvian heroes is common in Manichaean literature. Cf. Keph. 12.9–12 and PsBk2. 142.3–9. Note the appearance of Enoch here after the Noahides: an inverted chronological order, which is also observed in the presentation of apocalyptic material in the CMC (48.16–60.12). Cf. Reeves (1996), 28, n. 73.

[110] I.e. those of Jesus.

[111] I.e. the apostle John, the son of Zebedee.

[112] I.e. the escape of the apostle Paul from his enemies at Damascus (2 Cor. 11.33).

[113] The material presented by the Manichaeans on the death of Zarathustra is otherwise unattested.

this is the way in a (. . . the) two (natures) which fight with (one another) . . . [10] . . . in this way. He lifted up . . .

Yet, furthermore, (the) matter of his body, . . . more than all the apostles. Behold . . . his body so that they would not throw it . . . Behold Zarathustra, as it is written . . . [15] . . . on the tombs of the kings. Behold . . . they covered his body with perfumes (?) and . . . clothing. They lay him out in honour . . . in the land of the Indians, and . . . they put him in the clouds . . . [20] . . . with them swearing (that) while his bones . . . every (apostle) who had been . . . if they . . . from the world . . . champion, they would not put their bodies . . . [25] . . . they wept over them and grieved . . . the one who would see the place of burial . . . and remember him for a good . . . his shame is revealed . . . every generation. He bound you . . . [30] . . . the people stumbled and knew . . . of our father . . . generations (are) worthy . . . denier . . .

16. The institution of the bema

Hom. 71.2–73.34, trans. Clackson. In the Manichaean cultus the bema is a platform with five steps on which is placed an effigy of Mani, and to which his followers paid their homage on the day when his death was commemorated.

71 . . . custom and his place of . . . matter furthermore of his bema . . . [5] . . . sacrifice (?) . . . will see his seating-place . . . he did not think (?) that he was going to leave his (. . . and) they (would (?)) manage furthermore . . . [10] . . . and this other one besides . . . seating-place of . . . place (where) he was established . . . he proclaimed his wisdom. The (place(?) . . . revealed). The place (where) he (prayed [15] . . .) the place where his crucifixion . . . his body there. The place . . . sitting. The place . . . the one who did not see (?) saw (?) him . . . he remembered the goodness (. . . [20] what) he preached . . . their kind. If we see his (bema (?) . . . we sit) and weep over it because . . . his statue . . . they depicted . . . [25] the ones who crucified him . . . battlefields (?) . . .

72 . . . This year . . . strengthened his bema which is . . . [5] . . . persecutor and the enemies . . . which he put down . . . apostle(s) in him / it. In the generation . . . feast-days and (observances . . .) Christians. They . . . [10] . . . about him. In the month . . . in which he (was crucified . . .) but what will we do (. . . ?) They mix their fast . . . sects fast and sin . . . [15] . . . find their hands spread out . . . my (?) beasts. Beasts . . . we fast . . . the sects. They give their sins . . . furthermore their fast; they [20] . . . greatly, in the blessed . . . feast-(days) and observances (. . . revealed) through it; at present . . . but they go in them . . . blessed . . . [25] . . . good, according to (?) . . . of the trumpet . . . observances . . . 73 . . . year to year . . . [5] . . . the fire . . . fast which . . . idols in . . . [10] . . . hindrance there (?).

There are some . . . fast and they spread out their beds . . . These are the laws of the sects . . . world(s), the ones which fast . . . they sin and they stumble in . . . [15] Yet, furthermore, he appointed (?) his day . . . all the . . . of good. The other fast (which . . .) is excellent and . . . victory. Its bearing . . . of those who deny . . . [20] . . . neither tree nor . . . offence / wound (?) happened . . . their calm . . . defilement, with psalms . . . [25] prayers and blessings; with eyes (?) . . . called to God with . . . our father, our saviour, the one who . . . is (the) day of restraint . . . repaid us with foolishnesses . . . [30] . . . which they would write . . . name (?). Blessed is the one who (shall) believe . . . the one who shall hunger for . . . Blessed is the . . .

17. The death of Mani compared to the trial and crucifixion of Jesus the Messiah

This Parthian text from Turfan,[114] which is undoubtedly translated originally from Syriac, is significant for its use of material from the account of the crucifixion in Tatian's Diatessarōn. The Manichaeans would have consulted this gospel harmony in its Syriac version.

{page header} Discourse on the Crucifixion

. . . and he (Mani?) was unconscious and died. Such was the parinirvana of (our) father, as was written. No one should contemplate on anything more wonderful. Absolve us from all that had happened to him. As we all know when Jesus the Messiah, the lord of us all, was crucified; it was attested about him that they seized him like a evil-doer. They also dressed him in a (purple) cloak and placed a cane in his hand. And they paid reverence to him and (mockingly (?)) spoke: ('. . . King), our Christ!' And they then led (him) to the cross (?) . . . he was delivered to them, but if not . . . there are also others who (departed (?) from this world) through crucifixion. Many there (are . . .) who were put (to death) by the sword . . . And there are those who went to distant lands and were killed when they got there. Every one of these messengers was well known, for (we (?)) are told about them: what they have endured and through what form of crucifixion (i.e. execution) they departed from this world. They also had some disciples who were thrown to the animals and others who were evicted from land to land. They were like strangers and enemies to the whole world and they were called the "deceived ones" and "ruined ones" in the whole world. And many are the temptations (?) . . . and they endured . . . (and) (?) themselves also taught . . . alms. Even as our father, the (beneficent . . .) our . . . living, so also the Jews (similarly desired) to remove <him> from the world, as it is shown that at dawn, the teachers, the (Jewish) priests, the scribes and the religious leaders deliberated (cf. Luke 22:66) and took counsel from each other to kill him (cf. Matt. 27:1). And they sought (false witnesses) (cf. Matt. 26:59), but their testimony did not agree with each other (cf. Mark 14:59). They brought forward two others (cf. Matt. 26:60) and they said: "This man had declared: 'I am able to destroy the temple (lit. palace) which is built with hands and in three days build another one built without hands (cf. Mark 14:58).'" Their testimonies also do not tally (cf. Mark 14:59), and the High Priest asked him, saying: "I demand of you, on oath to the living God, that you tell me, whether you are the Christ, the son of (God, the living (?))" (cf. Matt. 26:63). Jesus said to him, "First, you yourself have said that I am it (cf. Matt. 26:64) . . . (truly) appears; but from now on you will see the Son of Man as he sits on the right side of divine power (and) when he will come in the (chariot) from heaven" (cf. Matt. 26:64). Then the High Priest of the Jews (tore) his garment and said (cf. Mark 14:63): "To me" . . . and they spoke to one another: ". . . the testimony which is desired. We have heard again (?) (the blasphemy) from his own very lips (cf. Luke 22:71) (. . . thereupon) it is necessary to kill him" (cf. Matt. 26:66) . . . Pilate . . .

[114] M4570, KG §4a.18, pp. 76–9, trans. S. Lieu.

18. The death of Mani commemorated in two bema psalms

PsBk2. 14.18–20.17 (psalms 225 and 226), ed. and trans. C. R. C. Allberry (adapted I. Gardner).[115]

14 (Psalm) 225

By the lord Syrus.[116]

. . . your daughter, the church; the Paraclete, our merciful . . .

[115] All the extracts from PsBk2. (ed. and trans. Allbery), which are reproduced in this volume, have been adapted to the common style, including uniform translation of technical terms; they also take into account improved readings based on later scholarship (or occasionally on parallel texts found at Ismant el-Kharab), and they may have been rearranged according to strophes.

[116] Who the lord Syrus (author of this Psalm) was is not known.

To whom can I go, widow? For they are slanderers, all of them, . . . Who among them will wipe away my . . . from me (?) upon the earth? They are slanderers . . . murderers. Alas, alas for the violence that is done: for they run after me like wolves that run after a lamb.

How many shadows, how many falls . . .
fear . . .
desert me . . . holy . . .
. . . to do violence; but do not desert 15 me, my blessed king who knows my heart.

I was escaping from the wastes, my hair loosed like a mad woman, I asking everyone that comes upon me:
'Who will give me word of my shepherd; and teach me how he was slain in the godless city by the lawless sects, the beasts that were maddened by the poison of their flames of fire?'

I have heard concerning you Magians, the priests of the fire, that you seized my god in your foul hands;
impious men, mad and godless,
the brothers of the Jews, the murderers of Christ.
A fire took hold of your heart, until you had murdered the righteous ambassador.

Lo, these are the deeds that are full of outrage, of bitter-hearted men.
This is the road they have made that will lead them to hell.
I have not seen a beast branded like these,
nor again have I seen fire consuming chaff . . .
Yet, there was found no merciful man standing up to snatch from them this sinless and righteous one.

They all cried out with one voice to the godless judge, telling him words in which there was no truth:
'Lo, a man has appeared in these days,
fighting with us and bringing our affairs to nought.

We implore thee with one accord, o king, do away with him, for he is a teacher who leads men astray.'

When he heard these words, the foolish man, the king of these pitiless ones, he was astonished, the evil-fated, the evil-doer:
he sent, he called my shepherd,
he says to him wrathfully in a mighty voice:
'Who bade you do these things, or who are you? You do deeds that harm all people.'

16 The glorious mind answered, and says to him straightly:
'Know, o king, that God has given into your hand, you being human.
The law of life . . .
. . . the perfect commandments of Christ. My doctrines . . .
. . .
. . . to you.'

He parted his lips, he cried out in a
. . .
'will appear to you. You are a lowly stranger . . .
a poor man, lacking everything. You are a person of . . .
. . . to give this favour and gift unutterable.'

'They that are of God seek not after gold and the possessions of the world.
God it is who commands, there is no other commandment but his.
God it is who teaches whom he pleases (and gives to him) the gift that surpasses all gifts, as a seal . . . prophet,
the true man of God in his deeds and his words.'

The lover of fighting, the peaceless one, roared in flaming anger;
he commanded them to fetter the righteous one,
that he might please the Magians,
the teachers of Persia, the servants of fire.
In truth, this is the way that they gave judgment upon the victor, the angel, the Paraclete.

How many days of fear, my father, did you endure;
until you had cut and severed the race of frightful men!
Twenty-six days in all, and the nights of them,
you did spend in chains in Belapat.
O the renown of the aeons of light!
O noble holy image of the mysteries of God!

O hands that gave freedom to a multitude of souls, that were bound today in bonds of iron!
To whom shall I go now,
that he may release for me these hands of pity?
My God, forsake me not,
for my enemies (all) mock (me . . .)

17 . . . my lord Manichaios, the judge of this totality,
. . . pitiless . . . ; you have . . .
your joyous wings. First you did pray unto (God your) Father, but the dead body you cast down (before the face of) your enemies.

. . . the nature of deception . . .
the cruel . . . , the sign . . .
he desired in the madness of his wrath, in . . .
to destroy the beauty of your limbs. You ascended in . .
. . . to the heights without any hindrance.

He raged (?), even the murderous demon, he . . .
. . . saying: 'Perchance it is a drug which you have . . .
forth'. He commanded the physicians and . . .
to examine the body, your holy body, which he mocked and plotted against; he kindled fire in a great furnace.

The dragon that lives to his shame and all the . . .
of his . . .
. . .
the keeps of the gates of the city. He spilled his blood to no purpose; his murder became a sign for every person who pities him.

On the second day of the week, you received the glory of victory, you bound the diadem upon your head;
for you killed the race of darkness,
in the month Phamenoth, on the fourth day of the moon.
You received your crown. O my father, the victor in the war;
be merciful unto me, I entreat you, the Paraclete.

O witness of the ineffable benefactions of the first Christ, the sign of the soul whose fame has spread to the earth;
it is fitting for you to receive this crown, our father, in joyous feasts and vigils.

The victory to you, our lord Mani the living;
victory too to your bema, the glorious and blessed;
18 and the soul of Maria, Theona.

(Psalm) 226

All mysteries have been fulfilled in you, our father,
(the Spirit of) truth, our lord Mani the living.

On the day of the cross
he gave himself up to the authorities;
on the second day of the week . . .
on the fourth (day) of the month Phamenoth, at (the eleventh) hour of the day,
he gave himself up to (death).

(Our father), the blessed one, our lord Mani the living, he bent his knees, imploring mercy, crying out unto God, 'Open me the door and give me release out of my sufferings.'

The rulers of the earth judged me in their wrath,
. . . their lying words,
through the words of . . . these, as they shall alter and change that which is sweet and make it bitter.

In the day that they brought me before the judge
. . .
firmly established . . . all of them . . .
(. . . none) among them aided me.

All the lawless ones judged me;
the impious, the creatures of sin,
they held me in their power amidst the whole multitude,
like a sheep that has no shepherd.

They buzzed at me like wasps, they roared against me like these lions, saying to me in a loud voice:
'It pleases us not that thou should do these things.'

He did evil unto me in his wrath, he counselled against me with his chieftains,
he swore to me by the salvation of his father:
'I will not leave you in the world henceforth.'

They loaded me with iron, as they do to sinners;
19 they fettered me as they do thieves, they judged me like these . . .
. . . like these sorcerers.

From the day when they bound me to the day of the cross there are numbered in all some twenty-six days, they keeping watch on me night and day, appointing guards, keeping watch on me.

(They put) six neck-chains upon me, they fettered me with shackles
All the elect were weeping, and the catechumens, seeing my sufferings wherein I was.

These sinners, all of them, they did not allow me to see my children and my disciples and my shepherds and my bishops;
when they saw them coming unto me.

(From) the day of the great persecution to the day of the cross there are six years.
I spent them walking in the midst of the world, like captives in the midst of strangers.

They were stirred, they trembled, even the powers of the evil one,
they turned their sword against the humble man;

they were not willing indeed to see me in the streets of their cities.

Lo, the sky and the earth and the two luminaries bear witness of me in the heights;
that I did good among them,
but they in their cruelty crucified me.

I was gazing at my familiar with my eyes of light, beholding my glorious father;
he who is ever clasped to me,
he opening before me the gate unto the heights.

I spread out my hands, praying unto him;
I bent my knees, worshipping him also, that I might divest myself of the image of the flesh and strip from me the vesture of manhood.

Lo, his body was brought forth in the city of these sinners, when they had cut off his head and hung it up amid the whole multitude.

20 . . .
the elect and the catechumens . . .
their great shepherd who has ascended from among them.

(Then), when the beloved had ascended to heaven,
he set . . . his elect,
that they might . . . night and day
. . .

Spread out your hands, all the elect and the catechumens of the faith;
and pray with a great prayer, that the Father of glory may give to you . . .

. . .
who see me . . . light (?), these that are in the church, . . .
who watch over her night and day.

15 Glory and victory to our lord Mani the living,
(the Spirit) of truth, this one from the Father;
and all his holy elect.
Victory to the soul of Maria.

THE MANICHAEAN CHURCH UNDER SISINNIOS AND HIS SUCCESSOR INNAIOS

19. Persecution of the Manichaean church

Hom. 74.8–78.30, trans. Clackson.

74 . . . 5 . . . they came to the middle of the . . . of some churches . . . 10 . . . revelations . . . afflictions and persecutions . . . Satan did not allow them . . . by the will of . . . until now before he has completed his . . . 15 . . . writings. He[117] was apprehended and crucified . . . scattered his congregations . . . furthermore his church . . . our father himself furthermore and our (saviour . . .) happened / became like the . . . 20 . . . wisdom. He was (disturbed . . .) his (church) . . . like a . . . teachers and readers . . . 25 . . . he threw up a cry and . . . the world. He threw . . . set forth revelations . . . he got a name, he became famous, he (. . . 30 sent) him / it, he . . . he practises / his practice(s) (. . . the) sects and the races . . . in the world . . . until the last . . . 75 when the apostle goes . . . but this world, its kind is this . . . the ones who have built it, that neither a good nor a wicked one should be left (in it (i.e. the world).)

Therefore, in the way of these (good ones . . .) 5 furthermore (our (?)) good father himself in their way. (The wicked ones themselves) and his crucifiers came (?) . . . again came forth. Also in the way the . . . wicked ones from the beginning to the end . . . How many have departed from the (world, the weak and the) 10 strong; the wretches and the heroes . . . and his manhood; all his good ones (and his wicked ones); the beautiful and the ugly . . . his lascivious ones. Their souls went (up and their) bodies returned to the earth. Their souls (. . . and) 15 their bones were scattered in every (land and in every) city.

However, the wicked who (thought that) they would depart like their companions, (their end came about) in accordance with their deeds because they made (his blood) flow (away . . .) namely his father and the one he . . . 20 . . . his name. Blessed be (. . . blessed) be his truth. (Blessed) be . . . blessed be the (prophets) . . . blessed be his . . . day (. . . blessed be) the congregation of his faithful (. . . 25 the) teacher of truth, the instructor . . . wisdom. Blessed be the . . . and all who hear; they . . . sins and outrages against (?) the elect (and the catechumens) who listen to the . . .

[117] The victim here appears to be Mani and the account is a summary of his death as seen in the context of the sufferings of the early leaders of the Manichaean church and the vile fate which befell their persecutors.

30 Then, after their crucifixion of our (father, he fulfilled the) mystery of his apostolate . . . of Jesus. He ascended in the (form . . . (he gave?)) orders, he laid down some (commandments . . .) far from his justice . . . 35 . . . he established his (. . . armour) of glory . . . 76 . . . This year in which . . .

Another three years (passed . . . no)-one sinned against his people . . . trembling. They quieted their (anger 5 just as) he told them to while he was still (alive); but then . . . after the crucifixion of my (lord . . .) began to creep. It gathered . . . his anger[118] . . . from below . . . began little by little 10 . . . in every land . . . his anger until the fifteenth (year . . .) namely the wicked ones and the rebels . . . him, because Satan envied . . . and beyond his faithful ones; as if (?) 15 . . . the kings of . . . were angry . . . the consuming fire.

The wolves . . . sheep to kill and scatter . . . in between the bulls, to destroy . . . the wicked ones came in to the . . . 20 . . . they cut the branches and (twigs . . . robbers) came into the place for depositing (possessions . . .) destroyed the treasures. The cattle (went . . .) trod on him while he was upright . . . entered the dovecots of . . . 25 . . . fearful birds. The fame . . . land of the crucifixion . . . Persia, from Mesene . . . and Ctesiphon, in the land of (Ozeos and) Babylon in every city.

How many (. . . The) maidens and the continent 30 went away from them every year . . . They caught and killed the . . . sheep. They seized the bishops . . . his treasuries, they . . . 35 . . . slaughtered them like . . . 77 They revealed . . . small . . . before their teachers . . . lions. The lions spared (them . . .) They put armour on some (and made them go into competition) 5 with she-bears / lionesses; some . . . They set free mares . . . them, they gave eight . . . they (did not) spare them but killed them . . . they brought him and rolled (him . . .)

10 Some of them . . . Fire was thrust in their (faces in order to know) whether they had been well (and truly) killed, like . . . tore them, they also tore them . . . observed them sitting. Then . . . 15 them in their iniquity, they . . . questioned them about everything . . . crucified the youths, [118] The persecuting Persian king would now have been Vahram II (r. 276–93). See below Hom. 81.9–10 (in 20).

the children (and . . .) eunuchs. They sawed up some . . . them boasting (that . . . [20] . . .)

How numerous were the . . . deeds . . . them that they would (?) lie . . . like a herd . . . chains every year (. . . like) a beast without a (master . . . [25] . . . in) hundreds and fifties . . . in every land (. . . they) slaughtered a child in (front) of them . . . [30] . . . their possessions. The catechumens . . . 78 . . . they whipped (?) . . . some of them they dragged . . . Some furthermore . . . chains, to throw them into (prisons [5] in a (state of) hunger) and thirst, while they were fasting . . . in the cold with tribulations . . . with their feet on the ground (. . . thorns) and spikes and (. . . since) they were hidden without the sun . . . [10] . . .

They envied (the) just ones (. . . they broke) its watch-towers; they cut (?) a . . . walls on every side of it. They went . . . its doors. They opened its gates . . . they did (not have (?)) a youth. They were also . . . [15] . . . powerfully. They plucked . . . they scattered about the possessions of his . . . the ship to wreck it and make it sink into the abyss . . . to lead . . . astray . . . hero . . . [20] . . . (its) foundation and its root . . . sweet . . . guile because they were disturbed inside (. . . justice), she / it recoiled . . . [25] . . . he saved her (?) . . . She related this (cause for?) weeping to him . . . her groan . . . hunger and thirst . . . [30] . . .

20. The prayer and martyrdom of Sisinnios (Mar Sisin)

Sisinnios was the immediate successor to Mani and he was leader (archegos) of the community for about ten years (c. 276-c. 286, cf. Hom. 83.13, below). On his name see Tubach (1997) 388–9. This account is preserved in Hom. 79.1–85.34 (trans. Clackson). Another prayer attributed to the imprisoned Sisinnios is preserved in the Chinese Manichaean Hymnscroll (§§83–119), trans. Tsui Chi (1943) 183–6. The two prayers bear very little resemblance to each other; and it is interesting to note that the bodily suffering resulting from persecution by secular authorities, which is so prominent and cogent in the Coptic version, had been spiritualised in the Chinese version into the eternal battle between spirit and body and between permanence and impermanence.

After the martyrdom of Sisinnios the text records a temporary truce between Narses and the Manichaean church under Innaios.

79 'Spare my children. Send me (your power to help me) in this danger . . . every year from my enemies . . . [5] . . . perish . . . in your name, your glory in . . . from the day you chose me . . . great diadem, you put into my hand . . . the sects and all the races . . . [10] of your light. I did not lie to your . . . I did not falsify your oath (. . . which you) gave me, I watch over them.'

'Now . . . vanity and you see my tears (. . . this is) the way in which I strengthened myself while I was in . . . [15] It is your hour / (you) are a god, do not renounce (me . . .) trap (?). My enemies . . . listen to the voice of this widow . . . the judge because I was judged in . . . , my children (were killed) in every (land . . . [20] . . .) loaded with possessions and your . . . The sea was disturbed by the . . . wave upon wave. I am (your . . . , your) gardeners (are) in me. I am your (. . . I) am your seed, while your husbandmen (. . . [25] . . .), your children are by (me . . . spare) me and pity me and send (me . . .) because I see the grief of my children (. . . kill them (?)) and they slay (my . . .) they burn my householders with fire . . . [30] . . . of truth (?) . . .'

'They came down . . . (with them) wishing to uproot them . . . their land and their kingdom . . . [35] . . . mystery . . . 80 . . . the hand (of) my enemies. They became / were . . . with my possessions, the libations . . . the congregations of my divinity . . . and abominations [5] (. . . view) the . . . year. I see my children (thrown down . . .), the bodies of the . . . lying (. . . in every) land. The head of the strangers and the . . . form of the ones who grieve and the [10] . . . and races. The dogs which . . . the wicked dragons. They have torn . . . their blood flowed out onto the earth . . . in every city. They mock . . . Their kin put me to shame [15] . . . indeed your (fem. sing.) god is the light . . . his is the wisdom. You (fem. sing.) indeed, why . . . , then why are they slain? . . . I however look at you (masc. sing.) . . .'

'The (kings) persecuted me [20] (. . . rulers), they did not leave me lacking . . . the inner ones furthermore, I did not make (obeisance (?)) to them . . . they made me see them with my (own) eyes . . . over me. They scattered . . . they sealed the doors . . . [25] . . . they threw me out from my dwelling-places . . . to my place. They revealed . . . They took away my beauty . . . song. They took me in . . . from the light of the sun, as if . . . [30] . . . stealthily. They killed the wise ones . . . pure (ones). They slaughtered my children (. . . my presbyters) and my faithful ones. They . . . the ones who were sitting . . . my wisdom . . . [35] . . . ' 81 . . . while she was crying (?) out . . . '. . . you observe . . . how many are . . . O my father . . . [5] send your power to support . . . the ones who were crucified . . . resting-place(s). Receive the (souls of the catechumens) who were destroyed . . .'

(It was in) the years of (King) Vahram, (the son of) [10] Vahram that these things happened; but he (and the) entire (congregation of Magi) and the deniers . . . of the good and the peace-givers (. . . crucifixion) of our lord.

Then, (after these great tribulations) and dangers, while . . . in this manner. From the outside indeed . . . but (from the inside) he bore the . . . his righteousness . . . which he had preached about that . . . crucified him. The world (was filled with his) glory. It reached the ears of the kings of . . . that time in anger . . . justice. They went . . . with the deniers, the ones who had . . . They wrote petitions (libelli) (. . . They showed) them to the king, full of (iniquity . . . the) strength of the Magi . . . refused his hope . . . the king and the nobles . . . and peacefulness. These ones with these (other . . .) each other, badness . . . a great evil befell . . . their anger . . . his faithful ones . . . 82 in the presence of . . . justice . . . They proclaimed . . .

He was taken into the presence of the king. He questioned him about everything . . . (asked) him about every matter. My lord (Sisinnios . . .) well. He persuaded . . . in his place; but the king hurt him (. . . desire), saying to him that . . . he compelled him '. . . listen to me, fear (?) . . . but if you listen to me I shall . . . you. You are a beautiful man. Why do you . . . yourself? Why are you going to strangle yourself . . . yourself so that I will not destroy you. Spare yourself (or (?)) I (will) kill you.'

Then he said to the king: '. . . your words and your deeds . . .' his heart . . . strong, it did not stir within him at (all . . .) he fetched some swords and he set them in order . . . The king said to him: 'Look and (see (?) . . . . .) my word.' However, my lord Sisinnios . . . : 'I have one more dreadful than you . . . I fear the one who . . . your word.' Then the king became angry (. . . 'Who) is it you fear more than me?' (Sisinnios said: '. . .) God. My heart is fearful . . .'

Then once, twice, three times (the king . . .) him, (but) he was not persuaded. He took (up) a sword . . . him, saying: 'I shall kill you now.' . . . the cross, in the manner of his . . . from the king. He did not flinch . . . time, the number of others . . . he was not afraid . . . He gave power . . . 83 rest above . . . lordship . . . his shoes; he stripped . . . his own hair. He . . . the king raised his hand and struck (lit. "put") him with the (sword . . .) blood flowed out like a . . . three presbyters . . . Apket and Abesira, the brothers . . . his crucifixion took place . . . the city. He was crucified . . . at the ninth hour of the day, on day one . . . . . hours. He went . . .

In the ten years (he had been leader), his heart had not (influenced (lit. "bent") him) at all. (He drank from) the cup of the crucifixion of his (father . . .) after him. He received the garland of the (. . . walked) on the road of his saviour . . . peace. He rested himself . . . he found recompense for his suffering . . . . . and the other brothers who were crucified, (they) bequeathed his word to Innaios . . . that the leader of the sect (. . . listened) to the prayer of the just (. . . entreaty (?)) and weeping of those who called (up . . .)

25 Then after this murderous act of (crucifixion . . .) all of them. Then it came (down . . .) reached his children in their tribulation (. . . a danger) overtook . . . the king who was suffering greatly indeed like all the (officials) 30 and physicians also . . . the one who had come upon him, the ones of his law . . . , with them wishing (to) cure him. They could (?) not . . . at that time . . . departed in 35 . . . 84 . . . gentle . . . he put it in his heart.

. . . into the presence of the king . . . truthful . . . He perceived 5 . . . cure, in short a reason . . . God, the one who helped (him . . .) oaths: 'I shall . . . cure, you with your (whole) heart (. . . benefit) and good of your sect 10 . . . I killed your children and you (fear me and) do not cure me. It was not I who was pleased (but these) evil (men) who accused (them . . .) and what is in you, tell it . . . Do not be afraid. All these things have (passed by) 15 . . . from today.'

Then he cured him . . . god(s), he was glorified. The gods and (. . . helped) him. He received letters (from . . .) in every land.[119] He . . . before the face of the whole world . . . 20 . . . hand(s), with them bringing them to the (table . . .) so that he should sit next to him . . . he gave him gold and silver; he did not take . . . so that he should receive authority from the . . . God and his hope only. He 25 . . . before the king[120] and the nobles . . . they honoured him. More and more . . . He received victory and (favour . . .) his sect. Glory (. . . the) honoured and the despised (. . . 30 . . . the elect) and the catechumens . . . God. Justice . . . It (i.e. the church (?)) attained great glory . . . they built and set in order their (?) . . . from the places 35 . . . (85) in every place. They wrote (letters . . .) nobles . . . every river . . . in the palace of the (king . . .)

Peace descended upon . . . 5 . . . (up)on justice. They made (friends . . .) with the chiefs and the (leaders . . .) before the good. (Then) (in) the three (years of . . .) Vahram the king these things took place[121] . . . in peace at that time . . . 10 to it (i.e. the church (?)), it was greatly glorified. Then (after this, he) went up to Belapat and died. (He went to rest) at that time, from . . . is [119] The Manichaean Historical Text (p15997) found at Medinet Madi, of which only a handful of leaves have survived the aftermath of the Second World War, tells us that Amarō the King of the Arabs at Hira (an important ally of the Sassanians) interceded on behalf of the community; and this brought about an audience between Vahram's successor Narses (r. 293–302) and Innaios. Cf. Pedersen (1997) and Schmidt, Ibscher and Polotsky (1933), 29. A translation of part of this text can be found below, in 22b.

[120] The king in question is most likely to be Narses.

[121] I.e. the martyrdom of Mani which took place in 276.

blessed . . . and the word of the apostle . . . [15] . . . what he had proclaimed, (namely) that they . . . and (were) drawn from the world (. . . and they) crossed over and passed away.

The church . . . in all its places. Many . . . a change in their body (. . . the [20] church) sees them and . . . ; it is established and lasting . . . They wished (to) do (evil . . .) It is the stumbling-block (lit. "stone") (. . . of) all worlds. It is the . . . [25] all . . . It will not move until the day of . . . with its members who will rule in the (. . . Woe to) the one who shall strike it and not (repent, nor worship) it. Blessed are its . . . and its faithful ones and (every one . . . [30] . . .) because this is the one who shall find (life eternal). Amen.

The (part) about the crucifixion of (the enlightener), [35] the (true) apostle, is finished.

CHAPTER 3

Manichaeism in the Roman Empire

The religion of Mani was founded on clear universalist principles. His travels to Upper Mesopotamia, Iran and India would have brought him in contact with Christianity, Zoroastrianism and Buddhism; and what struck him most about these established earlier religions was their apparent cultural and geographical boundaries. In a Middle Persian fragment which is probably derived from the semi-canonical Šābuhragān (a summary of his religion which he had translated into Middle Persian for the reigning Shahanshah Shapur I), Mani tells one of his disciples that the most important proof of the truth of his new revelation is its success as a universalist religion which would transcend geographical and national barriers:

{Header:} The ascension . . .
{R} . . . till the end (in the w)orld is established?' And (the lord (?) replied) to him: 'This religion which was chosen by me is in ten things above and better than the other religions of the ancients. Firstly: The older religions were in one country and one language; but my religion is of the kind that it will be manifest in every country and in all languages, and it will be taught in far away countries.

Secondly: The older religions (remained in order) as long as there were holy leaders in it; but when the leaders had been led upwards, then their religions became confused and they became slack in commandments and pious works, and by {V} greed and fire (of lust) and desire were deceived. However, my religion will remain firm through the living (. . . tea)chers, the bishops, the elect and the hearers; and of wisdom and works will stay on until the end.

Thirdly: Those former souls by whom in their own good action was not completed, come to my religion and it verily is to them the gate of salvation.

Fourthly: This revelation (of mine) of the two principles and my living books, my wisdom and knowledge are above and better than those of the previous religions.

Fifthly: All writings, all wisdom and all parables of the previous religions when they to this (religion of mine came . . .)'[1]

[1] M5794 I + M5761, MM II, 295–96 + KG 2205–07 + 2210–12; trans. S. Lieu, with reference to the earlier translation by Asmussen which is based solely on M5794 I. For the parallel tradition preserved in the Kephalaia, see 91.

The source of this missionary zeal might have been the success of the followers of Marcion in disseminating his teaching in Asia Minor, Mesopotamia, Syria, North Africa and Rome in the Second Century AD. For Mani the fact that the Sassanian Empire was positioned between the Empires of Rome, Kushan and China, and was itself culturally heterogeneous, would have undoubtedly given the young Mani a highly cosmopolitan vision for his missionary enterprises. The recent military successes of the Sassanians against the Romans in the frontier regions would have certainly opened up new possibilities for commerce between the two empires and the Manichaean missionaries were the first to exploit them. We are fortunate that the community maintained a strong historiographical tradition throughout its history. Among the codices from Medinet Madi was a historical work but sadly it was lost after the Second World War and only a few odd leaves have survived (see below). However, a considerable number of historical texts have been identified among the fragments from Turfan, and these in the usual hagiographical style associated with such texts inform us of Manichaean missionary activities in the Roman Empire as well as in Central Asia.

Once the community had established itself in Egypt and Syria, further penetration into the western half of the Empire was merely a matter of time. Manichaean texts were translated from Mani's original Syriac into both Greek and Coptic, and later into Latin, and their missionaries were well known for the care they lavished on the production and preservation of their scriptures. These, along with members of the elect, also became targets of legislations against the sect from Diocletian onwards (303). The religious peace declared by Constantine and Licinius in the Edict (or Rescript) of Milan in 313, however, enabled the sect to pass itself off both as a form of reformed Christianity and of enlightened paganism. Soon Manichaeism was well established in the Nile Valley, especially at Lycopolis, and it might have been from Lycopolis that members of the sect migrated to the Dakhleh Oasis to avoid persecution. It had a strong base in Antioch, where among those who advocated tolerance towards it was the city's famous rhetor Libanius, and its presence was also noted in Greece. The history of the sect in North Africa, especially in Carthage, Thagaste, Hippo and Malliana is well documented by Augustine, who spent nine years as a hearer while he was a student and later teacher of rhetoric at Carthage. It was with Manichaeans that he sojourned in Rome, and it was through their net-working and influence that he was appointed to the Chair of Rhetoric in Milan. Later as a deacon and bishop at Hippo he debated with the Manichaean missionaries Fortunatus and Felix; and also wrote a lengthy refutation of the Apologia of Faustus of Milevis, the most influential Manichaean preacher of his time.

With the accession of Theodosius, anti-heretical legislations eventually put serious restrictions on the mobility of the sect; even though these were first ignored. By the time of Anastasius and Justinian, the sect was generally proscribed with the threat of the death penalty for its elect. Its followers were also deprived of the right to serve in the civil administration and forbidden to write an effective will. The latter measure would have been disastrous for a sect in which the elect members relied heavily on the monetary and other forms of contribution by their faithful hearers. Little genuine information on the teaching of the sect survived the reign of Justinian which implies that the community had lost almost all its scriptures, and with them its original identity as a religion of the book par excellence.

EARLY MISSION AND REACTION

21. The mission of Mār Addā and Pattek the teacher

The mission to the eastern Roman Empire was instituted by Mani himself, during his life-time, as evidenced by these Manichaean missionary text-fragments preserved in Middle Iranian.[2]

(a) From the Middle Persian version:[3]

'. . . become familiar with the writings!' They went to the Roman Empire (and) saw many doctrinal disputes with the religions. Many elect and hearers were chosen. Patīg was there for one year. (Then) he returned (and appeared) before the apostle. Hereafter the lord sent three scribes, the Gospel and two other writings to Addā. He gave the order: 'Do not take it further, but stay there like a merchant who collects a treasure.' Addā laboured very hard in these areas, founded many monasteries, chose many elect and hearers, composed writings and made wisdom his weapon. He opposed the "dogmas" with these (writings), (and) in everything he acquitted himself well. He subdued and enchained the dogmas. He came as far as Alexandria. He chose Nafšā for the religion. Many wonders and miracles were wrought in those lands. The religion of the apostle was advanced in the Roman Empire.

[2] On the various versions of Manichaean missionary history in Middle Iranian which pertain to the mission of Mār Addā to the Roman Empire see esp. Sundermann (1986), 246–50. Though the texts, as we possess them, are the works of Manichaean scribes in Central Asia in the ninth to tenth centuries AD, they contain material which almost certainly goes back to early accounts of Manichaean mission composed in Syriac or Parthian.

[3] M2 I R I 1–33, MM II, 301–2; Eng. trans. Asmussen (1975), 21. The manuscript fragment also includes an account of Mār Ammo's mission to Parthia and Central Asia.

(b) From the Parthian version:[4]
And when the apostle (i.e. Mani) was (in) Vēh-Ardashīr (i.e. the refounded Seleucia), he sent from there (Patīg) the teacher, Addā the bishop, (and M)ani the scribe to Rome. (And) four instructions . . . to . . . there . . . from (. . . who) gathers (a treasure. And Addā founded) many mon(asteries (m'nyst'n) and he composed . . .) and writings of light. (And) he grasped (?) (wisdom for) the refutation of the dogmas. He devised many (ways) and fashioned them (as weapon) against all the dogmas. And he defeated the teachings and put them all to shame like someone who (wielded) a powerful weapon.

(c) From the Sogdian version:[5]
'. . . Which riding-animal is faster than the wind?' Mār Addā gave as answer to them: 'I have good thought . . . conscience, whose (way of life (?) . . .) is faster (than the wind). And I have (a religion (?)) the radiance of which is (brighter) than the sun. And I have (as) provisions divine profit (?) I have (divine (?)) the taste of which is (sweeter) (than) honey.' The ministers (?) then asked Mār Addā: 'O lord, (what) form does the soul take?' Mār Addā ans(wered)them thus: 'The soul is comparable to the body, which is divided (into five) limbs, (a head), two (arms) and two feet. The soul too (is) just like that: (life) is seen as the (first) limb of the soul, power (is counted as) the second limb, light is counted (as the third (limb), beauty) is counted as the (fourth) (limb) and fragrance is counted as the fifth (limb). And its form and manner are an image (of the body) (?), just as (Jesus (?)) has said: 'It cannot be seen with a fleshly eye, the fleshly ear does not hear <it>, it cannot be held with a fleshly hand nor with a (flesh)ly tongue can it be completely explained.' And (Mār Ad)dā (expended) there in the Roman Empire much effort. (He purified many hearers . . . and in large . . . the west(ern . . .) and many scriptures . . . and . . . wrote . . . struggle . . . and (the) divine (profit) arose upwards through him (and) (spread) in all the Roman lands and cities right up to the (gr)eat Alexandria.

22. The healing of Nafšā of Tadmor (Palmyra) by Mār Addā

So 18223 (= T.M. 389c) + So 18222 (T.M. 389c) KG §3.3 (441–515), pp. 41–5, Sogdian text from Turfan trans. S. Lieu.

[4] M216c R 8 – V 13, KG , §2.5 (170–87), p. 26, trans. S. Lieu.
[5] So. 18220 (= T.M. 389*α*), KG §3.2 (360–95), pp. 36–41, trans. S. Lieu.

. . . Nafšā herself (pleaded) with (Jesus): ('Hel)p (?) me, beneficent God! . . . for this reason, because in your . . . in the midst of the followers of <foreign> religions and . . . ' (. . . the lord Man)i (?), the apostle openly descended into the presence of Nafšā and he laid his hand upon <her>, and straight away Nafšā was healed, and she became wholly without pain. Everyone was astonished at this great miracle. And <there were> many people, who accepted the truth anew. Also Queen Taδī, the sister of Nafšā, wife of the emperor (kysr) with great . . . came before Mār Addā and from him . . . received the truth. And Mār Addā up to . . . went. And (when (?)) he arrived, the people (who) were devoted (to the veneration of the demons (?)) said: 'We shall (a)llow you because (. . . te)mple where . . .' And in the night the voice and . . . as had been said by them, and . . . stood totally amazed because . . . the walls of the houses of idols in . . . was, so that an exit could be found (?) immediately . . . And the door was sealed with the emperor's seal and there was no house in the vicinity. Without delay Mār Addā stood in supplication and prayer there, and he said to the apostle: 'I would like to obtain the explanation of this information'. And immediately it was revealed and the apostle came and explained to him, that there are twelve classes of men who never speak to one another. And for each individual man (of) . . . channels (?) are dug from . . . , right up (to . . .) where the idols sit . . . are twelve men who . . . eat, make music (. . . the channels (?)) hold the moisture (?). 'And go (. . . to the) Caesar and to him the secret . . . holy (. . .) (. . . wr)ite (having perverted religion (?)) <and> having little understanding in . . . behaviour . . . And no one should be disobedient, following his own desire and will, so that his effort and trouble should not be without reward.' And at the end he gave them all the commandments, morals and habits, laws and rules, conduct and behaviour, fully and completely by numbers <viz.>: Five commandments (in ten) divisions; three seals in six divisions; five (garments in) (ten) divisions; watchfulness and zeal . . . ; (twelve) dominions in sixty-two divisions; . . . each in five each . . . each one in seven (. . . expo)sitions; seven hymns . . . and five expositions (. . . each) one in seven prohibitions and (seven (?) c)(onfessions, each) one in . . . (they are. And) for that reason they are called believing hearers, and they participate in the religion, and their commandment is manifest. And these, now, who are hearers and remain mixed (?) in earthly things, immature saplings (?) they are and children who drink milk, and their food is the milk of the spirit. For them too a commandment and order (are) manifest in the church, because they themselves are (in) the c(hurch) and from the living soul . . . Holy Ghost, who in . . . they worship, and also . . . are of the glory of the religion who . . . is. And by divine (grace (?)) they (the "perfect" hearers (?)) are counted (amongst the full-grown) trees . . . and the command is thus . . .[6]

The success of the Manichaean mission to Tadmor, and its important role in the westward spread of the religion, is also implied in the following text (Coptic).[7] Although, most unfortunately, the preservation is very poor, it appears to claim the Queen of Tadmor (Zenobia?) and King Amarō of the Lakhmids as patrons of the religion.

. . . of Persia make peace and they were re(conciled (?)) . . . the river and . . . those neighbourhoods, . . . the merchants in the land of Khūzistan (. . . 15 every) place, and they lived with them in their province . . . they are full of our knowledge and our faith . . . of that place in . . . the teacher Abiēs, . . . before Malōp, the son of Adbkh(. . . 20 . . .) and Abakarim, and he spoke with (. . . go) also in to Queen Thadamōr . . . rightly, and the teacher Abiēs, . . . that . . . and other brethren, and they made a great . . . church of that place . . . 25 . . . the teacher . . . sent the servant Sethel . . . Zakhias to Abira of the watch tower, and they . . . a church of that place . . . the matter came before King Amarō[8] (. . . Aba)karim, therefore the brethren were caused to go . . . 30 . . . a cause of healing, and they caused him to become friends with (us . . .) good in him, and he helped us very . . . for us, and he became a great patron for (us . . .) his patronage and his . . . appear . . .

23. A warning against Manichaean missionaries

This is the text of a pastoral letter written by an Egyptian Christian bishop in the late third century.[9]

12Again the Manichaeans speak (falsely against marriage saying that) he does well (who does not) marry. (Paul) says (1 Cor. 7:1ff.) that the man who does not marry (does better); but that adulterer and forni(cator 15 are evil is manifest from the) holy scriptures, from which we learn (that marriage is honoured by God, but that he abominates forni)cators and adulterers (Hebr. 13:4). Whereby it is manifest (that he condemns) them also that worship the creation (Rom. 1:25) who (. . . have committed adultery) with [6] On this story see also the newly combined Sogdian fragment (Berlin Ch/U 20505 and Ch/So 20216 cf. KG §19 (2049–59), p. 123 + Kyoto Otani 7481 and 7251) published by Yoshida (2000), 81 which appears to compare Buddhist mendicants unfavourably with Manichaean Elect.

[7] P15997 R (= MCPCBL II, pl. 99), lines 10–34, ed. and trans. Pedersen (1997), 196 (adapted). See also Tardieu (1992), 16–17.

[8] The Lakhmids of Hira were traditionally friendly to the Sassanians and were their main desert allies in Romano-Persian conflicts.

[9] P. Rylands Greek 469.12–42, ed. and trans. Roberts (1938), 42–3.

sticks and stones (Jer. 3:9). Not but what God commands us (to chastise the man that does) evil, in these words: [20] (If there be found man or woman) in one of the cities which the lord your God gives you (Deut. 17:2–3) that has wrought wickedness in the sight of the lord your God and has worshipped (the sun or any of the host of heaven), it is an abomination unto the lord your God. Every one that does (these things is an abomination unto the lord) your God (Deut. 7:25; 17:1 and 18:12).

And the Manichaeans manifestly wor(ship the creation (? and that which they say)) in their psalms is an abomination to the lord (. . . (saying) 'Neither) [25] have I cast it (sc. the bread) into the oven: another has brought me this and I have eaten it without guilt.' Whence we can easily conclude that the Manichaeans are filled with such madness; especially since this "apology to the bread" is the work of a man filled with much madness.

As I said before, I have cited this in brief from [30] the document of the madness of the Manichaeans that fell into my hands, that we may be on our guard against these who with deceitful and lying words steal into our houses, and particularly against those women whom they call "elect" and whom they hold in honour, manifestly because they require their menstrual blood for the abominations of their madness.

[35] We speak what we would not, seeking not our own profit, but the profit of many that they may be saved. May therefore our God, the all good and the all holy, grant that you may abstain from all appearance of evil and that your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless [40] in the presence of our lord Jesus Christ. Greet one another with a holy kiss. The brethren with me greet you. I pray that you may be well in the lord, beloved, cleansing yourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit.

24. Alexander of Lycopolis on the Manichaean mission in Egypt

Alexander was a Neo-Platonist, whose contemporary account of the Manichaean mission,[10] and its successes amongst his philosophically minded colleagues, provides a fascinating counter-point to the more usual themes of Christian polemic.

(I) (p. 3) The philosophy of the Christians is a simple one. In fact it devotes most of its attention to moral education, but remains allusive when it is a question of entering into more precise arguments relating to the divinity. Furthermore, the essence of their efforts concerning this subject matter cannot but meet with general approval, when they suggest that the generating cause is the most venerable, the most ancient and the reason for the existence of all things. In morality, also, they leave aside the most difficult questions, for example: what is moral virtue and what is intellectual virtue, also everything concerning attitudes and affections, in order to devote most of their time to commonplace moral exhortation; and, neglecting to put forward the elementary principles which govern the acquisition of each virtue, they haphazardly amass somewhat simplistic principles. The masses who listen to them make, as can be seen from experience, great progress in moderation, and their actions are stamped with a distinctive mark of piety; it rekindles the moral sense which such customs strengthen, and leads it progressively towards a desire for the good.

[10] ed. Brinkmann (1895) §1–11, pp. 3–4; Eng. trans. S. Vince and S. Lieu.

This philosophy being divided into several factions, impelled by those who came subsequently, the questions have multiplied, just as in sophistry:[11] some of these men have also become more skilful (p. 4) and, so to speak, more expert than the others in the art of raising difficulties. Certain of them were even founders of sects, this resulted in the decline of a moral teaching which had become unreliable. For, on the one hand, none of them who were ambitious to lead sects were in a position to give discourses of the requisite precision; whereas the masses demonstrated above all their inclination to indulge in confrontations with rival factions. There were no rules, nor any law which would have permitted a solution to these difficulties to be found; and, as with everywhere else, there is nothing that is not spoiled by an excessive desire for celebration. (II) Here also, the efforts of each person to out-do his predecessor through the novelty of his ideas meant that, in their hands, this very simple philosophy became something inextricable.

An example is given by the man known as Mani: He was of the Persian race, and, to my mind at least, he surpasses all his rivals in the extravagance of his proposals. His strange new ideas came to light very recently. The first person to interpret the doctrines of this man was named Papos; after him came Thomas, and others still after these two. As for Mani himself, it is said that he lived in Valerian's time, that he accompanied the Persian King Shapur in his campaigns, and that he was put to death for having offended this prince in some way.

25. Edict (rescript) of Diocletian against the sect (AD 302)

This edict (in Latin)[12] was written in response to a petition from (Flavius?) Julianus, Proconsul of Africa. However, there is also intriguing evidence of the arrival of a [11] Lit. 'the eristic school'.

[12] Collatio Mosaicarum XV.3, ed. and trans. Hyamson (1913), 131–3, revised by S. Lieu.

Manichaean missionary Bundos at Rome during the reign of Diocletian; this according to the much later Greek historian Malalas:[13]

> During his (sc. Diocletian's) reign a certain Manichaean by the name of Bundos appeared in the city of Rome. He broke away from the teaching of the Manichaeans and put forward his own doctrine. He taught that the good God engaged in battle with the evil (one) and triumphed over him. One should therefore honour the victor. He returned to teach in Persia. The doctrine of the Manichaeans was called that of the Daristhenes by the Persians, which in their own language means that of the good (God).

The work of Ioannes Malalas was published sometime after 574. The material contained in this enigmatic passage is completely uncorroborated by other sources, and seems to contain references to the sect of the Mazdakites which caused a social revolt in Sassanian Persia in the early sixth century. However, a date for the arrival of Manichaeism in the capital city of the Roman Empire under Diocletian is entirely plausible.

The Emperors Diocletian and Maximianus (and Constantius) and Maximianus (i.e. Galerius) to Julianus, Proconsul of Africa. Well-beloved Julianus:

(1) Excessive leisure sometimes incites ill-conditioned people to transgress the limits of nature, and persuades them to introduce empty and scandalous kinds of superstitious doctrine, so that many others are lured on to acknowledge the authority of their erroneous notions.

(2) However, the immortal gods, in their providence, have thought fit to ordain that the principles of virtue and truth should, by the counsel and deliberations of many good, great and wise men, be approved and established in their integrity. These principles it is not right to oppose or resist, nor ought the ancient religion be subjected to the censure of a new creed. It is indeed highly criminal to discuss doctrines once and for all settled and defined by our forefathers, and which have their recognised place and course in our system.

(3) Wherefore we are resolutely determined to punish the stubborn depravity of these worthless people.

(4) As regards the Manichaeans, concerning whom your carefulness has reported to our serenity, who, in opposition to the older creeds, set up new and unheard-of sects, purposing in their wickedness to cast out the doctrines vouchsafed to us by divine favour in olden times, we have heard that they have but recently advanced or sprung forth, like strange and monstrous portents, from their native homes among the Persians – a nation hostile to us – and have settled in this part of the world, where they are perpetrating many evil deeds, disturbing the tranquillity of the peoples and causing the gravest injuries to the civic communities; and there is danger that, in process of time, they will endeavour, as is their usual practice, to infect the innocent, orderly and tranquil Roman people, as well as the whole of our empire, with the damnable customs and perverse laws of the Persians as with the poison of a malignant serpent.

[13] Chronographia XII, ed. L. Dindorf, CSHB (Bonn, 1831), 309.19–310.2; trans. S. Lieu. On this passage see esp. Christensen (1925), 97–9.

(5) And since all that your prudence has set out in detail in your report of their religion shows that what our laws regard as their misdeeds are clearly the offspring of a fantastic and lying imagination, we have appointed pains and punishments due and fitting for these people.

(6) We order that the authors and leaders of these sects be subjected to severe punishment, and, together with their abominable writings, burnt in the flames. We direct that their followers, if they continue recalcitrant, shall suffer capital punishment, and their goods be forfeited to the imperial treasury.

(7) And if those who have gone over to that hitherto unheard-of, scandalous and wholly infamous creed, or to that of the Persians, are persons who hold public office, or are of any rank or of superior social status, you will see to it that their estates are confiscated and the offenders sent to the (quarry) at Phaeno or the mines at Proconnesus.

(8) And in order that this plague of iniquity shall be completely extirpated from this our most happy age, let your devotion hasten to carry out our orders and commands.

Given at Alexandria, 31 March.

The edict of Diocletian may be compared with the first such one issued by Christian emperors (AD 372, Latin):[14]

Emperors Valentinian and Valens Augusti to Ampelius, urban prefect.

Wherever an assembly[15] of Manichaeans or a crowd of this kind is found, after their teachers have been penalised by a severe punishment and also those persons who assemble have been segregated from the company of men as infamous and ignominious, their houses and habitations, in which the profane instruction is taught, should be appropriated undoubtedly to the fisc's resources.

Given on 2 March at Trier, Modestus and Arinthaeus being consuls.

[14] CT XVI.5.3, p. 855; Eng. trans. Coleman-Norton (1966), I, 333.

[15] The law targets the meeting-places of the sect where the authorities feared illicit and magical rites were celebrated. On this see especially Kaden (1953), 58.

26. Warning against door-to-door missions by the Manichaeans

The setting is Rome in the 370s; the source: an anonymous commentator on the Pauline Epistles (Latin).[16]

Although this would fit all heretics, as they (all) inveigle themselves into houses and charm women with persuasive and crafty words so that through them they might deceive the men in the fashion of the devil their father who defrauds Adam through Eve, it matches the Manichaeans above all others. None are so ruthless, so deceitful, so enticing as those whose practice it is to cultivate one idea and declare another, say one thing in private and another in public. Although they uphold saintly living, they lead a life of gross immorality with the support of their own rule. Although they praise compassion, they are found to be harsh towards each other. They preach that the world is to be despised while taking care of their personal advancement. They boastfully vaunt that they are strict in their fasting though they are all well weighed down, because it is only by some trickery that they appear pale so that they may deceive (other people).

The apostle had prophesied this especially about them who, as is well known, were not then in existence; just as neither were the Arians. The Emperor Diocletian makes this quite sure by his edict, in which he says: 'This impure and sordid heresy which has recently arrived from Persia . . . ' They seek out women, who always want to hear something for sheer novelty, and persuade them through what they like to hear to do foul and illicit things. For the women are desirous to learn, though they do not possess the power of discrimination. This is what is meant by, 'always willing to listen but not having the knowledge of the truth' (2 Tim. 3:7).

MANICHAEANS AND CHRISTIAN ASCETICS IN EGYPT

27. Manichaeans out-argued by Didymus the Blind

The attitude of Didymus the Blind in this text (c. AD 350, Greek)[17] may be compared with the guarded courtesy of St Anthony, at least as presented by Athanasius (c. AD 340, Greek):[18]

> Anthony's devotion to the faith was most extraordinary. He never held communion with the Meletian schimatics, because he knew their wicked apostasy from [16] 'Ambrosiaster', in ep. ad Tim. ii, 3.6–7, 2, ed. A. Souter, CSEL LXXXI/3, 312.4–20; trans. S. Lieu.

[17] Didymus Alexandrinus, Expositio in Ecclesiastes 9.9a, ed. Grünewald (1979), 274.18–275.2.8–10; trans. S. Lieu.
[18] Athanasius, Vita Antonii 68, PG 26.940B; Eng. trans. Keenan (1952) 195–96.

> the beginning; nor did he have friendly dealings with the Manichaeans or any other heretics, except in so far as to admonish them to be converted to piety, for he believed and maintained that friendship and association with them was harmful and destructive to the soul.

And once I (i.e. Didymus the Blind) also said this to the Manichaeans: 'Look, how great this chastity is! He runs no risk of a punishment if he comes together with his wife at the right time; it will bring him no reproach, for it is not counted as offending against the law. As he himself however has gone beyond this law and has yielded himself up to another law intended for angels, that is why he refrains from it as from something which is not fitting for him.'

Like a sophist (the Manichaean) questioned me (by way of a) premise; he said to me: 'What is the will of Jesus?' He wanted me to say, for example: 'Not to marry'; so that he himself could then quote the ancient fathers in the case. He says: 'What is the will of Jesus?' I say: 'That one should do the works of Abraham and believe in Moses.' Instantly, his sophism was dissolved . . . said the word and says to me: 'You have brought together the fist-fighter and the tragedian.' (I say) to him: 'I have not brought the fist-fighter together with the tragedian nor the tragedian with the fist-fighter; but I have put the tragedian with the tragedian and the fist-fighter with the fist-fighter, for I make every effort to be a fair adjudicator.'

28. A travelling Manichaean converted by true 'hospitality'

c. AD 380, Latin.[19]

An old man in Egypt lived in a desert place. And far away lived a Manichaean who was a priest, at least was one of those whom Manichaeans call priests. While the Manichaean was on a journey to visit another of that erroneous sect, he was caught by nightfall in the place where lived this orthodox and holy man. He wanted to knock and go in and ask for shelter; but was afraid to do so, for he knew that he would be refused hospitality. Still, driven by his plight, he put the thought aside, and knocked.

The old man opened the door and recognised him; and he welcomed him joyfully, made him pray with him, gave him supper and a bed. The Manichaean lay thinking in the night, and marvelling: 'Why was he not hostile to me? He is a true servant of God.' And at break of day he rose, and fell at his feet, saying: 'Henceforth I am orthodox, and shall not leave you.' And so he stayed with him.

[19] Verba Seniorum XIII.II, PL 73.945; Eng. trans. Chadwick (1958), 146–7.

29. A Manichaean missionary challenged to trial by fire

The setting is Hermopolis (c. AD 390, Greek).[20]

On one occasion I (i.e. Copres, a holy man) went down to the city (Hermopolis Magna), and there I found a certain Manichaean who had been leading the people astray. As I was unable to make him change his mind by debating with him in public, turning to the crowd of listeners I said: 'Light a large fire in the square and both of us shall enter the flames; and whichever one of us remains unhurt, he shall be the one with the true faith.' At this the crowd eagerly lit the fire and dragged us towards the flames. However, the Manichaean said: 'Let each of us go in by himself, and you should be the first one since you suggested it.' Then, having made upon myself the sign of the cross in the name of Christ, I went into the fire. The flames parted asunder this way and that and did not harm me for the half hour which I spent in the fire. At the sight of this miracle, the crowd made a loud acclamation and compelled the Manichaean to go into the fire; but he dragged his feet as he was frightened, and the crowd took hold of him and pushed him into the middle of the fire. He suffered serious burns all over his body and the crowd expelled him from the city in disgrace,[21] shouting: 'The deceiver should be burnt alive.' As for me, the crowd carried me with them to the church, ascribing praises to God as they went.

30. A food-test imposed by the Patriarch Timothy

In this way Timothy of Alexandria (sedit 380–5) was able to detect and expose crypto-Manichaeans; this according to Eutychius (Sa'id ibn Batriq) (Arabic).[22]

Most bishops in Egypt were Manichaeans. They (the former) therefore ate meat, as did the patriarchs and the monks. The patriarchs of Rome, Constantinople, Antioch and of the holy city and their bishops and monks did not eat meat; but replaced it with fish, and ate it because fish was said to be an animal too.

Sa'id ibn Batriq, the practising physician, says: Timothy, the Patriarch of Alexandria, did not permit the eating of meat, in order that it be replaced by fish. By the 'eating of meat' he meant the sacrifice, and fish is not a [20] Historia Monachorum in Aegypto x.30–5 (191–225), ed. Festugière (1961), 87–8; Eng. trans. S. Lieu. Cf. Latin version in Rufinus, Historia Monachorum 9, PL 21.426c–27b.

[21] A later version of the story given in Syriac by Anan-Isho says that the Manichaean was entirely consumed by the fire. Cf. 'Enaniso' Monachus, Paradisum Patrum, ed. Budge (1904), 416.9.

[22] Ed. Breydey (1985), Textus, 83; Eng. trans. by Dr S. Calderini for the Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum (unpublished). On this passage see esp. Stroumsa (1986), 312.

sacrifice. There is a class of Manichaeans who are known as 'hearers' (Arab. sammakini), and they eat fish because it is not a sacrifice; but they forbid the 'eating of meat' because it is a sacrifice. They who have replaced meat with fish are in error. Our lord Christ ate meat. It follows necessarily then that everyone who confesses the Christian religion eats (i.e. must eat) meat too like Christ, to be precise at least once a year; in order to repudiate any suspicion of heresy and to renounce Manichaeism publicly.

The Manichaeans had two groups: the group of 'hearers' and the group of 'righteous ones' (saddikeni). The righteous ones fasted always (at all times), and only ate what the earth produces. The hearers fasted on certain days of the month. When they became Christians they were afraid that, if they continued to eat no meat, they would be discovered and killed. So they set for themselves times of fasting: at Christmas, at the feasts of the apostles and of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary. During these times of fasting they did not eat meat. By this means they divided the year up with (times of) fasting without running the risk of being recognised because of their refusal to eat meat. After some considerable time they were followed on this path by the Nestorians, the Jacobites and the Maronites. In this way a law was made of it.

31. A story of two Manichaean merchants

These merchants are portrayed masquerading as traders in Christian relics. The story is related in a sermon on the Wedding in Cana by the Patriarch Benjamin of Alexandria (c. AD 643, Coptic).[23]

There came also two priests, wishing to pay a visit there. They happened to be foreigners, being merchants in Egypt; and since they were staying in the oratory, they slept near to us at night.

Now in the middle of the night I heard a voice crying out: 'Give what is holy to the holy.' And the voice cried out until dawn broke.

We spent five months in that place. After that, we arose and went south. The brothers received us among them very gladly. And as for the two priests, God ordained that they should not leave the place at all, although they entered the oratory as if to stay just until the following day and then go on their way; but it was as though someone had chained them with iron, and they were unable to come out and go anywhere.

[23] On this passage see esp. Stroumsa (1986), 312 Ed. de Vies (1922), 80–8. Eng. trans. Dr S. Clackson (slightly adapted). See also the text of C. D. G. Müller (1968), 162 and 184; also Johnson (1987), 209.

After this, it happened that the good God wanted to relieve our suffering. Peace flourished once more in the church, and the people rejoiced with us; by God's will we returned northwards, and went to Alexandria. And, when I reached that oratory, I intended to go in to perceive the words I had heard there. When I went in through the door with the crowd of faithful who were with me, the voice cried out again: 'Give what is holy to the holy.' I spent a week in that place during which the voice cried out day and night: 'Give what is holy to the holy.' God inspired me not to leave that place until I knew everything. I thought to myself: 'Perhaps those priests have got hold of some martyrs' bones.' I called to one of them, and said to him: 'Before you came into this topos there was no noise like this in it. Since you came in here there have been all these voices; perhaps you have some martyrs' bones that you took by stealth. If so, bring them here to me so that I can send them on their way in peace. If not, believe me, I will send you to the governor at Antinoe and have you thoroughly questioned; but tell me the whole truth.'

However, he was very frightened and said to me: 'My holy father, we have committed a grave sin; but I will tell you what we have done. For more than five years now, I and my companion here have been on the road selling our lord's body, for we are Manichaeans.[24] We were persecuted when found doing this in our own country; the governors in our country prepared to inflict great suffering on us. However, we gave a large sum of money so that they would let us go on, being driven out of our country. And they said to us as follows: "The day that we find you in this country your sin will be upon you; and you will be punished by fire." We arose, left our house and came to this country. We went into a church, for every year a large crowd came to it to stay there. The people of the village took us into a church, so that we might give our blessing in it. We rose to our feet, took a large consecrated host and divided it; then we took away all the relics of all the bodies, which we shared out. We set out for the sea (or the Fayum), to give them to the devil who was living there. Believe me, o my holy father, since we came into this oratory we have become like people in irons, unable to go outside the door. And when we propose to go out, it is as if we were bound up. In any case, listen to those who cry out, and question them; because you are the high priest and the shepherd. And let it be as you command.'

[24] The identification of these two merchants as Manichaean is seen by some scholars as a polemical topos. On this controversial passage, see discussions in Rochow (1979), 15–16, Grillmeier (1990), 171, n. 4; also Klein (1992), 373–4.

And when I heard this my whole body trembled, my soul dissolved with fear. I wept copiously and cried out, saying: 'Woe is me, wretch that I am! For what manner of sin rules over the world! O God, my God! Have pity, merciful one! Do not be angry with your heritage because of earthly sinners; but lord, give the wrongdoers their just reward, and wipe out the sinners.'

And I summoned that impious priest. The other also replied these things to me. And it happened that, when I had heard them speaking thus, I stood up with the bishop, priests and other members of the clergy. I had candles and incense burned. We left and went to those men's lodgings. The things (i.e. the consecrated hosts) were brought out, and given to me on a silver plate. And I cried out and wept: 'Woe is me, wretched man that I am! For I sleep on soft beds, while the body of my saviour is in the hands of these impious men. Woe is me, wretch that I am! For I eat and drink, while the very body of my saviour is in the hands of these impious men, who wander with him from place to place.' And I placed both of them under guard. I took the holy relics to the church, the bell was rung for prayer; and we made preparations to receive the blessing. And when we had finished the holy anaphora, I had the holy relics brought onto the altar; and at that moment they emitted blood, until the altar cloths were soaked. And when we had dismissed the congregation I sat down and wrote a letter to Shenute, the God-loving dux at Antinoe.[25] And I wrote to him thus: 'Who can count the grains of sand which are scattered on the sea shores? – as it is said in the scriptures. Who can count the grave sins of the devil's children? I mean those who even now are selling the body of the lord, and receive money for it; like Judas, who betrayed his lord for thirty pieces of silver so that he might be crucified. Who can shut his ears so as not to hear what we write to you, o Christ-loving one? Truly heaven trembles at what we are about to tell you, o God-loving son; and the earth moves this way and that, because of the audacity of two impious men, who deserve the fate of Arius who had his stomach ripped open, and died a death more terrible than that of any man. Believe me, o my God-loving one, that when I began to write to you to tell you what has happened, my whole body trembled, my eyes watered and I was powerless to describe what happened.

Still, it is indeed necessary for us to tell you, o Christ-loving one, what has happened; and when you have heard it for yourself, your body will tremble. For when you have questioned them (i.e. the Manichaeans), men of their sort absolve thieves, fornicators and (those who commit) the other sins all men commit. For if men sin against the good God, who will snatch them away from the punishments which he will bring upon them? Lest we get carried away in a long discourse to you, o God-serving one, here are the brothers of Judas the traitor, whom we have sent to you bound up. For indeed, in the same way as he sold the lord, they have also sold the lord.

[25] The Dux Shenute (Dux Thebaidis 641/42) later played an important role in the surrender of Byzantine forces in Lower Egypt to the Arabs. Cf. 'Senuthius (Sīnōdā) 2' in Martindale (1992), 1122.

However, Judas sold the lord once; these men, on the contrary, have sold him many times. The Jews crucified the lord once; these men, on the contrary, have crucified the lord many times. In fact these men we have sent to you are Manichaeans, who sell the lord for money.

Now therefore, the throne of Mark the evangelist commands you, o God-loving one, to deal with them in accordance with your wisdom. Be well, our beloved son. We are praying for you so that you are well in the lord.'

When we had written this, we put them in irons and sent them to Antinoe.

And when he had read the letter, he was not remiss in any way. He ordered a copper cauldron to be brought and filled with oil and pork fat, and a fire to be lit underneath it until the flames leapt very high. He tied them up and threw them into it. And the fire burned up their whole bodies, and nothing at all could be found of them.

MANICHAEISM IN THE LEVANT, ASIA MINOR AND GREECE

32. The debate between the Manichaea Julia and Porphyry the bishop of Gaza

Manichaeism had first entered the Roman Empire via the trade routes from the east; and, although there are not such substantial remains or accounts of its success as exist for Egypt and North Africa, there is certainly enough evidence to show that it was a major force throughout the eastern Mediterranean world of the fourth century. One of the scant material (excluding textual) remains is the famous sepulchral inscription of a Manichaean electa at Salona (early 4th C., Greek):[26]

Bassa, a virgin[27] from Lydia, a (female) Manichaean.

There is also this plea for toleration, by Libanius the sophist of Antioch to Priscianus Governor of Palestina Prima (c. AD 364, Greek):[28]

Those who venerate the sun without (performing) blood (sacrifices) and honour it as a god of the second grade and chastise their appetites and look [26] Cf. Egger et al. (ed.) (1926), II, 52–3 and 73, Inscription 73. See also the important study of Cumont and Kugener (1912), 175–7.

[27] The term 'virgin' (Gr. parthenos) is used in Coptic Manichaean texts synonymously with electa. See esp. Hom. 22.6.

[28] Ep. 1253, ed. R. Foerster, Libanii opera, xi, 329; Eng. trans. S. Lieu. Cf. Seeck (1906), 244–5.

upon their last day as their gain are found in many places of the world but everywhere a few only. They harm no one but they are harassed by some people. I wish that those of them who live in Palestine may have your authority for refuge and be free from anxiety and that those who wish to harm them may not be allowed to do so.

However, as elsewhere, it is accounts of Christian success that were mainly preserved by the victorious church; for instance, the conversion of a Manichaean leading citizen in Sparta to orthodox Christianity by the holy man Sarapion the Sidonite (end of fourth century?, Greek):[29]

However, having come to the country where the Spartans live, he heard that one of the first men of the city was a Manichaean with all his house, though virtuous in other respects. To him again he sold himself as he had done at first; and within two years he induced him to forsake his heresy, and brought him to the church and his wife also. Then they loved him no longer as a servant, but treated him as a true brother or father and glorified God.

The following text recounts another success, resulting from the debate between the Manichaea Julia and Porphyry the bishop of Gaza, as told by Mark the deacon (c. 400, Greek).[30]

85. About that time, a woman from Antioch named Julia arrived in the city, she confessed to the abominable heresy of those known as Manichaeans; now, discovering that among the Christians there were some neophytes who were not yet confirmed in the holy faith, this woman infiltrated herself among them, and surreptitiously corrupted them with her impostor's doctrine, and still further by giving them money. For the inventor of the said atheist heresy was unable to attract followers except by bribing them. In fact, the said doctrine, at least, for those in their right minds, is full of every kind of blasphemy, damnable things and old wives' tales, only useful for attracting feeble women and childish men, short on reasoning and intelligence. This false doctrine of different heresies and pagan beliefs was created with the treacherous and fraudulent intention of enticing all kinds of people. In fact the Manichaeans worship many gods, thus wishing [29] Palladius, Historia Lausiaca 37.8, ed. Bartelink (1974), 186–7 (64–71); trans. Lowther Clarke (1918), 130.

[30] Marcus Diaconus, Vita Porphyrii Gazensis, 85–91, eds. Gregoire and Kugener (1930) 66–71; Eng. trans. Lieu and S. Vince. Cf. Burkitt (1925), 7–11, Trombley (1993), 229–34, Lim (1995), 16–30 and Scopello (1997). Considerable doubt exists over the authenticity of the vita because of the numerous anachronisms and chronological and prosopographical errors which it contains; but the account of the debate fits well with our knowledge of public debates between Christian and Manichaean leaders of this period.

to please the pagans; besides which, they believe in horoscopes, fate, and astrology in order to be able to sin without fear since, according to them, we are not really accountable for sin, it is the result of a fateful necessity.

86. They also confess Christ, but claim that he was only apparently incarnate. As well as that, they who claim to be Christians themselves only appear to be so. I leave aside that which is ridiculous and offensive in order to avoid filling my audience's ears with the sound of scandalous words and monstrous suggestions. For they constructed their heresy by mixing the fables of the comic Philistion, Hesiod and other so-called philosophers with Christian beliefs. Just as a painter obtains the semblance of a man, an animal or some other object by mixing colours to delude the viewers, so that fools and madmen believe these images are real, whereas sensible people will only see in them shadows, portent and human invention. In the same way, the Manichaeans have created their doctrine by drawing on many beliefs; or, in other words, they have mixed the venom from various reptiles to make a deadly poison capable of destroying human souls. For as I have said, on the arrival of this pestilential woman, some Christians allowed themselves to be taken in by her false teaching.

87. Some days later, warned by some of the faithful, Porphyry sent for her and questioned her about herself, her origins and the doctrine she followed. The woman gave her country of birth and declared that she was Manichaean. Her companions were seized with rage (the bishop had some zealous Christians with him). The holy man told them not to be angry; but patiently to admonish the guilty woman once and twice according to the word of the holy apostle. Then he said to the woman: 'My sister, abstain from this false doctrine, because it is Satan's.' She answered: 'Speak and listen: either you will convince me, or you will be convinced.' The holy man said to her: 'Prepare yourself to come here tomorrow.' She took leave of him and withdrew. Having fasted and prayed to Christ at length in order to confound the devil, the holy man prepared himself for the next day. He invited some of the clerks and pious laity to the meeting he was to have with the woman.

88. The next day, the woman arrived with two men and two women. All four of them were young and good-looking, but very pale; as for Julia, she was well on in years. All of them, especially Julia, based their reasoning on the order of world knowledge. Their attitude was humble and they spoke quietly, as befits the word: Wolves in sheep's clothing and venomous beasts. Everything they do and everything they say is hypocrisy. Then, asked to sit down, they began the discussion. The saint, bearing the scriptures, first made the sign of the cross, and began to question Julia, asking her to state her belief. She began her account of it. As for brother Cornelius, the aforementioned deacon, who had studied the writings of Ennomos (on short-hand systems?)[31] on the orders of the blessed bishop; he took down all that was said, and all the answers, dictated by brother Barochas and myself. I have not transcribed their dialogue in this book because it is too long and I wanted the present writing to be precise; but I have put the conversation into another work[32] for those who would like to know about the wisdom which God gave to saint Porphyry, and the old wives' tales told by Julia, the poisoner given to monstrous ramblings, who is swiftly brought to divine justice.

89. Now when she had uttered her usual copious and lengthy stories and blasphemies against the lord and God of the universe, the holy man Porphyry, seeing he who encompasses all things visible and invisible blasphemed by a woman possessed of the devil and subservient to his will, made the following accusation to her: 'God who has made all things, the one eternal being without beginning or end, he who is glorified in the Trinity will strike your tongue and stop your mouth to prevent you from uttering blasphemies.'

90. Punishment followed quickly upon sentence. Julia began to shake and her expression changed. She remained for a long time as if in ecstasy; she no longer spoke, but remained silent and motionless, her eyes wide open and fixed upon the most holy bishop. Seeing what had happened to her, her companions were terrified. They tried to revive her, murmuring incantations in her ear; but she said not a word, and heard nothing. Having remained silent for a long time, she gave up the ghost and returned to the darkness which she revered and considered as light, according to the scripture which says: Woe unto those who make sweetness bitter and bitterness sweet, who change darkness into light, and light into darkness. The holy man Porphyry ordered her body to be placed in a shroud and buried, out of pity for human nature; for he was extremely merciful.

91. And all those who learned of the events were seized with great stupefaction, not only those of our faith, but also the pagans. As for the two men and two women who accompanied Julia, and all those who had been beguiled by her, they ran to throw themselves at the feet of the blessed bishop, crying: 'We have sinned!' And they asked for pardon. The saint made all of them anathematise Mani, the founder of their heresy, he to whom they owe their title of Manichaeans. And, having duly instructed [31] Scopello (1997) comm. ad loc., p. 190 suggests other readings, e.g. ek nomou semeia 'les signes de la loi'.

[32] This separate work has unfortunately not survived.

them for several days, he led them to the holy catholic church. On the occasion of their conversion other gentiles repented and were baptised.

33. The conversion of the Manichaeans at Ziph

According to this text, the Manichaeans at Ziph (in Palestine) were converted through the monk Euthymius (before AD 428, Greek).[33]

In this region (i.e. Caparbaricha) he (i.e. Euthymius) founded a monastery. The cause of the foundation of this monastery is said to have been as follows. A son of a certain headman of the village of Aristobulias had an evil spirit and would in his shrieks invoke the holy Euthymius by name. The father of the boy, hearing of Euthymius's being in the region between his village and Caparbaricha, made search and came to him. As soon as the youth saw the saint, he was thrown into convulsions and the demon came out of him, at which he was cured. When the miracle was noised abroad, people came to him from Aristobulias and the villages round about and built him a monastery; some brethren gathered and remained with him while God satisfied their bodily needs. Some of the people of Ziph who had formerly adopted the heresy called after 'mania'[34] renounced the impure heresy as a result of his inspired teaching; declaring anathema on Manes, its begetter, they were instructed in the catholic and apostolic faith and baptised.

34. The works of Mani and of Mār Addā refuted by Heraclianus of Chalcedon

The anti-Manichaean books of Heraclianus (fl. early-mid fifth century AD?) are only known to us as described by the patriarch Photius of Constantinople (Greek).[35]

I (i.e. Photius) read the twenty books of Heraclianus, bishop of Chalcedon, Against the Manichaeans. His style is concise, free from redundancies, lofty, not wanting in clearness, at the same time tempered with dignity. He combines atticism with ordinary language, like a teacher of boys entering into a contest of superatticism. He refutes the Gospel, the Book of the Giants and the Treasures (i.e. the Thesaurus) of the Manichaeans. He also gives a list of those who wrote against the Manichaean impiety before him: Hegemonius, who wrote out the disputation of Archelaus against Manes [33] Cyril of Scythopolis, Vita Euthymii 12, ed. Schwartz (1939) 22.22–23.3; Eng. trans. Price (1991) 18. On this episode, see esp. Stroumsa (1985) 276.

[34] A standard word-play in Christian polemics.
[35] Photius, Bibliotheca 85 (65a/b) ed. P. Henry, 9–10; Eng. trans. Freese (1920) 151–2, revised by S. Lieu.

(i.e. Mani); Titus, who was supposed to be an opponent of the Manichaeans, whereas he rather attacked the writings of Addas; George of Laodicea, who uses nearly the same arguments as Titus against the impious heresy; Serapion, bishop of Thmuis; lastly, Diodorus, who wrote twenty-five books against the Manichaeans, in the first seven of which he imagines that he is refuting the Living Gospel of Manes, instead of the work of Addas named Modion (i.e. Bushel, cf. Mark 4.19), as is really the case. In the remaining books he explains and clears up the meaning of certain passages in the scriptures which the Manichaeans were in the habit of appropriating to support their own views. Such is his account of Diodorus. Any statements in the works of these fathers (as the pious Heraclianus calls them) that do not appear to be sufficiently emphatic, he briefly confirms, carefully supplies what is missing, and quotes with approval in their entirety passages which are adequate for the purpose, adding further reflections of his own.

The man is full of philosophical vigour, and is admirably equipped with the theoretical knowledge of other branches of learning. Hence, he energetically combats and overthrows the trifling fables of Manichaeus, and from the consideration of what exists refutes the fabulous nonsense about being.

This treatise against the Manichaeans was written at the request of a certain Achillius, whom the author calls his faithful and beloved son. This Achillius, seeing that the Manichaean heresy was growing, begged that it might be publicly refuted, and this work was written, an unexceptionable triumph over impiety. This most pious Heraclianus flourished in . . .[36]

MANICHAEISM IN ITALY AND NORTH AFRICA

35. The young Augustine joins the sect at Carthage as a hearer

The selection of texts turns now to the autobiographical passages from Augustine's Confessions. This episode must be dated to c. 374 (Latin).[37]

Thus did I fall among men mad with pride, extremely carnal and talkative, in whose mouths were the snares of the devil, smeared with a sticky mixture [36] The loss of the date is most unfortunate and there is no agreement among scholars on the date of Heraclianus. Since few Manichaean canonical works would have survived in the sixth century because of the severity of the anti-heretical laws of Justinian, Heraclianus was most likely to have flourished before the end of the fifth century.

[37] Augustinus, Confessiones, III.VI.10, eds. Gibb and Montgomery (1908) 61–2; Eng. trans. Bourke, (1953), 57 (slightly adapted). On this passage see the detailed commentary by O'Donnell (1992) II, 173–81.

of the syllables of your name and that of our lord Jesus Christ and of the Paraclete our consoler, the Holy Spirit.[38] These names never left their lips, but were empty sound and the rattling of the tongue; for the rest, their heart was void of truth. They kept saying: 'Truth, truth'; and they said often to me, yet it was never in them. Rather they continually spoke false things, not only of you, who are truly the truth, but also of the elements of this world, your creatures.

Augustine accepts the alimentary rationale of the sect:[39]

While I was ignorant of this, I ridiculed those who are your saintly servants and prophets. And what was I doing while ridiculing them but becoming more ridiculous in your sight, gradually and little by little being drawn into such foolishness that I believed that a fig weeps when it is plucked, and that the tree, its mother, sheds milky tears?[40] And, if some "saint" ate this fig, plucked by another man and not by his own impious action, he would blend it in his bowels and breathe forth angels from it, even little pieces of God were imprisoned in this fruit unless released by the teeth of the 'elect.' Unfortunately, I believed that mercy should be shown to the fruits of the earth rather than to the men for whom they were produced. For, if a hungry man, not a Manichaean, were to ask for food and if it were given him, I would have thought that mouthful destined to receive capital punishment.

Monica, mother of Augustine, comforted by a Christian bishop who had once been a Manichaean scribe:[41]

Yes, you did give another answer through your priest, a certain bishop who was educated in the church and well trained in your books. When that woman (Monica) begged him to be good enough to talk with me and refute my errors, to teach me to unlearn evil things and to learn good things (he would do this whenever he happened to find any suitable listeners), he refused, prudently of course, as I later realised. He replied that I was not yet teachable, due to the fact that I was puffed up with pride at the novelty of [38] In the Psalm-Book (PsBk2. 49.29–31) we find the Father of Light, Jesus the Splendour and Mani the Paraclete praised as a form of Trinity. However Mani, who claimed to be the Paraclete through his divine Syzygos, was not always identified with the Holy Spirit. In the opening section of the Parthian Sermon of the Light-Nous, readers are requested to make obeisance to 'Father, . . . Son and Holy Spirit' (M351 R 1–2, ed. Sundermann (1992), §1, p. 62).

[39] Aug., Conf. III.x.18, ed. cit. 74–5; trans. cit. 67–8 (slightly adapted). Augustine gives a fuller explanation of the redemptive role of the digestive systems of the electi in de mor. Manich. XV.36; cf. BeDuhn (2000), 171–2.

[40] On weeping / bleeding plants see CMC 6–10 (above, 3); also Aug., c. Faust. VI.4.

[41] Aug., Conf. III.xii.21, ed. cit. 77; trans. cit. 70–1 (slightly adapted).

that heresy and that I had disturbed many unlearned people with all sorts of trifling questions, as she had pointed out to him. 'But,' he said, 'let him stay where he is. Just pray to the lord for him. He will find out himself, by reading, what the error is and how great an impiety.' At the same time he also told her how he, as a little boy, was given over to the Manichaeans by his mother, who had been led astray, and that he had not only read nearly all their writings, but had even copied them often, and, without anyone arguing in opposition or convincing him, it became clear to him how much this sect was to be avoided. And so he had left it.

A visit to Carthage by the Manichaean bishop Faustus, as recounted by Augustine (383):[42]

I shall speak out, in the sight of my God, concerning that twenty-ninth year of my life. A certain Manichaean bishop, Faustus[43] by name, had just come to Carthage. He was a great snare of the devil and many people were trapped by the lure of the sweetness of his speech. Now, though I did admire this, I was becoming able to distinguish it from the truth of things which I was eager to learn. I looked not to the kind of vessel in which his discourse was served, but to what this highly reputed Faustus was putting before me as food for knowledge. For I had heard advance reports about him, that he was most expert in all worthwhile teachings and especially learned in the liberal arts.

Augustine's disappointment with Faustus (383):[44]

12. For after it was quite clear to me that he was unlearned in those arts in which I had thought that he excelled, I began to lose hope that it would be possible for him to clarify and resolve the matters which were troubling me. Of course, he could have been quite ignorant of these matters and still have possessed the truth of piety, but only if he had not been a Manichaean. For, their books are filled with the most lengthy fables about the heavens, the stars, the sun, and the moon. Now, what I desired really from him was that a careful explanation be given me as to whether these things, in the light of the conflicting numerical explanations that I had read elsewhere, were indeed just as the books of Mani showed them, or at least whether an equally acceptable explanation could be gained from those books. That he could do this I no longer believed.

[42] Aug., Conf. v.iii.3, ed. cit. 109–10; trans. cit. 103 (slightly adapted).

[43] A native of Milevis in Numidia, his parents were pagans. On this best known of Manichaean leaders in the Roman West, see especially Brückner (1901), 1–18 and Decret (1970), 51–70.

[44] Aug., Conf. v.vii.12–13, ed. cit. 118–19; trans. cit. 112–13 (slightly adapted).

Nevertheless, when I did present these things for consideration and discussion, he quite modestly refused to take up the burden. He knew that he was ignorant of these things and he was not ashamed to confess it. He was not like those persons, whose loquacity I have often endured, who have tried to teach me these things and have said nothing. This man was possessed of a heart, though not properly directed to you, which was, however, not lacking in prudent care of himself. He was not altogether ignorant of his own ignorance and he refused to be forced into a rash discussion of something from which there was not exit, or easy way out, for himself. Even in this, he pleased me all the more. For, the moderation of a frank mind is more beautiful than those things which I craved to know. Such did I find him in regard to all the more difficult and subtle problems.

13. And so, when the interest which I had directed to the works of the Manichaeans was turned aside, and I was less hopeful of their other teachers, because, in the many problems which I had, that renowned master made this poor showing, I began to spend some time with him because of his own enthusiastic interest in that very literature of which I was then a rhetorician, already teaching to the young men of Carthage. Thus, I read with him either the things he knew by repute and wanted to hear, or which I judged suitable to his natural bent. For the rest, any desire of mine to make progress in that sect was definitely killed when I came to know that man. Not that I parted company with them completely, but, as one who could find nothing better than what I had already somehow or other fallen into, I had decided to be content for the time being, unless, perchance, something else which seemed preferable should appear.

Thus, that man Faustus, who had been for so many people a deadly snare, unwillingly and unknowingly began now to loosen that snare of mine in which I had been caught.

Augustine was taken care of by the Manichaeans at Rome, who also helped him to secure the Chair of Rhetoric in Milan (end of 383 to early 384):[45]

18. . . . I was associating even then, in Rome,[46] with those false and fallacious "saints":[47] not just with their hearers, to which rank the man in whose home I recuperated and regained my health,[48] but even with those whom they call [45] Aug., Conf. v.x.18–xiii.23 (with omissions), ed. cit. 126–7; trans. cit. 119–25 (slightly adapted).

[46] Augustine left Carthage for Rome at the end of 383 to pursue his career as a rhetorician. Faustus, who had been based in Italy before, probably gave him the necessary introductions to the members of the community in Rome. Manichaeans were well known for their hospitality to visiting co-believers.

[47] The Manichaeans in the west did consider themselves a community of saints. On this see Lim (1989).

[48] This auditor or hearer was very likely Constantius who later tried to establish a Manichaean community in Rome. See next section.

the elect. For, up to that time, it seemed to me that it is not we who sin, but some other unknown nature within us which sins. It was a joy to my pride to be set apart from culpability, and, when I had done some evil thing, not to confess that I had done it (so that you might heal my soul because it was sinning against you), but I loved rather to excuse myself and accuse some other unknown being which existed with me and yet was not I. In truth, of course, the whole was myself, and my impiety had divided against myself. This sin was all the more incurable because I did not consider myself a sinner . . . So, until then, I associated with their elect, but now, losing hope that I could make any progress in that false teaching, I followed its tenets with a slackness and negligence, determined to acquiesce in them only if I could find nothing better.

I did not neglect to criticise my host's overcredulity, which I felt he had in regard to the fabulous things with which the Manichaean books were filled. I continued, however, in closer friendship with the Manichaeans than with other men who did not belong to this heresy. I did not defend it with my original zeal, but their friendship (Rome concealed a good many of them) made me less eager to seek anything else, particularly since I had no hope of finding the truth in your church, o lord of heaven and earth, creator of all things visible and invisible. . . .

xiii.23. After a time, a request was sent from Milan to the prefect of Rome that a master of rhetoric be provided for that city, and he was to travel by public conveyance. I myself made the round of those men who were intoxicated with Manichaean vanities (from whom my departure was to separate me, though neither they nor I were aware of it) so that I might be granted an audition, and, when approved, the prefect, who was Symmachus[49] at that time, would send me.

36. A Manichaean house at Rome

Augustine's account of a failed attempt by the Manichaean hearer Constantius to set up a hostel for mendicant Manichaean electi in Rome (between AD 384 and 388, Latin).[50]

What more shall I say about your practices? I have mentioned the things that I myself discovered and which took place while I was in that city.

[49] Q. Aurelius Symmachus, who was Praefectus Urbi 384/5, was a staunch pagan. He probably appointed Augustine to counterbalance the influence of Ambrose, the bishop of the city.

[50] Augustinus, De moribus Manichaeorum, XX (74), ed. J. B. Bauer, CSEL 90 (Vienna, 1992) 154–6; Eng. trans. D. A. and I. J. Gallagher (1966), 115–16. On this episode see esp. Decret (1978), II, 12–13 n. 8; and Courcelle (1968), 227–9.

What went on at Rome during my absence would take too long to describe in detail, but I shall give a brief account of it, for the affair erupted with such violence that it could not remain hidden, even from those who were absent. Later on when I was back in Rome, I was able to verify everything I had heard, although the person who had related the story had himself been present and was so well known to me and so reliable that I could not doubt him in the least.

One of your hearers,[51] a man unsurpassed even by the elect in their famous abstinence, and liberally educated as well, was eager to defend your sect and used to do so with great eloquence. He was very much perturbed that the opponents so often brought up the profligate behaviour of the elect who lived disordered lives, scattered about in the poorest lodgings. Therefore, he wanted to gather all those who were prepared to live according to the precepts into his own house, if it were possible, and to maintain them at his own expense, for he cared little for money and had more than ordinary wealth. He complained, however, that his efforts in this direction were hindered by the laxity of the bishops, whose co-operation was indispensable to the plan.

At last, a certain bishop of yours (i.e. the Manichaeans) was found, a man altogether crude and unpolished, as I myself know, yet somehow, on account of this rough nature, more strict in the observance of good morals. The hearer seized upon this man, so long awaited and now at hand, and placed before him his plan. The bishop commended him and agreed to be the first one to take up his abode in the house. As soon as this was accomplished, all of the elect who were able to be at Rome were gathered together and the rule of life from the epistle of Manichaeus was set forth. It appeared intolerable to many of them, and they departed. However, quite a few remained out of shame. They began to live as they had agreed to and as their great authority had prescribed, while the hearer began vigorously to enforce everything upon everyone, although nothing which he did not first take upon himself.

Meanwhile, quarrels broke out repeatedly among the elect, and they hurled recriminations at one another. Distressed over the things he heard, the hearer so arranged it that they unwittingly exposed each other in their altercations. Monstrous and abominable deeds were brought to light. In this way, the character of those who had considered themselves capable of submitting to the full rigour of the precepts was made known. What, then, must we suspect of the others, or rather, what is to be our judgement of them? And then what? They at last got together and complained that the rules could not be kept. A revolt broke out. The hearer presented his case in a brief disjunction, that either the whole rule had to be observed, or else he who had prescribed a rule with conditions that no one could fulfil must be regarded as an utter fool. Nevertheless, and it could hardly have been otherwise, the violent uproar of the crowd prevailed over the opinion of one man. The bishop himself finally gave up and fled in complete disgrace, for it was reported that he had often been discovered with food smuggled in against the rule, and that he had a purse full of money which he kept carefully hidden.

[51] The name of the hearer was Constantius. Cf. Augustine, c. Faust. V.5, ed. J. Zycha, CSEL 25/1 (Vienna, 1891), 277.21.

37. Letter of the Manichaean Secundinus to Augustine

Secundinus writes from Rome, questioning the depth of the latter's involvement in the sect (c. AD 405/6, Latin).[52]

Secundinus to Augustine, the lord who is deservedly to be honoured and praised and uniquely to be venerated.

I feel and express my gratitude to the ineffable and most holy majesty and to his first born, the king of all lights Jesus Christ, and I humbly bring the gratitude I feel to the Holy Spirit, because they have given and offered me the opportunity to greet freely your excellent holiness, lord, who are deservedly to be praised and uniquely to be venerated. Nor is it surprising, for they are most capable and most powerful both at providing all good things and at warding off all evils; from which may they protect your goodness with their defences, and rescue it from that evil – not the one which is nothing or which is produced by the strife and passion of mortals, but the one which has been made ready to come. Woe to him who shall have offered himself as its opportunity! For you deserve to receive such gifts from them and that they should be made nurturers of your truth, you who are really a lantern which the right hand of truth has placed in the lampstand of your heart, to stop the inheritance of your treasure being despoiled by the arrival of the thief. They should order that your house should stand without collapsing, as you have built it not upon the sand of error, but on the rock of knowledge; and should deflect from us that evil spirit which strikes fear and treachery into men, so as to divert souls from the narrow path of the saviour. (894) That spirit's every assault is spread abroad by means of those princes against whom the apostle states in his letter to the Ephesians that he has entered the battle. For he says that he 'is battling not against flesh and blood, but against princes and powers, against the spiritual forces of evil that exist in the heavens.' And rightly so. For who would take up weapons to fight, and not to fight against an armed enemy, against the one who is on the attack? For as the bodies of men are the weapons of sin, so the precepts of salvation are the weapons of righteousness. This is what Paul testifies, and this is what Manichaeus himself testifies.

[52] Secundinus, epistula ad Augustinum, ed. J. Zycha, CSEL XXV/2, 893–901; Eng. trans. M. Vermes. The letter precedes Augustine's polemical treatise Contra Secundinum Manichaeum, ibid., 905–47. On Secundinus see Desmulliez et al. (eds.) (2000), 2008–9 ('Secundinus 2').

Therefore it is not a fight involving weapons, but involving spirits that use those weapons. However they fight for the sake of souls. In their midst is placed a soul, to which from the beginning its own nature has given the victory. If this soul has acted in unity with the spirit of virtues, with that spirit it shall have eternal life and possess that kingdom to which our lord invites us; if on the other hand it begins to be led astray by the spirit of vices and gives its consent, and then after its consent shows repentance, it will obtain a source of pardon for these disgraces. For it is seduced by being mixed with flesh, not by its own volition; but if having learnt to know itself it consents to evil and does not arm itself against the enemy, it has sinned by its own volition. If it is once again ashamed of its error then it will find the author of mercies ready. For it is not punished because it has sinned, but because it has not repented of its sin. Yet if it passes away in that same sin without pardon, then it will be shut out, then it will be like the foolish virgin, then it will be the heir of the left hand, then it will be driven by the lord from the wedding banquet because of its black clothing, to where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth, and it shall go with the devil to the fire of his own origin. Your remarkable learning either recounts that the devil was made from an archangel (p. 895) or states that he is nothing. Why in that case shall the just reign? Why shall apostles and martyrs be crowned? Is it entirely because they have won nothing? How greatly is the victor's power nullified, when his opponent is already stated to have no strength! Change your opinion I beg you, cast off the treachery of your Punic race[53] and change your conversion, that you made from fear, back to the truth. Do not make excuses with these lies.

My slight and nondescript Roman intellect[54] has read a number of writings by your reverend honour, in which you show as much anger with [53] An almost 'racist' reference to Augustine's North African backgound.

[54] This is normally taken as a reference to the fact that Secundinus wrote from Rome and that he knew Augustine when he sojourned with the sect in the city. However, the term 'Roman' here could be used simply as a contrast to that of 'Punic'.

the truth[55] as does Hortensius with philosophy.[56] When I had read them a second and third time with my judgement suspended and a quick eye, I found everywhere a supreme orator and almost a god of complete eloquence, but nowhere did I discover a Christian. I found someone armed against everything, but affirming nothing, when you ought to have shown yourself more skilful in knowledge than in rhetoric. I cannot keep silent about it before your most patient holiness. For it seems to me – and this is definitely the case – that you have never been a Manichaean, and never been able to discover the unknown mysteries of his secret, and that under the name of Manichaeus you are attacking Hannibal or Mithridates.[57] For I confess that the marbles of the Anician house do not shine with as much diligence[58] or such hard effort as the eloquence with which your writings gleam. If you had determined that this eloquence should match the truth then certainly a magnificent ornament would have been erected for us. Do not, I beg you, go against your own nature, do not be the spear of error, with which the saviour's side is pierced. You can see that he is crucified both all over the world and in every soul, when his soul (p. 896) never had the nature of being angered. You therefore, who derive from that soul, now cease, I beg you, your empty accusations and abandon your pointless controversies. All the time that you were kept with your father in the midst of darkness you never played the joker, but in open sunlight and moonlight you have been proven the accuser. Who therefore will be your advocate before the just tribunal of the judge, when you begin to be convicted by your own testimony from both your statements and your deeds? The Persian whom you have accused[59] will not be there. Without him who will console your weeping? Who will save the Carthaginian? Or has there been a correction in the Gospel, so that the broad way does not lead to perdition? Or is it incorrect in Paul, so that each individual will not have to render account of their deeds? How much better it would have been if when you left Manichaeus you had joined the Academy or written an exposition of the wars of the Romans who conquered the world. What great and noble

[55] I.e. Manichaeism.

[56] It was Cicero's (now lost) work Hortensius which first introduced Augustine to philosophical inquiry. Cf. Aug., Conf. III.iv.7–8.

[57] Mithridates Eupator, King of Pontus (later Cilicia) who rebelled against Rome in 88 BC and nearly succeeded in expelling Roman suzerainty from Asia Minor. He and Hannibal were traditionally seen as Rome's most dangerous enemies. The fact that Hannibal also came from Carthage continues Secundinus's attack on Augustine's 'Africanness'.

[58] Anicius: cf. Cicero Brutus 83. A reference to the gleaming marbles of Rome. On this see Decret (1978), I, 143.

[59] I.e. Mani. The idea of Mani playing a role in the last judgement is not Manichaean.

achievements you would have found there, and you, a chaste man of absolute modesty and poverty, would not have gone over to the Jewish tribes with their barbaric customs. Now you add their stories to your precepts and you include 'the fornicating wife' (Hos. 1:2) and 'you will make sons of the fornicating woman' and 'by fornication the earth will be polluted away from the Lord' (Gen. 24:2 and 47:29). Also 'you shall not wash your hands after intercourse with your wife' (Lev. 11:2), and 'put your hands on my thigh' and 'kill and eat' and 'grow and multiply' (Gen. 1:28). Did the lions in the pit please you because there were no cages? (Dan. 6:16ff.) Or were you saddened by Sara's sterility, when her husband had been the one to divert her from her honour by pretending she was his sister? (Gen. 12:13, 20:2) Perhaps after the contest of Dares and Entellus[60] you had wanted to await Jacob and his wrestling match? (Gen. 32:24) (p. 897) Or had you set yourself to count the number of the Amorites (Josh. 10:5) or the pancarpus in Noah's ark (Gen. 7)? I know that you have always hated these things, I know that you have always loved great things, that quit the earth, and seek the heavens, that mortify the body and give life to the soul. So who is it that has suddenly changed you?

Although to say these things to your holiness is the height of absurdity. For you yourself are well aware how wicked he is and how evil, and how he campaigns even against the faithful and best men with so much guile, that he forced Peter to deny his lord three times in the same night (Matt. 26:69–75), and when he arose prevented Thomas from believing in him (John 20:24–26). These wounds were relieved by the medicine of pardon. But even bolder was this act: that when the lord was sowing the best seed he mixed in darnel and snatched Iscariot away from such a shepherd. So that it should be brought to the final punishment of the cross, he incited the scribes and Pharisees to his destruction, so that they shouted for Barabbas to be released and Jesus to be crucified. Therefore we have escaped because we have followed a spiritual saviour. For such was the outpouring of that one's audacious behaviour that, if our lord had been of the flesh, then all our hope would have been severed. And yet he could not be satisfied even by the ignominy of the cross, but in his rage forced him first to be crowned with thorns and then given vinegar to drink, to be pierced with the soldiers' spear and then to suffer blasphemy from the lips of the robber on his left. Afterwards (p. 898) his wickedness grew so far that he devised various problems for him and his apostles who gathered there, under their name, which is all the worse, dividing among all the superstitious the dignity of the term Catholic. For I omit how far he armed each of the disciples against the magistrates, and how far he deceived Hymenaeus (1Tim. 1:20), or Alexander (2Tim. 4:14), and his deeds at Antioch, at Smyrna or at Iconium (2Tim. 3:11). I only now add the activities of the present multitude, from which virtue is as far removed as it is a closed book to the people. For it is not virtue to which the crowd has attained, and especially the crowd of women; but I hesitate to make their secrets public, lest crimes begun by others be reproduced. Yet it is the role of the wise to tolerate both, to laugh at both, and to strive only for that which engenders beatitude and which nurtures life.

[60] A reference to the wrestling match in Aen. 5.362ff. of Vergil – Augustine's favourite poet.

And still I humbly entreat you again and again, I beg and beseech you time after time, first to deem me worthy of pardon, if any statement of mine has irritated your heart of gold. For I have written this from excess zeal, because I do not want you to be plucked from our flock; even I myself might have wandered from it and nearly perished, but that I quickly saved myself from a wicked form of communion. Secondly, I beseech you to reconcile yourself to the communion which has done you no wrong; return to the communion which if you do return will not be angry with you for your guilt. For it does not (p. 899) know forgiveness only seven times (Matt. 18:22), rather it has the power both to bind and to release (Matt. 16:19 and 18:18). Do not imagine you are touching, since you saw long ago; do not wish to learn, as you are able to teach. Cast aside status among men, if you wish to please Christ. Be a new Paul for our times:[61] though he was a doctor of Jewish law, when he had won from the lord the privilege of being an apostle, everything he had thought pleasurable he despised as dung (Phil. 3:8), in order to gain Christ. Bring aid to your bright soul, because you do not know at what hour the thief is coming. Do not adorn the dead, because you are the ornament of the living. Do not be a companion on the broad way, because it awaits the Amorite, but hurry to the narrow way, in order to win eternal life. Stop, I beg you, enclosing Christ within a womb, lest you yourself be enclosed once again in a womb. Stop making two natures into one, because the judgement of the lord is approaching. Woe to those who will meet him and who are changing sweetness to bitterness!

However, if you have doubts about the origin or are uncertain about the commencement of the battle, then an explanation can be given in a lengthy disquisition and a peaceful conference. Yet, I want to make it clear to your supremely wise goodness that there are certain things which cannot be explained in such a way that they can be understood; for divine reason surpasses the hearts of men. For example this question, as to how there are two natures or why he, who could not suffer anything, fought. Or again what he also says about the new age, that it is to be built from the broken fragments of this great earth; but who would admit that there can be a fragmentation among divine elements? Unless that is you were to (p. 900) make an image of the speaker compared to the hearer: words are fragmented in the hearer's case and put together in the speaker's. However many words the lecturer has spoken, that the hearer holds to himself, yet they have not departed from the lecturer. Unless this is your view also about that age, then what is said is quite stupid and inane. Similarly also with the fight. Unless you first postulate that God in his entirety is justice, but it is the utmost crime to attack someone else's domain, and further when the opposite nature invaded, God certainly could suffer nothing, because of his foreknowledge, then he would have appeared to have given consent to the crime had he not fought back. He opposed his great virtue[62] to the invader, so that his own justice would not be polluted by any consent to sacrilege. For the just man has been formed by him in such a way that he never sins himself nor ever gives his consent to the sinner. Moreover God in his kingdom had power over nature, being omnipotent and judge. If these things have been said with the result, not that God was created, but that I have not had the ability to comprehend, they still do not suffice for apostasy; but neither has the sun risen for the blind, nor has a voice been heard by the deaf nor a feast prepared for the dead. That places cannot be assigned to natures is a fact which the human condition calls inexplicable and indescribable; but the saviour, for whom everything is easy, calls these two places right and left, inside and outside, "come and go". Whereas you do the opposite and take a poetic foot – for example orbis, vita, salus, lumen, lex, ordo, potestas – and if it is a voiced syllable you treat it as silent, and a long one you pronounce short. (p. 901) These natures do not agree in this way, but they certainly mean two things, separated from one another.

[61] A very apt challenge for Augustine to be the leading Manichaean apostle of his age given the importance of Paul's apostolicity to Mani's own prophetic credentials.

Yet, when such things are expounded by me to your admirable supreme intelligence, it is as if the Jordan were bringing water to the ocean, or a lantern light to the sun, or a people sanctity to their bishop. Therefore, you should tolerate whatever this letter contains. For had I not known of your divine patience, which readily pardons each person, I would never have written in such a way, although you can see that I have touched my deepest feelings only cursorily and have taken the greatest care not to appear to you verbose. Accordingly these thoughts shall find acceptance by your holiness, as will the method of our salvation; otherwise you will be able to produce as a result thousands of volumes, lord who are deservedly to be praised and uniquely to be venerated. Farewell.

[62] I.e. the Primal Man.

38. The Manichaean Firmus converted by a sermon of Augustine's

Firmus was a Manichaean merchant. This occupation was much favoured by the community, as it did not sin against the living soul (as, for instance, farming or baking would); and equally the cross-cultural elements of the faith may be supposed to have appealed to traders and travellers. This account is from Possidius's Life of Augustine, and the episode should probably be dated prior to AD 421 (Latin).[63]

I (i.e. Possidius) remember, and so do my brethren and fellow servants who at that time were living with the holy man at Hippo, that when we were living with the holy man at Hippo, that when we were seated at table Augustine remarked: 'In church today did you notice that the beginning and end of my sermon were contrary to my usual method? I did not fully explain the subject I introduced, but left it unfinished.' Thereupon, we replied: 'Yes, we know it and we recall our surprise at the time.' To which Augustine answered: 'I believe that the lord perhaps wished some erring person to be taught and healed by our forgetfulness and error on that occasion, for both we and our sermons are in the lord's hands. As I was still considering the introduction of my proposed topic, I digressed and changed to another subject. Thus, without concluding and fully explaining the original question which I had started out to prove, I closed my sermon with an argument against the error of the Manichaeans, about which I had intended to say nothing.'

On the next day or the day following, if I am not mistaken, a certain merchant, Firmus by name, came to the holy Augustine as he was sitting with us in the monastery. The stranger fell upon his knees and prostrated himself at the feet of Augustine, shedding tears and begging the priest and his holy companions to intercede with the lord for his sins. He confessed that he had followed the Manichaean sect, living in it for many years, and that, therefore, to his sorrow, he had contributed much money to the Manichaeans, or rather to their so-called elect. Recently, however, by the mercy of God, he had been present in church, was converted and became a Catholic through Augustine's words. Thereupon, when the venerable Augustine himself and those of us who were present at the time diligently inquired what had particularly struck him in that sermon, he told us, and we recalled the trend of Augustine's discourse. In wonder and admiration at God's profound plan for the salvation of souls, we glorified and blessed his holy name. For he effects their salvation when and how he wishes through his own instruments, whether they are aware of it or not. From that time on, then, Firmus adhered to the manner of life of God's servants, abandoning his career as a merchant. Later, he became conspicuous by his activity among the members of the church and, having been called and constrained by God's will, entered upon the office of presbyter in another region. In this position he constantly maintained the sanctity of his way of life, and perhaps across the sea he is still living an active life in the world.

[63] Possidius, Vita Augustini 15; Eng. trans. Müller and Deferrari (1952) 90–91.

39. Victorinus exposed as a crypto-Manichaean

Victorinus was sub-deacon of Malliana in Mauretania. This episode is reported by Augustine in one of his letters (after AD 395, Latin).[64]

I think the best thing I can do is to write directly to your holiness,[65] so that my negligence may not allow the enemy to lay waste the flock of Jesus Christ in your province, for he never ceases to lay snares to destroy the souls bought at so dear a price. It has come to my knowledge that a certain Victorinus, a subdeacon of Malliana,[66] is a Manichaean, and that he hides his sacrilegious error under the name of cleric. He is also a man of advanced age. He was so well known that I questioned him before he could be arraigned by witnesses; he could not deny the accusation, for he knew that there were many such to whom he had incautiously given himself away. He would have appeared altogether too bold, not to say out of his mind, if he had tried to deny it. He admitted that he was indeed a Manichaean but not an elect . . .[67]

That subdeacon, posing as a Catholic, not only believed those intolerable blasphemies as the Manichaeans do, but he taught them as vigorously as he could. He was discovered by his teaching when he trusted himself, so to speak, to his pupils. Indeed, he asked me, after he had confessed that he was a Manichaean hearer, to lead him back to the way of truth of [65] i.e. Deuterius, a bishop of Mauretania and a contemporary of Augustine.

[64] Augustinus, Ep. 236, ed. A. Goldbacher, CSEL XLIV (Vienna, 1895), 523.21–524.11 and 525.12–24; Eng. trans. Parsons (1956), 179–81.

[66] On Victorinus see Madouze (ed.) (1982), 1199 ('Victorinus 12')

[67] The section of the letter omitted is a summary of the ethical teaching of the sect which Augustine made for Deuterius who probably knew nothing about the religion. This is given in this book in the chapter on the teaching of Mani (below, 81).

Catholic doctrine, but I confess I was horrified at his duplicity under his clerical guise and I took steps to have him confined and driven from the city. And I was not satisfied with that until I had notified your holiness by letter that he should be known to all as a person to be shunned, having been degraded from his clerical rank with fitting ecclesiastical severity. If he seeks an opportunity for repentance, let him be believed if he will make known to us the other Manichaeans whom he knows, not only at Malliana but in the whole province.

40. Manichaeans detected and punished in Carthage

These events, as related by Augustine, are to be dated between AD 421 and 428 (Latin).[68]

9. In this circumstance, or rather because of some demand of their detestable superstition, their elect are forced to consume a sort of eucharist sprinkled with human seed in order that the divine substance may be freed even from that, just as it is from other foods of which they partake. However, they deny that they do this, claiming that some others do it, using the name of the Manichaeans; but they were exposed in the church at Carthage, as you know, for you were a deacon there at the time when, under the prosecution of Ursus the tribune, who was then prefect of the palace, some of them were brought to trial. At this time a girl by the name of Margaret gave evidence of their obscene practices and claimed, though she was not yet twelve years old, that she had been violated in the performance of this criminal rite. Then with difficulty he compelled Eusebia, some kind of Manichaean nun, to admit that she had undergone the same treatment in this regard, though at first, she maintained that she was a virgin and insisted on being examined by a midwife. When she was examined and when her true condition was discovered, she likewise gave information on that whole loathsome business at which flour is sprinkled beneath a couple in sexual intercourse to receive and commingle with their seed. This she had not heard when Margaret gave her testimony, for she had not been present. Even in recent times some of them have been exposed and brought before ecclesiastical authority, as the 'Episcopal Acts' which you have sent us show. Under careful examination, they admitted that this is no sacrament, but a sacrilege.

10. One of them, whose name is Viator, claimed that those who commit such acts are properly called Catharists. Nevertheless, though he asserted that there are other groups of the Manichaean sect divided into Mattarii and especially Manichaeans, he could not deny that all of these three forms were propagated by the same founder and that all of them are, generally speaking, Manichaeans. Surely the Manichaean books are unquestionably common to all of them, and in these books are described these dreadful things relating to the transformation of males into females, and of females into males to attract and to loosen through concupiscence the princes of darkness of both sexes so that the divine substance which is imprisoned in them may be set free and escape. This is the source of the obscene practices which some of the Manichaeans refuse to admit pertain to them. For they imagine that they are imitating divine powers to the highest degree and so they attempt to purge a part of their god, which they really believe is held befouled just as much in human seed as it is in all celestial and terrestrial bodies, and in the seeds of all things. And for this reason, it follows that they are just as much obliged to purge it from human seed by eating, as they are in reference to other seed which they consume in their food. This is the reason they are also called Catharists, that is, purifiers; for they are so attentive to purifying this part that they do not refrain even from such horrifying food as this.

[68] Augustinus, De Haeresibus, XLVI.9–10, ed. and trans. L. Müller (1956) (slightly adapted).

SELECT LEGISLATIONS AGAINST THE MANICHAEANS FROM THEODOSIUS TO JUSTINIAN

41. Anti-Manichaean legislation issued by Theodosius

The first of a series of prescripts issued by Theodosius in his name as well as those of his young sons (AD 381, Latin)[69] sets the tone in forbidding members of the sect the right to transfer their property to the sect. The same restriction had already been imposed on the Donatists. This measure would have hit the Manichaeans particularly hard as the electi were economically entirely dependent on the philanthropy (Gr. eusebeia) of their hearers, especially rich ones like Constantius (v. supra, 36).

The same Augusti (i.e. emperors Gratian, Valentinian II and Theodosius I) to Eutropius, praetorian prefect.

If any Manichaean – man or woman – from the day of the law enacted long ago and originally by our parents[70] has transmitted his own property to any person whatsoever by having made a will or under title of any liberality [69] CT XVI.5.7, pp. 857–88; trans. Coleman-Norton (1966), I, 367–8. On Theodosian legislations against the sect, see especially Beskow (1988).

[70] I.e. the edict of 2 March 372 (CT XVI.5.3).

whatsoever or by form of donation, or if anyone of these persons has been enriched by grant of an inheritance entered through any form whatsoever (since immediately from the said persons, under branded infamy's perpetual stigma, we withdraw all capability of making a will and of living under Roman law, and since we do not permit them to have the power either of leaving or taking any inheritance), the whole by an immediate investigation on the part of our fisc, should be joined to its resources. Whether by illicit literality this property shall have come to a husband or to a relative or to anyone whatsoever who well has deserved it or even to children, whom indeed the villainies of the same criminal life shall unite, or even if through any intermediate person whatsoever it shall profit the said person who is found to be of such a class and a company of persons it should be claimed under the title of vacancy.[71]

(1) The rule of this law issued by our gentleness should prevail not only for the future but also for the past;[72] whatever either such persons as owners have bequeathed or as heirs have held, the fisc's acquisition of the advantage should ensue. For, although the orderly arrangement of celestial statutes indicates observance of a sacred constitution in respect to matters about to follow afterward and has not been wont to be prejudicial to completed matters, nevertheless in this ordinance only, which we wish to be specially vigorous, by a sense of just instigation we recognise what a habit of obstinacy and a persistent nature deserve and we regard as guilty of sacrilege on the ground of violation of this described law those persons who, even after the law originally had been issued, have not at all been able to be restrained at least by divine admonishment from illicit and profane assemblies. We sanction the present statutes' severity not so much as an example to be established but as a law to be vindicated, so that a defence of time cannot also profit them.[73]

(2) The inheritance of paternal or maternal property should be conferred only on those children who, though born from Manichaeans, yet shall have withdrawn themselves from associations of the said life and profession, because they have been admonished by a sense of and a desire for their own salvation, have dedicated themselves in respect to pure religion, and are immune from such a crime.

[71] In Roman law, heirless (caducus) property is passed to the imperial fisc.

[72] We have here a rare example of a retroactive law which is contrary to contemporary principles of Roman law (as stated e.g. in CT 1.1.3).

[73] A Manichaean defendant cannot therefore plead that the enactment is not retrospective or that the lapse of time has barred legal action. Cf. Coleman-Norton (1966), 1, 369, n. 13.

(3) To this ordinance we add also the following: that they should establish neither in conventicles of towns[74] nor in famous cities their wonted sepulchres of funeral mysteries; they should be restrained completely from sight in a crowded community.

Nor with malignant fraud they should defend themselves under pretence of those fallacious names, by which many, as we have discovered, desire to be called and to be designated as of approved faith and of rather chaste course of life; especially since some of these persons desire themselves to be denominated Encratitans,[75] Apotactitans,[76] Hydroparastatans,[77] or Saccoforians[78] and by a variety of diverse names falsify – as it were – the services of their religious profession. For it is proper that all these persons should not be protected by a profession of names, but should be held notorious and execrable by the criminality of their sects.

Given on 8 May at Constantinople. Eucherius and Syagrius being consuls.

Mandate on apostate Christians' wills and penalties for Manichaeans (AD 383, Latin):[79]

The same Augusti (viz. Gratian, Valentinian II and Theodosius I) to Hypatius, praetorian prefect.

By denial of liberty of making a will we avenge the crime of Christians who turn to altars and temples.

Also should be punished the shameful acts of those who by disregard for the dignity of the Christian religion and name have polluted themselves with Jewish contagions.[80]

But that penalty, which both our predecessor Valentinian of divine authority has assigned and our decrees no less often have ordered, should [74] A problematic and uncommon phrase conventicula oppidorum, the meaning of which is unclear. Meeting places of the sect are usually labelled conventicula in legislations but the context here rules out a specific reference to Manichaean conventicles.

[75] One of the earliest ascetic sects, its traditional founder was the Syrian Tatian in the second century AD.

[76] Apotactikos – renunciator of marriage and of private property – is also a commonly used term for an ascetic in documents from Roman Egypt.

[77] Little known sect, its title suggests the substitution of water for wine in the eucharist; i.e. ascetics who drink only water, a feature shared by the Manichaeans.

[78] These are radical ascetics who took to the wearing of dark garments made of sack cloth and of long hair (for men) and short hair (for women). On all these groups see the full discussion in Beskow (1998) 8–9. The inclusion of these sects in the legislation points to the reluctance of the church and the Christian emperors to accept the activities of the extreme ascetic wing of the church.

[79] CT XVI.7.3, pp. 883–5; trans. Coleman-Norton (1996), II, 385–6.

[80] The mention of Manichaeans alongside Jews is interesting in that Manichaeism was sometimes seen as a non-Christian religion in its own right and not merely as a heretical sect.

follow continually and perpetually those who have preferred at any time to attend the Manichaeans' nefarious retreats and wicked recesses. Moreover the same penalty should follow the authors of this persuasion, who have deflected unsteady minds to their own fellowship, as those guilty of such error; nay, we ordain that even weightier punishments – according to the governors' impulses and to the crime's character – should be imposed generally and extraordinarily upon the nefarious artificers of this wickedness.

But lest either perpetual outrage of accusation should harass the dead or questions of inheritance wholly outdated by the difference of long periods of time should be agitated always into revived conflicts, we assign a limit of time to questions of this character: that, if anyone accuses the deceased of having violated and deserted the Christian religion and contends that the said person went over to the sacrileges of temples or to Jewish rites or to Manichaeans' infamy and affirms that on this account a will not at all could be made, within a continuous quinquennium, which has been established for actions of voidance, he may make use of this action and may obtain the beginning of a future trial of this sort: to the effect that, when the said person whose transgression is to be accused is living and is shown to have been a participant of this shameful act and wicked deed, he, having testified under public attestation, may prove his indictment; for he who through his silence is proved to have shown perfidy to the supernal name, thus acquiescing in such wicked acts, may not make henceforth an accusation about a transgression, as though ignorant of it.

Given on 21 May at Padua, Merobaudes for the second time and Saturninus being consuls.

Mandate on the suppression of the meeting places of Manichaeans and their expulsion (AD 383, Latin):[81]

The same Augusti to Postumianus, praetorian prefect.

Absolutely all persons whomsoever the error of diverse heresies excites, that is Eunomians, Arians, Macedonians, Pneumatomachians, Manichaeans, Encratitans, Apotactitans, Saccoforians, Hydroparastatans, should not assemble in any gatherings, should not collect any multitude, should not draw any people to themselves and should not show walls of private houses after the likeness of churches, should practise either publicly or privately nothing which can be detrimental to Catholic sanctity.

And if there shall have been anyone who may transgress what so evidently has been prohibited, by all good persons' common agreement he should be expelled, because such opportunity has been allowed to all whom the veneration and the excellence of correct religious observance delight.

[81] CT XVI.5.11, p. 859; trans. Coleman-Norton (1966) II, 387–88.

Given on 25 July at Constantinople, Merobaudes for the second time and Saturninus being consuls.

42. The death penalty for Manichaeans

A law of Zeno, or of Anastasius I, on the right of residence of Manichaeans decreeing the death penalty (AD 487 or 510, Greek – originally Latin):[82]

We ordain that persons who prefer the Manichaeans' deadly error should have no freedom or leave to dwell in any place whatever of our state; but that, if ever they should have appeared or should have been found, they should be subject to capital punishment.

Given on 9 August, the most distinguished Boethius being consul.[83]

Law of Justin I and Justinian I also imposing the death penalty on Manichaeans (AD 527, Greek – originally Latin):[84]

Emperors Justin and Justinian Augusti.

. . . (The first part is lost) Therefore we have permitted heretics to assemble and to have their own domination, that they, having felt shame for our patience, willingly may come to their senses and may turn to the better. But a certain intolerable recklessness has entered into them and they have infiltrated themselves, having disregarded the laws' command, into governmental services, in which the very words of the royal formularies show that such persons should no longer participate.

We call heretics other persons, just as the accursed Manichaeans and those about like these; indeed it is unnecessary that they even should be named or should appear anywhere at all or should defile what they have touched. But the Manichaeans – as we have said – thus ought to be expelled and none ought either to tolerate or to overlook their denomination, if indeed a person diseased with this atheism should dwell in the same place with others, but also a Manichaean, wherever on earth appearing, ought to be subjected to punishments to the extreme degree . . .

[82] CJ 1.5.11, p. 53. The original Latin version is now lost but a Greek translation (partly lost) is found in the Basilica (1. line 25, ed. Scheltema et al. (1953 ff.) 5); trans. Coleman-Norton (1966), III, 940.

[83] The date of the law would have been 510 if the consul was Anicius Manlius Boethius, the famous philosopher.

[84] CJ 1.5.12, pp. 53–4. Like the previous legislation, this is preserved in Greek translation in the Basilica (1. line 26, ed. Scheltema et al. (1953 ff.) 5); trans Coleman-Norton (1966), III, 995–6.

43. Mandate of Justinian I on Manichaeans' wills

AD 527, Greek – originally Latin.[85]

. . . (The first part is lost) Since persons who have been unfortunate in respect to the Manichaeans' impious error are worthy not only of punishment while they live, but also of the circumstance that after their death they may not give their property to whom they wish or to whom the laws give it by intestacy, we use the present divine pragmatic law to your magnificence, by which we command that the property of persons possessed by this disease should be examined; and that if their children or any of their descending relatives should be free of such sort of madness, these should be allowed to share the property given to them by law, but that if any other cognates of the deceased persons either are called to their inheritance according to those persons' last will (which indeed has been forbidden) or have accepted a donation from such a person while living or even have been honoured with a legacy from, of course, the same person, their property or the things donated or bequeathed should be taken from them absolutely and should be attached to the public treasury.

[85] CJ 1.5.15. Like the previous legislation, this is also preserved in Greek translation in the Basilica (1. line 27, ed. Scheltema et al. (1953 ff.) 6); trans. Coleman-Norton (1966) III, 1005.

CHAPTER 4

The scriptures of Mani

One of the reasons why Manichaeism is sometimes termed the first 'religion', in the modern sense, is that it was deliberately constructed; and a vital element in the foundation for this were the revealed scriptures written down by Mani himself. Indeed, Mani repeats that this is one of the advantages of his church, that its apostle (i.e. himself) has written down the teachings, and thus it will endure and not be led astray (see e.g. 91, below). In contrast, previous apostles had not written down their teachings, and it had been left to their disciples to put down what they remembered. This important theme enabled Mani to hold fast to the principle of a line of true apostles, in which he placed himself; while at the same time explaining the corruption of previous churches, and also the reason why his own would stand fast to the end. And this provided a suitable key for polemic against other religions, and for Manichaean exegesis of their scriptures as containing both truth and falsity.

Nevertheless, just as we should be cautious in our use of the term 'religion', and not impose anachronistic conceptions derived from the modern discipline of the history of religions; so, we also need to consider what exactly Mani and his followers meant by the concepts of scripture and canon. At the time Mani wrote, the list of Christian scriptures was not yet closed, and it is arguable that the idea of the canonical New Testament in anything like the modern sense did not occur until the fourth century AD. And, of course, the focus on the revealed book that is so characteristic of Islam lay some centuries into the future (although the mechanisms for this remain unclear, it seems more probable that the matrix of ideas concerning the cycle of apostles and books passed from Manichaeism on to Islam). Can we then say that Mani was the first to create the idea of a canon, just as many have maintained that Marcion created the idea of a New Testament?

This is probably to go too far. It is noticeable that, whilst Mani's emphasis on the importance of his books is remarkable, there was some difficulty in maintaining closure to their number, order, and perhaps even contents. In the first two sections of this chapter a number of 'canon lists' are provided from different sources widely ranged over time and space. The continuity that Mani succeeded in achieving is most often commented on, but significant regional and temporal sub-traditions are also apparent. There is some fluctuation between five and seven 'scriptures' in the sources, and certain books had particular authority in one place but not another. Still, in the following very early source (probably by an immediate disciple and written in the first generation after the death of Mani himself), we find:

> The Gospel and The Treasury of the Life, The Treatise and The Book of the Mysteries, The Book of the Giants and The Epistles, The Psalms and the Prayers of my lord, his Picture(-Book) and his apo(caly)pses, his parables and his mysteries . . .[1]

Here there are the classic seven scriptures of the Manichaean canon (with The Psalms and the Prayers counted as one). These are clearly distinguished from Mani's Picture(-Book), which was a depiction of his teachings by himself; and from other (written or oral?) sources ascribed to him. As well as these one must also mention the Šābuhragān, a summary of his teachings in Zoroastrian guise written in Middle Persian by Mani for his patron Shapur I. It was not generally included in the canon of Manichaean scriptures, which were otherwise all originally written in Aramaic, and is rarely noted in sources from the Roman Empire. In sum: When speaking of a 'canon', it is probably best not to mean much more than a core list of Mani's writings, around which gathered a number of other sources ascribed to him; but a really qualitative notion of canonicity (and fixity of the revealed letter and word) would be to impose too much, as the Manichaeans themselves do not seem to have made this distinction.

However, one of the major problems for the modern study of Manichaeism is the flimsy survival of Mani's scriptures themselves. Whilst we now have access to many hundreds, indeed thousands, of pages of text written by followers of the religion, and including large amounts of kephalaic material that purport to record Mani's words, the actual scriptures themselves (i.e. the seven works listed above, and of course the Picture (-Book) as well) are in very large part lost. As we will see in this chapter, there are some quotations surviving from various works, some substantial [1] Hom. 25.1–6; ascribed to Koustaios, who may well have acted as Mani's scribe. In the same source we also find the following, which is remarkable for the place it gives to The Kephalaia (and as evidence for the early date of that text): 'I weep . . . for The Prayers and the Psalms. I weep for the illustrations of my Picture (-Book), as I (remember (?)) their beauty. I am weeping for The Kephalaia and . . .' (18.3–6). Kephalaiac literature was necessarily sub-canonical, since by its nature it was the recording of Mani's sermons, lessons, occasional parables and such like. Kephalaiac literature was therefore written by disciples, not by Mani himself; and thus had a problematic element in view of Mani's critique of such practices in prior churches.

fragments of The Epistles, and very important descriptions of the contents of the books by an-Nadīm; but we still can not say that we really know what an absolutely fundamental source such as The Living Gospel or The Book of Mysteries looked like. This is an enormous lack. In part it is doubtless a matter of luck; but it is noticeable that persecuting authorities would have focused especially on the destruction of the Manichaean scriptures, and in this work they appear to have been all too successful. We can only hope that future discoveries will redeem this situation.[2]

44. Mani's canon according to the Kephalaia

Early in the introduction to the Coptic Kephalaia of the Teacher, the section which provides a frame and a rationale for that work as (self-consciously) sub-canonical literature, Mani is quoted as listing his 'books of light'. Unfortunately the meaning of the 'three lessons' (Coptic lit. "words") that they are said to contain is not certain, although they may well be the 'three times' upon which Mani's teachings are built. Mani then urges his disciples also to preserve all his occasional discourses, and it is this that provides a justification for the text.

In this first canonical list it appears that The (Book of the) Giants is called 'the writing for the Parthians'[3] in the list of seven works (the traditional number, noting that The Psalms and the Prayers are usually counted as one), whilst there is no mention of the Šābuhragān unless it is the same as 'the writing for the Parthians' which is unlikely as the Šābuhragān – a summary of Mani's teaching for Shapur I – was composed in Middle Persian, the language of the Sassanian court. In the second kephalaia listing the The (Book of the) Giants is included but not 'the writing for the Parthians'. Neither piece counts The Picture-Book, although there are various references to that text elsewhere in the kephalaiac literature.

(Keph. 5.21–33; 6.15–27) . . . unveil in these three lessons . . . in them. I have written them in my books of light: in The Great Gospel and Treasury of the Life; in The Treatise (Gr: Pragmateia); in The One of the Mysteries; in 25 The Writing, which I wrote on account of the Parthians; and also all my Epistles; in The Psalms and the Prayers. For these three lessons are the measure of all wisdom. Everything that has occurred, and that will occur, is written in them! Have strength to discriminate . . . and know it through them. Every writer, 30 if he reveals these three great lessons: that one is the writer of truth. Also, every teacher, if he gives instruction and proclaims these three

[2] It should be noted that on-going editorial work by Funk and Gardner of codex remains from both Medinet Madi and Ismant el-Kharab is beginning to give a much clearer idea of The Epistles; and that similarly (by Funk and others) the editing of the Synaxeis codex from Medinet Madi should help us to understand more about The Living Gospel. It can also be noted that substantial portions of the Šāburagān survive, see MacKenzie (1979 and 1980).

[3] Cf. Tardieu (1981) 59.

lessons, is the teacher of truth. I also, for my part, behold I have revealed these three great lessons. I have given them to you . . .

Yet, now I will entrust to you . . . The world has not permitted me to write down . . . to me all of it; and if you, my children and my disciples, write all my wisdom . . . the questions that you have asked me . . . [20] and the explanations that I have made clear to you from time to time; the homilies, the lessons, that I have proclaimed with the teachers to the leaders, together with the elect and the catechumens; and the ones that I have uttered to free men and free women; . . . all of them, that I have proclaimed from time to time! They are not written. [25] You must remember them and write them; gather them in different places; because much is the wisdom that I have uttered to you.

Although the publication of the editio princeps of the codex only reached kephalaion 148 ('Concerning the five books: They are ascribed to five fathers') in 1999, the contents were already discussed (and a provisional text provided) in the first account of the Medinet Madi library by Schmidt, Ibscher and Polotsky in 1933 (35–41, 86). The passage is again important for the problematic question of the canon list. In this particular account there is evidence of textual corruption. As Funk (in his 1999 edition) points out: whilst the title counts five books, we find here six titles arranged as four gifts. It is most likely that at some point in the redaction history The Psalms and the Prayers have become omitted (cf. Keph. 5.23–26). Probably they were paired as a single gift, and placed prior to The Epistles.

(Keph. 355.4–25) Once again our enlightener speaks to his disciples: [5] These great writings, which I have written for you, are gifts; as they were freely given to you from the fathers of light.

So, The Great Living Gospel is the gift of the Ambassador. [10] The Treasury of Life is the gift of the Pillar of Glory. The Treatise and The Book of Mysteries and the writing on The Giants: These three holy writings are a single one, the gifts of the light Twin. [15] Also, all The Epistles that I have written for you from time to time: They are my gifts and my presents. This is the good fruit, which I have given you, from the good tree.

Now, you yourselves, my beloveds: Give thanks [20] and be confirmed in these good writings, these that were given freely for you from the fathers of light. Receive them in to your heart and believe them. Inscribe them upon your memory, because through them you will . . . eternal life.

45. Canon lists from an Arabic and a Chinese source

Although the following accounts are not, of course, 'from the Roman Empire', they do illustrate the unity and longevity Mani's canon achieved for Manichaeism. Our first source is that according to Ibn an-Nadīm (10th C. AD, Arabic),[4] which still remains in many respects the most detailed account available of the actual contents of Mani's books. In the absence of anything more than fragments still extant from these texts, it remains impossible to verify many of an-Nadīm's details; but what is interesting is that at his time of writing he clearly was able to access the works themselves, and as a source he has (when possible to verify) always proved to be remarkably accurate.

The Titles of Mānī's Books

Mānī wrote seven books, one in Farsi (i.e. Persian) and six in Syriac, the language of Syria. Among them are The Book of Secrets (i.e. The Book of Mysteries), which contains (a number of) chapters, (including) 'An account of the Dayṣāniyya (i.e. the followers of Bardaiṣan of Edessa)', 'The testimony of Yastāsif on the Beloved', 'The testimony of . . . about himself given to Ya'qūb', 'The son of the widow' (who according to Mānī was the annointed and crucified one, crucified by the Jews), 'The testimony of Jesus about himself as given in Judea', 'The commencement of the testimony of al-Yamīn as given after his victory', 'The seven spirits', 'The discourse on the four transient spirits', 'Laughter', 'The testimony of Adam regarding Jesus', 'The fall from religion', 'The discourse of the Dayṣāniyya on the soul and the body', 'Refutation of the Dayṣānites on the soul of life', 'The three trenches', 'The preservation of the World', 'The three days', 'The prophets', (and) 'The resurrection'. This is what is contained in The Book of Secrets. (Then there are) The Book of Giants, containing . . . ; The Duties of the Hearers, (with) the chapter 'The duties of the Elect'; The Book of aš-Šāburaqān,[5] containing the chapters 'The dissolution of the Hearers', 'The dissolution of the Elect', and 'The dissolution of life'; The Book of Revival, containing . . . ; and The Book of Pragmateia, containing . . .

The remarkable survival of Mani's texts can be further illustrated from the titles of Mani's canonical works according to a Compendium of Manichaean doctrines in Chinese (compiled on 16 July, AD 731)[6]

Third article: On the style of the canon of scriptures and the drawing. All in all there are seven parts, together with a drawing: the first: the great ying-lun (from Gr. evangelion), interpreted 'book of wisdom which thoroughly

[4] Fihrist, ed. cit., p. 336; trans. M. Laffan (unpubl.).

[5] The Šābuhragān was a summary of Manichaean doctrines in Zoroastrian guise written in Middle Persian for Mani's patron Shapur I. For an excellent edition and translation of the nominatim fragments see Mackenzie (1979 and 1980). See also related texts collected in Hutter (1992). It was not generally included in the canon of Manichaean scriptures, which were otherwise all originally written in Aramaic.

[6] S3969 Mo-ni kuang-fo chiao-fa i-lüeh, ms. lines 57–69; Eng. trans. Haloun and Henning (1952) 194–5.

understands the roots and origins of the entire doctrines' (i.e. The Great Living Gospel);
the second: hisn-t'o-ho, interpreted 'the sacred book of the treasure of pure life' (i.e. The Treasure of Life);
the third: ni-wan, interpreted 'the sacred book of discipline', also called 'the sacred book of healing' (i.e. The Epistles);[7] the fourth: a-lo-tsan, interpreted 'the sacred book of secret law' (i.e. The Mysteries);
the fifth: po-chia-ma-ti-yeh (from Gr. pragmateia), interpreted 'book of instruction which testifies the past' (i.e. The Pragmateia);
the sixth: chu-huan, interpreted 'book of the strong heroes' (i.e. The Book of the Giants);
the seventh: a-fu-yin, interpreted 'book of praises and wishes (vows)' (i.e. The Psalms and Prayers);
one drawing; ta-men-ho-i, interpreted 'the drawing of the two great principles' (i.e. The Picture-book or Eikon).
The seven great scriptures and the (one) drawing mentioned above, Mani, the Buddha of light, at the very time when he was about to descend into the world and, all sanctities approving, responded by birth to the causes attained, on the day of the establishment of the law (he himself) transmitted (them) to the five grades (of believers). As to the authorised teaching (dharma) stated during the remainder of (his) sixty years, the disciples noted them down according to opportunity. Those (we) do not enumerate.

46. From The Living Gospel

The opening section as preserved in the Greek Cologne Mani-Codex.[8]

He wrote (again and) 66 said in the gospel of his most holy hope:
'I, Mannichaeus (sic),[9] apostle of Jesus Christ,[10] through the will of God, the Father of Truth, from whom I also came into being.[11] He lives and abides for all eternity. Before everything he is, and he remains after everything.

[7] ni-wan is a transliteration of Middle Persian dyb'n ('archive'). Cf. Henning in Haloun and Henning (1952), 207.
[8] CMC 65.23–68.5, ed. cit., 44–5; Eng. trans. J. M. and S. Lieu. This and the other citations from the Gospel were cited in the CMC in support of the apostleship of Mani.
[9] This form of the name with the doubling of the -n- is also found in Coptic (Hom. 7.5). According to Augustine (de Haeresibus XLVI.1), this was a deliberate ploy by the Manichaeans to counter the easily made association between 'Mani' and 'mania' by polemicists, and to make the name sound like the 'pourer of Manna'.
[10] The phrase 'Mani the apostle of Jesus Christ' is also found on a seal in Syriac and written in the characteristic Manichaean script. Cf. de Menasce and Guillou (1946).
[11] This is closely paralleled in the Middle Persian version; see the next text.

Everything which has happened and will happen, is established through his power. From him I have my being, and I exist also according to his will. And from him all that is true was revealed to me and from (his) truth I exist. I have seen (the truth of eternity which he revealed.) And 67 I declared the truth to my companions; I preached peace to the children of peace;I proclaimed hope to the undying generation; I chose the elect and showed the path leading to the height to those who will go up according to this truth. I have proclaimed hope and revealed this revelation; and have written this immortal gospel, in which I have put down these pre-eminent secret rites and declared great deeds, indeed the greatest and holiest of supreme deeds of power. (And) these things which (he revealed) I have made known (to those who live in accordance with) 68 the vision of supreme truth which I have seen, and the most glorious revelation which was revealed to me.'

Quotations from the first book of the Gospel as preserved in Middle Iranian fragments from Central Asia:

(a) Middle Persian version[12]
{Header} He teaches the Gospel Aleph.[13]
(She was praised and be praised), R the Maiden of Light, head of all wisdoms. It was praised and is praised, the holy church, by the power of the Father, by the praise of the Mother, and (by the wisdom of the Son), and on the speakers and hearers of the true word. (8 lines left blank) Let there be praise and honour to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost and (to the holy book.)
(. . . ca. 15 lines lost. . . . V which instructs eye and) ear, and teaches the fruit of truth. (8 lines left blank)

I Mani, apostle of Jesus the friend, by the will of the Father, the true God, he from whom I came to be, . . . is after all (things), and everything which has been and will be stands by his power. The fortunate receive this (good) news, the wise recognise (it), the strong don (it, sc. as their armour), the learned (consider (?)) (it to be) better . . .

(b) Middle Persian and Sogdian diglottal version[14]
. . . R (Pe.) and the understanding of the wise. (Sogd.) He has been praised and will be praised, the dearest-of-the-dear son, the life-giving (saviour) Jesus, head of all giving, support of the pure and perception of the wise. (Pe.) She was praised and be praised the Maiden of Light, head of all wisdoms. (Sogd.)

[12] M17, ed. and trans. MacKenzie (1994), 184 and 186–90.
[13] Middle Persian 'rb. The Gospel of Mani, according to Arabic sources, comprised of 22 chapters, each after an alphabet of the semitic alphabet.
[14] M172, ed. and trans. MacKenzie (1995), 185 and 186–90.

She has been praised and will be praised, the wonder-working Kanīgrōšān,[15] who is the head of all wisdom. (Pe.) It was praised and is praised, the holy church, by the power of the Father, by the praise of the Mother, and by the wisdom of the Son. (Sogd.) It has been praised and will be praised, the holy church, righteousness, by the power of the Father, god Zurwān, by the praise of the Mother (of Life), god Rāmrātux,[16] and (V) by the wisdom of the Son Jesus. (Pe.) Welfare and blessing upon the children of well-being and on the speakers and hearers of the true word. (Sogd.) Welfare and blessing upon the children of well-being and on the speakers and hearers of the trustworthy holy word. (Pe.)

Let there be praise and honour to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost and to the holy book. (Sogd.) Likewise let there be praise and reverence to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Spirit, and to the living scripture. (Pe.) The saying of the living Gospel, which instructs eye and ear, and teaches the fruit of truth.

A further quotation from the Gospel in the Greek Cologne Mani-Codex:[17]

Yet again he said:
'All the secrets which my father gave me, I have hidden and sheltered from the sects and gentiles and indeed the world, but to you I have revealed them in accordance with the will of my most blessed father. And if he should wish me to once more, I will again reveal them to you. For the gift which was given to me by my father is very great and (rich). For if (the whole) world and all 69 men obeyed (him), I would be able, with this possession and advantage which my father has given me, to enrich them and render the wisdom sufficient for the whole world.'

Another quotation, probably also from the Gospel, in the Greek Cologne Mani-Codex:[18]

Again he said:
'When my father showed favour and treated me with pity and solicitude, he sent from there my never-failing Syzygos, the complete fruit of immortality, who might ransom and redeem me from the error of those of that rule. He came to (me and) brought to me (the) noblest hope, the (redemption) 70 of immortality, true instructions and the laying on of hands from my father.

[15] i.e. the Maiden of Light.
[16] A tentative translation of the Sogdian version of the name of the Mother of Life given by MacKenzie ((1995), 187) is 'liberal (?) with joy (?)'.
[17] CMC 68.5–69.8, ed. cit. 46–8; trans. J. M. and S. Lieu.
[18] CMC 69.9–70.9, 48; trans. J. M. and S. Lieu.

He came and chose me in preference to others and set me aside, drawing me away from the midst of those of that rule in which I was brought up.'

47. From The Treasure of Life

There are two quotations from the Thesaurus, the latter on the 'seduction of the rulers', cited by Augustine (Latin).[19]

(Frg. 1, from the second book) Those however who by their own negligence have not allowed themselves to be cleansed from the stain of the spirits mentioned earlier and have failed to obey the divine commandments at all, and have refused to observe any further the law given them by their liberator, and have not governed themselves as was fitting . . .

(Frg. 2, from the seventh book) Then the blessed father, who has shining ships as lodgings and dwelling places according to their size, in accordance with the clemency that is attached to him, brings aid to set his vital substance free from the impious bonds and straits and torments in which it is held. By his invisible nod he transforms his powers which he has in his shining ship, and causes them to show themselves to the hostile powers which are set in the different parts of the heavens. These are of both sexes, male and female. Hence he makes the aforesaid powers appear partly in the shape of beardless boys to women of the hostile race, partly in the shape of fair virgins to males of the hostile race. He knows that all these hostile powers are easily taken in because of the deadly unclean lust that is congenital to them, and will yield to the beautiful forms they see, and will so be dissolved. Know that our blessed father is identical with these powers of his, which for a necessary purpose he transforms into the undefiled likeness of boys and virgins. He uses these as his proper instruments, and by them accomplishes his will. The shining ships are full of these divine powers which are set over against members of the infernal race as in a kind of marriage. Quickly and easily, in a moment, they achieve their purpose. When reason demands that they should appear to males they show themselves in an instant in the form of beautiful virgins. Again, when they have to come to women they put off the appearance of virgins and take on that of beardless boys. At this comely sight, their ardour and concupiscence grow, and in this way the prison of those evil thoughts is broken, and the living soul which was held bound in their members of those same (beings) is by this opportunity released and escapes and mingles with the purest air which is its native element. Souls that are completely purified board the shining ships which have been prepared for their conveyance and passage across the narrow sea (that separates them from) their homeland. Anyone who still shows the taint of the adverse race goes down step by step through fiery heat, gets mixed up with trees and the other cuttings (used for propagation) and all the seedlings and is stained with diverse colours. Out of that great shining ship the figures of boys and virgins appear to the hostile powers whose home is in the heavens and whose nature is fiery. At the fair sight the part of life which is held bound in their members is released and brought down by heat to earth. In the same way the highest power, that inhabits the ship of living waters, appears by means of his messengers in the shape of boys and holy virgins to the powers whose nature is cold and moist, which also are set in the heavens. To those which are female it appears in the form of boys, and to males in the form of virgins. By this diversity of divine and beautiful forms the princes of cold and moist stock, whether male or female, are brought to naught and the vital element in them escapes. What remains is brought down to earth by cold and is mingled with all the species of earth.

[19] (I) Aug., Contra Felicem, 2, 5, ed. Zycha, CSEL XXV/2, 832.22–7; Eng. trans. M. Vermes; (II) Aug., De natura Boni 44, ed. cit. 881,24–884,2; Eng. trans. Burleigh (1953) 344–5 (slightly altered). On the cosmogonic episode of the 'seduction of the rulers' see introduction to Mani's 'Teachings' at p. 16.

48. From an unnamed work of Mani, probably The Pragmateia

The once commonly accepted hypothesis of Cumont and Kugener[20] and followed by Adam[21] that the citations given below are from the lost canonical work, the Book of the Giants, must now be called into doubt. The Book of the Giants, as shown from extant Turfan fragments, shows the distinctive influence of the Book(s) of Enoch and this has been confirmed by Milik's identification of a prototype of the Manichaean work among the Enochic fragments from Qumran (1st C BC - 1st AD).[22] The citations are given by the Patriarch Severus of Antioch (sedit 512-38, Syriac, orginally Greek).[23]

[20] Cumont and Kugener (1912) II, 160–1. [21] Adam (1969) §5, pp. 11–14.

[22] Cf. Reeves (1992) 172–4. The lost work behind the citations gives one of the most abstract and most demythologised versions of Manichaean cosmogony, and it is not inconceivable that it was a Christianised version of a Manichaean work utilised by heresiologists for the refutation of the teachings of the community.

[23] The citations are found in Homiliae Cathedrales CXXIII of Severus of Antioch. Originally composed and delivered in Greek, the homilies have come down to us in two Syriac rescensions. The earlier that of Paul of Callinicum (ed. Rahmani (1909) pp. mh–pṭ) and the later and arguably the better of Jacob of Edessa (ed. Brière (1961) 124 (628) – 188 (692)). The following citations, translated by S. Lieu and revised by S. Brock are based on the resecension of Jacob of Edessa as edited by Brière. See also the fully annotated translation of Reeves (1992) 167–70.

From where did the Manichaeans, who are more wicked than any other, get the idea of introducing two principles, both uncreated and without beginning, that is good and evil, light and darkness, which they also call matter?[24] . . .

But he (Mani) says: 'Each one of them is uncreated and without beginning, both the good, which is light, and the evil, which is darkness and matter. And there is no contact between them.'[25] . . .

The good, which they have called light and the tree of life, occupies the regions in the east, west and north; but the tree of death which they also called matter, being very wicked and uncreated, occupies the regions towards the south and the meridian.[26] . . .

The difference and gulf between the two principles are as great as that between a king and a pig. The one moves in a royal palace in chambers fitting for him; the other wallows like a pig in filth, feeds on its foul stench and takes pleasure in it, or (is) like a snake, coiled inside its den.[27] . . .

The (beings) which have existed for ever and at all time from the beginning – he is speaking about matter and about God – each one of them exists in its own nature. Thus is the tree of life, which is decorated there with all its beauties and with all its shining splendours, which is filled and clothed with all its excellence, which stands fast and is fixed in its nature: its territory includes three regions, that of the north which is external and below, (that) of the east and (that) of the west which is external and below. There is not anything which is penetrated or occluded by it from below, not even in one region, but it (stretches) infinitely outside and below. No foreign body is around it (the tree of life) or below it, nor at another place of the three regions, but below and outside belong to it, to the north, to the east and to the west. There is nothing which surrounds and encloses it on these three sides; but it is in itself, of itself and to itself, arrayed in itself with its fruits. And the kingdom consists of it.[28] . . .

And it (i.e. the good) is not seen in the southern region, and that is because it is hidden in that which is within its bosom (the region of light); for God has built a wall around that place.[29]

Its light and its grace are invisible, so that it does not give the evil tree, which is in the south, an occasion for desire; and so that it should not be the cause for it to be provoked and harassed and to get into danger, but it [24] Hom. 123, ed. Brière (1961) 148.23–25. [25] Ibid. 150.8–10. [26] Ibid. 152.14–16.

[27] Ibid., 152.20–23. [28] Ibid., 154.7–18. [29] Ibid., 154.22–4.

is enclosed in splendour and gives no occasion because of its goodness. Yet it has preserved itself by its righteousness and is in this splendour, existing continually in the nature of its greatness in these three regions. The tree of death, however, according to its nature has no life or any fruits of goodness on its branches. It is always in the southern region. It has its own place, which is above (?) it.[30] . . .

The tree of death is divided into many (trees). War and embitterment exist in them. They are strangers to peace and are full of all wickedness and never have good fruits. It (the tree of death) is divided against its fruits and its fruits too stand against the tree. They are not at one with the one who produced them, but they all produce the worm for the destruction of their place. They are not subject to the one who produced them, but the whole tree is bad. It never does any good but is divided in itself and each individual part destroys what is nearby.[31] . . .

For they also wrote these strong words. (Let this be said) about matter and about its fruits and members: Because of the unrest – therein was the reason – it happened, that they ascended even to the worlds of light. For these members of that tree of death did not even know each other, and were not even aware of each other. For none of them knew more than its own voice and saw only that which was before their own eyes. And when it (the voice) called out something, then they heard it and were aware of it and set off to the voice with violence. They did not know anything else. And so they were stimulated and spurred on by each other to press forward even as far as the frontiers of the splendid land of light; but when they realised that its wonderful and exceedingly beautiful appearance was far better than their own, then they assembled – i.e. that dark matter – and took counsel against light to mix themselves with it. On account of their madness they did not know that a strong and powerful God dwelt therein; but they strove to ascend to the heights, because they had never recognised anything of the excellence of the Godhead, nor had they realised who God was. And they looked there, full of foolishness, urged on by the desire for the appearance of those blessed worlds and believed that it would belong to them. There arose therefore all the members of that tree of darkness, that is matter which creates ruin, and ascended with many, countless armies. Yet they were all clad in the matter of fire.[32]

The members however (of matter) were varied. Some had a firm body and were of infinite size, the others incorporeal and untouchable, having a keen perception like the demons and apparitions of phantoms. When, now, the whole of matter had arisen, it ascended with its winds and storms, with water and fire, with its demons and apparitions, the rulers and powers; and this was while they were all in the depths, so that they could associate themselves with the light. On account of this disturbance, which was prepared out of the depths against the land of light and against the holy fruits, it was necessary that a part should come out of the light and be mingled with the evil ones, so that the enemies would be captured by this mingling, and the good would have peace and the nature of the good would be preserved, after that blessed nature had been delivered out of the fire of matter; and out of that ruinous decay, and thereby again the luminous ones would be divested of matter by the power which has been intermingled, so that the matter will be destroyed from the midst and the tree of life be God in all and over all. For in that world of light there is no burning fire, to be set against evil, nor cutting iron, nor water which drowns, nor any other evil which is like it. For everything is light and free space. And no harm comes to it; but rather this exodus or crossing-over takes place in order that, by virtue of the part which came from the light, the enemies, being scattered, might cease their attack and are captured by the mingling.[33]

[30] Ibid., 154.26–156.8. [31] Ibid., 162. 6–13. [32] Ibid., 164.10–27.

(You (i.e. Mani) say): 'that this portion (of light) was given to matter in the guise of tempting bait and a deception, so that after this "the mixture" ' – as you say – 'would be purified', or rather 'the light would be found pure', as if you are supposing that you are devising a discourse about dregs mixed in wine, and not about God! 'And after the purification' – I am also saying this according to you – 'matter will be completely reduced to destruction'! For with these very words we have set you forth above as saying: 'so that matter would be obliterated from the midst'.[34]

49. From The Psalms and Prayers (?)

Here are lines from the Song of the Lovers (Amatorium canticum) as recalled by Augustine (Latin).[35] In general, the content of this canonical scripture is not well understood, nor its relationship to extant Manichaean psalmic literature. Some clue [33] Ibid., 164.28–166.15 (the same quotaton continued). [34] Ibid., 174.3–8.

[35] Aug., c. Faust. xv.5–6, p. 425.4–6, 426.8–12 and 428.5–16; Eng. trans. S. Lieu. Cf. Brückner (1901), 77–8. There is little doubt that the song is genuinely Manichaean as it renders extremely accurate information on the five sons of the Living Spirit. On this see Jackson (1932), 300–1. There are also strong echoes of this song or hymn in Coptic Manichaean psalms (e.g. PsBk2. 136.13a–17a.29–38 and 43–9 and 2.6–20). Adam ((1969), 2) suggests that the 'Canticum' could have been a fragment of Mani's Gospel.

may be provided by the canon lists embedded in the Medinet Madi Psalm-Book. Here we find:

There are two and twenty compounds in his antidote:
His Great Gospel, the good tidings of all them that are of the light.
His water-pot is The Treasury, the treasure of life:
In it there is hot water, there is some cold water also mixed with it.
His soft sponge that wipes away bruises is The Treatise.
His knife for cutting is The Book of the Mysteries.
His excellent swabs are The Book of the Giants.
The splints for every cure is the book of his Epistles.
. . . that is hot, the two Psalms, the weeping . . .
there is a cure also that is cool, his Prayers and all his lessons.[36]

It is the reference to two psalms in particular that is most telling, but whether either of these is really one of those here recorded by Augustine can not be known.

Do you recall your 'Song of the Lovers' in which you describe the supreme reigning monarch, forever sceptre-bearing, crowned with flowers and possessing a fiery countenance? . . . As you follow the song, you add (to the list of gods) twelve aeons (duodecim saecula) clothed in flowers and full of song, throwing their flowers at the Father's face. Whereupon you profess that he was surrounded by these twelve great so-called gods, three of them in each part of the four regions . . . Carry on then with what you are singing and watch out, if you can, for the shame of your idolatry. The doctrine of the deceiving demons has invited you to the imaginary dwellings of the angels where the wholesome breeze blows and to fields which abound in sweet scent and hills and trees and seas and rivers which flow forever with sweet nectar . . . Have you ever come face to face with the reigning, sceptre-bearing monarch bedecked with floral crowns and the armies of gods; and the great Keeper of Splendour (splenditenens), with six faces and expressions and is radiant with light; and another, the King of Honour (rex honoris), [36] PsBk2. 46.20 – 47.4 (ed. and trans. Allberry, and adapted by I. Gardner with reference to the reedition by G. Wurst (1996)). The reference to the number 22 in the first line indicates the Gospel which we know was constructed after the letters of the alphabet. A similar canon tradition is also found from 139.20 – 140.16, which unfortunately is rather fragmentarily preserved (though Allberry's edition is improved by Martin Krause (1994)). However, this lists 'five holy books' amongst which we can read (or reliably restore): numbered 1, the Great Gospel and numbered 2, The Treasury of Life; then follows, The Book (of the Mysteries), The Book of the Treatise, The Book of the (Giants), The Book of the Epistles, The Prayers of our lord, the two Psalms. After the first two, it is unclear how these should be grouped to render 'five'; but see the discussion in Krause (1994).

surrounded by cohorts of angels; and another, the heroic and belligerent Adamas, who carries a spear in his right hand and a shield in the left; and another, the King of Glory (gloriosus rex), who propels three wheels, those of fire, water and wind; and Atlas, chief of all carrying the world on his shoulders, down on one knee and supporting it with both arms? Have you seen all these and a thousand other portents face to face, or has the doctrine of the deceiving demons been sung to you through the lips of the deceived although you are not aware of it?

50. The titles of Mani's Epistles

The titles of The Epistles of Mani, and also of his immediate successors,[37] are given according to Ibn an-Nadīm (Arabic, 10th C. AD).[38]

The Two Sources * The Eminent Ones * The Great Epistle of India * On Seemly Goodness * The Consummation of Justice * The Epistle of Kaskar * The Great Epistle of Fatiq[39] * The Armenian Epistle * Amūlyā the Unbeliever * Ctesiphon as it appears in The Document * The Ten Words * The Teacher on Social Intercourse * Waḥman on the Seal of the Mouth * Ḫabarhāt on Consolation * Ḫabarhāt on – * The Epistle of Umhasam of Ctesiphon * Yaḥyā on Perfume * Ḫabarhāt on – * Ctesiphon to the Hearers * The Epistle of Fāfī * The Minor Epistle on Guidance * The Dualist Epistle of Sīs * The Great Epistle of Bābil * Sīs and Fatiq on Forms * The Garden * Sīs on Time * Saʿyūs on the Tithe * Sīs on Pledges. * On Organization * The epistle of Abā the Student * – to ar-Ruhā[40]* Abā on Love * Maysān[41] on The Day * Abā on – * Baḥrānā on Terror * Abā on the Recollection of Goodness * The Servant of Jesus on The Tribes * Baḥrānā on Social Intercourse * The Epistle of Šāyil and Saknā * Abā on Alms * (337) Ḥadāyā on The Pigeon * Afqūriyā on Time * Zakū on Time * Suhrāb on The Tithe * The Epistle of Karḥ and ʿUrāb * Suhrāb on the Persians * The Epistle of Abrāḥyā * The Epistle of Abū Yasām the Architect * The Epistle of Abrāḥyā the Unbeliever * The Font * Yaḥyā on Money * Afʿand on the Four Tithes.

[37] The status of these different groups of letters is unknown. As a canonical work, it would seem unlikely that The Epistles were an open-ended text (contrast the Kephalaia as little more than a genre of sub-canonical discourses); but it is possible to suppose that al-Nadim is following some model such as the Shi'ite preservation of hadith from the Imams after Muhammad.

[38] Fihrist, ed. cit., pp. 336–7, trans. M. Laffan (unpubl.).

[39] This could be the work known as the 'Epistula Fundamenti' in Roman North Africa. See below.

[40] Ar-Ruhā is the semitic name for Edessa. See below (§51) for a citation (in Greek) of this letter, as preserved in the CMC.

[41] A similarly titled epistle is preserved in the Middle Persian fragment M733, HR ii, pp. 30–32, Rd. §do, pp. 184–85 and trans. GSR, p. 258.

Then there are: Af'and on the First Felicity * on the Recollection of the Cushions * Yuḥannā on the Administration of Alms * The Hearers on Fasting and Vocation * The Hearers on the Great Fire * al-Ahwāz on the Recollection of The Angel * The Hearers on the Utterance of Yazdānbaḫt * The First Persian Epistle of Maynaq * The Second Epistle of Maynaq * The Tithe and Alms * The Epistle of Ardašīr and Maynaq * The Epistle of Salam and 'Anṣūrā * The Epistle of Ḥaṭṭā * Ḫabarhāt on The Angel * Abraḥyā on the Healthy and the Sick * Araddud on the Beasts * Aǧā on the Shoes * The Two Luminous Burdens * Mānā on Crucifixion * The Epistle of Mahr the Hearer * The Epistle of Fayrūz and Rāsīn * 'Abdbāl on (Mānī's) Book of Mysteries * The Epistle of Simeon and Ramīn * 'Abdbāl on the Garment.

51. A quotation from 'the Letter to Edessa'

This is cited in the Greek Cologne Mani-Codex.[42]

64 (We acknowledge) that he did not receive truth from men nor from the report of books, as our father himself says in the writings he sent to Edessa.[43] He says as follows:

'The truth and the secrets of which I speak, as well as the laying on of hands which is mine, I did not receive from men or beings of flesh, nor from the intercourse with writings; but when my most blessed (father) who called me to his grace and did not (wish) me and the others in the world to perish, saw and pitied me, with the purpose of (offering) well-being to those 65 who were ready to be chosen by him from the religions, then by his grace he took me away from the council of the multitude which did not know the truth. And he disclosed to me his secrets and those of his undefiled father and of the whole world. He revealed to me how they existed before the creation of the world, and how the foundation for all works, good and evil, was laid, and how they manufactured from the mixture in those (times).'

52. Passages from The Epistles preserved at Ismant el-Kharab

Among the Manichaean texts recovered by the excavations at Ismant el-Kharab there were a hundred or so papyrus fragments in Coptic from a codex that [42] CMC 64.1–65.22, ed. cit. 42–4; Eng. trans. J. M. and S. Lieu. The citation immediately precedes those from the Gospel (supra, 46).

[43] The title of the letter is given by al-Nadim (see above). Edessa, the capital city of the Roman province of Osrhoene, had long been a centre of early Christianity; especially popular there were the teachings of the 'gnostics' Marcion and Bardaisan.

evidently contained some (probably not all) of Mani's canonical Epistles. The work of reconstruction has not yet been completed, but in advance of the first critical edition (by I. Gardner and W.-P. Funk) we here provide three short passages (trans. Gardner).

In the first passage we certainly have the start of one of these Epistles. As is well known, Mani models his style on that of Paul. Here it is of interest that the text uses the spelling Chrestos, i.e. 'Jesus the 'good'; amongst ancient authors, Alexander of Lycopolis noted that the Manichaeans adopted this form (c. Manich. 34.18-21).

Manichaios, apostle of Jesus Chrestos, and all the brothers who are with me; to N.N., my loved one, and all the brothers who are with you, each one according to his name. Peace through God the Father, and our lord Jesus Chrestos, be it upon you my loved one; and may it guard you and . . . you in your body and your spirit. The Father, the God of truth . . .

In this second passage we are probably at the very end of an Epistle. The autobiographical asides are especially interesting; and the reference to 'ten sayings' means that this is probably the letter concerning 'the ten words', which is named by the Muslim author an-Nadīm in the tenth century, in his list of the titles of these scriptural texts (50).

Indeed, my loved one, I was obliged to write a mass of words to you this time; but God himself knows that these young people, whom you sent and who came, found me in how much pain. For I was sick in my body (?) and in want to come forth from it, I had no relief at all in it. For all of thirty years to the day I was never sick like this occasion; and these young people who had come, I wished merely to proclaim the news to them, and by my mouth send to you without letter. However, your heart was grieved by the words of the brothers who are ill; because of this I myself was oppressed with a great pain, and I have written to you these ten sayings that I might comfort your heart my child. I myself suffered, and that I might give relief to my child: Know therefore that these words I heard in suffering, you too receive them in joy and confirmation; and you understand them.

Finally, we provide this passage: Mani quotes a saying of Jesus (John 13:18, which is itself an allusion to Psalm 41:9) which the fourth evangelist had used with regard to Jesus's foreknowledge of his betrayal by Judas, and applies it to himself. The modelling of Mani's life-experience on that of 'our lord', and particularly with regard to the elements of the passion narrative, is a characteristic feature of Manichaean texts. This passage here evidences that this goes back to Mani himself. The peculiar form of the logion is also of interest as regards the (unresolved) question of Mani's own knowledge of the gospel textual tradition.

The saying that our lord proclaimed by his mouth has been fulfilled in me: 'The one who eats salt with me has raised his foot against me.' I (Mani) myself too, this has happened to me: One who eats salt with me at the evening table, with my clothes upon his body, he has raised his foot against me; just as an enemy would do to his enemy. All these things have I suffered from my children and my disciples, they whom I have saved from the bondage of the world and the bondage of the body; whilst I bear them from the death of the world. I, all these things, I have endured and suffered in their season from a multitude.

53. 'The Fundamental Epistle'

Citations from the Epistula Fundamenti found in the works of Augustine (Latin):[44]

(Frg. 1): Mani, apostle of Jesus Christ, through the providence of God the Father.[45]

(Frg. 2): These are the words of salvation from the eternal and living source. Whoever hears them and first believes, then keeps their teachings, will never be subjected to death but will enjoy an eternal and glorious life. For he who has been instructed in this divine knowledge is truly to be considered blessed and who, thereby freed, shall dwell in everlasting life.[46]

(Frg. 3): May the peace of the invisible God and knowledge of the truth be with the holy and beloved brothers who believe the heavenly commandments and also observe them at the same time! May the right hand of the light protect you and deliver you from every assault of evil and the snare of the world! May the piety of the Holy Spirit open up the depths of your heart so that you may see your souls with your own eyes![47]

(Frg. 4a): You have indicated to me, my dearest brother Patticius,[48] saying that you wish to know in what manner Adam and Eve came into being,

[44] The 'Epistula quam Manichaei vocant Fundamenti' was according to Augustine the most widely read work of Mani among the Manichaeans of North Africa. It formed the basis of his debate with the Manichaean doctor Felix in 404 (cf. Aug., Contra Felicem, ed. Zycha, CSEL XXV/2, 801–52) and that of a major refutation of its contents (cf. Aug., Contra Epistulam Manichaei quam vocant 'fundamenti', ed. Zycha, CSEL XXV/1, 193–248). The latter is the source of the majority of the quotations given below. There is an edition of the reconstructed text, with a detailed but dated commentary, by E. Feldmann (1987). The numbering of the fragments given below follows that of Feldmann. Eng. trans. by J. F. Hendry in Haardt (1971), 295–301; revised by S. Lieu, S. Llewelyn and M. J. Vermes.

[45] Aug., c. Epist. Fund. 5, 197.10–11 and c. Fel. 1.1, 801.16–17.

[46] Aug., c. Epist. Fund. 11, 206.18–24 and c. Fel. 1.1, 801.17–24.

[47] Aug., c. Epist. Fund. 11, 207.11–13 and 18–20 and c. Fel. 1.16, 819.9–15.

[48] This is very likely to be the same person as the Teacher Patīg whom Mani sent to evangelise the regions of the Roman Empire which bordered on those of the Sassanians (see 21)). Among the titles of Epistles of Mani given by Al-Nadim we find a 'long epistle of Futtuq' which may be the same letter as the Epistula fundamenti. The length of the extant citations which could have represented only whether they were brought forth through the word or were begotten from a body. To this you shall receive an appropriate reply.[49] This subject has been treated by many writers in various texts and revelations, and dealt with in varying ways. The truth of this matter as it stands is therefore not known by almost all peoples, and (especially) by all who have discussed the subject at length and in detail. If they had attained to a clear knowledge of the origin of Adam and Eve, they would never become subject to corruption and death.[50]

(Frg. 4b): In order to be able to penetrate this mystery however, beyond any ambiguity, one must of necessity set forth other facts in advance.[51]

(Frg. 4c): In the first place, therefore, if you will, hearken to what was before the world came into being, and how the struggle was started, so that you may be able to distinguish the nature of the light and the darkness.[52]

(Frg. 5a): In the primeval beginning there were the two substances separated from one another. God the Father ruled over the light, eternal in his holy origin, magnificent in his power, by nature true, forever rejoicing over his own eternity. In him were contained wisdom and the vital senses by which he also embraces the twelve members of his light,[53] namely the abounding riches of his own dominion. In each of his members, however, thousands of countless and immeasurable treasures are concealed. The Father himself, exalted in his glory and incomprehensible in his greatness, possesses in union with himself blessed and illustrious aeons, whose number and extent cannot be estimated. The sacred and noble Father and generator lives with them, in his splendid kingdom there is no beggar or cripple.[54]

(Frg. 5b): Thus his shining kingdoms are founded above the bright and blessed earth, in such a way that they cannot ever be moved or shaken by anyone.[55]

(Frg. 6a): Near one section and the side of that glorious and holy land,[56] (Frg. 6b): was situated the land of darkness, deep and of immeasurable extent; in it resided fiery bodies, baneful breeds. Here, emanating out of part of the work (which Augustine prefers to call a liber rather than an epistula) certainly suggests its being a long work, and much longer than an average letter of Mani.

[49] This question from an enlightened disciple and answer from the master in the form of an intended dicourse is standard in Manichaean didactic literature and is frequently used in the Kephalaia and by Manichaeans in Central Asia where it could easily be adopted to resemble a Buddhist sutra.

[50] Idem, c. Epist. Fund. 12, 207.25–208.11. [51] Ibid., 208.13–16. [52] Ibid., 208.23–26.

[53] I.e. the Twelve Aeons. These are also known as the Twelve Maidens or the Twelve Hours.

[54] Ibid. 13, 209.11–26.

[55] Ibid., 209.26–8; idem, c. Fel. 1.17, 820.10–12; idem, de natura boni 42, 877.18–20 and Evodius, de fide contra Manichaeos 11, ed. Zycha, CSEL XXV/2, 955.1–3.

[56] Aug., c. Epist. Fund. 15, 212.9–10 and idem, c. Fel. 1.19, 824.16–17. For an important study of the description of the land of darkness as depicted in the 'Epistula Fundamenti' see Puech (1951).

the same principle, came a boundless and incalculable darkness, together with its own progeny. Beyond the darkness lay filthy whirling waters with their inhabitants; further within were terrifying and violent storms with their ruler and progenitors. Next followed another fiery region, a prey to destruction, with its leaders and peoples. In the same way there lived inside it a breed filled with gloom and smoke, among whom loitered the horrible ruler and leader of all these worlds, who had congregated around himself innumerable princes, and he himself was the spirit and source of all of them. And these were the five natures of the corruption-bearing land.[57]
(Frg. 6c): But those five species inhabiting those natures were savage and destructive.[58]

(Frg. 7): The Father of the blessed light, however, knew that a great contamination and destruction was rising from the darkness and menacing his sacred aeons, unless he opposed to it an outstanding, brilliant and powerful deity, through which he would at once overcome the descendants of the darkness and destroy them, and thus, following their destruction, ensure for the inhabitants of the light eternal rest.[59]

(Frg. 8a): . . . the Father who generated there the sons of light; both the air and the land itself and the sons themselves are one substance, and all things are equal . . . [60]

(Frg. 8b): For that is this Epistula Fundamenti, which your holiness knows well, which I too have quoted, because it contains the beginning, the middle and the end.[61]

(Frg. 9): Then he (i.e. the ruler of darkness) spoke in his wanton deceit to those who were with him: 'What do you make of that powerful light rising up (over there)? See, how it sets the heavens in motion and convulses most of the powers. It is better therefore that you give over to me whatever light you have in your power. With it I shall make an image of that great one that has appeared in glory. Through that image we shall be able to rule and we shall at last be freed of this sojourn in the darkness.'

When they had heard this and debated at length, they thought it best to render up what they were asked. For they were not confident that they would be able to keep back this light permanently. They therefore considered it better to offer it to their ruler with whom they did not despair of reigning, thanks to this expediency. We must now consider the manner in which they transferred the light which they possessed. This also is scattered in all divine writings and heavenly mysteries. For the wise, of course, a knowledge of the method of transfer is by no means difficult; for this becomes apparent and clearly recognised by him who truly and sincerely desires to know.

[57] Aug., c. Epist. Fund. 15, 212.10–22. [58] Ibid. 30, 230.11–12.
[59] Aug., c. Fel. 1.19, 824, 23–9; idem, de natura boni 42, 877.21–26, idem., c. Sec. 20, 935.23–6, Evod., de fide 11, 955.3–9.
[60] Aug., c. Fel. 1.19, 825.24–6. [61] Ibid. 2.1, 828.23–6.

As the congregation of those who had assembled differed in sex, namely male and female, he commanded them to mate, whereby some in the act of coition ejected seed and the others became pregnant. The offspring were like their generators, and, as the first-born, received the major part of their parents's powers. Their ruler took them and rejoiced over them as over an extraordinary gift. And just as we even today can observe that the principle of evil forms bodies, draining power from the latest ones before creating new ones, so the ruler we have mentioned receiving the offspring of his companions, who possessed the sensual powers of their parents, their intelligence and also the light which had been procreated with them at the time of their generation, consumed them. He drew a great deal of strength out of that sort of food, in which there was not only strength but even more, cunning and the corrupted senses which derived from the savage mentality of their generators. He called to him his own female companion, who originated from the same source as himself. When he had united with her, he sowed in her, like the others had done, the surplus of evils which he had consumed, and added to these something of his thinking and his power, so that his own mind should shape and form all that he had brought forth. His female companion received it all, just as the best tilled soil customarily receives the seed. For in her the images of all heavenly and earthly powers were shaped and interwoven, so that what took shape there, possessed a similarity to the entire universe.[62]

(Frg. 10): The enemy, who hoped to have crucified that same saviour, the father of the righteous, was himself crucified: for at that time, appearance and real event were distinct.[63]

(Frg. 11): . . . the (souls) which had allowed themselves to be seduced from their former light-nature by love of the world, became enemies of the sacred light, armed themselves openly for the destruction of the sacred elements, and gave themselves up obediently to the spirit of fire. By their hostile persecution they did harm to the holy church and its elect, who are appointed adherents to the heavenly commandments; they are shut out of the blessedness and glorified state of the sacred earth. And because they allowed themselves to be overcome by evil, they shall remain within that breed of evil and have no access to that peaceful earth and the regions of immortality. This will happen to them because they have so entangled themselves in evil works that they have become alienated from the life and freedom of the sacred light. Therefore they cannot be taken back into those peaceful kingdoms, but will be confined in the terrible 'mass'[64] already mentioned, for which a guard must also be assigned. These souls therefore will remain attached to the things they have loved and be left behind in this 'mass' of darkness. This they have brought upon themselves through their own misdeeds. They made no effort to understand these teachings concerning the future, and when they were granted time to do so, distanced themselves from them.[65]

[62] Aug., de natura boni 46, 884.29–886.17. [63] Evod., de fide 28, 964.7–10.

54. 'The Letter to Menoch'

The authenticity of this text (Latin)[66] remains open to dispute. It was presented by the Pelagian writer Julian of Eclanum, who used it in his attack against Augustine, the former Manichaean.

1 Manes the apostle of Jesus Christ to Menoch[67] his daughter: May grace and well-being be granted to you by our god, who is in reality the true god, and may he himself illuminate your mind, and reveal his righteousness to you, because you are the fruit of a divine lineage.

2 (. . . Declare (?), Admit (?)) those by whom also you have been made as spotless as you are, by recognising how you were before and from what kind of souls you have sprung, a kind blended from all substances and savours and attaching to different appearances. For just as souls are begotten from souls, so the creation of the body derives from the nature of the body. Therefore, what is born of the flesh is flesh; and what of the spirit, is spirit; however by 'the spirit' understand 'the soul', then the soul (is born) of the [64] Latin 'globus horribilis'. The term 'globus' (sphere, clump) was used as a Greek loan-word in Syriac and was certainly known to Mani. Cf. Ephraim, ad Hypatium III, ed. Mitchell (1912–22), I, 87.43.

[65] Evod., de fide 5, 952.28–953.16 and Aug., de natura boni, 42, 878.23–5.

[66] Aug., contra Julianum opus imperfectum, III, 172.1–12, 186.5–12, 187.2–11, 37–42, 47–9 and 53–9 ed. Zelzer, CSEL LXXV/1 (Vienna, 1974) 473 and 485–8; Eng. trans. S. Lieu and S. Llewelyn with acknowledgement to an earlier unpublished draft translation by C. J. Morgan for the Database of Manichaean Texts. See also the text in Adam (1969) §12, pp. 31–2 (based on PL 45.1318–27) which is still widely used. For an edition of the epistle with a full listing of testimonia and a detailed commentary see Stein (1998). The numbering of the subdivisions in the translation follows that of Stein's edition. For a full study with text and translation, including those of contextual material, see Harrison and BeDuhn (2001), 131–9.

[67] Among the titles of Mani's epistles cited by an-Nadīm (see above, 50) are: 'The first Persian epistle of Maynaq. The second epistle of Maynaq. The epistle of tithe and alms. The epistle of Ardaīr and Maynaq'. However, there are good grounds to dispute Mani's authorship for the extant citations. Julian claimed to have acquired it via Constantinople, but Augustine claimed (c. Jul. op. impf. III, ed. cit. 165.4–166.5) that he had never come across it before. The letter, as Stein ((1998), 28–33) has ably demonstrated, manifests a number of peculiar readings in its New Testament citations which suggest an author familiar with the Latin version of Paul's Letters and also preoccupation with theological issues (such as infant baptism) which could not possibly have been of interest to Mani.

soul, and the flesh of flesh. 3. So just as God is the originator of souls, so the devil is the originator of bodies through lust, so that in the devil's snare by means of the lust of a woman, whence the devil lies in wait, (he catches (?)) not souls but bodies, either by sight, or by touch, or by hearing, or by smell, or by taste. 4. In short, abolish the root of this evil stock and gaze at once on your own spiritual self. For, says the scripture, the root of all evils is lust.

5. Wherefore see how foolish are they who say that his creative act was established by the good God, which act they are sure is begotten of the spirit of lust. (Yet) they unite with unwilling heart and they act with hidden shames, while they hate the light so that their works may not be made manifest. 6. For the sake of which the apostle says (Rom. 9:16): 'That it may be understood, this work is not of a willing man.' For if we perform the good, it is not of the flesh; because the deeds of the flesh are plain to see, which are fornication etc., if we do evil, it is not of the soul; because the fruit of the spirit is peace, joy (etc.) (Gal. 5:19 and 22). 7. Finally also the apostle clamours to the Romans (7:19); the good which I wish, I do not do; but I work at the evil which I dread. You see the voice of the stubborn soul, defending the freedom of the soul against lust. For he grieves because sin, i.e. the devil, is working every lust against him. 8. The authority of the law proclaims his wickedness, when it censures all his practices, which the flesh admires and praises; for every bitterness of lust is sweet to the soul, through it the soul is nourished and stirred to activity. 9. In short, the soul of the man who restrains himself from all practice of lust is wakeful, is enriched and grows; but by the practice of lust it is wont to diminish . . .

3 It is worth mentioning, because the first soul, which sprang from the God of Light, received that creation of the body that it might control it with its own restraint. The command came, sin which appeared to have been a prisoner, revived; the devil found his moments, led astray into it (i.e. the soul) the disposition of lust and by means of it he ruined it. The law indeed is pure, but pure for the pure (soul); and God's command is both just and good, but for the just and good (soul).

4 1. Yet, these are men who have dared to say that this lust is a good thing in opposition to the evangelical and apostolic books, which they keep reading in vain; you may see how their holy men at one time have slept with their daughters, at other times have had intercourse with several concubines and wives as well. And the apostles do not see this: what alliance is there for light and darkness, for the faithful and the faithless, for Christ and Babel? 2. They go astray, gathered in the gloom of lust, whose poison they so enjoy, that, seized with madness, when they perform this act, they think it has been permitted by God as if they did not know that the apostle said; what things are done by them in the dark, it is shameful to speak indeed . . .

5 1. Come, you defender of lust, with frank speech relate its fruits and its works. Behold in opposition to it I do not fear the light, which it trembles and hates. For everyone who does evil hates the light and does not come to the light lest his works be manifest. 2. Do you see that lust is the source of evil,[68] through which wretched souls are the slaves to desire, not of their own accord, because this is the only thing which we do with unwilling heart.

6 In short, every sin is outside the body, because it is active; but he who fornicates, sins against his own body. For every sin, before it is committed, does not exist; and after the deed, only the memory of its doing remains, not the image (?) itself; but the evil of lust, because it is natural, exists before it is committed; when it takes place, it is increased; and after the deed it is seen and endures.

7 If sin is not natural, why are infants baptised, who are agreed to have done no evil of themselves?[69]

8 (Let those answer), whom I have to question with these words, – if every evil is committed by an act, then before anyone does evil, why does he receive the purification of water, when he has done no evil of his own accord? Or, if he has not yet done it, must he also be purified? Is it permitted that they declare the springing forth of evil lineage by nature, these wicked men themselves whom madness does not allow to understand either what they are saying or what they are asserting as true?

55. Spurious letters attributed to Mani

The following four fragments are all cited in polemics against Monophysites by Orthodox writers and are very likely to be fabrications.

Fragment of a Letter to Addas (Greek):[70]

The Galileans affirm that Christ has two natures but we pour rude laughter on them. For they do not know that the substance of light is not mixed with [68] A peculiar misquotation of 1Tim. 6.10: 'For the love of money is the root of all evils, . . .' which seems to suggest familiarity of the reading 'cupiditas' for 'avaritia' in the versions of the Latin New Testament which argues against the letter being a genuine work of Mani. Cf. Stein (1998), 29–36.

[69] An argument unlikely to have been used by Mani given the lack of interest in the topic of infant baptism among Syriac-speaking Christians at the time of Mani. Cf. Stein (1998), 38–9.

[70] Fragmentum epistulae ad Addam, ap. Eustathius Monachus, Epistula de duabus naturis adversus Severum, PG 86.904A (= Adam (1969) §13, p. 33); Eng. trans. S. Lieu.

another matter but is pure, and cannot be united with another substance even if they seem to be joined. The title of 'Christ' is a name which is loosely applied and does not give any indication of form or being. But the highest light, remaining one with his own, appointed for himself a body among earthly bodies, being completely of one nature.

Fragment of a Letter to the Saracen Kundaros (Greek):[71]

When the Jews desired to stone Christ and to put into action the daring of their lawlessness, the son of the highest light manifested his nature clearly, and he walked through their midst without their seeing him. For the immaterial form was, though conformed in appearance to the flesh, not visible nor tangible, as matter has nothing in common with the immaterial. His (i.e. Christ's) nature is one throughout even though his bodily form was visible.

Fragment of a Letter to Scythianus (Greek):[72]

The son of the eternal light manifested his own being on the mountain since he did not have two natures, but one nature, both visible and invisible.

Fragment of a Letter to his disciple Zabinas (Greek):[73]

The nature of light is entirely one and does not suffer and its power is one. For the light shines in the darkness and the darkness did not overcome it. (The light) touched not the substance of flesh, but was veiled with a likeness and form of flesh, lest it should be overcome by the substance of the flesh, and suffer and be spoiled, the darkness spoiling its operations as light. How then did it suffer since neither did darkness overcome it nor was its operation darkened?

A single nature does not die and a semblance of flesh is not crucified. Therefore, the light remained in possession of one nature, and one activity which suffered nothing from the veil of flesh which does not have a nature which is overcome.

[71] Fragmentum epistulae ad Condarum, ap. Diekamp (ed.) (1907), 64 (= Adam (1969) §14, p. 33); Eng. trans. S. Lieu.

[72] Fragmentum epistulae ad Scythianum. ap. Justinianus, c. Monophysitas 91, ed. Schwartz (1973), 38.35–6; Eng. trans. S. Lieu. Scythianus was the name of the precursor of Mani in the polemical Acta Archelai.

[73] Fragmentum epistulae ad Zabinam, ap. Diekamp (ed.) (1907), 41; Eng. trans. S. Lieu.

CHAPTER 5

Teachings

For a summary of Mani's teaching see Introduction (pp. 8–21). The following extracts give emphasis to Manichaean writings in Coptic because of their relative inaccessibility.

56. The community sing 'the knowledge of Mani'

This psalm (PsBk2. 9.3–11.32 ed. and trans. Allberry, adapted by Iain Gardner) is now found amongst the 'psalms of the bema', at least in the Medinet Madi codex. However, it is so clearly a fundamental account of the entire history of the conflict between the two principles, the loss and redemption of the living soul, that it is tempting to suppose some special status for the piece. See further Wurst (1991).

(Psalm) 223

9 Let us worship the Spirit of the Paraclete.

Let us bless our lord Jesus who has sent to us the Spirit of truth. He came and separated us from the error of the world, he brought us a mirror, we looked,
we saw the all in it.

When the Holy Spirit came he revealed to us the way of truth and taught us that there are two natures, that of light and that of darkness, separate one from the other from the beginning.

The kingdom of light, on the one hand consisted in five greatnesses, and they are the Father and his twelve aeons and the aeons of the aeons, the living air, the land of light; the Great Spirit breathing in them, nourishing them with its light.

However, the kingdom of darkness consists of five storehouses, which are smoke and fire and wind and water and darkness; their counsel creeping in them, moving them and raising them to make war with one another.

Now, as they were making war with one another they dared to make an attempt upon the land of light, thinking that they would be able to conquer it. Yet they know not that which they have thought to do they will bring down upon their own heads.

And there was a multitude of angels in the land of the light, having the power to go forth to subdue the enemy of the Father, whom it pleased that by his word that he would send, he should subdue the rebels who desired to exalt themselves above that which was more exalted than they.

Like unto a shepherd that shall see a lion coming to 10 destroy his sheep-fold: for he uses guile and takes a lamb and sets it as a snare that he may catch him by it; for by a single lamb he saves his sheep-fold. After these things he heals the lamb that has been wounded by the lion.

This too is the way of the Father, who sent his strong son; and he produced from himself his virgin equipped with five powers, that she might fight against the five abysses of the dark.

When the watcher stood by the borders of the light, he showed to them his virgin who is his soul; they bestirred themselves in their abyss, desiring to exalt themselves over her, they opened their mouth desiring to swallow her.

He held fast her crown, he spread her over them, like nets over fishes, he made her rain down upon them like purified clouds of water, she thrust herself within them like piercing lightning. She crept in their inward parts, she bound them all, they not knowing it.

When the First Man had perfected his war,
the Father sent his second son.
He came and helped his brother out of the abyss;
he established this whole universe out of the mixture that took place of the light and the darkness.

He spread out all the powers of the abyss to ten heavens and eight earths, he shut them up in this universe for a season; while he made it a prison for all the powers of darkness,
it is also a place of purification for the soul that was swallowed in them.

The sun and moon he founded, he set them on high, to purify the soul. Daily they take up the refined part to the heights, but the dregs however they scrape 11 down to the abyss, what is mixed they convey above and below.

This entire universe stands firm for a season, there being a great building which is being built outside this world. So soon as that Builder shall finish, the whole universe will be dissolved and set on fire that the fire may smelt it away.

All life, the relic of light wheresoever it be, he will gather to himself and of it depict a Statue.
And the counsel of death too, all the darkness, he will gather together and paint its very self for a (bond (?)) for the ruler.

In an instant the Living Spirit will come . . .
. . . he will succour the light. However, the counsel of death and the darkness he will shut up in the tomb that was established for it, that it might be bound in it for ever.

There is no other means to bind the enemy save this means;
for he will not be received to the light because he is a stranger to it;
nor again can he be left in his land of darkness, that he may not wage a war greater than the first.

A new aeon will be built in the place of this universe that shall dissolve, that in it the powers of the light may reign, because they have performed and fulfilled the will of the Father entire, they have subdued the hated one, they have . . . over him for ever.

This is the knowledge of Mani, let us worship him and bless him. Blessed is he every one that believes in him, for he it is who may live with all the righteous.

Glory and victory to our lord Mani, the Spirit of truth that comes from the Father, who has unveiled for us the beginning, the middle and the end.
Victory to the soul of the blessed Maria, Theona, Pshai, Jmnoute.

57. Alexander of Lycopolis on the Manichaean system

This schematic representation of the Manichaean system is by the Neo-Platonist Alexander of Lycopolis (early fourth century, AD Greek).[1] It is a remarkable testimony to the rapid penetration of Manichaean beliefs even amongst philosophical circles in Egypt.

(II.) This is a summary of Mani's doctrine as we know it from members of his circle: He established as principles (p. 5) God and matter (Gr. hyle). God is good, matter is evil. However, there is still more good in God than there is evil in matter. That which he calls matter is not what Plato (civ. II 358e) thus named, in other words that which becomes all things by assuming the nature and the form (it is the reason why Plato calls it 'universal receptacle', or 'mother' and 'wet-nurse') (Tim. 49a). Neither is it what Aristotle meant, in other words the element to which form and privation relate (organ. II, p. 402ff., ed. Waitz), it is something else still. Indeed, it is the random movement (Gr. ataktos kinēsis) which is in every being, that is what Mani calls 'matter'. Other powers stand at God's side, these play the role of auxiliaries and are wholly good. And beside matter, there are, seemingly, other powers which are wholly evil. The splendour, the light, the on-high, all these powers are with God. Obscurity, the darkness and the here-below are with matter. God also has desires, but these are all good. Matter too has desires, but they are all evil.

[1] Alexander Lycopolitanus, contra Manichaei opiniones disputatio II–V, ed. Brinkmann (1895) 4–8; Eng. trans. S. Lieu and S. Vince. On Alexander as an important early source on Manichaeism, see esp. van der Horst and Mansfeld (1974); Stroumsa (1991); A. Villey (1985).

III. At one time, matter was seized with desire to ascend to the place on high. And, having reached it, it marvelled at the splendour and the light which were in God's company. It wished to become master of this kingdom and drive God out of it. The latter resolved to punish it, but he had difficulty in finding the evil necessary for its punishment: in fact there is no evil in God's house. Therefore he hastened to dispatch a power,[2] that which we call the soul,[3] to confront matter, with the aim of bringing about a complete mingling with it. And its consequent separation from this power would result in the death of matter. It is thus that by virtue of divine providence (p. 6) the mingling of the soul and matter will be achieved, a mingling of unlike with unlike. Yet in this mingling, the soul will contract the same affections as matter. In the same way as the contents of a poor-quality jar often become contaminated, so it is with matter, the soul undergoes something similar and, contrary to its true nature, is diminished by having had dealings with matter.

Now God was filled with compassion, and he sent another power, that which we call the 'demiurge'.[4] When this power had arrived and taken in hand the creation of the world, it separated from matter that part of the power which had not had to suffer anything contrary to its nature by virtue of the mingling: thus the sun and moon were first created. The part which had suffered moderately from dealings with matter gave birth to the stars and to the whole sky. As for the portion of matter from which the sun and moon had been separated, it was relegated beyond the confines of the world, and it is a fire, definitely burning, but without brilliance, almost like the night. As for the other elements, and the plants and animals which populate them, the divine power was mingled with them in unequal proportions. That is the reason for which the world came into being and, in this world, the sun and moon which, by means of generations and corruptions, continually separate the divine power from matter and dispatch it to God.

IV. Indeed, there is another power[5] beside the demiurge, which has borrowed the luminous rays of the sun to descend, and which works at this

[2] I.e. the Primal Man. Alexander gives no account of his suffering in the kingdom of darkness.

[3] A statement commonly found in polemical writings, see e.g. Acta Archelai VI (ap. Epiph., Panarion LXVI.25.8) (v. infra, 58) where it was the armour of the Primal Man which was the soul. However, Manichaean writings are much less unequivocal on this equation.

[4] Viz. the Living Spirit. Unlike the gnostics, the demiurge is not a negative figure in Manichaeism.

[5] Viz. the Third Messenger. Alexander is almost unique among Greek and Latin sources in identifying both demiurgic figures in the Manichaean system.

labour of separation. This labour is an obvious thing and, so it is said, even a blind man can see it. For in its waxing phase the moon collects the power which was separated from matter, and becomes filled with it during this time. (p. 7) Then, once it is full, it wanes, causing the said power to re-ascend into the sun. The sun in its turn sends it back towards God. That done, the sun receives, emanating from the last full moon, another part of the soul which migrates towards it, and, having received it, leaves it to make its own way to God by the same means. That is the sun's perpetual task.

Furthermore, one can see in the sun an image which resembles the human form. Seeing it, matter was seized with the desire to imitate it and produced man itself, thanks to the total mingling which links it to the power: therefore man himself also possesses a particle of the soul. Nevertheless, the form has contributed greatly to the fact that man participates in the divine power more than other living beings and mortals, since he himself finds that he is an image of this divine power.

Christ is an intellect (Gr. nous).[6] Coming one day from the place on high, he liberated the greater part of the power in order to restore it to God and finally, through his crucifixion, he made it known that in the same way the divine power was nailed or, in other words, crucified on matter.[7]

So, therefore, since God's decree commands that matter should perish, one must abstain from all food derived from animals, eat vegetables and all things which have no feeling, abstain from marriage, the pleasures of love-making and the begetting of children, so that the time the power spends in matter is not prolonged through succeeding generations. But it is also forbidden for Manichaeans who put themselves to death to be granted an artificial purification of the stains which their mingling with matter inflicted on the power.

v. Such are their principal doctrines. Besides, they honour the sun and moon above all else, not as gods, but as the way which allows access to God.

[6] The identification of Christ the saviour with nous goes back to the earliest Manichaean writings. In the Šābuhragān (see above, p. 152), the name for Christ in Middle Persian was xrdyšhr yzd ('God of the World of Wisdom or Intellect'). Cf. Rose (1979), 138. While the Light Mind was identified with Jesus the Splendour or the Jesus of Light by the Manichaeans, the same identification is not made with Jesus the Messiah who suffered in the hands of the Jews and was crucified. The statement that 'Christ is Nous' is further elaborated in the treatise of Alexander (§24, 34.17–35.20, ed. Brinkmann) in which he defended the name of Christ from a Christian position against Manichaean misuse which may indicate that he might have once been a Christian. On this see the important observations of Edwards (1989).

[7] I.e. Jesus Patibilis, the third manifestation of Jesus in Manichaeism.

They also say that after the total separation of the (p. 8) divine power, the external fire will melt from on high and will consume itself, together with all substance that still remains.

58. The Acta Archelai on cosmogony

Summary of Manichaean teaching on cosmogony from the Acta Archelai[8] (mid-late 4th C., Greek, with a near contemporary Latin version).[9]

(25), 3 Summary of the sacrilegious teachings of Mani:
(VII) If you wish to become acquainted with Mani's belief, then hear it from me in a brief summary. He reveres two unbegotten, eternal gods originating from their own nature, of whom the one is the adversary of the other. He introduces the one as good, the other as evil. To the one he gives the name light, to the other darkness, and he says that the soul which is in man is a part of light, whereas the body belongs to darkness and is a creation of matter. 4. He says that a mixture or confusion of them came about in the following way, comparing the two gods with the following illustration. Like two kings fighting each other, who have been enemies from the beginning and each of whom respectively has his own territory, darkness by coincidence rose up out of its limits and attacked light. 5. However, when the good Father noticed that darkness had penetrated his land, he caused to emanate from himself a power, the so-called Mother of Life and from this emanated the First Man (and) the five elements. These are wind, light, water, fire and air.[10] 6. And when he had put on these as battle armour, he descended and fought with darkness. The rulers of darkness then went over to a counter attack and ate of his armour, which is the soul. 7. Then the First Man

[8] Traditionally attributed to Hegemonius, the Acta Archelai purports to be a record of debates between Mani and various Christian leaders across the frontier in the Roman Empire, especially with the bishop Archelaeus at Carchar (= Carrhae in Osrhoene ?). The work, which also contains a highly satirical version of the life of Mani, enjoyed enormous popularity in late antiquity. Originally composed in Greek in the first half of the fourth century, it has survived in a complete form only in a near contemporary translation in Latin. However, the heresiologist Epiphanius has preserved in Greek in his lengthy article on the heresy (Panarion LXVI) substantial parts of the Greek version of the Acta including the important sections containing the summary of Mani's system. On the Acta as a source for the history of early Manichaeism see S. N. C. Lieu (1988); and Scopello (1995).

[9] Epiphanius, Panarion LXVI.25.3–31.8, ed. K. Holl, rev. J. Dummer, GCS (Berlin, 1985), 53.18–72.8; Eng. trans. M. Vermes and S. Lieu. The chapter numberings in Roman numerals are those of the Latin version of the Acta Archelai (ed. C. H. Beeson, GCS (Leipzig, 1916) 9–22). The chapter and section numberings in Arabic numerals in the translation follow those of Holl's edition of Epiphanius. For a detailed commentary on the summary see Riggi (1967), 110–59.

[10] The text reads 'matter' (Gr. hyle) but most scholars prefer 'air' (aēr) as the fifth light element, and in Coptic sources it is the living air (e.g. PsBk2. 137.36–7). The (erroneous?) reading clearly goes back to the earliest Greek versions of the Acta Archelai as the Latin translation gives materia.

down below was pressed very hard by darkness, and if the Father had not heard his prayer and sent out another power, which emanated from him, that is the so-called Living Spirit, and if this latter had not descended and stretched out his right hand, leading the First Man out of darkness, then he would long ago have risked being held fast. So from then on he left the soul down there. 8. It is for this reason that the Manichaeans shake each other by the right hand when they meet, as a sign that they are saved from darkness. For, he says, all the sects are in the darkness. Then the Living Spirit created the world, put on three other powers, descended, brought up the rulers and crucified them in the firmament, which is their body, the sphere.

(VIII) 26 Then the Living Spirit created the lights, which are the remnants of the soul, and made them circle round the firmament. Furthermore he created the earth in eight forms.[11] The Porter down below carries it, and when he becomes weary of carrying, he trembles and causes an earthquake, outside the determined time. 2. For this reason the good Father sent his son from his bosom into the heart of the earth and into its lowest parts, to bring upon him a suitable punishment. For every time the earth quakes, he is either trembling with weariness, or transferring the earth onto his other shoulder. 3. Then matter created plants from itself and when they had been stolen by certain archons, it called all the highest archons, took power from them individually, formed this man in the image of that First Man and bound soul in him. This is the reason for the mingling. 4. Still, when the living Father saw the soul suffering in the body, then in grace and mercy he sent his beloved son for the salvation of the soul. It was for this reason and because of the Porter that he sent him. 5. And the son came, transformed himself into human form, and appeared to men as a man, although he was not human. And people believed that he had been begotten. 6. So he came and made creation for the salvation of souls and produced an instrument with twelve vessels; this is turned by the sphere and draws up the souls of the dying. Then the great light takes them up with its rays, purifies them and passes them on to the moon and thus is filled the face of the moon, as we call it. For he describes the two lights as ships or ferries. 7. Then when the moon is full, it ferries the souls to the east and so wanes, as it is lightened of its load. And again it fills the ferry and again it unloads as the souls are brought up by the vessels, until it has saved its own share of soul. For every soul and every living creature has a share in the good Father's being, he maintains. 8. Now when the moon has passed on to the aeons of the Father its burden of souls, they remain in the Pillar of splendour,[12] the so-called perfect air.[13] This air is a pillar of light, because it is full of souls being purified. This is the reason why souls come to salvation.

[11] I.e. the eight earths (on which see Introduction, p. 15). It is odd that they are mentioned here without the usual accompanying 'ten heavens' or 'ten skies'.

(IX) 27 The reason, however, why men die is as follows: A lovely, decorated and very attractive maiden[14] tries to rob the rulers, who were brought up and crucified in the firmament by the Living Spirit, by appearing to the male rulers as a beautiful woman, to the female ones as a good-looking and desirable youth. 2. When the rulers see how beautiful she is, they are stung by a love-charm; since they cannot grasp her however, they become terribly enflamed and erotic desire deprives them of all reason. 3. Now when the maiden becomes invisible before their advance, the great ruler produces clouds from out of himself, to darken the world in his anger, and if he strains much, like a man he sweats and grows tired, and his sweat is the rain. 4. If at the same time the ruler of the harvest is robbed by the maiden, he pours out an epidemic over the whole earth, to kill men; for this body is called cosmos, corresponding to the macrocosm, and all men have roots beneath, which are linked with those above. So when he is robbed by the maiden, he begins to cut off men's roots; and when their roots are cut off, the epidemic breaks out and so they die. 5. However, if that which is above the roots sways as a result of the tension, an earthquake occurs as a consequence, with the Porter also shuddering. This is the cause of death.

(X) 28 I will tell you also how the soul transmigrates into different bodies. First of all a little of it is purified, then it moves into the body of a dog, of a camel or of another living creature. If it is a murderous soul, it is carried into the bodies of lepers; if it is found to have harvested, into those whose speech is handicapped. (The names of the soul are as follows: mind (Gr. nous), thinking, intellect, thought, reasoning.) 2. The harvest workers, who do the reaping, are like the archons, who were in darkness from the beginning, when they ate of the armour of the First Man. So they must be transformed into grass or beans or barley or ears of grain or vegetables, so that they too can be harvested and cut down. 3. If someone eats bread, he must also become bread and be eaten. If someone kills a bird, he will become a bird; if someone kills a mouse, he will become a mouse. 4. Furthermore, if someone is rich in this world, and has departed from his tent, he must pass over into the body of a beggar, so that he moves around and begs, and then goes into eternal punishment. 5. However, because this body belongs to the rulers and to matter, a man who plants a persea tree[15] must move through many bodies until that persea tree is felled. If a man builds himself a house, he will be distributed to all the bodies. If a man bathes, then he fixes his soul to the water. 6. And if a man does not give alms to the elect, he will be punished in hell and reincarnated in the bodies of catechumens, until he has given many alms. For this reason they bring the best of foods as offerings to the elect. 7. When they are about to eat bread, they pray first, saying to the bread: 'I have neither harvested you, nor have I ground you, nor pressed you, nor put you in an oven, but someone else has done all this and brought you to me; I have eaten (you) without guilt.'[16] When he has said this to himself, he says to the catechumen, 'I have prayed for you', and so the latter goes on his way. 8. As I said to you a little earlier, if a man reaps, he will be reaped, and similarly one who throws grain in the machine, will also be thrown in himself; whoever kneads, will also be kneaded, whoever bakes bread will also be baked. For this reason they are forbidden to carry out an occupation. 9. Once more they say that there are other worlds, from which the lights rise again, when they have set in this world. And if a man walks on the ground, he damages the earth. And whoever moves his hand, causes damage to the air; for the air is the soul of men, of animals, of birds, of fishes and of reptiles, and of anything else there is in the world. For I have told you that this body does not belong to God, but to matter, that it is dark and must be kept in the dark.

[12] Or 'radiant Pillar'.

[13] Often emended to 'Perfect Man' (the Latin version of the Acta gives 'vir perfectus'). However, the association of both 'air' (Gr. aēr) and 'man' (Gr. anēr) with the Pillar of light is found in Manichaean texts. See e.g. PsBk2.CCLXVI, trans. Allberry, 83.25–8: 'Hail, Perfect Man, holy path that draws to the height, clear air, mooring-harbour of all that believe in him: open to me thy secrets and take me to thee from affliction.' On this see van Lindt (1992) 170–5, esp. 174–5.

[14] I.e. the Virgin of Light. The link between the Virgin and human mortality and judgement is also found in other Manichaean texts. See e.g. PsBk2. CCLXVII, 84.30–2 and Keph. XCV, 244.9–13. Cf. van Lindt (1992) 176–81.

(XI) 29 About paradise, which is called "world". The trees in it are desires and other deceptions, which spoil the thoughts of men. That tree in paradise by which they know good, is Jesus, and the knowledge of him which is in the world. 2. Whoever accepts it, distinguishes between good and evil. However, the world itself is not of God, but was formed from a part of matter and for this reason everything goes to its ruin. However, what the rulers robbed from the First Man is what fills up the moon and is daily purified out of the world. 3. And if a soul departs which has not recognised the truth, it is given over to the demons, so that they can subdue it in the hells of fire. After the chastisement it is transformed into other bodies, so that it can be subdued, and so it is thrown into the great fire until the very end.

[15] I.e. a fig tree. Cf. Riggi (1967) 136–7, n. 1.
[16] For a similar prayer see P.Rylands Greek 469.23–6; translation given in 23 (ch. 3, supra).

30 About the prophets among you he says this: there are spirits of godlessness or lawlessness of the darkness which rose up at the beginning; and by them they were led into error and did not speak truly. For that ruler has blinded their senses. 2. And if anyone follows their words, he dies for all eternity, bound up in the "lump" (Gr. bolos), because he has not learnt the knowledge of the Paraclete. 3. He commanded his elect alone, who are not more than seven in number:[17] 'If you cease to eat, pray and put on your head an olive branch, exorcised in many names, to strengthen this faith.' The names however were not revealed to me; for only the seven make use of them. 4. And he went on to say that the name Sabaoth, which is great and honoured among you, is the nature of mankind and the father of desire, and for this reason simpletons worship desire because they take it for god.

5. (XII) About how Adam was created, he says this: the one who said 'Well then, let us make a man in our image and in our likeness' or in other words according to the shape which we have seen, is the ruler, who said to the other rulers: 'Well then, give me of the light, which we have received, and let us make a man, after the shape of ourselves, the rulers, which we have seen, which is the First Man.' 6. And so they created man. They created Eve in the same way and gave to her a share of their own desire, so as to deceive Adam. And through them the creation of the world came about by the creative activity of the ruler.

31 He says that God has no part in the world itself and takes no pleasure in it, because from the beginning he has been robbed by the rulers and come into oppression. For this reason he sends out and robs them of his soul every day by means of these lights, sun and moon, by which the whole world and all creation is plundered. 2. The one who spoke with Moses, the Jews and the priests is, he says, the ruler of darkness; so Christians, Jews and heathens are all one and the same, because they honour the same God. For he deceives them by his desires, because he is not the God of truth. 3. So all those who hope in that God, who spoke to Moses and the prophets, share with him the fate of being bound, because they did not put their hope in the God of truth. For that other one spoke with them according to their desires.

[17] This is an odd piece of information as the number of electi must have exceeded the number of Mani's original disciples which was twelve (see below, Aug., de haer. XLVI.16, trans. Infra, 59). Although the Latin translation of the Acta (XII.4, ed. Beeson, 19.18–19) gives the same information, later in the Latin version of the same polemical treatise (63.5, p. 92.7) we learn from Turbo a (fictitious?) disciple of Mani that one morning after the proto-Manichaean Terebinthus 'had climbed a high roof top, where he began to invoke certain names which only seven of the elect have been taught', which seems to point to an early misunderstanding by the author in summarising the teaching of Mani.

4. (XIII) After all this at the end he says, as he has written: When the elder lets his image appear, then the Porter will let the world go, and so the great fire will become free and devour the whole world. 5. Then again he puts the "lump" in the middle of the new aeon, so that all the souls of sinners shall be bound for ever. These things will happen, when the statue comes. 6. However, all the emanations, Jesus who is in the little ship, the Mother of Life, the twelve steersmen, the Virgin of Light and the third elder, who is in the large ship, and the Living Spirit and the wall of the great fire and the wall of the wind and of the air and of the water and of the inner living fire, all dwell in the little light, until the fire has consumed the whole world; within how many years I was not able to discover.[18] 7. And after that the restoration of the two natures will take place and the rulers will inhabit their lower parts, while the father will dwell in the upper parts, when he takes his own. 8. All of this teaching he passed on to his three disciples and commanded each one to go to different areas. Addas received the regions of the East, Thomas was given the land of the Syrians, Hermeias the other one travelled to Egypt. And they remain there until today, because they wish to lay the foundation of the teaching.

59. Augustine's summary of the teaching

This is the most complete and structured summary of the Manichaean system by Augustine.[19]

1. The Manichaeans sprang from a certain Persian called Manes, but when they began to publish his mad doctrine in Greece, his disciples chose to call him Manichaeus to avoid the word for 'madness'. For the same reason some of them, somewhat more learned and therefore more deceitful, called him Mannicheus, doubling the letter 'n', as if he were one who pours out manna.

2. He invented two principles, different from and opposed to each other, both eternal and co-eternal, that is, he imagined they have always been. Following other ancient heretics, he also believed that there were two natures and substances, that is, one good and one evil. Proclaiming, on the basis of their teachings, a mutual strife and commingling of the two natures, a purgation of good from evil, and eternal damnation, along with the evil, [18] According to Manichaean teaching the Great Fire will burn for 1,468 years. Cf. Keph. XXIV, 75.22–3.

[19] Aug., de Haeresibus XLVI.1–8 and 11–19, ed. cit., 84–94; trans. cit., 85–95, revised by S. Llewelyn.

of the good which cannot be purged, these heretics devise many myths. It would be too tiresome to treat all their doctrines in this work.

3. As a consequence of these ridiculous and unholy fables, they are forced to say that both God and the good souls, which they believe have to be freed from their admixture with the contrary nature of the evil souls, are of one and the same nature.

4. Then they declare that the world has been made by the nature of the good, that is, by the nature of God, but yet that it was formed of a mixture of good and evil which resulted when these two natures fought among themselves.

5. However, they claim that not only do the powers of God effect this purgation and liberation of good and evil throughout the whole universe and of all its elements, but also that their own elect achieve the same results by means of the food of which they partake. And they state that the divine substance is intermingled with this food just as it is with the whole universe, and imagine that it is purified in their elect by the mode of life which the Manichaean elect live, as if their mode of life were holier and more excellent than that of their hearers. For they would have their church consist of those two classes, elect and hearers.

6. Moreover, they believe that this portion of the good and divine substance which is held mixed and imprisoned in food and drink is more strongly and foully bound in the rest of men, even their own hearers, but particularly in those who propagate offspring. Now whenever any portion of the light is completely purified, it returns to the kingdom of God, to its own proper abode, as it were, on certain vessels, which are, according to them, the moon and the sun. In addition, they maintain that these vessels are likewise fashioned from the pure substance of God.

7. They also state that this physical light, which lies before the gaze of mortal eyes, not only in those vessels where they believe it to exist in its purest state, but also in certain bright objects where they consider it held in admixture and needing purification, is the divine nature. For they ascribe five elements which have generated their own princes to the people of darkness and give to these elements the names: smoke, darkness, fire, water, and wind. Two-footed animals were generated in smoke, and from this source they believe men to take their beginnings; serpents were generated in darkness; quadrupeds in fire; swimming creatures in the waters; flying creatures in the wind. Five other elements have been sent from the kingdom and substance of God to conquer the five evil elements, and in that struggle air has become mixed with smoke, light with darkness, good fire with bad fire, good water with bad water, good wind with bad wind. They make this distinction between the two vessels, that is, the two lights of heaven, saying that the moon has been made of good water, and the sun has been made of good fire.

8. Moreover, on those vessels there are holy powers, which at one time change themselves into males to attract females of the opposing faction, and at another into females to attract males of that same opposite faction. The purpose of this is to enable the light which they have intermingled in their members to escape when their passions are aroused by this attraction, and to allow it to be taken up by the angels of light for purification, and when purified to be placed aboard those vessels to be carried back to their proper realm . . .[20]

11. Yet they do not eat meat either, on the grounds that the divine substance has fled from the dead or slain bodies, and what little remains there is of such quality and quantity that it does not merit being purified in the stomachs of the elect. They do not even eat eggs, claiming that they too die when they are broken, and it is not fitting to feed on any dead bodies; only that portion of flesh can live which is picked up by flour to prevent its death. Moreover, they do not use milk for food although it is drawn or milked from the live body of an animal, not with the conviction that there is nothing of the divine substance intermingled with it, but because error itself is inconsistent. For they do not drink wine either, claiming that bitterness is a property of the princes of darkness, though they do eat grapes. They do not even drink must, even the most freshly pressed.

12. They believe that the souls of their hearers are returned to the elect, or by a happier short-cut to the food of their elect so that already purged, they would then not have to transmigrate into other bodies. On the other hand, they believe that other souls pass into cattle and into everything that is rooted in and supported on the earth. For they are convinced that plants and trees possess sentient life and can feel pain when injured, and therefore that no one can pull or pluck them without torturing them. Therefore, they consider it wrong to clear a field even of thorns. Hence, in their madness they make agriculture, the most innocent of occupations, guilty of multiple murder. On the other hand, they believe that these crimes are forgiven their hearers because the latter offer food of this sort to the elect in order that the divine substance, on being purged in their stomachs, may obtain pardon for those through whose offering it is given to be purged. And so the elect themselves perform no labours in the field, pluck no fruit, pick not even a leaf, but expect all these things to be brought for their use by their hearers, living all the while, according to their own foolish thinking, on innumerable and horrible murders committed by others. They caution their same hearers, furthermore, when they eat meat, not to kill the animals, to avoid offending the princes of darkness who are bound in the celestials. From them, they claim, all flesh has its origin.

[20] The sections omitted (i.e. §§9 and 10) are given in 40 (ch. 3, supra).

13. And if they make use of marriage, they should, however, avoid conception and birth to prevent the divine substance, which has entered into them through food, from being bound by chains of flesh in their offspring. For this is the way, indeed, they believe that souls come into all flesh, that is, through food and drink. Hence, without doubt, they condemn marriage and forbid it as much as is in their power, since they forbid the propagation of offspring, the reason for marriage. 14. They assert that Adam and Eve had as their parents princes of smoke, since their father, whose name was Saclas, had devoured the children of all his associates, and in lying with his wife had, as if with the strongest of chains, bound in the flesh of his offspring whatever he had received mixed with the divine substance.

15. They maintain that the serpent of whom our scriptures speak was Christ, and they say that our first parents were illuminated by the latter so that they might open the eyes of knowledge, and discern good and evil; further, that this Christ came in recent times to set souls free, not bodies; and that he did not come in real flesh, but presented the simulated appearance of flesh to deceive human perception, and therein he feigned not only death, but resurrection as well. They assert that the god who gave the law through Moses, and who spoke in the Hebrew prophets is not the true God, but one of the princes of darkness. Even in the New Testament they, claiming falsification, choose among the various books, and thus they accept what they like from it and reject what they do not like. They prefer certain apocryphal writings to the scriptures, as if they contained the whole truth.

16. They claim that the promise of the lord Jesus Christ regarding the Paraclete, the Holy Spirit, was fulfilled in their heresiarch Manichaeus. For this reason, in his writings he calls himself the apostle of Jesus Christ, in that Christ had promised to send him and had sent the Holy Spirit in him. For the same reason Manichaeus also had twelve disciples in imitation of the twelve apostles. The Manichaeans keep this number even today. For they have twelve of their elect whom they call masters, and a thirteenth who is their chief, but seventy-two bishops who receive their orders from the masters, and an indefinite number of priests who are ordained by the bishops. The bishops also have deacons. The rest are called merely the elect; but even any of their members who seem suitable are sent to strengthen and support this error where it exists, or to plant it where it does not.

17. They allege that baptism in water grants no salvation to anyone, and do not believe that they have to baptise any of those whom they deceive.

18. In the daytime they offer their prayers towards the sun, wherever it goes in its orbit; at night, they offer them towards the moon, if it appears; if it does not, they direct them towards the north, by which the sun, when it has set, returns to the east. They stand while praying.

19. They ascribe the origin of sin not to a free choice of the will, but to the nature of the opposing element, which they hold is intermingled in man. For they assert that all flesh is the work, not of God, but of an evil mind, which emanating from the opposite principle, is coeternal with God. As they will have it, carnal concupiscence, by which the flesh lusts against the spirit, is not an infirmity engendered in us by the corruption of our nature in the first man, but a contrary substance which clings to us in such a way that if we are freed and purged, it can be removed from us, and can live, even alone, immortally in its own nature. These two souls, or two minds, the one good, the other evil, are in conflict with one another in man, when the flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh. This defect in our nature has not been healed, as we say it has, nor will it ever be healed. Yet, that substance of evil, after being disjoined and separated from us, even at the end of this world, upon the conflagration of the universe, will live in a "lump", as if in an eternal prison. They claim that a sort of envelope or covering, composed of souls which are good by nature, but which, nevertheless, have not been able to be purged from the contagion of the evil nature, will continually come and cling to the "lump".

60. An account of the evocation of the gods

This is one of the best known of the kephalaia (entitled: 'The seventh, concerning the Five Fathers' 34.13–36.26), due to its full and ordered account of the evocation of various Manichaean divinities. However, it is important to note that the schema of the 'five fathers' is not an archetypal classification prior to all the other theological taxonomies evident throughout the texts; but, rather, only a partial and conditioned representation of the overall system.

In temporal priority the Third Ambassador is the principal divinity of the third evocation (redemption). In the first evocation (descent) the Father had summoned the Mother of Life, who then called forth the First Man and his five sons. In the second evocation (creation) there was summoned the Beloved of the Lights, the Great Builder, and the Living Spirit and his five sons. Kephalaion 7 is concerned with the sequence from the Father through the Ambassador; and its purpose is, therefore, the emanation of the divinities from the aspect of redemption.

Once again the enlightener, our father the apostle of truth, is sitting in the midst of his disciples and preaching to them of the greatnesses of God. Again, he speaks to them like this, in his revelation: Five fathers exist, they were summoned forth one of one. Also, one did come out of another!

The first Father is the Father of Greatness, the blessed one of glory, the one who has no measure to his greatness; who also is the first only-begotten, the first eternal; who exists with five fathers for ever; the one who exists before every thing that has existed, and that will exist.

Now he, the glorious Father, summoned from him three emanations. The first is the Great Spirit, the first Mother, who came out of the Father. She appeared first. The second is the Beloved of the Lights, the great glorious Beloved, the one who is honoured; who came out of the Father. He manifested out of him. The third father[21] is the Third Ambassador, the eldest of all the counsellors; who came out of the first Father. He appeared.

This is the first Father, the first power, the one from whom the three great powers came out. This is the first Father, the first eternal, the root of all the lights; from whom the three emanations came out. They have humiliated the darkness. They have brought its heart's desire to naught. They have given themselves the victory. They have also given the victory to their aeons.

The second father, who came out of the first Father, is the Third Ambassador, the model of the King of lights. And, again, he too summoned and sent out of him three powers. One is the Pillar of Glory, the Perfect Man; the one who bears up under all things; the great Pillar of blessing; the great porter, who is greater than all the porters. The second is glorious Jesus the Splendour; the one through whom shall be given life eternal. The third is the Virgin of Light, the glorious wisdom; the one who takes away the heart of the rulers and the powers by her image, as she fulfills the pleasure of the greatness.

[21] Textual error: the Ambassador is the second father, but the third emanation of the first Father.

The third father, who came out of the second father; he is glorious Jesus the Splendour. And, again, he too summoned [20] three evocations after the pattern of the second father. The first power whom he summoned is the Light Mind, the father of all the apostles, the eldest of all the churches; the one whom Jesus has appointed corresponding to our pattern in the holy church. The second power whom Jesus summoned [25] is the great Judge, who gives judgement on all the souls of mankind, his dwelling being established in the atmosphere under . . . wheel . . . stars. The third power is the Youth, the great . . . light in his two persons, in . . . , I am speaking about that which has been established [30] in the summons and the obedience. He too stood with his father the king . . . the saviour . . . seen, as he tells . . . I, what I have seen with my Father, I tell to you. For yourselves, what you have seen with your father, do that.[22]

36 The fourth father is the Light Mind, the one who chooses all the churches. And, again, he too summoned three powers after the pattern of Jesus. The first power is the Apostle of Light; the one who shall on occasion come and assume the church [5] of the flesh, of humanity; and he becomes inner leader of righteousness. The second is the counterpart, who shall come to the apostle and appear to him, becoming companion to him, sticking close to him everywhere; and providing help to him all the time, from all afflictions and dangers. The third [10] is the Light Form; the one whom the elect and the catechumens shall receive, should they renounce the world.

And also the fifth father is this Light Form; the one who shall appear to everyone who will go out from his body, corresponding to the pattern of the image to the apostle; and the three [15] great glorious angels who are come with her. One (angel) holds the prize in his hand. The second bears the light garment. The third is the one who possesses the diadem and the wreath and the crown of light. These are the three angels of light, the ones who shall come with this Light Form; [20] and they appear with her to the elect and the catechumens.

These are the five fathers who have come out of one another. They have appeared and manifested through one another. Blessed is he who will know and understand them! For he may find life eternal; and receive these light garments [25] that shall be given to the righteous, the faithful, the givers of peace, and the doers of good things.

[22] John 8:38.

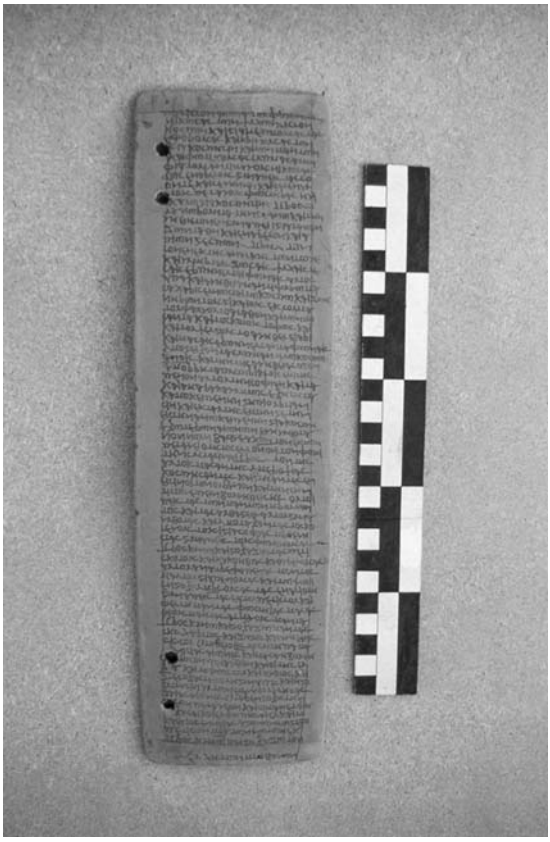

Figure 5.1. Prayer of the Emanations from Kellis

61. 'The prayer of the emanations'

This text (fourth century AD Greek)[23] was found at Ismant el-Kharab in early 1992. The fact that the hymn did not try to disguise or modify its polytheism gives the impression that it was composed in the first half of the fourth century, viz. before the dominance of Christianity compelled the Manichaeans to veil their cult in a semblance of monotheism. The authorship or status of the text is not known, but it is a remarkable example of Manichaean composition in Greek and is unique in the large number of Manichaean technici termini (mostly of Syriac origin) which it contains.

[23] Ed. and trans. Jenkins (1995); some adaptations by Gardner and Lieu. (N.b. the provisional numbering system, viz. 'T. Kellis 22', utilised in that publication was subsequently abandoned by the Dakhleh Oasis Project and should not be followed.) The text is described by the editor as follows: 'A single wooden board, 31 high by 9 cm (with Schriftspiegel 28 by 7 cm) ultimately deriving (as the presence of binding holes demonstrates) from a wooden board book of narrow proportions. . . . Nomina sacra are present, according to a system which is more or less familiar from Christian manuscripts.' (Jenkins (1995), 243).

(Side I) (Heading) Prayer of the Emanations

I worship and glorify the great Father of Lights from pure thought. With a guileless word you have been glorified and honoured: You and your majesty and the wholly blessed aeons. For you in glory have perfected their foundation. Your power and glory and your light and word and your majesty and the aeons of affirmation and all your counsel have been glorified. For you are God, the foundation of every grace and life and truth.

I worship and glorify all gods, all angels, all splendours, all luminaries, all powers: Those which are from the great and glorious f(ath)er, those which subsist in his holiness, and in his light are nourished, purified from all darkness and malignance.

I worship and glorify the great powers, the enlightening angels: Those, having advanced by their own wisdom and having subjected the darkness and its remorseless powers which were prepared to fight with the ruler of all; these are those who created heaven and earth and bound in them all the substance of contempt.

I worship and glorify the offspring of the greatness, the enlightening mind, king (and) Christ: The one who came forth from the outer aeons into the upper creation, and from that to this lower creation; and having incomparably announced his wisdom and the ineffable mysteries to people on earth, and having displayed to the entire universe the way of truth, and having preached with all voices, and having distinguished truth from the lie and light from darkness and good from evil and the just from the wicked. From you every grace has become known to the universe, and life together with truth to every tribe has been interpreted with all voices. He himself has become for living souls the redeemer from the obligation of the inimical bonds.

I worship and glorify the living God, virtuous and true: The one who, by his own power, raised up all things, this arrangement above and below.

I worship and glorify the great luminaries, both the sun and the moon and the virtuous powers in them: Which by wisdom conquer the opponents and enlighten the entire arrangement, and of all observe and judge the world and conduct the victorious souls into the great aeon of light.

(Side II) I worship and glorify the five great lights: Through which the entire universe came into existence, and through which heaven and earth (and through which (?)) by participation power and beauty and soul and [75] life are present in all. And without these the universe could not exist.

I worship and glorify all gods, all angels, the living and pure: [80] Who support this whole creation with the permission of the great and virtuous light, who rules over all those (now) singing (these) hymns.

[85] I worship and glorify all the enlightening angels: Who dominate the totality of the universe, and subject all demons and all [90] evil, shielding righteousness and guarding it from the wicked demons and growing the good in it.

[95] I worship and glorify all the righteous: Those who escape from all evil, those who both have existed before, exist now, are coming into existence and are [100] ready to come into existence because they have recognised truth and all preeminence; the chaste and firm, in order that all [105] those whom I have worshipped and glorified and invoked may assist me and bless me with favour and may deliver me from every bond and all constraint and oppression and [110] every reincarnation, and provide me with access to the great aeon of light which all the wise and [115] upright in knowledge hope to attain, where peace and the purest of the good rule, where there is no perception of evil but ambrosia [120] and eternal life are present, where all the inhabitants are without any need and experience neither death nor corruption.

Blessed be he who prays [125] this prayer frequently, or at least on the third day, with a pure heart and forthright speech, asking for [130] forgiveness of sins committed.

The Prayer of the Emanations is ended.

62. Concerning the coming of the soul

This is the second of the so-called 'Psalms of Thomas' (PsBk2. 205.10–207.16, ed. and trans. Allberry, adapted by Iain Gardner), a group of psalms found at the end of the Medinet Madi codex. In style, terminology and imagery they are distinct from all the other texts in the collection, even though these also evidence many clear variations in authorial style and purpose. It has been suggested that the group title (ⲛ̄ⲫⲁⲗⲙⲟⲥ ⲛ̄ⲑⲱⲙ) may be better understood as 'Psalms of the Twin-Spirit', and that these are songs of the inspired and Paraclete-indwelt Mani himself. This might help to explain some of the power of the poetry and imagery, and also the apparent lack of concern with the doctrinal fixities so noticeable in much of Manichaean church literature. One can also note evident parallels with Mandaic literature, and (in the following example most clearly) with the enigmatic 'Hymn of the Pearl' found embedded in the Acts of Thomas.

205 Concerning the coming of the soul

They that are not as I am made themselves like me, they that are unworthy of me made me wroth.

The wretches that belong not to the house of my Father:
they rose, they took arms against me,
they rose, they took arms against me,
making war with me, making war with me;
fighting for my holy robe, for my enlightening light, that it might lighten their darkness;
for my sweet fragrance,
that it might sweeten their foulness;
because of my brethren, the children of the light, that they might give a peace to their land;
because of my sister, the hour of light,
that she might be a strengthening of their building.
A part therefore went forth from my robe, it went, it lightened their darkness;
my sweet fragrance went,
it sweetened their stink;
my brethren, the children of the light, went,
they gave a peace to their land;
my sister went, the hour of light,
she was a strengthening of their building.

They take arms against me, making war with me, crying out against me, like men going to subdue a camp;
they drew the swords against me, like men going to kill lions;
they stretched their hands to the bow against me, like thieves going to attack a man.

206 They did not stir from warring with me until (they had made) a wall against me,
the weak and paralysed ones continually crept;
they did not stir until they had made a wall against me, they crept until they had made a wall against me;
they established a watch outside me . . . ,

the bell was made to go round because of me.

My good fortune (came) on my behalf, the wretches thinking in their heart that I (was) a man for whom none would seek. I therefore was looking towards my Father,
that he might send aid;
looking towards my brethren, the children of the light, that they might come, tracking me;
my Father therefore sent the aid to me;
my brethren arose, they became one with me.

Through a cry only which my brethren uttered, their wall tottered and fell;
their wall tottered and fell,
their watches were unable to stop them;
nor was he that goes round with the bell and cries good fortune found, against the cry which my brethren uttered;
the demons ran to the darkness, the demons ran to the darkness, trembling seized their ruler entirely.

Yet I said to my brethren:
'Suffer me yet this hour';
I was quieting my brethren that they might not destroy their firmament, for I await my robe until it comes and clothes him that shall wear it;
I will await my enlightening light, until it strips itself of their darkness;
I will await my pleasant fragrance until it returns to its place;
I will await my sister, the hour of light,
until she casts their corruption away;
I will await my brethren, the children of the light, until their stature (?) is completed for them.

When therefore my shining robe comes and clothes him that shall wear it; when my pleasant fragrance strips itself of their stink and returns (to its place);

207 when my lightening light leaves the darkness;
when my brethren, the children of the light,
are complete in their stature;
when my sister, the hour of light, goes up and sees the land of light:
Then I will strike my foot on the earth and sink their darkness down;
I will smite their heights with my head, and shake their firmament, and the stars shall fall down like these . . . ;
I will uproot the darkness, and cast it out,
and plant the light in its place;
I will uproot the evil, and cast it out, and plant the good in its place.

The universe will be full of glory,
the land will be without suspicion;
the entire earth will contain the righteous,
they of the land will dwell in peace;
there being no more rebel from henceforth,
no name of sin can be uttered again.
The rich ones of light will rejoice on every side without any grief:
That which the living ones took was saved;
they will return again to that which is their own.

63. The five worlds of the kingdom of darkness

This kephalaion is entitled: 'Concerning the Five Storehouses that have poured forth from the Land of Darkness since the beginning; the Five Rulers, the Five Spirits, the Five Bodies, the Five Tastes' (30.12–34.12). Elaborate descriptions of the kingdom of darkness, and its powers, are a feature of Manichaean (and anti-Manichaean) writings that must derive from canonical sources. The overall conception, with its delight in pentads, and a certain attention to what can be termed the psychosymbolism of evil, has a stamp that is unmistakably Mani's. Specific features, such as the 'five trees', appear in other gnostic writings; and may serve to indicate Manichaean influence, rather than vice-versa.

Kephalaion 6 (and compare also 27) evidences some textual development; and probably some corruption in the tradition. The redactor appears unsure of the relationship of the supreme King of Darkness (30.33–33.1) to his five warring rulers in the various sub-kingdoms; but tends toward identifying him with the King of Smoke (33.2–4). He is thus to be distinguished from the ruler or King of the sub-world of Darkness (33.33–34.5). Manichaean writings are also unclear about the relationship of the supreme King to personified Matter, who here appears to be prior to him as his fashioner (31.8–16). These points have been discussed by H.-Ch. Puech (Puech (1951)); who also shows that the parallel passage in the Mandaean Right Ginza XII.6 (278–282) is secondary to the Kephalaia.

Once again the enlightener speaks to his disciples: Five storehouses have arisen since the beginning in the land of darkness! The five elements poured out of them. Also, from the five elements were fashioned the five trees. Again, from the five trees were fashioned the five genera of creatures in each world, male and female. And the five worlds themselves have five kings therein; and five spirits, five bodies, five tastes; in each world, they not resembling one another.

The King of the world of Smoke . . . who came up from the depth of darkness; this is he who is the head of all wickedness, and all malignity. The beginning of the spread of the war occurred through him; all the battles, fights, quarrelling, dangers, destructions, fights, wrestling-contests! That is the one who first made arise danger and war, with his worlds and his powers. Afterwards, also, he waged war with the light. He pitched a battle with the exalted kingdom.

Now regarding the King of Darkness, there are five shapes on him. His head is lion-faced; his hands and feet are demon- and devil-faced; his shoulders are eagle-faced; while his belly is dragon-faced; his tail is fish-faced. These five shapes, the marks of his five worlds, exist on the King of the realms of Darkness.

Now, there are five other properties in him. The first is his darkness. The second is his putridity. The third is his ugliness. The fourth is his bitterness, his own soul. The fifth is his burning, which burns like an iron . . . as if poured out from fire.

There are also three others in him. The first, that his body is hard and very tough, even as she has formed him . . . cruel-hearted; namely Matter, who is the thought of death, the one who sculpted him from the nature of the land of darkness. This is the manner of the body of the ruler of Smoke. He is harder than every iron, copper and steel and lead; as there is no cleaver at all, nor any iron implement, can . . . him and cut him. For Matter, his fashioner, has formed him . . . strong and hard.

The second, that he wounds and kills by the word of his magic arts. His recitation and hearing, all his foolish instruction, make magic and invocations for him. When it pleases him, he can make an invocation over himself, and by his magic arts be hidden from his companions. Again, when it pleases him, he can be manifested over his powers and appear to them; so that these enchantments nowadays, which people utilise (?) . . . this world, are the mysteries of the King of Darkness. Concerning this, I command you [25] all the time: keep away from the magic arts and enchantments of darkness! For any person who will be taught them, and who does and accomplishes them; at the last, in the place where will be bound the King of the realms of Darkness with his powers; there they will bind that one also, the soul of whoever has lived freely among them and [30] walked in the magic arts of error. Whether it is a man or a woman, this is the sentence given, cut . . . from God's judgement, that whoever will . . . with their King.

32 The third, that the King of the realms of Darkness knows the converse and language of his five worlds. He understands every thing he hears from their mouths, as they address one another; each one of them in his language. Every design [5] they will consider against him; every snare they debate with one another, to bring upon him; he knows them. He can also understand the gesturing they signal between one another. Yet, his powers and his rulers, who are subject to him, can not understand his wordy converse. While all these things [10] are unveiled to him; still their heart is not manifested to him. He knows not their mind nor their thought; he can not ponder their beginning and their end. Rather, he only knows and apprehends what is before his eyes.

Also, another different thing is found in the King of the realms of Darkness. [15] For when it pleases him to move, he spreads all his limbs out and walks. When it comes to mind, he withdraws his limbs and takes them in, and is rolled (?) to his companions; and he falls to the ground like a grape and a great iron ball! He terrifies by his cry, [20] he is frightful. He frightens his powers with his sound; because when he speaks, being like thunder in the clouds, he resembles the . . . of the rocks . . . When he cries out and . . . and calls . . . over his powers; they shall tremble and totter and fall under foot, [25] even as some birds would be . . . the bird . . . and they fall down to the earth. Still, this thing only: he knows not what is far from him, he sees not who is at a distance, nor does he hear him. Rather, whoever is before his face he sees, hearing him and [30] knowing him.

These signs and these evil marks are found in the chief of the demons and fiends, the King of all the mountains of Darkness . . . the one to whom the land of darkness has given birth, begotten in its cruelty, in its wickedness and its wrath . . . 33 more than all his fellow rulers, who are in all his worlds.

Gold is the body of the King of the realms of Darkness. The body of all the powers who belong to the world of Smoke is gold. And also, the taste of its fruits is [5] salty. The spirit of the King, of the realms of Darkness, is this one who reigns today in the principalities and authorities of the earth and the entire universe. I mean these who reign over the entire creation, humiliating mankind with tyranny, according to their heart's desire.

In contrast, the King of the worlds of Fire is lion-faced, the foremost [10] of all the beasts. Copper is his body. Again, the body of all the rulers who belong to Fire is copper. Their taste is the sour taste that is in every form. Also, the spirit of the King, of they that belong to the world of Fire, is this one who reigns in the greater ones and the leaders; who are under [15] the command of the principalities and authorities and the kings of the world. Also a spirit of his is found in these sects that worship fire, as their sacrifices are offered to fire.

Again, the King of the worlds of Wind is eagle-faced. His body is iron. Also, the body of all they who belong to [20] the Wind is iron. Their taste is the sharp taste that is in every form. His spirit is the one of idolatry to the spirits of error who are in every temple, the sites of idols, the sites of statue- and image-worship, the shrines of the error of the world.

[25] For his part, the King of the world of Water is fish-faced. His body is silver. All the other rulers who belong to Water, silver is their body. Also, the taste of their fruit is the sweetness of water, the sweet taste that is in every (form). Again, the spirit of the King, of the rulers of Water, is this one who [30] reigns today in the sects of error; these that dip the baptism of the waters, (setting) their hope and their trust in the baptism of the waters.

Again, the King of the world of Darkness is a dragon. His body is lead and tin. All the other rulers [35] who belong to the world of Darkness, their body is lead and 34 tin. And, also, the taste of their fruits is bitterness. Again, the spirit who reigns in them is the spirit who speaks till today in the soothsayers, giving oracles; in the givers of portents, every type; in they who are possessed; [5] and the other spirits that give oracles, every type.

Concerning this I tell you, my brethren and my limbs, the perfect faithful, the holy elect: Hold your heart close to you, and you stay away from the five enslavements of the five dark spirits. Put [10] behind you the service of their five bodies. Live not in them, that you may break loose their chain and their chastening for ever!

64. The 'three days' and the 'two deaths'

This is kephalaion 39 (102.13–104.20: 'Concerning the Three Days and the Two Deaths'), which surveys the entire history of the divine and its conflict with the darkness from the viewpoint of eschatological hope. From a Manichaean perspective (as it were!), this is a most suitable place to begin an account of this history. Life in this time and world is but a precursor to the reign of the saints in the new age and the new earth. There the First Man, the victorious son, will be king (compare Hom. 41.11-20). However, this too will come to an end; when the hidden Father at lasts reveals his image, and receives the souls and gods back into the heart of the eternal kingdom, from where they have been barred since the beginning of the conflict.

In contrast to this glorious hope, sinners are warned of a second death, eternally separated from life and the divine.

Once again the apostle speaks to his disciples: Happen you know, my beloved ones, that there exist three great mighty days in all; and also two great and bitter deaths. When his disciples heard [20] they say to him: Tell us our father, what are these three great days? Or again, what are these two deaths that are bitter?

He speaks to them. The first day is our father, the Man. From the time when the First Man went down to the abyss of darkness [25] and drowned in it; and the Living Spirit was sent, who went and bore him up. After the Man had ascended, the Father of Life and the Great Spirit set things in order, and the worlds above and below.

Furthermore, the glorious Ambassador came and dwelt in the ship of the day. [30] He displayed his glorious image, and he purified the light out of all things. He walked in the heights of the heavens. Till the time when the world will be dissolved, all things destroyed, the great fire released, and the Last Statue ascends. [35] These three deeds were begun on this first day, when they sent the First Man with his five sons.

In contrast, the first death 103 is the darkness that mixed with the five sons of the First Man.

The second day is the time when the fathers of light, who were victorious in the struggle, will sit on their thrones in the new aeon and dwell [5] on the new earth. And they reign in the new aeon till the Father unveils his image above them. The length of the sojourn (?) in the new aeon equals the measure of the first day spent in affliction. They will reign like this and rejoice in the new aeon.

[10] The great third day is the time when the Father will unveil over them his image . . . and he raises them up . . . and he receives them in to his hidden treasury . . . and he gives . . . his soul. He can pour out upon them . . . [15] his ambrosia and his sweet perfume, which takes away all affliction that they have seen with their eyes. . . . fullness and a joy eternal! When his grace would sate them, he gives to them his . . . and they are made anew in them.

Also, he can summon them once more in peace [20] and silence, and perfect their stature in same measure as his first aeons. And he sets each power in its aeon, in its dwelling-place. They will dwell in the new aeon in their aeons! Now, when they dwell in their aeons, they will become rich beyond measure, [25] for ever, beyond time.

From then on they will not count that season amongst them; nor the number of the days, nor the hours, generation after generation, for ever and ever. The Father will not be hidden from them, from this time on. Rather, he has accomplished (his) unveiling to them . . . he being revealed [30] to them for ever.

These are the three great days, which the Father of Greatness has given number to in the reckoning.

In contrast, the two deaths that I have proclaimed to you are these. 104 The first death is from the time when the light fell to the darkness, and was mixed in with the rulers of darkness; until the time when the light will become pure, and be separated from the darkness in that great fire. The remainder left [5] behind there can build and add to that Last Statue.

Now, the second death is the death in which the souls of sinful men shall die; when they will be stripped of the shining light that illuminates the world. And also they are separated from the living air, from which they receive [10] living breath; and they are deprived of this living soul, which . . . in the world; and they are separated and swept away from this Last Statue . . . and bound on . . . the female will become . . . [15] their torture and their affliction; for their deeds . . . those three places; because they have blasphemed and despised the Holy Spirit since every generation of the world.

These are the two deaths. The first death is temporal; but the second death is eternal. It is the [20] second death!

65. The seven works of the Living Spirit

This is kephalaion 32 (85.19–86.17), which is very typical of the genre with its elaborate taxonomies and numerical sequencing. These would have had catechetical and mnemonic purposes; and the genre can be understood as an evolving, open-ended source and instruction volume for the elect. Here the concern is with the Living Spirit, the Manichaean demiurge. He is the principal god of the second emanation (creation), whose tasks connect the first (descent) and the third (redemption). Therefore, he saves the First Man; defeats the demons who have devoured the living soul; and constructs the universe with the use of their bodies in which there is now both light and darkness. The universe is then held in place by the five sons of the Living Spirit and a multitude of other divine powers.

It is the Living Spirit who first called out the summons to redemption which, joined with the obedience of the First Man, becomes the active will to salvation. Thus it is mixed with the five sons of the Man, the soul.

Once again the enlightener speaks: The Living Spirit has done seven works with his strength.

The first: He brought the First Man up from the contest, the way [25] a pearl is brought up from the sea. The second: He spread about the one who had rebelled, he crucified him in every body. The third: He trampled, piled up, and pierced the essences of death. The fourth: He constructed the ships of light.

The [30] fifth: He evoked his five sons, and distributed them about. They took possession of the zone, they bore up under all the universe's weight. Also, he evoked three living words. He set them upon the three vessels, another one upon the giant. Again, he evoked the summons, that it might be mixed with the five shining [35] men.

86 The sixth: When he had constructed the zone he arose and sent forth a multitude of powers and many angels; so that they would bound the circuit of the zone on every side, until he finished constructing the works. And at the end of all the [5] works he took some of them in to his storehouses, and he appointed others at the watch-posts.

The seventh: At the time when the Ambassador displayed his glorious image, the Living Spirit established many gods and angels. They . . . [10] They took hold of it, that the entire building . . . not . . . one another against the light, which he had . . .

Also another great and glorious work he will enact at the end is the Last Statue, which he will bring up to the aeons of light; and he . . . in, and he takes hold, and he smites . . . , [15] and he builds, and he . . . , and he . . . them.

Blessed is he who knows him in the new aeon, and dwells in that aeon of glory and joy!

66. Mani discusses astrology

This kephalaion (no. 69, 166.31–169.22: 'Concerning the Twelve Signs of the Zodiac and the Five Stars') is one of a number where astrological teachings are introduced into and reconciled with the Manichaean system. In this instance the framing sequence, i.e. as a discourse of Mani's, is most likely to be an entirely artificial device.

Mani is asked to explain the distribution of the twelve signs of the zodiac and the planetary stars. Since he subscribes to the astral fatalism found throughout gnostic and esoteric systems in late antiquity, he identifies them as evil rulers from the worlds of darkness. However, it is noticeable that this causes a variety of structural problems for his system, all of which are apparent in this chapter. In Manichaeism the demiurge is one of the light-gods, the Living Spirit; unlike in many of the other dualistic traditions. Thus, it is constantly necessary to explain why evil powers are given a place and a role in the universe. The characteristic pentads of Mani's system, here the five worlds of darkness from which the evil powers originate, cannot be made to fit the distribution of the twelve zodiacal signs.

Perhaps of most interest, Mani is clearly aware that the ruling powers are commonly understood to be the seven and the twelve (as in Mandaeism). However, since for him the sun and moon are divine vessels, he must develop his teaching about the two ascendants. In this chapter there are two obvious attempts to reconcile this matter.

Once more, during one of the times, the apostle is sitting down 167 among the congregation. A disciple stood before him and questioned him. He says to him: We entreat you, our master, that you may recount to us and explain about the twelve signs of the zodiac that are set in the sphere. How are they determined? Or to what place do they belong, [5] according to their essence? Or else again, these five stars that circle in them, from whence are they? Or why has the demiurge appointed them as the authorities and leaders? He is the great constructor who has appointed the entire creation; and he has bound and fixed them on the sphere. Now, we entreat you, our [10] master, that you may satisfy us about these things that are hidden from all mankind.

Then he speaks to that disciple who had questioned him: Whether these twelve signs of the zodiac that are fixed on the sphere, or these five stars that circle upon them; those and these are rulers, all of them, according to their essence. They are all enemies and rivals to [15] each other <one oppresses another, they threaten each other>. They plunder one another by the action of the great craftsman who has formed all the worlds. He has gathered them and bound them on the sphere above, which circles constantly. Now, while it circles and tumbles them, so they shall do everything that they desire, above and below, according to their pleasure. [20] Nevertheless, a guardian is over them, a debt-collector above them; compelling, extorting, and taking what is theirs away from them!

Now, this is how it can rightly be understood. They were seized from the five worlds of darkness, and bound on the sphere. Two zodiacal signs were taken per world. Gemini [25] and Sagittarius belong to the world of smoke, which is the mind. In contrast, Aries and Leo belong to the world of fire. Taurus, Aquarius and Libra belong to the world of wind. Cancer and Virgo and Pisces belong to the world of water. Capricorn [30] and Scorpio belong to the world of darkness. These are the twelve rulers of depravity, the ones that wickedness shall not . . . For they cause all the evil and . . . in the world, whether in tree or in flesh.

168 And understand also about these five stars, the leaders: from where were they formed? The star of Zeus (Jupiter) was generated from the world of smoke, which is the mind. In contrast, Aphrodite (Venus) came about from the world of fire. 5 And then Ares (Mars) belongs to the world of wind. Hermes (Mercury) belongs to the world of water. Cronos (Saturn) belongs to the world of darkness.

And also, the two ascendants are counted to fire and desire; the dry and the moist. They are the father and the mother of all these.

10 And also, the sun and the moon, which are counted in with them as a rule <counted to their kind, but why did they count them in with them?> so that they would reign over them. You will discover they subjugate them at every moment.

These seven we have named, the five stars and the two ascendants. They are the doers of wickedness that do every wicked and bad act in every land, the whole of it, above 15 and below, in every creature, in the dry and the moist, in tree and flesh.

Once more I reveal to you about these signs of the zodiac: they are distributed, appointed on four sides, three per angle in these four places. And they are fixed to this revolving sphere. Aries, 20 Leo and Sagittarius, these three belong to a single side.[24] In contrast, Taurus, Capricorn and Virgo, these other three belong to another side. And then Gemini, Libra and Aquarius belong to another side. Scorpio, Pisces and Cancer belong to another corner. Now, they 25 are placed like this, appointed to these four parts, and distributed on the sphere.

So, when the side of Aries, Leo and Sagittarius will be plundered by the guardian who is over it, who extorts from it and the leaders who move upon it; at that instant shall affliction strike 30 all the four-footed creatures below. However, when the side of Taurus, Virgo and Capricorn will be plundered; affliction shall 169 at once befall the herbs, together with the vegetables and all the fruits of the trees. Yet again, when the side of Scorpio, Pisces and Cancer will be plundered; scarcity shall befall the waters upon the earth, 5 and drought be from place to place. Conversely, should the side of Gemini, Libra and Aquarius be plundered;

[24] The circle of the zodiac is quartered, with each set of three houses grouped as by an equilateral triangle. Thus Aries, Leo and Sagittarius are not consecutive signs; but rather the first, fifth, and ninth houses.

deformity and stuntedness shall befall the form of mankind from place to place.

Behold now, I have explained to you about these twelve [10] signs of the zodiac: They were fashioned from the five worlds of darkness, and bound on the sphere.

Also, I have taught you about the other five, the stars: They too came about from the five worlds of the land of darkness.

I have recounted to you also about the two ascendants: They are set [15] to the mystery of fire and desire. They are the dry and the moist, the father and the mother.

Again, I have revealed to you about the sun and the moon: They are strangers to them. Still, because of the constraint of the arrangement, in that the thing receives light, and as they belong and plunder them; [20] because of this they were counted in with them in relation to the calculation of the number. For, the sun and the moon are from out of the greatness, not belonging to the stars and the signs of the zodiac.

67. The Coptic treatise on the Light Mind

This complex treatise, which is found embedded in the Medinet Madi Kephalaia of the Teacher codex (89.18–102.12, entitled 'Concerning the Light Mind and the Apostles and the Saints'), has substantial parallels in other Manichaean literatures.[25] Its concern is to demonstrate the correlation between the macrocosmos and the microcosmos of the human body. The prodigious gods and demonic beings who inhabit Mani's worlds are here integrated with the more accessible workings of religious psychology. These insights into the life of the community aid an understanding of the appeal and success of Manichaeism.

(89.21–90.14) A disciple asks Mani a series of questions about the Light Mind, the god who enters into the believer and transforms the old man into the new man. How can this happen, and why does the old man continue to rebel? He also asks Mani about his apostolate.

(90.15–92.8) Mani begins his discussion with the macrocosmos. The universe is constructed in the form of a human. Its life and soul are the five sons of the First Man. The five sons of the Living Spirit are the intellectual qualities, who act as sleepless guardians, each firmly established in its place. The summons and the obedience, that is the active will to salvation personified in Jesus the Youth, become the sixth sons of each. The Pillar of Glory, the Perfect Man, is the Mind in the universe.

[25] Manichaean texts on the same theme and obviously derived from Mani's original writings in Syriac (Book of the Giants ?) can be found in Parthian, Sogdian, Old Turkish and Chinese. On this see especially Sundermann (1992), 13–22. See also Lieu (1998), 59–75. A new edition of the Chinese with Parthian, Sogdian and Old Turkish parallels by Sam Lieu and Gunner Mikkelsen for the Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum is forthcoming.

(92.9–94.16) The five sons of the Living Spirit each have their appointed watch-districts. Yet, demonic rebellions have occurred in each during the course of cosmic history; and have had to be dealt with by various gods.

(94.17–95.1) Similarly the Light Mind dwells in the human body, and needs to deal with the treachery of sin manifested by the old man who still lies bound within. Mani assures his listeners that despite the recurrence of evil the powers of light know the final victory; and thus always act for the good.

(95.2–10) Mani briefly answers the disciple's question as to how the mighty Light Mind can live in this small fleshly body.

(95.10–97.24) Sin constructed the human body from evil matter. Yet, its soul is divine, being taken from the five sons of the First Man. The five intellectual qualities were bound in the body and overlaid by corresponding evil qualities. This led the soul into error and forgetfulness of its true origin. When the Light Mind comes it frees the divine qualities, binds the evil ones, and imprisons sin. Thus the believer is transformed into a new man.

(97.24–99.17) Nevertheless, sin can rebel and cloud the intellectual qualities, leading the believer once again into error. Mani explains the process by which such a person may gradually come to turn against the true faith, despite the love and support of church leaders and friends.

(99.18–100.17) Mani emphasises to his disciple that he has now explained the workings of the Light Mind in the body, whose role corresponds to that of the watch-keepers in the macrocosmos. By purifying the spiritual intellect the elect can ascend in their hearts to God the Father, and know everything.

(100.19–102.3) Mani now turns to the disciple's final question about his apostolate; and explains how he, although a solitary man against the world, has been victorious over all the kings and earthly powers. Thus he has achieved more than all previous apostles, excepting only Jesus.

(102.4–12) The disciples thank Mani and promise to be strong in their faith.

Once again, at one of the times, a disciple questioned the apostle, saying to him: You have told us that the Light Mind is this one who shall come and assume the saints. You said it to us like this: He too is one among the gods . . . 25 . . . many gods are with him. You have also told us: When he enters within the body of the flesh and binds the old man with his five counsels, he sets his five counsels upon him in the five limbs of his body.

So, now, where is he? In that the old man is chained in the body! 30 For I see how rebellions arise there despite his bondage, from time to time.

Also, secondly, I ask you: If then he is a great god, unchanging and immeasurable, how could he come and appear in the smallness of the body?

The third thing I want you to recount to 35 me . . . a holy one is the Mind, and he is pure; . . . the defilement of this body?

90 Fourthly: If truly the Light Mind exists in the saints, why is his likeness not displayed to us, the way that he is?

The fifth thing I want, for you to tell me and explain about your apostolate. [5] Look, it is not clear to me! For they oppress and persecute you in the world.

I entreat you: Can you persuade me about these things that I have asked you?

Then he speaks to that disciple: My entire revelation, which I have unveiled, I have declared to my church. [10] In your presence! This one alone among . . . him.

This disciple says to the apostle: All that you have unveiled you have . . . in our presence. Yet, I wanted to know . . . the Light Mind, the way that he is.

[15] Then the apostle says to him: If I shall repeat . . . to you about these things that you are so set upon, and they become true for you after you are so set upon them, will you understand what you . . . ? On your account I will give vision to they who see! I will make the living fountain overflow for the thirsty, that they may drink and live.

[20] Then speaks the apostle to him: All the error, when the enemy of the lights constructed it, he constructed after the likeness of a man. The head of the universe is the beginning of the garments. His neck is the nape of the garments. His stomach is the five unfolded ones (?), which are . . . of the garments. [25] His ribs are all the firmaments. His navel is the sphere of the stars and the signs of the zodiac. And also, the parts that come from his navel to his hip are . . . that come from the sphere to the corners of the four worlds. His loins are the three earths that are below . . . [30] upon the head of the Porter. His . . . from the . . . to the earth upon which the Porter stood firm. His shins and his feet are . . . and the entire zone that belongs . . . 91 His heart is mankind. His liver is the four-footed animals. His lung is the race of birds that fly in the air. His spleen is the race of fish that swim in the waters. His kidneys are the world of reptiles that creep [5] upon the earth. His outer skin is the wall that . . . which surrounds the piercing and the great fire. His . . . the vessels of the great fire. His . . . of darkness. His gall is the . . . His great intestine is the breadth of the great . . . [10] . . . of the worlds. His veins . . . all the springs and wells. His eyes (?) . . . His feet are his . . .

This is how each of the worlds have been harmonised (?). [15] Five gods are fastened in him. . . . they are his soul and his life . . . man is a sinner . . . the Living Spirit and the Ambassador . . . the five sleepless guardians.

He has . . . [20] the Keeper of Splendour, the mind which is . . . in the world of the mind that is above. He has . . . whole . . . of the powers of heaven that are in . . . of the great King of Honour, who is the thought that exists in the seventh firmament. He has humbled . . . [25] . . . also of the Adamant of Light, who is the insight . . . he has given . . . because of lust . . . He has also appointed the King of Glory, who is the counsel . . . patience over the three images; that of wind, that of fire, and that of water. He has handed over to him the . . . [30] . . . do evilness. . . . the Porter, who is the consideration . . . the wisdom in the . . . which is below. He has made him . . . the foundation below . . .

92 Furthermore: The Ambassador refined from them five intellectuals of life. Also, the summons and the obedience were situated there. Now, they made six sons of the Living Spirit, together with the six sons of the First Man.

[5] Further: the Ambassador placed in them the great mind; who is the Pillar of Glory, the Perfect Man.

Furthermore: Jesus the Youth was set there; who is the image of the living word, of the utterance and the obedience.

He has made strong these camps, those above and those below [10] . . . each one of them will be secure in the circuit of his watch-district, so that neither uprising nor treachery are made in his watch-district.

And look, see! The Keeper of Splendour is set firm in the great mind, in the camp above the prison of the bound ones, for he brings to nothing all the gloom of death. [15] And a treachery came about, and an uprising. The sin aborted, it tangled in with the soul. It became mixed with this light that it expelled toward the image of the Ambassador. It went . . . in the third firmament that is above the watch-tower . . . the Keeper of Splendour. From that place also it tangled [20] in with the light. It was detached and came down to that which is dry and that which is moist. It fashioned the trees upon the dry (land); but in the sea it immediately took form and made a great uprising in the sea.

Again, look, see! The great King of Honour, who is [25] the thought, he is in the third firmament.[26] He is made . . . with wrath. And an uprising came about. A treachery and an anger happened in his camp. The watchers of heaven, who came down to the earth in his watch-district, they did all the deeds of treachery. They have revealed crafts [30] in the world and have unveiled to people the mysteries of heaven. An uprising came about, and a destruction, on the earth . . . to it.

The Adamant . . . the fulfilment. He is set firm upon . . . 93 and a treachery came about in his camp; the occasion when the abortions fell to the earth. They formed Adam and Eve. They begat them so as to reign through them in the world. They fashioned every object of lust upon the earth. The entire world was filled by their lust. Also, they persecute the churches. They kill the apostles and the righteous in the watch-district of the Adamant of Light, time after time, and from generation to generation.

[26] Probably an error for the seventh firmament.

Once again: In the watch of the great King of Glory, who is the great counsel, he who exercises authority over the three wheels. A disturbance came about, and an affliction, for they were . . . pained and oppressed in the three earths. After the Ambassador displayed his image, the paths closed to their . . . their ascent was impeded by them . . . the wind, the water, and the fire ascend on them.

Once again: In the watch of the Porter, he who humiliates . . . uprising of the abysses below . . . bent, the fastenings underneath were loosened . . . in the foundation below.

On account of the earthquake that happened in the watch of the Keeper of Splendour; the Pillar of Glory came forth, as it . . . helper of the Keeper of Splendour. It bore up under all burdens.

Conversely, because of the treachery and the uprising that happened in the watch of the great King of Honour, which is the watchers who came down to earth from the heavens; four angels were called upon about them. They bound the watchers with an eternal chain, in the prison of the blackened ones (?). They obliterated their children from upon the earth.

Then again, the abortions descended in the watch of the Adamant and begat Adam and Eve; because of that great treachery which happened, and the mystery of the wickedness, he sent Jesus . . . the prayer of the five sons. He assumed them . . . the abortions. He fastened them beneath the . . . the mind of Adam.

94 Also, because of the earthquake that happened in these three earths, and in that the paths were hindered and the springs of wind and water and fire were impeded, Jesus cast himself down. He assumed Eve; and he straightened the tracks of the wind, the water, and the fire. He opened the springs for them, and he set in order the path of their ascent.

Once again: Since the earth beneath the Porter was loosened from the fastenings that . . . because of this too Jesus went down, assuming Eve until he reached that place. He set in order and strengthened the fastenings beneath. He returned, he came up to his . . . rest.

Then speaks the apostle to him: Look at all these watches of the zone, the ones in which these great gods are master, watching over them . . . Uprisings have happened, and treachery, in them. The . . . . . in them from time to time; with a great humiliation, until they humbled the powers of the enmity.

So also is this body! A mighty power lives here, even if it is small in its stature. Nevertheless, sin dwells within, and the old man who is lodged in it. Certainly he is cruel, [20] with great cunning; until the Light Mind finds how to humble this body, and drive it according to his pleasure.

Just so, in the watch-districts of his great outer brothers, they who are masters in the zone. In them, in the great body: the earthquake and treachery happened [25] from time to time. So, also, is the watch-district of the Mind, which is the body of the flesh. Sin raises up, from time to time, its agitations in the body.

Now you, understand thus, that the powers of light are good. The beginning and the end are unveiled to them. [30] All that they do is being done with correct judgement. Indeed, because of this they may permit the enmity to initiate error, and do its pleasure for a moment. Then they seize . . . 95 . . . they have acted first with a righteous judgement.

And with respect to this other (question) that you have put forward: How may the Light Mind come, this great and honoured mighty one, and assume this little body of the flesh? Again, look, see! These gods, in that [5] . . . are great and mighty ones. And each one of them is enclosed and hard pressed in this place wherein he is set; like trees holding to their taproot. So also this is how each one of them has 'held to his taproot' in the world, according to the kind of place in which he is set, bearing up till [10] . . .

Now, also, happen you know . . . the world is set firm, being ordered . . . the five sons of the Living Spirit in all its members . . . sin took this body out from the land (?) . . . constructed it in its members. It took its body [15] from the five bodies of darkness. (Sin) constructed the body. Yet, its soul it took from the five shining gods. (Sin) bound (the soul) in the five members of the body. It bound the mind in bone; the thought in sinew; the insight in vein; the counsel in flesh; the consideration in skin.

(Sin) set fast [20] its five powers: its mind upon the mind of the soul; its thought upon the thought of the soul; its insight upon the insight of the soul; its counsel upon the counsel of the soul; its consideration upon the consideration of the soul. It placed its five angels and authorities upon the five members [25] of the soul, which it had brought in and bound in the flesh. They . . . , pronouncing to the soul and continually leading it on to every evil thing, to all the sins of lust, to the worship of idols, to erroneous opinions, to humiliation; in the humiliation of slavery! As it is set fast, worshipping [30] the things that . . . will not remain; making obeisance . . . idols of wood and gold and silver. . . . worshipping beasts 96 that are unclean and polluted! They are ugly in their appearances and their forms.

(The soul) assumed error and forgetfulness. It forgot its essence and its race and its kindred; knowing not the door of the place to pray to him, nor call up [5] to him. It became hostile to its father . . . itself, being wicked . . . its own light . . .

The Light Mind comes and finds the soul . . . it assuming it in the . . . [10] . . . its wisdom . . . he shall become for it . . . the bonds . . . members in the body. He shall loosen the mind of the soul and release it from the bone. He shall release the thought of the soul [15] from the sinew; and so bind the thought of the sin in the sinew. He shall release the insight of the soul from the vein; and so bind the insight of the sin in the vein. He shall loosen the counsel of the soul, and release it from the flesh; and so bind the counsel of the sin in the flesh. He shall [20] release the consideration of the soul from the skin; and bind the consideration of the sin in the skin.

This is how he shall release the members of the soul, and make them free from the five members of sin. Conversely, these five members of sin, which were loose; [25] he shall bind them. He shall set right the members of the soul; form and purify them, and construct a new man of them, a child of righteousness. And when he fashions and constructs and purifies the new man; then he shall bring forth five great living members out from the five great members. [30] And he places them in the members of the new man. He shall place his mind, which is love, in the mind of the new man. Also, the thought, which is faith, he shall place in the thought of the new man; whom he shall purify. His insight, which is perfection, he shall place 97 in the insight of the new man. His counsel, which is patience, he shall place in his counsel. Also, wisdom, which is his consideration, in the consideration of the new man. He shall make the image of the word pure from the word of [5] sin; and he adds to it his word, so that his . . . becomes nourisher and strengthener . . .

Now, when he shall perfect . . . the twelve members. This is how . . . and his wisdom. His . . . [10] . . . becomes righteous, as he perfects . . . While formerly he was running . . . but instead of this, now he runs . . . his road and his path and his . . . also he mounts up to the heights, to the great aeons . . . [15] . . . thus the old man is bound in the . . . and his lust, his . . . his foolishness in these five members of the body . . . the dark spirit is imprisoned with them in a bond and in severe misery.

Also, the new man reigns [20] by his love, by his faith, by his perfection, by his patience, and by his wisdom. Yet, his king . . . the Light Mind, he who is king over the totality. He reigns over it according to his pleasure. While the members . . . , thus sin is imprisoned. Still, the Light Mind [25] is king, and an affliction may arise in the body from time to time.

There are occasions when sin shall mount up with its foolishness; and it disturbs the consideration, and it clouds the wisdom and the understanding of the person. It causes truth to be split into doubt in him, and he utters some foolish words [30] and some . . . When the manner of his foolishness will come to the . . . in the church, the teachers and the . . . and the . . . and the presbyters shall gather . . . helper. And they put straight his wisdom . . . His consideration has been set right 98 about this. His wisdom has been set in its right place and ordered . . . well.

Now, if he shall not accept the rebuke and the edification of his brethren and his helpers; then shall sin mount up again, another time, from the consideration to [5] the counsel. It takes his patience from him, and bestows upon him faint-heartedness and hurt. And the sin is displayed in the midst of his brethren. His . . . for every thing that he shall do . . . advice of his brethren, and he becomes . . . [10] the foolishness. A battle and a war shall arise (between) the Light Mind and the sin in the counsel . . . they shall group together and become . . . there, and they cause him to cease from the . . . and they put him straight in his place another time . . . his [15] companions in his struggle.

If again the . . . to that place, then again sin shall rise . . . and clothe him with lust and vanity and pride. He separates from his teacher and his brethren. He shall always want to go in and to come out alone. [20] He shall want to eat and to drink alone, a solitary man. He shall always want to walk alone. Indeed, this is the sign that the familiarity of his brethren does not act on him.

Should he again not . . . his heart from lust; again sin shall mount up, the thought of death, to his thought. He shall . . . [25] a vanity; and causes his faith and his truth to leave him. When the sign of his foolishness will be displayed, and his reputation spreads in the church, the wise ones of the church shall gather to him; so that they may set right his heart, and encourage it with God's edification. If now he took the [30] advice of his brethren, and listened to . . . and set himself apart from his wrath and . . . 99 It is possible he could live and be victorious over the sin, and all its wars.

Yet, if he shall not make this watch secure, (sin) shall rise up and assume his mind; and disturb his mind, which formerly was calm. It shall disrupt his love, away from his teacher and his [5] instructor. It shall take from his heart love of the church, and fill it full of hatred. And all his brethren become hateful before him. His brethren and his loved ones and his friends who love him; they shall be like enemies before him. Now, that person is disturbed like this, and he lets his [10] love and his will turn from him. That person shall himself become a vessel of loss, and he separates from the church, and his end comes down to the world. The Mind, who was in him, shall disperse from him and go to the apostle who sent him. He shall be filled by evil spirits; [15] and they deal with him, dragging him hither and thither. And he himself becomes like wordly men. He will change and become as if a bird, were its feathers plucked out. He becomes an earthly man.

Then have I taught you, and opened your eyes, as to how confusion shall arise in the zone; in the camps of [20] these great mighty gods? Again, this is how disturbance shall come about, from time to time, in the . . . of the Light Mind. So also these watch-keepers, for they are set . . . firm in the zone, (but) they are not visible. Again, this too is the way of the Light Mind, for he is not visible in the body.

[25] Also, corresponding to these outer watch-keepers; in that while they are great; yet have they contorted themselves. They have . . . , they have become small, to the measure of the task which is apportioned to each one of them. Again, this too is like the Mind, himself a great one, and exalted; but he is bent over and has become small, to this little worthless body.

[30] Even so the gods in the outer zone: they are transcendent and purified, they are set fast in the mingling of the totality, (but) are not defiled. This too is like the Light Mind. While he is placed in his . . .

100 Again, behold the mightiness and the activity of the Light Mind: how vast he is over all the watch-districts of the body! He stays fast at his camp. He shuts off all deliberations of the body from the beguilements of sin. [5] He limits them and distributes them out. He sets them down at his pleasure.

Also, he does another work, surpassing and exceeding (these). He bestows a great spirit upon the elect one. Indeed, now may you find him, as he stands on the earth, rising up in his heart and ascending to the Father, the [10] God of truth. He who exists and is established above all the things of loss. Once again, he may push down in his insight and his consideration, and descend to the land of darkness, from where the darkness has poured forth. His heart shall run and touch everything, as it . . .

[15] Then he says to that disciple: I have taught you the deeds of the Light Mind! Whoever has an open and perceptive eye, he can appear to him. Whoever has not that eye, he can not appear to him.

And, also, as to my work that is not manifest nor revealed to you, [20] the deeds that I have done; I will teach you about them, and open your eyes to this wonder . . . and of my leadership.

Observe from this! That I, a single Manichaios, I have come to the world alone. And the races and kindreds of the body, [25] and the gold and silver and brass . . . copper, and the many gifts and breastplates and armour of the multitude, and much humanity, submit to me. Many types of gods and idols from smelting furnaces! You have beheld the kingdom of the world. For, despite great effort, [30] even with many benefits and gifts, with a breastplate and a violent war; they have not subdued the cities nor conquered the countries. Yet, I, I have conquered without breastplate and without armour 101 distant cities by the word of God, and distant countries. And they bless my name, and it is glorified in all countries.

Understand also another thing that I will teach you. The kings have striven with me, and the nobles and [5] officials and their powers, so that they might bring to nothing this truth. They did not have the strength for this against me. Now, if I am alone, why did they not have power against me? Namely, all these who have striven with me.

The third thing: No one in the world has given freedom to his children and [10] his brothers and his kin, and made them free from the variance of all things, the way I have. I who have made all my children free from every toil and every . . .

The fourth thing: I have covered them with the breastplate of wisdom; so that you will not find a single one among mankind [15] . . . and he is victorious over them. For as no single person is able to be victorious over me in the entire world; so it is also like this for my children. No person will be able to be victorious over them!

The fifth thing: I have chosen with my power this entire great election. I have given my children my emblems of authority . . . [20] and the great springs of wisdom, so that . . . apostle . . . of the church . . . I have made it mine. I have made my church strong, and appointed in it all good things that are beneficial to it in every matter. I have planted the good, I have sown the truth in every land, [25] far and near. Apostles and ambassadors I have sent to all countries. Therefore, the former apostles who came before them did not do as I have done in this hard generation; apart from Jesus only, the son of greatness, who is the father of all the apostles. [30] So, all of the apostles have not done as I, I have done! Look again, and see now: How great is my power and my activity? For not one among the former apostles, . . . in the flesh has reached my like in the . . . through me. For this great 102 door has been opened, opened by me, to the gods and the angels and mankind, and all the spirits and the living souls, who are prepared for life and eternal rest.

Then, after his disciples had heard all these sayings, which he [5] proclaimed, his disciples answered. They say to him: Great and mighty are all these things that you have uttered to us; which you have done by your power, and the power of the one who sent you. Who could fully recompense you for the grace that you have done us, except this one who sent you? Still, the only gift [10] available to us, to repay you, is this: that we will make ourselves strong in your faith; and persevere in your commandments; and also be persuaded of your word, which you have proclaimed to us.

68. The descent of Jesus

This kephalaion (no. 8, 36.27–37.27: 'Concerning the Fourteen Vehicles that Jesus has boarded') evidences the total integration and subsumation of Jesus into the Manichaean system, with the consequent striking presentations of traditional themes (here the incarnation). The fourteen vehicles correspond to the stations through which Jesus passes as he descends deeper into matter for the purpose of salvation; and to the divine elements that he assumes and thus sanctifies in this descent. The listing of the ten 'carriages in the zone' reverses an order most familiar in accounts of the ascent of the light elements, the qualities of the living soul, as they pass through the redemptive process of summons and obedience, and finally ascend perfected from the Pillar to the moon and thence the sun.

[30] Once again, the light-man speaks to the congregation that is sitting in front of him: When Jesus the son of greatness came to these worlds, at the time that he unveiled the greatness, he boarded ten vehicles! He journeyed in the universe by them.

The first vehicle is the light ship, since [35] he received instructions from the Ambassador there. 37 The second carriage is the ship of the First Man, since his dwelling is established there. The third is the Pillar of Glory, the Perfect Man, since he shone forth there. He came below, he appeared in the world. [5] The fourth is the summons that he clothed upon his body. The fifth is the obedience that he swathed upon the summons. The sixth is the living air, and since he assumed it too, he received anointment there. The seventh is the living wind that blows. The eighth [10] is the light that illuminates. The ninth is the living water. The tenth is the living fire that is above them all. He was journeying in these ten carriages among all the orders and all the . . . , those above and those below.

After he had assumed these ten, he came and manifested in the [15] flesh. He chose the holy church in four vehicles. One is all the holy brothers. The second is the pure sisters. The third is all the catechumens, the sons of the faith. The fourth is the catechumens, the daughters of the light and truth.

These ten carriages [20] that he boarded in the zone, and the other four that are in the flesh; they complete and make fourteen carriages! He has done in them the pleasure of his Father. He has made alive, has redeemed, and given the victory to these who are his. Conversely, he has killed, bound, and destroyed they who are strangers to him. He has given glory to the Father who sent him, 25 and the entire kingdom of life. Blessed is he who will know these mysteries; for he will count to the portion of Jesus, the son of greatness.

69. Augustine on Manichaean Christology

Aug., c. Faust. XX.2, 536.9–24 and XX.11, 550.14–19; trans. S. Llewelyn and S. Lieu.

(Faustus says:) 'Therefore, we worship one and the same deity under a tripartite name of Father, even God omnipotent, Christ his son, and the Holy Spirit. Yet we believe that the Father indeed inhabits the highest and first light which Paul otherwise calls inaccessible; that the Son in truth dwells in this second and visible light. Seeing that he is himself also two, as the apostle recognised saying that Christ is the virtue and wisdom of God, we believe his virtue dwells in the sun, but his wisdom in the moon. And also we confess this whole circle of atmosphere to be the seat and lodging of the Holy Spirit which is the third power. From its strength and spiritual libation the earth conceives and begets the suffering Jesus, who is the life and salvation of men, hung from the tree for everyone. Also, for this reason religious observance is for us almost universal and similarly for you equal towards food and utensil, though you detest most strongly the makers of them. This is our belief . . .'

(Augustine says:) 'Again, tell us how many Christs you say there are. Is there one whom you call the suffering one whom the earth conceives and brings forth by the power of the Holy Spirit, he who is not only suspended from every tree, but also reclining on the grass; and another crucified by the Jews under Pontius Pilate; and a third who is divided between the sun and the moon?'

70. A psalm by Herakleides

We have placed this psalm (PsBk2. 187.2–36, ed. and trans. Allberry, adapted by Iain Gardner) here with other Christological material because it is an account, one might say, of the 'risen Christ'; except, of course, that Jesus did not die on the cross. The Manichaeans subverted the narrative of the passion, utilising powerful prior traditions[27] to present a deeper and truer meaning of its mystery.

[27] Note here in lines 24–9 use of the Ev. Thom. logion 38; see also ActJoh c. 98. Cf. Richter (1992) esp. 257–8.

187 Mariam, Mariam, know me: do not touch me.
(Stem) the tears of your eyes and know me that I am your master:
Only touch me not, for I have not yet seen the face of my Father.

Your god was not stolen away, according to the thoughts of your littleness:
Your god did not die, rather he mastered death.
I am not the gardener. I have given, I have received the . . . , I appeared (not) to you:
Until I saw your tears and your grief . . . for me.

Cast this sadness away from you and do this service:
Be a messenger for me to these wandering orphans.
Make haste rejoicing, and go unto the eleven:
You shall find them gathered together on the bank of the Jordan.

The traitor persuaded them to be fishermen as they were at first, and to lay down their nets with which they caught men unto life.

Say to them, 'Arise, let us go, it is your brother that calls you.'
If they scorn my brotherhood, say to them, 'It is your master.'
If they disregard my mastership, say to them, 'It is your Lord.'
Use all skill and advice until you have brought the sheep to the shepherd.

If you see that their wits are gone, draw Simon Peter unto you:
Say to him, 'Remember what I uttered between you and me.'
'Remember what I said between you and me in the Mount of Olives:
"I have something to say, I have none to whom to say it." '

Rabbi, my master, I will serve your commandment in the joy of my whole heart.
I will not give rest to my heart, I will not give sleep to my eyes,
I will not give rest to my feet until I have brought the sheep to the fold.

Glory to Mariam, because she listened to her master:
She served his commandment in the joy of her whole heart.
(Glory and) victory to the soul of the blessed Maria.

71. The great war and the last judgement

The 'Sermon of the Great War' (Hom. 7.8–42.8) must be dated to the first generations after the death of Mani, because (amongst other telling reasons) it is ascribed to the apostle's disciple Koustaios. It reveals a powerful apocalyptic vision of the community in suffering, but looking forward to their forthcoming vindication over the forces of evil. The end times are already breaking in upon history. For the historian of religion, and in terms of understanding Manichaean identity, the mix of Judaeo-Christian and Iranian themes, fashioned by Mani's own particular genius into something unique, provides many clues.

We present here a much abbreviated text[28] in translation (by Iain Gardner), focusing on the final passages: the last judgement, the collapse of the cosmos, and the final return to the Father.

(7.8–8.30) The Sermon of the Great War:

Let us venerate our good father, and (glorify 10 our) redeemer! For he has unveiled every thing: He has taught us about every matter, and spread them before (us. He gave) us the knowledge of the beginning, he taught us the (mysteries) of the middle, and also the separation of the end, . . . and the annihilation of the worlds, which is prepared for 15 the bodies and the spirits.

Our father, our apostle, did not abandon us in want. Indeed, whilst in our midst he was giving us help, supporting us greatly; also, on the day of his coming forth, he bequeathed his good to the orphans and the widows. He has also taught 20 us to praise him, to give glory . . . the lessons of truth. He has proclaimed to (us . . .) children . . . the world. The creation, the battles 25 . . . the beaker of wrath which is prepared for the great inhabited world. A bloody chalice and a beaker of . . . slaughter which is prepared for the worlds. . . . kingdom which is prepared for this land beneath . . . the nobles, the free, the slaves, 30 what is evil and what is good . . . in it . . . 8 for ever.

Many have testified to (the great war). All the apostles have proclaimed it. The prophets preached about it. Its fame is spread in the entire world. Further, its origin is with all the sects. 5 (Many) years and human generations ago they began to prepare . . . it in the heights. Now a great . . . Its sound will rise to heaven. (Now) is coming a time of trial, which can put to the proof they who are (evil and they who are) good; it is coming to the inhabited world and 10 . . . to Babylon and all its children. Annihilation is coming to flesh, as destruction is coming . . . , as despoliation is coming upon possessions, as war is being waged on the kings, as . . . wrath. The [28] The editio princeps was published by H. J. Polotsky in 1934 (Polotsky (1934b)), and a facsimile edition by S. Giversen in 1986. A major study of the work was published by Nils Arne Pedersen (Pedersen 1996), who is also soon to publish a revised edition of the entire codex for the Corpus Fontium Manichaeorum. Gardner has had the advantage of viewing a draft of this latter revision; and, although this translation was based on Polotsky's Coptic text, some readings are influenced by Pedersen to our certain benefit.

sword may be drawn in an [15] instant: retribution comes on retribution, a thousand are coming to reap the grain. The evil-doer: he can receive his retribution. While the world will remain on fire, all the cities will persist in turmoil. Their inhabitants will take up arms. The earth that they dwell upon: their blood [20] can flow over it. The sun which shines upon them every day: it can shine upon their corpses. (All) the free will mourn; the free and the slaves . . .

The trumpet will sound! . . . the battle . . . [25] . . . slays and he smites and he does not spare at all. On that day they are crushed (?) . . . like flocks of sheep if wolves will (fall) upon them, and they scatter out from their gathering. [30] A lion upon a herd of calves.

(9.19–27) [20] That day of fear, this time of trial which is coming to everyone: See then, that day comes and can speak no lie in its coming. See, its very . . . is imminent. They that have passed by are more than they that remain. Year by year, that time [25] comes, to give retribution . . . It comes like these . . . ; it may be like a trap, like lightening . . . the night.

(14.16–31) All the apostles have suffered, weeping, and their churches in each generation; for they were despised and crucified, they struck them in every city. They poured their blood out [20] upon the earth. The wild beasts have eaten their flesh. The bones have remained in the wilderness, like some robbers, as if they had done evil. They passed their life, made righteous men of light; and the world has repaid them evil. They did not indulge in its "good things", nor also did they revel in its [25] pleasures. They spent their time there hungering and (thirsting); and it turned its back to them. It has given evil repayment to them. Every (thing), if God has appointed to make it happen, . . . the (powers of) the world do it not.

Therefore, all the apostles have wept. They proclaimed . . . [30] this battle book after book: from Adam . . . till today. Its hour has not yet . . .

Then follows the account of the terrible war (omitted here), followed by the renewal of the church:

(27.28–29.18) Henceforward, from the war on, the church will not be weak. From (that time the) [30] melody of the psalms comes forth . . . in each city. The catechumens (will find) strength to give alms the more . . . you may find the catechumens as they . . . 28 the commandments of the election. The church will not be moved, being constant; so that some among us might be found at that time even until the antichrist. My lord says: [5] some might behold him among they of this human generation;[29] – of we, who have looked on my lord Mannichaios![30] Therefore, the new generation is come, and it is decided upon its good. They will find the brilliance (?) of his mysteries in the wisdom of my lord Mannichaios and his 10 church. They will come and find the scriptures are written, and the books are adorned. They will find the table and they that prepare it. They will find the churches . . . , they will find all these things after the war. Indeed, the church will not be hindered from this time; 15 from now till the day of Jesus, and until all (flesh (?)) is worn out.

The Gospel and The Picture(-Book) and the possessions, which the church has fashioned . . . of the holy ones which it has built, and the possessions which it has left in the world: These 20 . . . will come and find them. They did not . . . them. The scriptures of the apostle (of the light), they will give honour to them by their . . . they being honoured by their mouths, like these . . . will set them upon the judgement seat . . . 25 . . . venerate their name. Also, the body (of the apostle of) the light: A great mourning (will come about) because of it. At the hour when they will . . . in each land. They will mourn . . . of the apostle of the light. . . . 30 . . . that may find him at that time. . . . which were prepared today, being . . . this last. For, behold, the path of . . .

29 They have distributed the gifts, they have . . . among the friends of love. Behold the sects: they have been smitten, they have been destroyed! Behold the alms: it has been apportioned amongst they who gave it. Behold the spring of water: they have dug it down, they have (planted) 5 the good tree upon it. Behold the battle-standard: they have unfurled it! Behold the sword that can slay the lust. Behold the tribunal of the truth: they have prepared it. Behold the two ways: they have been separated.

This work the apostle of the light did in the land of the . . . 10 of Babylon, in the years of the kingdom of Persia. This truth was unveiled in the world. My lord says to us also, 'After the great war, until the days of Jesus the redeemer: Every thing I have written and set it down, I have made necessary 15 for my children until they do it. At that occasion they will perfect all the commandments, the small ones and the great, just as it is written. Love will dwell in all their hearts.'

Here follows one of the most important and continuous accounts (despite the lacunae) of the last things: the return of Jesus, the last judgement, the destruction of the universe and absolute containment of evil, the new aeon and the return to the Father.

[29] Cf. Mark 13.30. [30] On this spelling, see the comments of Augustine in 59, supra; also 46.

(35.11–42.8) . . . the advent of this glorious one . . . is likened to what? At that time . . . a great . . . [15] which is among them, for . . . outwards . . . the city. This is the way that the heavens and the . . . will resound and reverberate . . . all of them . . . the abysses below . . . [20] all the ones that are purified . . . of righteousness . . . the glory which can become great . . . that great . . . The judge of the truth, who may unveil . . . [25] . . . the king of the virgins . . . he can reveal . . . to give judgement . . . to judge the peoples, to justify his church. He is coming to separate out the goats, and set them apart from his sheep. He might be like the head of the . . . [30] . . . and weak ones . . . 36 . . . and he . . . the moon.

. . . [5] . . . as they walk . . . the diadems of honour . . . him, they who sound the trumpets of the truth; . . . flute, sounding them before him. They will beat [10] the glorious kettle-drum, and its reverberation will be heard in every world! They will gather the worlds before him, like a flock of sheep before the shepherd. Masses upon masses (will come), making rows; and they bow at his feet, worshipping in front of him. The angels [15] . . . will receive authority and gather all flesh before him. Every race and every language will glorify him, all of them at one time. Every "mixed" god,[31] the (bound (?)) and the loosened, they will all bless the (king (?)) who is sweet. Every purified and holy god, they will [20] . . . his power and his happiness . . . [25] . . . all languages, the laws and the sects. They will worship him, making supplication before him. His virgins and his continent ones: They will open their mouths . . . [30] his glory.

He will come down and prepare his judgement seat in the midst of the great inhabited world . . . 37 . . . idol . . . of this world . . . stand fast . . . god . . . [5] . . . set firm . . . catechumens . . . they have served his church . . . in his . . . [10] . . . on his left side . . . the sentence which is coming forth from his mouth. . . . then the great shining one will open his mouth and he . . . [15] the great and blessed king of kings. By his sweet blessed mouth he can proclaim his glorious word. And by the sound of his living word all the languages will understand that he is . . . each country and language. They will . . . [20] the interpretation of his words. And in front of his . . . his throne.

There are four kindreds . . . One is that of the kings and the nobles . . . the races of the entire world; the idol-worshippers . . . the kindreds . . . [25] . . . One are all the sects . . . of all the worlds . . . the elect and the catechumens (?) . . .

38 . . . you gave me food . . . Then, they to the right side . . . be astonished, for the one that [5] . . . thirst . . . freely, and they say (to him: On which) day (did we see you), our Lord? (. . . Then he) may say to them: Whatever you have . . . 10 . . . because of my name, because of . . . you have served me.[32] Also, I . . . who are to his right side, he can justify and (give to them) the victory; who are the catechumens . . . they whom he has summoned to the kingdom of the light. 15 And his righteous ones and his virgins he has made like the angels. On the other hand, the goats, who are to his left side, will see the confidence that he has given the ones to the right side. Their heart will rejoice for a moment, as they think that the victory of the sheep will come to them too! Then he will 20 (turn to the) ones on the left side, and he speaks and he says to them: . . . me, they who are cursed. Go to the fire, the devil and his powers! In that I was hungry and thirsted . . . not one of you did help (me . . .) they that are (to the) right . . . 25 . . . They will answer and say: (On which day) did we see (you), our Lord?[33] . . . these . . .

[31] I.e the divine conjoined to matter.

39 . . . in every world . . . the earth; the gods, the angels who have come with him; the gods, the angels and the elect being mingled and partaking in the glory . . . 5 will smite the sin and sweep it away, with (every) wicked thing in the universe. Then the trees will open (their mouths) and speak; for indeed there is no persecutor in the . . . , for she acted ill against the truth. The catechumens . . . Therefore, this king of the light . . . 10 . . . he being revealed . . . look on him with the eyes of the body, like . . . today. They will look on him . . . the image of the light; as they all are glad, (rejoicing) over him. The lust will be removed from them, and also the (other) 15 sorts of temptation. When they wish, they will be stripped of their body, and receive the victory from him. (And they find) the path, it being made smooth from him upwards to the kingdom of life. Then he may reign in the midst of his chosen ones for a great time. And after these things he rises up to 20 his gods and his angels. His . . . will follow after him.

Then, after Jesus, the obliteration of the universe . . . him. Flesh will wear away, little by little, and be wiped out from the universe. Until the . . . 25 flesh wears away and perishes and all . . . is purified to the heights. The universe . . . and it remains, made waste . . . and it remains like this for a great age . . . entire, from the great to the . . . 30 . . . only the earth, which is set firm . . . , and the trees which are verdant, and the . . . which are shining, as they are drawn there and are . . .

Then, after the age of its wasting . . . they who have built it will make a sign to their . . . 35 . . . the fire . . . 40 . . . the prisoners of war come out from it, and they . . . the free women who . . . to their kingdom, the one that the First Man . . . will unveil his face and draw his sons to him. 5 . . . the [32] Cf. Matt. 25:37–40. [33] Cf. Matt. 25:41–45.

Living Spirit. They will stretch out the Porter, that he can ascend and rise upwards and . . . great house of his father; that he can cast his . . . the rest comes to be. Then the Keeper of Splendour will stay his hand, and the first of the garments [10] . . . the King of Honour will . . . the King of Glory will proceed . . . can rise up to the heights. They will make a sign . . . all of you arise! The Adamas . . . who watches over his brethren, will proceed to the heights. [15] All the . . . will be redeemed, and they go forth from every . . . of the universe; the ones outside of it and the ones within it. The one who carries the weight, and they who . . . all the free will be released. . . . of the light.

There are some among them . . . [20] . . . to the light. There are also some . . . Again, there are some who may remain in this place . . . out like this . . . The sphere will sink down below by its weight . . . below will sink down. The three pits . . . [25] . . . the earth. Its destruction will come about . . . 41 . . . [5] all of it, which this fire has burnt. He can . . . new . . . He can confine the darkness in to the grave, its maleness and its femaleness. He can cover . . . it, and he obliterates the sinners . . . , as he . . . ; [10] but (they are (?)) different from the . . . in it.

Also, after these things the aeons (. . . the Father of) Greatness. He can give to them what they (beseech of him). He can give the grace to his fighters, they whom he (sent) to the contest with the darkness. The veils will be rolled back and gathered, [15] and he unveils to them his image! The entire light will be immersed in him! They will go in to the treasury. They will also come forth from him in glory . . . king, in the two kingdoms. On the one hand: the King of the aeons of the light, he is the Father, the Light King . . . [20] On the other hand: the king of the new aeon is the First Man . . . and the (Last) Statue . . . and the apostles and the . . . sabbath will count to the . . . king will count to the lord's day; in that . . . [25] . . . alone for ever . . . for ever and ever . . .

42 . . . [5] . . . our father, all they who sit . . . today, as they watch over this mourning and this fasting.

It has been completed, namely the Sermon of the Great War.

72. Four recently edited Kephalaia

For many decades the publication of the Coptic Medinet Madi codices was halted, and as regards The Kephalaia of the Teacher it had ended in the midst of kephalaion 122. However, in 1999, just as this present volume was being collated, publication resumed under the charge of Wolf-Peter Funk. Here we have selected four short passages, and provide a first English translation (by Iain Gardner).

Kephalaion 126 'Concerning Jesus, the Virgin and the Light Mind' (302.17–303.15).

20 Once again the apostle speaks: Jesus Splendour and the Virgin and the Light Mind and the great Mind, it is these three[34] who have been revealed in this world, the ones that are made apparent through all the apostles and the fathers of the good in each generation; and they have revealed 25 the mysteries in the world.

Indeed, Jesus Splendour, he who came and was revealed in the world: They crucified him through the enemy, against whom he stood firm. This occurred (corresponding) to the mystery of the First Man, he who came at the beginning against the enemy; while he has his 30 holy body, which is his sons, . . .

For her part, the Virgin of Light, she who . . . and continues purifying the life, while she . . . the mystery 303 of the Great Spirit, the Mother of Life, she who[35] . . . set up all things . . .

For his part, the Light Mind . . . church, and plants . . . 5 . . . signifying the mystery of the Living Spirit; he who set in order and constructed all . . . that are below, he set them . . .

Now, like these three great fathers: the First Man and the Great Spirit, who is the Mother of Life, 10 and the Living Spirit; indeed, like the champions who have done the will of the greatness for which they were sent; again, this is just like Jesus Splendour and the Light Virgin and the Great Mind.

Behold, . . . and they perfect their work, to go 15 up and rest themselves in the heights.

Kephalaion 136 'Concerning the birth of the two men: the new man and the old man; how they are born . . .' (337.10–338.18)

Once again the apostle speaks: Two births occur, 15 not resembling one another!

The first birth is of the flesh; the second is the birth of the spirit. When the person shall be born in the flesh, there shall be need of a care-taker, a nourisher.[36] This one, the one who will nourish . . . 20 . . . However, if he should not add to him a good nourisher, to make him well fed . . . come from the life of people.

[34] The duplication of the figure of the Mind may be supposed a textual corruption.
[35] Funk's text should be slightly emended to provide this evident meaning.
[36] The construction of the Coptic text is most unclear, and has probably been corrupted; but this translation represents what we regard as the evident meaning.

The second is the birth of the spirit. Whenever one shall be born . . . in the birth of the spirit, if then he finds a 25 care-taker and a useful nourisher, then he can . . . and he lives in the life . . . do goodness . . . out from his body . . . receive . . . 338 . . . new man.[37]

However, if he should not find . . . a veritable[38] teacher and a true nourisher . . . him, the ones that do not walk in . . . 5 . . . as through the transmigration above . . . he may receive a beneficial (?) judgement and shall not find rest . . . and he ascends for a great period.

On this account, blessed is every person who gives his attention to a true and perfect teacher, walking on the path of righteousness; and 10 at no time shall he set aside his habit. He receives teaching from him towards his righteousness and his godliness, so that he might find eternal life; and also flee from the evil, wicked teacher . . . gives an evil teaching, and he does signs . . . wickedness, and he falls into duplicity 15 . . . drives him to foolishness and he falls into . . . and laxities. They who achieve the requital of the suffering . . . which is suffered, are the ones who shall receive a great crown.

Kephalaion 138 'Who is the one who sins, and afterwards he makes repentance?' (340.20–341.24)

Once again one among the disciples stood up . . . questioning the apostle. He says to him, 'I (entreat) 25 you, my master, that you might tell me: Who (is this one) who shall sin and afterwards beseech absolution? Or, this one who shall receive teaching and (afterwards) is forgetful? Or, who is the (good) teacher? I ask you that you might open my eyes . . . '

30 The apostle says to him, '(I am the one who can instruct you in) 341 the lessons about which you have questioned me. This one that shall sin is no other than this living soul, the one that (indwells) the body of sin; because it is set (in) mixture. Another one: the old man dwells with it in (the body). 5 It shall cause (the soul) to stumble, as it makes it do (what is) not (right) for it. However, when it may make it sin, the Mind shall immediately give for (the soul) the remembrance of its sin that it has done. And in the remembrance of the Mind it shall shake off the sin and beseech the Light Mind 10 for absolution, and its sin is forgiven it.

Again, the one that shall receive teaching and be forgetful: It is the soul, the one that shall receive teaching from the Light Mind. The one that [37] This must surely be the meaning of the text, although it is difficult to reconcile with the traces recorded by Funk. In any case, the general sense is clear. Since line 337.22 Mani has been discussing someone who is born in the spirit. Such a person must find the right nourishment in order to grow and become established in the "new man". Now, from line 338, 1 he will explain what happens if this does not occur.

[38] We suggest that one might read here ἀληθής.

gives it teaching shall give it the remembrance of its first essence; and it is forgetful of its teaching because the old man [15] dwells with it. (The soul) is given pain by him. On account of this it shall be forgetful, and it errs due to its affliction.

And, for its part, its teacher that gives teaching for it, casting repentance in its heart: It is the Light Mind. This one shall come from above. It is the "ray" [20] of the holy enlightener, the one that shall come shining on the soul; and it makes it pure and gives light to it and guides it to the land of light, from which it came at the beginning. And (the soul) can separate itself another time, and (go) up to its first essence.'

Kephalaion 145 'Three moons that exist' (348.12–27)

Once again the apostle speaks: 'This moon that is named "our hope", it is made of three moons! [15] And these three are the hope of everything.

One is the moon that is apparent in the firmament, which is the hope . . . numeration, that of the days, that of the months and that of the years.

The second moon is the spring of the living waters, which [20] ascend from the side below, as it appears . . . upon this earth. It is the hope and the life of every person.

The third is the Light Mind, the one that shall come and give the hope of life for the spirits and . . . [25] in all the generations of the world, generation by generation. It is the beautiful hope of all souls, the righteous and the true people.'

73. Manichaean and other 'errors' concerning the destiny of the soul after death (Christian polemic)

This passage (edited by Lefort in Bang and Gabain (1929)) comes from the work of Shenoute: 'Who Speaks through the Prophet' = 'The Lord is long-suffering' (T41).[39] This is not the same text as another of Shenoute's works which deals with Manichaeans: 'And it is also good for us to say to you' = De actis Archelai, [39] This translation by I. Gardner. The text is attested primarily in White Monastery Codex ZM, of which Paris BN Copte 131[4] f.158b (translated here) is a part. In the ancient page numbering of the codex it runs from p. 42 col. A onwards (f. 157 in the Paris MS), to somewhere after p. 66; leaves from the codex after p. 44 are held in collections other than the BN. From p.66 onwards it is lost in a lacuna. See Emmel (1993) sv. Codex ZM. Citations from the work are also found in some White Monastery lectionaries. Editions of 'Who Speaks through the Prophet' from White Monastery Codex ZM: p. 42.a.10 – end 42b = Paris, BN Copte. 131[4] 157 (-158a?): ined. ?; p. 43.a.1 – end of 44 = Paris, BN Copte. 131[4] 158b: summarised and ed. Lefort in Bang and Gabain (1929) 429–30; pp. 53–54 = IB 7.30: ed. Zoega (1810) CCXI/1, Amélineau (1914) II, 189–93; pp. 59–60 = IB 7.31: ed. Zoega (1810) CCXI/2, Amélineau (1914) II, 189–93; pp. 65–6 = Vienna Kopt.9257: ed. C. Wessely, SPP XVIII 287 (pp. 127–8); plus (?) pp. 63–4 = Cairo, Egyptian Museum 9280: ed. Munier (1916) 135–7.

(Logoi 8, work 16, ed. Leipoldt CSCO 42, no. 36, 109–10). Comments by Shenoute on Manichaeans are also found in Logoi 8, work 27, De Vetere Testamento contra Manichaeos = 'And we will also say this other thing'; and (more briefly) in de sapientia magistratuum, which precedes 'Who Speaks through the Prophet' in White Monastery Codex ZM (Berl. 1611[4], = pp. 17–18 of the codex, ed. Leipoldt CSCO 42, no 14, 32–3).

The section of 'Who Speaks through the Prophet' featured here is closely related to the Acta Archelai, see Polotsky (1932); the author clearly knew of the Acta, either in the Greek (or in a Coptic translation?), or perhaps through the excerpts in Epiphanius's Panarion (see supra, 58). On the work see now Lucchesi (1999), esp. 73–75 (although some codicological details in Lucchesi's treatment on 73–74 should be corrected, see Emmel (1993) sv. Codex zm).

For, indeed, some say that this body will not rise, and that another one is given to its place; but others that, if the person should die, his soul shall go in to a robber; and others that it shall go in to the beasts; and others that it shall come to be floating in the atmosphere.

However, some say that the souls of the pagans shall come to be rising with the sun and the moon and the stars in the heavens; but others that they are taken to an island beyond the sea, that place – they say – where are the gods of the nations, and this is where they think that the souls will remain . . . Indeed, these things are what the pagans think.

However, the Manichaean: They say that if a soul which has been murdered should die, it shall be changed to a leprous body. And they also add to their godlessness: They say that the atmosphere is the soul of the animals and the people and the birds and the fish and the reptiles, and everything which is in the universe. Even more they say, that this body is not of God but of matter, and that it is darkness and must do darkness. And again, heaven and earth, they say that they are not of God. They reject the words of the holy prophets, saying that whoever would follow after them will die; and there are all their other acts of blasphemy that they say, whenever, against God and his Christ and all the holy ones. So much has he told us of their profanities, namely the one who has understood all their wickedness, the holy messenger of the lord, Athanasius the Archbishop. So again we have understood the error of many heretics, from his letters. And some, they destroy their soul . . .

CHAPTER 6

Worship and ethic

For a summary of the principles and practice of Manichaean religious life see Introduction (pp. 21–5). The following extracts again give emphasis to Manichaean writings in Coptic that are not widely known, supplemented by some classic descriptions by Augustine.

74. The essential precepts of the elect and the catechumens

This 'Chapter of the Commandments of Righteousness' (kephalaion 80, 192.3–193.22) contains a summary of the essential precepts held by the elect and the catechumens; arranged in two sets of two by three.

The first righteousness of the elect has three parts: to refrain from all sexual activity; to take great care not to harm the light-soul trapped everywhere in matter and especially vegetation (the Cross of Light), for instance by plucking fruit; and not to consume meat or alcohol (192.8–13). These correspond to the three seals of mouth, hands and breast discussed by Augustine (signacula oris, manuum et sinus; de mor. Manich. VII.10; IX.18); and also referred to in eastern Manichaean texts.

The second: to multiply wisdom, faith and grace.

The first righteousness of the catechumenate: fasting, prayer and alms-giving. The catechumens had to support the elect who could do no labour, farming or cooking.

The third: to give someone to the church; to share in their good works; to donate some church structure. The catechumens were allowed to marry and procreate, but were expected to compensate in this way.

Once more the enlightener speaks to his disciples: 'Know and understand that the first righteousness a person will do to make truly righteous is this: he can embrace continence and purity. And he can also acquire "the rest 10 of the hands", so that he will keep his hand still before the Cross of Light. The third is purity of the mouth, so that he will keep his mouth pure of all flesh and blood; and not take any taste at all of the "wine" name, nor fermented drink. This is the first righteousness. If a person will do it in his body, 15 he is pronounced righteous by all mankind.

Then, the second righteousness that he should do is this: He can add to it . . . wisdom and faith so that . . . from his wisdom he can give wisdom, to every person who will hear it from him. And also from his faith he can give faith, [20] to these who belong to the faith. From his grace he can give freely of love, shower it upon them, that he might join them to him. For, when that one acquires a great riches . . . in righteousness. By this second godliness he may cause others to be sent, resembling him in righteousness. [25] Just as this righteous one should fulfil the second and become a perfect elect; so too, if the catechumen shall be a catechumen of the faith, he is perfected in two stages.

The first work of the catechumenate that he [30] does is fasting, prayer, and alms-giving. Now, the fasting by which he can fast is this: he can fast on the lord's day and rest from the deeds of the world. And the prayer is this: 193 he can pray to the sun and the moon, the great light-givers. The alms-giving also is this: he can place it . . . in the holy one, and give it to them in righteousness . . .

The second work of the catechumenate that he [5] does is this: A person will give a child to the church for the (sake of) righteousness, or his relative or member of the household; or he can rescue someone beset by trouble; or buy a slave, and give him for righteousness. Accordingly, every good he might do, namely this one whom he gave as a gift for [10] righteousness; that catechumen . . . will share in with them. Thirdly: A person will build a dwelling or construct some place; so they can become for him a portion of alms in the holy church.

If the catechumen shall fulfil [15] these three great works, these three great alms that he gives as a gift for the holy church . . . which these alms will achieve. Also, that catechumen himself, who gave them, he can . . . as he shares in them. The catechumens who will give . . . [20] have great love therein, and a share of every grace and good in the holy church. They will find many graces.'

75. The archetypes of ritual action

In kephalaion 9 (37.28–42.23: 'The explanation of the Peace: what it is; the Right Hand; the Kiss; the Salutation') the ritual actions that occur in human society, and which Mani has initiated in his church, are presented as reenactments of divine archetypes. Mani's lesson is carefully structured, and provides many important details and insights into Manichaean doctrine and church practice.

The descent of the First Man from the land of light was a favourite theme. Full of the pathos of loss and estrangement, it is in a very real sense the story of each soul. Thus this text makes much of the familial love and care within the divine household (38.13–39.9). Once the sacrifice of the First Man has been achieved, he is saved by the Living Spirit and returns to the kingdom. This establishes and sanctifies the process of redemption; and, while it occurs at the beginning of the history, it also anticipates the triumphant return at the end of time of the collectivity of the divine, with the First Man at their head, to enter the new aeon (39.10–40.19).

Now that the primordial archetypes have been established, Mani immediately relates them to the individual's experience and the practice of the church (40.24–41.10). Mani then utilises the symbols to focus on the glorious hope offered to the victorious soul, when it meets the Light Form and receives its prizes (41.11–25). The lesson ends with the injunction to its hearers to honour and practice this divine teaching (41.26–42.23).

Once again the disciples questioned the apostle, saying to him: 'This peace and this greeting that occur in the world, from whom did they come forth? Or likewise, the right hand that occurs in the world, it being honoured by mankind, of whom is it? Or the mystery 35 of the kiss that they embrace one another with, . . . ? Or who is the one that reveals this 38 salutation with which they make obeisance to one another? Or this laying on of hands, which an immensely great one bequeaths upon his inferior, giving him an honour and making him great; of whom is this laying on of hands?'

Then he says to his disciples 5: 'You have questioned me about these five lessons. Now, they are displayed in the world as miniatures, being made little; and yet indeed they are great and honoured. I am the one who can reveal to you their mystery! So, these five signs are the mystery of the First Man. He came forth with 10 them from the aeon of light. Also, when he finished his contest, he went up with these good signs. They received him into the aeons of light.

The first peace is the one that the gods and the angels in the land of light gave to the First Man, when he comes 15 out against the enemy. The gods and the angels were walking with him; escorting him, giving to him their peace and power, and their blessing and fortification. This is the first peace that the gods and the angels gave to the First Man, as he comes forth from the aeon of light.

20 The first right hand is the one that the Mother of Life gave to the First Man, when he comes out to the contest.

The first kiss is this one with which the Mother of Life embraced the First Man; as he separates from her, coming down to the contest. Even all the gods and the 25 angels who are in the aeons of light were making to embrace him! . . . all of them also, and the church tutelaries (?), and the kinsfolk who belong to the household of his people. They were making to embrace him as he separates from them, accompanying him out, embracing him with the kiss of affection and love.

30 The first salutation is the salutation with which the First Man made obeisance, when he comes out to the depths below. He was bending his knees, making obeisance to the God of truth, and all the aeons of light 39 who belong to the household of his people; entreating them for a power to escort him,[1] as he comes forth.

The first laying on of hands is the one that the Mother of Life bequeathed upon the head of the First Man. She armed him and made him 5 mighty. She laid hands on him, and sent him to the battle. He descended. He completed his struggle with the great powers and the enmity.

By these five signs and these five mysteries the First Man came forth from the aeons of light against the enemy. He humbled him. He was victorious against him by them. 10 Also, when he ascended from the war, he came in to the kingdom of the household of his people by these five mysteries.

The peace with which he ascended is the peace that the summons gave to him, when it was sent forth from the Father of Life. It gave him the peace in the world of darkness. 15 Also, that peace with which he descended is the same as the one with which he ascended from the struggle! Therefore, appropriate to the mystery of that peace, which the summons gave the First Man, did this peace here and now come about. It was named and heard among the powers of the Father.

Again, this 20 second right hand is the one that the Living Spirit gave the First Man, when he brought him upward out from the struggle. Appropriate to the mystery of that right hand this right hand has come about; the one that occurs in the midst of mankind, as they give it to their companions, it being honoured and . . .

